JUDICIAL AND STATUTORY DEFINITIONS

OF

WORDS AND PHRASES.

VOLUME 3.

DEPOSITOR.

See "General Depositor."

Gen. St. 1876, c. 96, declaring that any person or "depositor" of wheat in an elevator shall be treated as having made a bailment of the wheat and not a sale, should not be limited to persons making an actual physical deposit of the grain, but, inasmuch as the issuing of warehouse receipts by a warehouseman for his own grain actually in store transfers the title and legal possession to the holder of the receipts and makes the warehouseman the holder's bailee, the word "depositor" must be construed to include all persons actually holding grain in store, whether deposited by themselves, or by others to whose rights they have succeeded. National Exch. Bank v. Wilder, 24 N. W. 699, 701, 34 Minn. 149.

A "voluntary deposit" is made by one giving to another, with his consent, the possession of personal property to keep for the benefit of the former or of a third party. The person giving is called the "depositor," and the person receiving the "depository." Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 4001; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 1353; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 2825.

In a bank.

A "depositor" is one who pays money into a bank to be placed to his credit and to be subject to his check. Commonwealth v. Sponsler, 16 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 116, 119.

A "bank depositor" is one who delivers to, or leaves with a bank, money subject to his order. Anheuser-Busch Brewing Ass'n v. Clayton (U. S.) 56 Fed. 759, 761, 6 C. C. A. 108.

A "depositor" is a beneficiary of a fund held by the bank as trustee. Kimball v. Norton, 59 N. H. 1, 6, 47 Am. Rep. 171.

"Depositors" in a bank, in the usual meaning of the word, are those who put their money on deposit in the usual course of business. Those who deposit it under special agreement or contract are but creditors of the bank under their contracts. In re Brandywine Bank's Estate, 1 Ches. Co. Rep. 431, 432.

The term "depositors," as used in Act 1862, § 10, providing that the capital stock of savings banks shall be a security to depositors who are not stockholders, was intended to include deposits for which certificates of deposit had been issued, as well as those made upon open account and subject to check. Murphy v. Pacific Bank, 62 Pac. 1059, 1061, 130 Cal. 542.

Originally a "deposit" was a thing delivered for gratuitous safe-keeping, and it remained the property of the owner, but it is now used to designate a certain kind of loan, for money deposited in the ordinary way becomes the property of the bank or banker, and the deposit is a debt. Such loans always imply that the money on deposit is lying in the bank on hand ready to meet the demand of the owner, and that it is kept there for convenience, and hence a bank which has made another bank the creditor on which it may draw is not a "depositor." State Sav. Bank v. Foster, 76 N. W. 499, 500, 118 Mich. 268, 42 L. R. A. 404.

One whose money is intermingled with the general funds of a bank to an ascertained amount, who is acknowledged by the bank to be a creditor to that amount, who is under no obligation to permit the money to remain there, is a "depositor." Catlin v. Savings Bank, 7 Conn. 487, 492.

DEPOSITORY.

Depositories are not public officers of the United States, but are instruments or agencies to keep the public funds. They are agencies sui generis and sui juris. Banks which have been made the depositories of money received from the treasurer or collector of taxes in the districts fixed by law for collectors to pay immediately to them are not regarded as "public officers" of the state, in the sense of that term as used in Code, §§ 148-171. A bank can hardly be called an officer. It cannot well be tried for misdemeanor, and be punished under section 156 of the Code, and the entire chapter appears to be dealing with individuals, not banks. Colquitt v. Simpson, 72 Ga. 501, 510.

DEPOSITUM.

Depositum "is a bare naked bailment of goods delivered by one man to another to keep for the use of the bailor." Per Holt, C. J., in Coggs v. Bernard, 2 Ld. Raym. 909, 912.

Depositum "is the term used in the civil and common law to designate a naked bailment without reward and without any special undertaking." Foster v. Essex Bank, 17 Mass. 479, 498, 9 Am. Dec. 168.

A "depositum" is a naked bailment of goods, to be kept for the bailor without reward, and to be returned when he shall require it. It is a contract by which one of the contracting parties gives a thing to another to keep, who is to do so gratuitously, and obliges himself to return it when he shall be requested. Johnson v. Reynolds, 3 Kan. 257, 261.

DEPOT.

See, also, "Station."

"Webster defines 'depot' to be a place of deposit for storing goods; a warehouse; a storehouse. Worcester defines it as 'a place where any kind of goods is deposited; a storehouse; a warehouse.'" State v. Edwards, 19 S. W. 91, 92, 109 Mo. 315.

A bill of lading exempting the carrier from liability for loss or damage by fire or the elements "while at depots," only refers to depots at which the cars may be stopped while in transit, and before the freight reaches its destination. E. O. Stanard Milling Co. v. Whitelime Central Transit Co., 26 S. W. 704, 708, 122 Mo. 258.

As building or warehouse.

See "Building (In Criminal Law)"; "In Depot"; "Warehouse."

As freight or passenger station.

See "Freight Depot"; "Regular Depot."

"Depot" is generally understood to be the place where a carrier is accustomed to receive merchandise, deposit it, and keep it ready for transportation or delivery. Maghee v. Camden & A. R. Transp. Co., 45 N. Y. 514, 520.

As applied to railroads, a "depot" is a place where passengers are received and deposited, and where freight is deposited for delivery. Maghee v. Camden & A. R. Transp. Co., 45 N. Y. 514, 520; State v. New Haven & N. Co., 37 Conn. 153, 163 (cited and approved in Plunkett v. Minneapolis, S. S. M. & A. R. Co., 48 N. W. 519, 79 Wis. 222; Fowler v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co., 21 Wis. 77, 79).

The term "depot" may be properly applied to a building erected alongside a railroad track within which there was a telegraph office with telegraphic instruments and a ticket office, which building was occupied by the company's station men and agent, who operated the telegraph, sold tickets for the company to passengers, operated the switch and water tank, and handled freight and baggage, there being a platform between the building and the railroad track at which trains stopped and received and discharged passengers and freight, though the accommodations were quite limited. Peters v. Stewart, 39 N. W. 380, 381, 72 Wis. 133.

One definition of "depot" is a "railroad station." The term, as used in the statute directing railroads receiving goods for transportation into their warehouses or depots to forward them in the order in which they are received, and making them liable for losses occasioned by a failure to do so, embraces the entire station of the railroad, so that a railroad must forward property received for shipment in the order in which it is received, though merely received on a platform used for handling that kind of property. Hill & Morris v. St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. of Texas (Tex.) 75 S. W. 874, 876.

Within the act of Connecticut of 1806 providing that no railroad shall abandon any depot or station on its road, after the same has been established for 12 months, except by the approval of the railroad commissioners, a "depot" is a station at which trains stop, not merely for wood and water, but for the transaction of the ordinary business of receiving and delivering freight and passengers. State v. New Haven & N. Co., 37 Conn. 153, 163.

A "depot" is a railway station—the building for the accommodation and protection of railway passengers or freight. This is the only meaning of the word as applied to a railroad, so that Gen. St. c. 94, art. 1, § 45, giving to the owner of a coal bank within three miles of any railroad the right to establish a road to the most convenient and suitable depot on such railroad, gives no right to the establishment of a road to a point on the railroad at which there is no established depot. Karnes v. Drake, 44 S. W. 444, 445, 103 Ky. 134.

The term "depot" may mean a house for the storage of freight and the accommodation of passengers, or it may mean a place where railroad trains regularly come to a stop for the convenience of passengers and for the purpose of receiving and discharging freight, or it may include all of these things. The term "depot" usually includes not only the idea of a stopping place, but also that of a building, or something of that kind, for the convenience of passengers and freight. Arkansas Cent. R. Co. v. Smith (Ark.) 71 S. W. 947, 948.

In a mortgage given by a railroad company of its franchises, real estate, right of way, and depots, the term "depots" is not necessarily limited to a place provided for the convenience of passengers while waiting the arrival or departure of trains. It applies also to the buildings used for receipt and storage of freight, which when received is to be safely kept until forwarded by the cars of the company, or delivered to the owner or consignee. Humphreys v. McKissock, 11 Sup. Ct. 779, 781, 140 U. S. 304, 35 L. Ed. 473.

A station at a coal bank where trains merely stop to take or leave cars for purposes connected with its trade is not a "depot" within a contract that defendant was to build but one other depot between two certain fixed points. Mahaska County R. Co. v. Des Moines Valley R. Co., 28 Iowa, 437, 449.

A building used by passengers on a railroad may properly be designated by the word "depot" as well as by the word "passenger station." Either is certain to a common intent. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Commonwealth (Ky.) 33 S. W. 939.

Where a covenant in a deed of a right of way to a railroad required the railroad to establish and maintain a depot for freight and passengers, evidence is admissible to explain what was intended by the term "freight and passenger depot," as there are freight and passenger depots all the way from mere flag stations, where there are no buildings at all, to the most modern depot with all its equipments and conveniences. But it was held that an umbrella shed cannot be called a "depot" for passengers. Murray v. Northwestern Ry. Co., 42 S. E. 617, 622, 64 S. C. 520.

Same—Flag station.

A mere flag station is not a depot. Hurt v. St. Paul, M. & M. Ry. Co., 40 N. W. 613, 614, 39 Minn. 485; Anderson v. Stewart, 76 Wis. 43, 44 N. W. 1091, 1092.

Same—Surrounding grounds.

Depot "does not necessarily mean a single building, but means the entire grounds used by a railroad company for its business purposes with the public at that station." Pittsburg, Ft. W. & C. R. Co. v. Rose, 24 Ohio St. 219, 229.

The term "depot" means a railroad station. "It is sufficiently broad to embrace within its meaning a passageway used for the convenient and safe egress and ingress of passengers. It is not restricted in its signification to the house or structure used also for their convenience in this respect, but includes a walk leading from the building or house, affording shelter to the passengers, to the car, and other approaches thereto." An allegation in an action that the railroad company had failed to properly light its "depot" held to be supported by evidence that it failed to properly light a passway. Galveston, H. & S. A. Ry. Co. v. Thornsberry (Tex.) 17 S. W. 521, 523.

In Act March 9, 1889, § 1, providing that every corporation, company, or person operating a railroad within the state shall place in each passenger depot of such company, located at any station in this state at which there is a telegraph office, a blackboard on which such company or person shall post the fact whether each scheduled passenger train is on time or not, by the words "passenger depot" was not meant merely a station house built for the accommodation of passengers, but the grounds prepared and used as depot grounds for the benefit of persons traveling on the particular railroad, and used by the company at such point in operating it as a common carrier of passengers State v. Indiana & I. S. R. Co., 32 N. E. 817, 818, 133 Ind. 69, 18 L. R. A. 502.

As place for military stores.

"Depot," as used in a contract with the government to transport supplies from certain posts, depots, and stations, is to be construed as meaning "a place where military stores or supplies are kept, or troops assembled." United States v. Caldwell, 86 U. S. (19 Wall.) 264, 268, 22 L. Ed. 114.

DEPOT GROUNDS.

"Depot grounds" are where passengers get on and off trains, and where goods are loaded and unloaded, and all grounds necessary and convenient and actually used for such purpose by the public and by the railroad company. This includes the switching and making up of trains and the use of the side tracks for the storing of cars, and the place where the public require open and free access to the road for the purposes of such business. Grosse v. Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co., 65 N. W. 185, 91 Wis. 482; Fowler v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co., 21 Wis. 77, 78 (citing Dinwoodie v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co., 70 Wis. 160, 35 N. W. 296; Plunkett v. Minneapolis, S. S. M. & A. Ry. Co., 79 Wis. 222, 48 N. W. 519).

"Depot grounds" and "yard limits" are synonymous terms. It is well known that in large cities these grounds extend for several miles. The question of frequent or infrequent use for switching purposes does not control. The question is, are they reasonably necessary to that purpose, or liable to become so? In McGrath v. Detroit, M. & M. R. Co., 57 Mich. 555, 24 N. W. 854, the court said: "The existence or extent of these grounds is not to be determined by the continued actual use thereof. When station grounds are laid out, their contemplated future use is not infrequently of more consideration than it actually demands at the time in determining their shape or extent; and, when these grounds are appropriated and set apart by the company, it would neither be safe nor wise to allow their limits to be curtailed or extended by a jury in a proceeding where they collaterally come in question." Rabidon v. Chicago & W. M. Ry. Co., 73 N. W. 386, 387, 115 Mich. 390, 39 L. R. A. 405.

A part of the main line of road, where there was but a single track in the neighborhood of the depot more than a hundred yards beyond the switch, and beyond where a cattle guard was subsequently placed, was no part of the "depot grounds," within a statute exempting a railroad from a duty to fence such grounds, though long trains, in switching, ran out to the place. Blair v. Milwaukee & P. du C. R. Co., 20 Wis. 254, 260.

"Depot grounds," as used in Rev. St. 1810, as amended by Laws 1881, c. 193, requiring railroads to be fenced except depot grounds, should be construed to include the railroad grounds used in connection with a building in which there was a telegraph office, with telegraphic instruments, a ticket office, and a place for eating and sleeping, and which building was occupied by the company's station men and agent, who operated the telegraph, sold tickets for the company to passengers, operated the switch and water tank, and handled the baggage and freight, there being a platform between the building and the track at which trains stopped and received and discharged passengers and freight. Peters v. Stewart, 39 N. W. 380, 381, 72 Wis. 133.

In an action to recover the value of a span of horses killed upon a railroad track, on the ground that the railroad company had neglected to fence its line of road at the point where the horses got upon the track, defendant contended that the place of the accident was part of its depot grounds, and as such not bound to be fenced under the statute. The evidence showed that there had been at one time a station house near the point in question, but for several years the company had kept no agent there, that the station building had been closed up and had gone to decay, that there were no grounds for a depot outside the usual right of way, and that the company had put in cattle guards 350 feet south of the station building and 721 feet north of it, and beyond this point the road was fenced. It was held that the court properly refused to hold as a question of law that such ground was "depot grounds," and that the jury were warranted in finding that a place near the north cattle guard was not a part of the company's depot grounds. McDonough v. Milwaukee & N. R. Co., 40 N. W. 806, 807, 73 Wis. 223.

Where a railroad company, at a place where it had maintained a flag station and side track, took up its fence and put in cattle guards after the laying out of the town plat, but did not keep any depot master or clerk, nor sell any tickets to the town, which consisted of two houses and a store, but merely took up freight there when flagged, as it did at any point on that portion of the road, it could not escape the liability for horses killed there for want of a fence, on the ground that such place constituted depot grounds. Anderson v. Stewart, 44 N. W. 1091, 1092, 76 Wis. 43.

Depot grounds on the right of way of a railroad $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles from any town, and not located on any highway, there being neither station, station agent, depot building, nor platform for receiving or discharging freight or passengers, but only a side track used for the convenience of loading and unloading a single commodity, are not "depot grounds" within the meaning of a statute exempting railroad companies from liability for failure to fence such property. Jaeger v. Chicago, M. & St. P. Ry. Co., 43 N. W. 732, 733, 75 Wis. 130.

"Depot grounds," within the meaning of a statute excepting depot grounds from the requirement that a railroad shall fence its right of way, includes flag stations at which trains are regularly stopped whenever there is freight, passengers, or express to be taken, though there is no depot erected thereon. Schneekloth v. Chicago & W. M. R. Co., 65 N. W. 663, 664, 108 Mich. 1.

DEPRIVITY OF HEART.

An instruction that if defendant purposely killed deceased after reflection, with a wickedness and depravity of heart toward the deceased, etc., the defendant was guilty of murder in the first degree, is sufficient as a statement of the highest degree of malice. Lang v. State, 4 South. 193. 195. 84 Ala. 1, 5 Am. St. Rep. 324.

DEPRECIATE.

"Depreciating," as used in a power authorizing a sale of securities upon their depreciation in value, is the present participle of the verb "depreciate," used intransitively, which verb, as defined by Webster, means "to fall in value; to become of less worth; to sink in estimation." As used in the power, it applied only to what might happen in the then future. National Bank of Illinois v. Baker, 27 Ill. App. 356, 359.

DEPRIVE.

"Deprive" conveys the idea of taking away that which one has, or withholding that which one may have. To take something from; to keep from acquiring, using, or enjoying something; to take away, end, injure, or destroy. State ex rel. Star Pub. Co. v. Associated Press, 60 S. W. 91, 100, 159 Mo. 410, 51 L. R. A. 151, 81 Am. St. Rep. 363.

A deprivation or taking of property, which is prohibited by the Constitution unless due compensation is made, includes anything that affects or limits the free use and enjoyment of one's property, or of the easements or appurtenances thereto. Myer v. Adam, 71 N. Y. Supp. 707, 710, 63 App. Div. 540.

In Const. art. 1, § 6, the word "deprive" is used in its ordinary and popular sense, and relates simply to divesting or forfeiting, alienating, and taking away property. It applies to property in the same sense that it does to life and liberty, and no other. Prohibiting the sale of property, except in pursuance of a license, is in no sense depriving the person of it. Wynehamer v. People, 13 N. Y. (3 Kern.) 378, 467 (per Johnson, J., dissenting).

In Const. art. 1, § 6, providing that a person shall not be deprived of his property, and that it shall not be taken for public use, without due process of law, the meaning of the word "deprive" is the same as the word "taken," and when property is not seized and directly appropriated to public use, though it be subjected, in the hands of the owner, to greater burdens than before, it is not taken within the meaning of the prohibition. Grant v. Courter (N. Y.) 24 Barb. 232, 233.

In the Constitution, declaring that a citizen cannot be "deprived" of his life, liberty, or property, unless by the judgment of his peers or the law of the land, "deprive" means take. It cannot be said that a citizen is deprived of his property when he is left in the undisturbed possession of it, whatever taxation may be imposed on it. Sharpless v. City of Philadelphia, 21 Pa. 147, 167, 59 Am. Dec. 759.

The constitutional provision is that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without process of law. This clause nowhere declares that in the exercise of the admitted functions of government private property may not receive remote and consequent injury. No person can claim that in the exercise of the proper functions of government his property shall not be diminished in value. The point is the owner shall not be deprived of his property without due process of law. If, in the exercise of any one of the admitted functions of government, a person's property is rendered less valuable, it cannot be seriously claimed this provision in the Bill of Rights has been infringed. So the act regulating warehouses, and fixing the rates of charges thereof, though it may diminish the value of such property, in that it deprives the owner of so much of the income therefrom as he has been in the habit of deriving from extortionate and unreasonable charges, is not a deprivation of his property, and does not infringe the Constitution. Munn v. People, 69 Ill. 80, 88.

The term "deprive," as used in the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States, does not prevent the regulating by statute of the use, or even the price of the use, of private property under all circumstances. Property does become clothed with a public interest when used in a manner to make it a public consequence and affect the community at large. When, therefore, one devotes his property to a use in which the public has an interest, he, in effect, grants to the public an interest in that use, and must submit to be controlled by the public for the common good, to the extent of the interest he has thus created. Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 113, 123, 24 L. Ed. 77.

An indictment for the theft of cattle under Pen. Code, art. 749, declaring that if any person shall willfully take into possession, and drive, use, or remove from its accustomed range, any live stock without the consent of the owner, and with intent to defraud the owner, he shall be deemed guilty of theft, is not defective for using the word "deprive" instead of "defraud," where it was alleged that the animals were fraudulently taken. Shubert v. State, 20 Tex. App. 320, 330.

Pre-existing right implied.

In Gen. St. 1875, § 23, providing that the husband of any decedent "shall not be deprived" of his right as tenant by the curtesy nor of the possession or control of the estate of his deceased wife, nor of the income thereof, during the settlement of her estate, the words "shall not be deprived" imply a pre-existing right, and apply as well to possession, control, and income as to the words "his right as tenant by the curtesy." Appeal of Staples, 52 Conn. 421, 423.

DEPRIVE OF LIFE.

"Deprive of life," as used in an indictment for murder charging that the defendant did deprive deceased of his life, was equivalent to the word "kill." Walker v. State, 14 Tex. App. 609, 627.

DEPUTY.

See "Special Deputy."

The term "deputy" means "one who is appointed, designated, or deputed to act for another." Willis v. Melvin, 53 N. C. 62, 63.

A deputy is one who by appointment exercises an office in another's right, having no interest therein, but doing all things in his principal's name, and for whose misconduct the principal is answerable. Carter v. Hornback, 40 S. W. 893, 139 Mo. 238; Willis v. Melvin, 53 N. C. 62, 63; People v. Barker, 35 N. Y. Supp. 727, 729, 14 Misc. Rep. 360; Piland v. Taylor, 18 S. E. 70, 113 N. C. 1; In re Tillyou, 57 App. Div. 101, 110, 67 N. Y. Supp. 1097, 1104.

Webster defines a deputy to be one appointed as a substitute of another, and empowered to act for him, in his name and on his behalf. An agent can only bind his principal when he does the act in the name of his principal, but a deputy may do the act and sign his own name, and it binds the principal. A deputy, however, is in law deemed an agent. When the officer or principal is dead, and that fact is known, or he is otherwise disqualified to act for himself, he cannot act by a deputy or agent. Herring v. Lee, 22 W. Va. 661, 667.

A deputy has power to do every act which his principal might do, and he cannot be restrained to some particulars of his office, for that would be repugnant to his being deputy. Steinke v. Graves, 52 Pac. 386, 387, 16 Utah, 293.

"A deputy is said to be one who occupieth in right of another, and for whom, regularly, his superior shall answer." "A deputy has not any estate or interest in the office, but is as servant to the officer." "A deputy cannot regularly have less power than his principal." Erwin v. United States (U. S.) 37 Fed. 470, 475, 2 L. R. A. 229 (citing 7 Bac. Abr. 316 [L]).

A "deputy," as defined by Bouvler, is one authorized by an officer to exercise the office or right which the officer possesses for and in the place of the latter. Comyn's Dig. tit. "Officer" (D, 3), says: "It is said that a deputy has power to do every act which his principal might do, but that a deputy cannot make a deputy, as this imports an assignment of all his authority, which is not assignable." In Bacon's Abridgment, "Officer" (L), it is laid down "that offices of inheritance for years, and those which require a superintendency, and no particular skill, may regularly be exercised by deputies. Thus, a sheriff, though he is an officer, made by the King's letters patent, and though it be not said that he may execute his office per se vel sufficientum deputatum suum, yet he may make a deputy, which is an undersheriff, against whom action may be brought by the parties aggrieved." A judicial officer cannot make a deputy unless he hath a clause in his patent to enable him, because his judgment is relied on in matters relating to his office which might be the reason of the making of the grant to him; neither can a municipal officer depute one in his stead if the office be to be performed by him in person, but when nothing is required but the superintendency in the office he may make a deputy. Bouvler says that in general "municipal officers cannot appoint deputies unless the office is to be exercised by the municipal officer in person." Willingham v. State, 21 Fla. 761, 776.

A deputy is an assistant to an officer, and he must be one whose acts are of equal force with that of the officer himself. The deputy must act in pursuance of law, perform official functions, and take oaths before acting. Opinion of Justices, 12 Fla. 651, 652; People v. Barker, 35 N. Y. Supp. 727, 729, 14 Misc. Rep. 360.

A deputy is a clerk with all the powers of the principal. An assistant does not mean a deputy. Clerks and other public officers have assistants who are not deputies. (Per Bibb, J.) A deputy is an assistant, and there may be other assistants who are not deputies. "Assistant" is a more comprehensive word than "deputy," and includes those who aid the principal, whether sworn or not, while "deputy" embraces only the sworn class. (Per Mills, J., dissenting.) Ellison v. Stevenson, 22 Ky. (6 T. B. Mon.) 271, 276, 279.

The word "deputy," in Const. art. 11, § 8½, relating to officers, includes employes and all the subordinates of the county officers. Thus the copyist in a recorder's office is a deputy, and may be appointed without examination by the civil service commission of the city and county of San Francisco. Garnett v. Brooks, 69 Pac. 298, 299, 136 Cal. 585.

By the public officers' law it is provided that every deputy shall be appointed by his principal, etc. If there is but one deputy, he shall, unless otherwise prescribed by law, possess the powers and perform the duties of his principal during the absence or inability to act of his principal, or during a vacancy in his principal's office. The function of a deputy possessing the powers, as he does, to act as if he were the actual incumbent of his principal's office implies a correlative duty and right on the part of the principal to exercise an unfettered personal selection in the appointment of such subordinate, and also a corresponding freedom in exercising the power of removal, and such is its meaning when used in statute providing that the act relating to removal of honorably discharged veterans from office shall not apply to any private secretary, chief clerk, or deputy. Within this meaning, a deputy tax commissioner, whose duties are prescribed by the statute, and for the performance of which he is responsible to the public, and which, while performed under the direction of the commissioners, do in any way interfere with the duties of the commissioners themselves, is not a deputy. People v. Barker, 35 N. Y. Supp. 727, 729, 14 Misc. Rep. 360.

Civil Service Law (Laws 1902, p. 805, c. 270, § 21) provides that no person holding a position by appointment in the state or city, who shall have served the term required by law in the voluntary fire department of a city, shall be removed except for incompetency or misconduct shown after a hearing on due notice, and that nothing in the section shall apply to the position of "deputy" of any official or department. Held, that the word "deputy," as used in the exception of the statute, referred to persons holding a strictly confidential relation to the appointing power, and did not apply to or include a deputy tax commissioner in the department of taxes or assessments in the city of New York, who was a veteran fireman, so as to authorize his removal without a compliance with such section. People v. Wells, 83 N. Y. Supp. 789, 790, 86 App. Div. 270.

The office of assistant clerk of the city is provided for in the charter, and he is expressly given all the powers, duties, and responsibilities of his principal, except that by implication, at least, he cannot certify to or affix the corporate seal to copies of the files and transcripts of records. His appointment by the clerk must be confirmed by the council, which also determines his salary, and he may be required to give a bond for the faithful performance of his duties, and is responsible to the municipality for their proper performance. He is in fact a deputy, although officially styled "assistant clerk." Kelly v. City of Minneapolis, 79 N. W. 653, 654, 77 Minn. 76.

As officers.

See "Officer."

DEPUTY CLERK.

As clerk, see "Clerk."

DEPUTY CONSTABLE.

A "deputy constable" possesses the whole power of his principal, and of right acts in his name. Simpson v. Morris (Pa.) 3 Yeates, 104, 107.

DEPUTY CONSUL.

"Deputy consul" and "consular agent," when used in the title relating to diplomatic and consular officers, shall be deemed to denote consular officers subordinate to such principals, exercising the powers and performing the duties within the limits of their consulates or commercial agencies respectively, the former at the same ports or places, and the latter at ports or places different from those at which such principals are located respectively. U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1150.

DEPUTY POSTMASTER.

The term "deputy postmaster" in Const. art. 2, § 9, providing that no person shall hold more than one lucrative office at the same time, but the office of deputy postmaster, when the compensation shall not exceed ninety dollars per annum, shall not be deemed lucrative, applies to the office of postmaster as not designated. Bishop v. State, 48 N. E. 1038, 1039, 149 Ind. 223, 39 L. R. A. 278, 63 Am. St. Rep. 270.

DEPUTY SHERIFF.

A deputy sheriff is an officer within the meaning of the law punishing the embezzlement of public money. State v. Brooks, 42 Tex. 62, 66.

A deputy sheriff is one appointed to act for the sheriff, and not in his own name, person, or right. He cannot legally act, as in serving an execution, in his own name, but such acts must be in the name and by the authority of the sheriff, in whose stead he acts. He is the deputy of the sheriff, and not of the office of sheriff, as distinct from the person holding the office. Wilson v. Russell, 31 N. W. 645, 4 Dak. 376.

Deputy sheriffs are of two kinds: (a) A general deputy, or undersheriff, who, by virtue of his appointment, has authority to execute all the ordinary duties of the office of sheriff (Com. Dig. tit. "Viscount," 542, B. 1); one who executes process without special authority from the sheriff, and may even delegate authority in the name of the sheriff or its execution to a special deputy. (b) A special deputy, who is an officer pro hac vice, to execute a particular writ on some certain occasion, but acts under a specific and not a general appointment and authority. Allen v. Smith, 12 N. J. Law (7 Halst.) 159, 162.

The deputy is an officer coeval in point of antiquity with the sheriff. The creation of deputies arise from an impossibility of the sheriff's performing all the duties of his office in person. The powers of the deputy have consequently been ascertained at an early date. The general criterion by which to test his authority is declared in the case of Levett v. Farrar, Cro. Eliz. 294, in which the court said that if a writ be directed to the sheriff by the name of his office, and not by a particular name, and doth not expressly command him to execute it in person, the undersheriff may execute it. Tillotson v. Cheetham (N. Y.) 2 Johns. 63, 70.

DEPUTY STATE CONSTABLE.

The phrase "deputy state constable" is equivalent to the phrase "deputy consul of the commonwealth," which is the designation used in the statutes. Commonwealth v. Intoxicating Liquors, 97 Mass. 63, 66.

DEPUTY TO CONGRESS.

Baldwin, J., in his opinion in the case of Cherokee Nation v. Georgia, considers that the words "deputy to Congress," occurring in the twelfth article of the Hopewell treaty with the Indians, providing that the Indians should have a right to send a "deputy of their choice * * * to Congress," might mean either a person having a right to sit in that body, since at that time it was composed of delegates or deputies from the states, or it might mean an agent or minister. In either event, he could not represent an independent or foreign nation; for if he sat in Congress as the deputy from any state it must be one having a political connection with the confederacy; if as a diplomatic agent, it could not be as an agent of an independent nation, for all such have an unquestioned right to send such agents when and where they please. Cherokee Nation v. Georgia, 30 U. S. (5 Pet.) 1, 38, 8 L. Ed. 25.

DEPUTY TREASURER.

Money was deposited in a bank in the name of "A., deputy treasurer." Held, that the words "deputy treasurer," in such connection, had the same import as the word "agent," and was merely an acknowledgment by A. that he held the money for some one else, and the person for whom he held the money not being divulged, as between the bank and A., the money belonged to A., and it was not entitled to justify a refusal to pay A.'s checks on that ground alone. Citizens' Nat. Bank v. Alexander, 14 Atl. 402, 404, 120 Pa. 476. See, also, Patterson v. Marine Nat. Bank, 18 Atl. 632, 130 Pa. 419, 17 Am. St. Rep. 778.

DEPUTY UNITED STATES MARSHALL.

As United States officer. see "United States Officer."

DERANGE.

The term "deranged," as applied to persons, includes all forms of mental unsoundness, except the natural born idiot. Hiett v. Shull, 15 S. E. 146, 147, 38 W. Va. 563.

DERELICT.

See "Quasi Derelict."

A "derelict" is defined by Judge Story to be a "boat or vessel found deserted or abandoned on the seas, whether it arose from accident or necessity or voluntary dereliction." The Hyderabad (U. S.) 11 Fed. 749, 754; Rowe v. The Brig (U. S.) 20 Fed. Cas. 1281, 1282; Montgomery v. The T. P. Leathers (U. S.) 17 Fed. Cas. 641, 643.

The term "derelict" is used in the maritime law to designate a vessel found entirely deserted or abandoned at sea. Evans v. The Charles (U. S.) 8 Fed. Cas. 838.

Derelicts are boats or other vessels forsaken or found on the seas, without any person in them. The Fairfield (U. S.) 30 Fed. 700, 701; Montgomery v. The T. P. Leathers (U. S.) 17 Fed. Cas. 641, 642; Flinn v. The Leander (U. S.) 9 Fed. Cas. 275; Baker v. Hoag, 7 N. Y. (3 Seld.) 555, 559, 59 Am. Dec. 431.

A derelict is a ship wrecked at sea which has been abandoned by the crew, without hope of recovery or intention on their part to return. Cromwell v. The Island City, 66 U. S. (1 Black) 121, 128, 17 L. Ed. 70; Rowe v. The Brig (U. S.) 20 Fed. Cas. 1281, 1282; Cromwell v. The Island City (U. S.) 6 Fed. Cas. 859, 860; Tyson v. Prior (U. S.) 24 Fed. Cas. 489; The Aquila, 1 C. Rob. 37, 41; The Ann L. Lockwood (U. S.) 37 Fed. 233, 237; The B. C. Terry (U. S.) 9 Fed. 920; The Emulous (U. S.) 8 Fed. Cas. 705, 707. A temporary abandonment for the purpose of providing more effectual means of saving it does not constitute a derelict. For this purpose the abandonment must be final, without the intention of returning and resuming possession. Lewis v. The Elizabeth and Jane (U. S.) 15 Fed. Cas. 478, 479. If the boat is simply abandoned by the crew temporarily for the purpose of obtaining assistance and returning, it is no derelict. Cromwell v. The Island City, 66 U. S. (1 Black) 121, 128, 17 L. Ed. 70; Rowe v. The Brig (U. S.) 20 Fed. Cas. 1281, 1282.

In maritime law the abandonment of a steamboat by the master to the care and protection of the master and crew of another steamboat, for the purpose of procuring assistance and safety, is not a case of derelict. Montgomery v. The T. P. Leathers (U. S.) 17 Fed. Cas. 640, 642.

When a vessel is found at sea deserted, abandoned by the master, without intention of returning and resuming the vessel, it is, in the sense of the law, "derelict," and the finder who takes possession with the intention of saving her gains a right of possession, which he can maintain against the true owner. The owner does not renounce his right to the property, and this is not presumed to be his intention, and the finder does not acquire the property, but the owner does abandon temporarily his right of possession, which is transferred to the finder, who becomes bound to preserve the property in good faith, and to bring it to a place of safety for the owner's use, and he acquires the right to be paid for his services a reasonable and proper compensation out of the property itself. The Bee (U. S.) 3 Fed. Cas. 41, 44.

A derelict is a wreck which has been abandoned by all parties; generally applied to shipping. Goods cannot be taken and title therein acquired by finding as derelict, while they are floating in the water, having escaped from the custody of the crew of the wrecked steamer, with full knowledge on their part, unless they have been absolutely abandoned, such goods being still in the constructive possession of the owner of the vessel, in the same manner as goods in a house which is on fire, and which has not been abandoned because of the peril. United States v. Stone (U. S.) 8 Fed. 232, 243.

A vessel loaded with a cargo of slaves, who revolt and throw the crew overboard, is a derelict. Flinn v. The Leander (U. S.) 9 Fed. Cas. 275.

A bark which has broken from her anchorage in the arm of the sea, drifted on a rock beach in a heavy storm, made fast to trees by the captain and crew, filling with water during the night, deserted the next day by all hands, who took with them the ship's papers, compasses, side lights, and their personal effects, and then goes adrift again some days later, and is found drifting 14 miles from her anchorage, with no one on board, is a derelict. The Canada (U. S.) 92 Fed. 193, 198.

DERELICTION.

See "Presumed Dereliction."

As abandonment of goods.

Dereliction by the civil law is the voluntary abandonment of goods by the owner, without the hope or purpose of returning to the possession. Jones' Adm'rs v. Munn, 12 Ga. 469, 473 (citing 1 Bro. Civ. Law, 239; Wood's Civ. Law, 156).

Dereliction or renunciation of property requires both the intention to abandon and external action. Thus the casting overboard of articles in a tempest to lighten the ship is not dereliction, as there is no intention of abandoning the property in case of salvage, nor does the mere intention of abandonment constitute dereliction without a throwing away or some external act. Livermore v. White, 74 Me. 452, 456, 43 Am. Rep. 600.

As land gained from sea.

Dereliction is land gained from the sea when the sea shrinks back below the usual high-water mark. Linthicum v. Coan, 2 Atl. 826, 827, 828, 64 Md. 439, 54 Am. Rep. 775.

Dereliction is a rescission of the waters of the sea, a navigable river, or other stream, by which land that was before covered with water is left dry. In such case, if the alteration takes place suddenly and insensibly, the ownership remains according to former bounds, or, if it is gradual and imperceptible, the dereliction or dry land belongs to the riparian owner through whose shore or bank the water has receded. Warren v. Chambers, 25 Ark. 120, 121, 91 Am. Dec. 538, 4 Am. Rep. 23.

Dereliction or reliction is land added to a front tract by the permanent uncovering of the waters; the laying bare of the bottom, by the retirement of the waters, as contradistinguished from a filling up of the bottom by deposits causing the waters to recede. Dereliction, as used in the English law, meant when the sea shrank back below the usual water mark, and remained there. In those cases the law is held to be that, if this be by little and little, it should go to the owner of the land adjoining. It is recognized by the Louisiana law as a mode of acquiring property, but the mere temporary subsidence of the waters occasioned by the seasons, coming in the winter and staying to the spring, going in the summer and gone in the autumn, does not constitute dereliction in the sense of an addition to the contiguous land, susceptible of private rights as riparian rights. Sapp v. Frazier, 26 South. 378, 380, 51 La. Ann. 1718, 72 Am. St. Rep. 493.

DERIVE.

In the compact between Virginia and Kentucky in reference to lands ceded to Kentucky, providing that all private rights and interests of land within the said district, "derived from the laws of Virginia prior to such separation," shall remain valid and secure under the laws of the proposed state, and shall be determined by the laws now existing in this state, such phrase "appears to have been employed to express the direct and immediate concessions and sales by the state." Beard v. Smith, 22 Ky. (6 T. B. Mon.) 430, 437.

In Rev. St. § 2364, providing that on judgment for divorce the court may divide the estate, both real and personal, of the husband, and so much of the estate of the wife as shall have been "derived from the husband," the words "property derived from the husband" refer not only to property directly transferred from him to her, but also such as was substantially derived, mediately or immediately, from the husband. Gallagher v. Gallagher, 61 N. W. 1104, 1105, 89 Wis. 461.

DEROGATION OF COMMON RIGHT.

A statute is in derogation of common right which imposes special burdens upon individuals or upon one class of the community not shared by others. Barber Asphalt Pav. Co. v. Watt, 26 South. 70, 72, 51 La. Ann. 1345.

DESCEND.

See "Estate Descended."

The words "descend," "inherit," and "inheritance," in the statutes of the state in reference to the estates of decedents, ordinarily relate to real estate; but while this is true, it is in the power of the Legislature to give them a different inflection and expand their meaning. The words "descend," "inherit," and "inheritance," in their broad meaning, are frequently applied to personal property. Rountree v. Pursell, 39 N. E. 747, 749, 11 Ind. App. 522.

As ascend.

The word "descend" means ordinarily to go down, but in the law relating to the devolution of property rights "descend" may mean "ascend," as "descending in the ascending line." Rountree v. Pursell, 39 N. E. 747, 749, 11 Ind. App. 522.

As go to.

The word "descend," in a will devising testator's property to certain persons, but, if he left no child or children, then directing that the property was to descend to others, was construed to have been used in the sense of the words "go to." Brooks v. Kip, 35 Atl. 658, 660, 54 N. J. Eq. 462; Stratton v. McKinne (Tenn.) 62 S. W. 636, 640; Borgner v. Brown, 33 N. E. 92, 94, 133 Ind. 391.

"Descend," as used in an antenuptial contract providing that certain property shall remain in the wife, but if there be issue of the marriage then said property shall descend to such child or children, share and share alike, according to the law of the state of Tennessee, is not used in its technical sense, but means shall "go to" or "be vested" in such child or children, share and share alike, or equally, as is provided in the laws of Tennessee in cases of descent or distribution. Aydlett v. Swope (Tenn.) 17 S. W. 208, 209.

As pass by devise.

V. S. 2613, provides that the probate court may appoint trustees in cases not otherwise provided for, when the use of property, real or personal, descends to a person for life. In construing the word "descends" in this statute, the court observes that it is a canon of construction that every word of the statute must be given effect, if possible, and that if words, taken in their technical sense, would make a statute inoperative in whole or in part, they will be taken in their popular sense. In view of this rule, it is held that the word "descends" as used in the statute includes estates for life which pass by devise, and is not limited to those passing by operation of law on the death of the ancestor intestate. Mitchell v. Blanchard, 47 Atl. 98, 99, 72 Vt. 85.

"Descend," as used in a will providing that, after the death of testator's children, the trust created by the will should cease and determine, and the several tracts or parcels of land and premises should go and descend, freed and discharged from all trusts, to the respective right heirs of his children in fee simple, does not express descent in the legal sense, but devolution by force of the devise. It is the same as if testator had said "go down to the children." Ballentine v. Wood, 9 Atl. 582, 585, 42 N. J. Eq. (15 Stew.) 552.

Testator's will provided "the share of my property received by J., he may have and use the profits from during his natural life, and at his death descend to his children." Held, that the word "descend" was used in the sense of "go" or "belong" to, and at the death of J. such children took the estate by virtue of the will. Tate v. Townsend, 61 Miss. 316, 319.

Testator bequeathed a sum of money, a slave, and other chattels to his wife, to hold during her natural life, and at her death to descend to her granddaughter. Held, that the term "descend" thus used in the will was legatory, and meant that the granddaughter took a vested remainder, and not a contingent interest as successor to the wife. Timberlake v. Parish's Ex'r, 35 Ky. (5 Dana) 345, 347.

As pass by operation of law.

The word "descend" ordinarily defines the vesting of the estate by operation of law in the heirs immediately upon the death of the ancestor. Potts v. Kline, 34 Atl. 191, 192, 174 Pa. 513.

Testator's will, after devising the residue of his real estate to his daughters, and the survivors of them, until death or marriage, provided as follows: "After the marriage or death of my surviving daughters, the estate herein devised shall descend to those persons who will then be entitled to take the same as my heirs." Held, that the word "descend" denoted the vesting of the estate by operation of law in the heirs immediately on the death of the ancestor, and manifested the intention of the testator to have been that, after the particular estates which he had given should have failed, the law should take its course, and his estate go to his heirs as if he had made no further disposition. Dove v. Torr, 128 Mass. 38, 40 (citing Bullock v. Downes, 9 H. L. Cas. 1; Mortimer v. Slater, 7 Ch. Div. 322; Mortimore v. Mortimore, 4 App. Cas. 448).

"Descend," as used in a will giving property to a certain person to descend to his female children and grandchildren and to their heirs forever, does not operate to work a "descent" in the legal strict sense of the term, as inheritance is through operation of law. Its employment, therefore, no other meaning being apparent, is to be taken as indicating the desire of testator that his property shall follow the same channel into which the law would direct it. The devise can only mean that the grandchildren only whose parents are dead shall take with the living children, for only in case of the death of its parent can the grandchild become the heir at law of its grandfather, and take from him by descent. Property cannot descend from a grandparent to a grandchild whose parents are living. Halstead v. Hall, 60 Md. 209, 211.

A will directing that, after a certain time fixed, the estate devised should "descend" to those persons who may then be entitled to take the same as the testator's heirs, meant that at that stage the law should take its course and the estate go to the testator's heirs as if he had made no further disposition, since the word "descend" ordinarily denotes the vesting of the estate of the deceased person, by operation of law, immediately on the death of the ancestor. Wood v. Bullard, 25 N. E. 67, 71, 151 Mass. 324, 7 L. R. A. 304.

"Descend," as used in a will devising testator's real estate, and bequeathing his personal property in trust for his wife for life, and directing a division among his heirs on her death, except the share which would by law descend to his daughter, is to be construed to mean to pass or to be transferred. Childs v. Russell, 52 Mass. (11 Metc.) 16, 21.

"Descend," as used in the expression in a will providing that at "her death the same to descend to such of her children as were then living," refers to the course the property would take by descent. Harrington v. Gibson, 60 S. W. 915, 916, 109 Ky. 752.

The word "descend" has a well-defined meaning in law, as the following definitions of the word "descent" will show: "Descent is what takes place when land, or some interest in land or other realty, belonging to a person, passes on his death, intestate, to some one related to him. Descent is opposed to what takes place when land, on the death of a person, passes to some one else by virtue of a gift or limitation to him as persona designata." Rap. & L. Law Dict. Again: "Descent is frequently used to distinguish the vesting of title in any one, by mere operation of law, from purchase, which may be either devise or grant. In the former case the person is said to take by descent or as heir, while a grantee or devisee is said to take by purchase or as a purchaser." Abbott, Law Dict. The above definitions of the word "descent" clearly establish that when the statute declares that in case the adopted child dies without issue the property shall descend, not to his next of kin, but to that of the adopting parent, it means that in case the adopted child dies intestate it should so descend, for otherwise it would pass by devise, and could not descend. Spangenberg v. Guiney, 3 Ohio Dec. 163, 165, 2 Ohio N. P. 39.

As a word of inheritance.

"Descend," as used in a clause of the will declaring that one-half of the estate shall descend to E.'s heirs and assigns, and the other half to descend to G.'s heirs and assigns, must be construed as a word of inheritance, vesting in the first taker as a fee, since, if it be construed that E. and G. were simply to take life estates, there would be nothing to descend to their heirs. Also the use of the word "assigns" in this connection lends force to this construction, for it contemplates that E. and G. might have the right to transfer the property. In re Browning, 16 Atl. 717, 718, 16 R. I. 441, 3 L. R. A. 209.

A will directed that deceased's executor invest a sum of money in real estate for M. W., and that the title to the same be made to her, with the restriction that she should not have power to sell or incumber the same in any way, but might rent, use, or occupy the same, and on her death it was to "descend to her heirs"; and further provided that an annuity should be given to one of the brothers of the testator until July 1, 1882, or to his wife in the event of his death, and directed that at the time named $5,000 should be invested for their benefit, and after their death "the said $5,000 is to be paid to the children of my said brother Henry, share and share alike. If my said brother H. and his wife both die before the 1st day of July, 1882, the said $5,000 is not to be paid until the said 1st day of July, 1882, at which time, if they are both dead, the said children shall be entitled to the same." Held that, construing both clauses of the will together, "descend to her heirs," used in the clause first quoted, is not employed by way of words of purchase, or to express a devise, but merely to express the idea that the testator expected and intended his bounty would, upon M. W.'s death, pass by descent to her heirs. Wedekind v. Hallenberg, 10 S. W. 368, 371, 88 Ky. 114.

The word "descend" is inapplicable to any estate less than a fee. Johnson v. Morton, 10 Pa. (10 Barr) 245, 248.

As a word of purchase.

The word "descend," as used in a deed conveying property to another for and during her natural life, and to descend to her heirs in equal portions, means to pass from the grantee to her heirs, and is of the same effect as if the deed read "to her during her natural life, and to her heirs." Taney v. Fahnley, 25 N. E. 882, 126 Ind. 88.

"Descend" has been held to mean the same as "to go to," and, as used in the habendum clause of a deed providing that the land shall descend to W. on the death of the first takers, is a word of purchase and not of limitation, and does not show that it was the intention to vest the first takers with the fee, in the face of the express statement that they are to take only a life estate. Doren v. Gillum, 35 N. E. 1101, 1102, 136 Ind. 134.

Land was devised to the testatrix's two nephews in common during life, with the provision that immediately after their decease the same should descend to their children in equal shares, or their heirs, yet so that the children of each only divide the share that belonged to their father. Held, that the use of the term "descend" in such devise did not indicate an intention on the part of the testatrix that the children should take as heirs of their parents, and not by way of remainder, especially when taken in connection with the preceding clause, by which a life estate was given to two other nephews, it being provided therein that on the death of either life tenant the undivided half belonging to the one so dying should go to and be enjoyed in equal shares by his children, or to their heirs. Appeal of Keim, 17 Atl. 463, 464, 125 Pa. 480.

In a clause of a will providing that the property herein devised to my several children is to remain their own during their natural lives, and to descend to their bodily heirs, if any, the word "descend" is used in the sense of "going to," and will not be understood to vest the fee in the children, as rendering the words "bodily heirs" words of limitation. Stratton v. McKinnie (Tenn.) 62 S. W. 636, 640.

"Descend," as used in the provisions of a will as follows: "The above named real estate, one-third to descend to his wife if living, the remainder to go to my children"—means "go," and is not a limitation on the fee devised. Borgner v. Brown, 33 N. E. 92, 94, 133 Ind. 391.

DESCENDANT.

See "Immediate Descendants or Issue"; "Lineal Descendants."

"Descendants," as used in the act of 1763 directing that an intestate's estate shall descend to his children or their descendants, if any, means all legitimate children, whether they were born in wedlock, or were made legitimate by subsequent marriage by their parents and recognition according to statute. Jackson's Adm'r's v. Moore, 38 Ky. (8 Dana) 170, 173.

Within the provision of the Code that the estate of an illegitimate dying intestate without children, husband or wife, or mother, shall go equally to his brothers and sisters by his mother, or descendants of such brothers and sisters, the words "descendants of such brothers and sisters" mean legitimate descendants only, and will not include illegitimate ones. Giles v. Wilhoit (Tenn.) 48 S. W. 268, 270.

The word "descendants," in a will providing that, if a certain one of testator's sons should leave no other issue or descendants than one son then living, the former's power of disposition should be limited to a certain sum, is not used as a word of purchase, the testator evidently having imagined that the word "issue" might be mistakenly read for "children," and he therefore followed it in the disjunctive—"or descendants." Appeal of Barry (Pa.) 10 Atl. 126, 127.

The use in the Penal Code of any word expressive of relationship, state, condition, office, or trust of any person, as the "parent," "child," "ascendant," "descendant," "minor," "infant," "ward," "guardian," or the like, or of the relative pronouns "he" or "they," in reference thereto, includes both males and females. Pen. Code Tex. 1895, art. 22.

As children.

The word "descendant," as used with reference to persons taking the estate of a deceased person, has not the same precise technical signification as the words "heirs of the body," and may be and is often used by testators as synonymous with "children." Schmaunz v. Goss, 132 Mass. 141, 144.

As grandchildren.

By a will testator's property was devised to his brothers and sisters surviving at his death, and the descendants of such as should then be dead, such descendants to take the share or portion which would have otherwise belonged to such deceased parent. At the time of his death six of his brothers and sisters were dead, and had left children and grandchildren. The broad import of the term "descendants" is sometimes narrowed where there is ground for judging that it was intended in a restricted sense. Thus, the word "issue," which is coextensive with "descendants," and includes every degree, has been restricted to the sense of "children." In this case we may reasonably conclude the testator intended to regard each deceased sister and brother as a stock of descent, and, while using the word "descendants" in the sense of children and the descendants of children, still had regard to representation. On a strict construction, perhaps, only children would take, but as it was used it included the grandchildren of the deceased brother or sister. Barstow v. Goodwin (N. Y.) 2 Bradf. Sur. 413, 416, 417.

As heir or next of kin.

"Descendant," as used in a bill to restrain the depredation of the graves, monuments, etc., of plaintiff's ancestors, while an anytonym of "ancestor," cannot be construed as a synonym of "heir"; and therefore the allegation that the ancestors of the plaintiff were buried in the yard could not be held to be equivalent to an allegation that the plaintiff's parents were buried, or that the plaintiff was the heir of the persons buried. Mitchell v. Thorne, 32 N. E. 10, 12, 134 N. Y. 536, 30 Am. St. Rep. 699.

Children are, eo nomine, descendants, but descendants are not necessarily children. A descendant is a person who is descended from another; that is, one who proceeds from the body of another, however remotely, and includes every person descended from the stock referred to. It is coextensive with "issue," but does not embrace others not of issue, and is not to be understood as "next of kin," or "heirs at law," for these phrases comprehend persons in the ascending as well as the descending line, and they also include collaterals; but it means the issue of the body of the person named, of every degree. Rates v. Gillett, 24 N. E. 611, 612, 132 Ill. 287.

Testator's will directed a certain fund to be invested and held in trust for the maintenance and support of certain slaves and their descendants. Held, that the word "descendants" was equivalent to "next of kin," or those who would take under the statute of distribution; and a contention that the word caused the creation of a perpetuity was without merit. Walker v. Walker, 25 Ga. 420, 423.

"Descendants," as used in a will, means the issue of the body of the person named in every degree, as children, grandchildren, and great-grandchildren, and it does not include the next of kin as heirs of law generally, such as brothers and sisters. Hamlin v. Osgood (N. Y.) 1 Redf. Sur. 409, 417.

Where a will provided that at the death of the testator's wife the estate should go to and be divided "amongst my children and their descendants," the word "descendants" will not be limited in meaning so as to include only those persons who have proceeded in some degree from the body of a child of the testator, so as to exclude from the devise those who, though heirs at law of any deceased child, were not the direct or remote issue of such child; and hence where one of the children died prior to the death of the testator's widow, leaving surviving a widow, the remainder created will be construed to vest immediately on testator's death in his surviving children, subject to the life estate of the testator's widow, so as to give an interest to the son's widow. Knight v. Pottgieser, 52 N. E. 934, 935, 176 Ill. 368.

Where a will devises to one a life estate, with remainder "to his descendants, if any, in fee, according to the laws of descent and distribution," a mother and the brother and sister of the half blood of the devisee cannot claim the remainder in fee as descendants and heirs at law of the devisee. Tichenor v. Brewers' Ex'r, 98 Ky. 349, 352, 33 S. W. 86, 87 (quoting Webster, Rap. & L. Law Dict., and Bouv. Dict.).

As issue.

The term "descendants," used in speaking of the descendants of a deceased person, means issue. Prettyman v. Conaway (Del.) 32 Atl. 15, 17, 9 Houst. 221.

A will provided that, on the death of one having a life interest in a trust fund, the interest theretofore received by her should pass to her sister, "or to her descendants in case of her death." Held, that the word "descendants" was the equivalent of "issue," and, being used with reference to personalty, was a word of purchase. In re Wain's Estate, 42 Atl. 299, 300, 189 Pa. 631.

The word "descendants," as used in a provision of a will providing that if any of said grandchildren shall die previous to the decease of my daughter, leaving descendants, "then I direct that such issue shall take the share to which their parents would have been entitled, said share to be received by said grandchildren or their descendants free from any control or claim of any husband," is used interchangeably with "issue" as used in such provision. Cochrane v. Kip, 46 N. Y. Supp. 148, 152, 19 App. Div. 272.

As issue of any degree.

Descendants are "those who have issued from an individual, including children, grandchildren, and their children to the remotest degree—issue of any degree." Huston v. Read, 32 N. J. Eq. (5 Stew.) 591, 599. "Descendants," says Bouvier, "are those who have issued from an individual, and include his children, grandchildren, and their children to the remotest degree." Bryan v. Walton, 20 Ga. 480, 512; Bates v. Gillett, 24 N. E. 611, 612, 132 Ill. 287; Van Beuren v. Dash, 30 N. Y. 393, 415.

The word "descendants" used in a will does not mean next of kin or heirs generally, but means the issue of the persons named, of every degree, as children, grandchildren, and great-grandchildren. Tompkins v. Verplanck, 42 N. Y. Supp. 412, 415, 10 App. Div. 572.

Bouvier defines "descendants" as "those who have issued from an individual, and includes his children, grandchildren, and their children to the remotest degree. The descendants form what is called the 'direct descending line.' The term is opposed to that of 'ascendants.'" Those who are denominated "descendants" do not comprise all of those who come to the title by descent. Jewell v. Jewell, 28 Cal. 232, 236.

A "descendant" is one who descends as offspring, however remotely; correlative to "ancestor" or "ascendant." The term includes the most remote lineal offspring, and is practically synonymous with "issue" in its legal meaning; hence it excludes collateral relations, nor does it include relatives in the ascending line. The word "descendant," in section 13, c. 78, Code 1899, means one who proceeds from the body of another, however remotely, and is coextensive with "issue," but does not embrace others not of issue.—Waldron v. Taylor, 45 S. E. 336, 338, 52 W. Va. 284.

"Descendants" does not mean "next of kin" or "heirs at law" generally, as these terms comprehend those as well in the ascending as in the descending line, and collaterals; but it means—what the word obviously imports—the issue of the body of the person named of every degree, as children, grandchildren, and great-grandchildren. Brothers and sisters cannot take under the term "descendants." Hamlin v. Osgood (N. Y.) 1 Redf. Sur. 409, 411.

In Williams, Ex'rs, p. 376, it is said: "Under this description is comprised every individual proceeding from the stock or family referred to by the testator." In 2 Jarman, Wills, 632: "Descendants are issue of every degree." And, where a legacy was left to the descendants of F., the great-grandchildren were held entitled to share with the grandchildren. Levering v. Orrick, 54 Atl. 620, 622, 97 Md. 139 (citing Crossley v. Clare, Ambler, 397).

"Descendants," as used in Act 1850, defining the rights of husband and wife, section 11, declaring that, on dissolution of the community by the death of a husband, one-half of the community property shall go to the surviving wife and the other half to the descendants of the deceased husband, means all persons who are children and grandchildren of the ancestor, and their children to the remotest degree. Jewell v. Jewell, 28 Cal. 232, 236.

The words "child, children or descendants," in a will in which testator devises land to his daughter and her heirs and assigns forever, providing that she dies leaving lineal heirs of her body, but, in case she dies leaving no "child, children, or descendants," the lands shall go to others, shows that testator had reference to descendants indefinitely, and not the children alone of the beneficiary, and therefore the will passes an estate tail, and not an executory devise. Holden v. Wells, 31 Atl. 265, 266, 18 R. I. 802. See, also, In re Gormley's Estate, 25 Atl. 814, 815, 154 Pa. 378.

The word "descendants," as used in a devise of a home to the testator's son and his wife in trust, the purpose being to provide a home for the family during the life of the son and his wife, "and of the survivor of them, and at the death of the survivor to divide the trust fund among their descendants by stocks," is not synonymous with the word "children," but the word "descendants" includes children, comprising issue of every degree, and does not evince an intent that the remainder should vest at the death of the life tenant, rather than at the death of the testator. Neilson v. Brett, 40 S. E. 32, 33, 99 Va. 673.

"Descendants," in its ordinary sense as well as its legal sense, includes the issue of the body of the testator of every degree, no matter how remote. Consequently, as the numbers constituting the class of descendants must vary according to the point of time at which the determination is to be made, it becomes necessary to determine the period at which the testator intended that those who then answered to the designation of descendants would be entitled to receive the gift; and where, in a will, the word "descendants" is used, and another clause provides that such descendants and the widow may sell real property, and in still another provision the word "descendants" is used synonymously with "children," the word "descendants" will be construed to relate to the time of the death of the testator. In re Collins, 24 N. Y. Supp. 226, 228, 70 Hun. 273.

As issue of living person.

The word "descendant," according to its lexicographical and legal meaning, designates the issue of a deceased person, and does not describe the child of a parent who is still living, the word being the correlative of "ancestor"; but as used in a will giving a life estate to the testator's daughter, with power to appoint it thereafter to her child or children, or his, her, or their descendant or descendants, will be construed to embrace all the persons in the line of descent from any child or children of the daughter, whether living or dead. Hillen v. Iselin, 39 N. E. 368, 371, 144 N. Y. 365.

As lineal descendant.

A "descendant," as usually understood, is an heir in the direct descending line. In Baker v. Baker, 74 Mass. (8 Gray) 101, it was held that the word "descendants" in a will cannot be construed to include any but lineal heirs, unless there are clear indications in the will of the testator's intention to extend the meaning. Our laws of descent used the words with the same signification. Thus, in Rev. St. 1881, § 2469, it is provided that "if any intestate shall die without lawful issue, or their descendants, alive, one half the estate shall go to the father and mother of such intestate as joint tenants, and the other half to the brothers and sisters, and to the descendants of such as are dead, as tenants in common." The word "descendant" in Rev. St. 1881, § 2571, reading, "Whenever any estate, real or personal, shall be devised to any descendant of a testator, and such devisee shall die during the lifetime of the testator, leaving a descendant who shall survive such testator, such devise shall not lapse, but the property so devised shall vest in the surviving descendant of the devisee as if such devisee had survived the testator, or died intestate," does not apply to a brother of a testator. It refers, we think, exclusively to a lineal descendant, as a child or grandchild. West v. West, 89 Ind. 529, 631.

"Descendant," as used in 2 Rev. St. (3d Ed.) p. 126, § 44, providing that whenever any estate, real or personal, shall be devised or bequeathed to a child or other descendant of the testator, and such legatee or devisee shall die during the lifetime of the testator, leaving a child or other descendant who shall survive such testator, such devise or legacy shall not lapse, but the property shall vest in the surviving child or other descendant of the legatee or devisee, means "lineal descendant," and not any person upon whom property might descend, and is not equivalent to the term "relation." It means direct lineal descendants of the testator. Armstrong v. Moran (N. Y.) 1 Bradf. Sur. 314, 317.

"Descendants," as used in Rev. St. 1879, § 2190, giving a widow the right, when her husband dies without a child or other descendants in being capable of inheriting, in lieu of dower, to elect to take one-half of his property, means those who descend in a direct line from the husband, as children, grandchildren, etc., and does not apply to collateral or ancestral kinship. Webster defines "descendant" as "one who descends, as offspring, however remotely; correlative to 'ancestor.'" Brawford v. Wolfe, 15 S. W. 426, 427, 103 Mo. 391.

The word "descendants," when used in a devise of property to testator's descendants, will only be construed to include lineal heirs, unless it clearly appears from the will that testator used the word in a different sense. Baker v. Baker, 74 Mass. (8 Gray) 101, 119.

"Descendants," as used in Rev. St. p. 369, § 22, providing that when any estate shall be devised or bequeathed to any other person, being a child or other descendant of the testator, etc., and such devisee or legatee shall die during the life of the testator, leaving a child or children who shall survive the testator, the legacy shall not lapse, but shall vest in such child or children, descendant or descendants, from such devisee or legatee, cannot be construed to include nephews and nieces of a testator, but only extends to the child, grandchildren, etc., who descend from him in a direct line. Van Gieson v. Howard, 7 N. J. Eq. (3 Halst. Ch.) 462, 463.

As nearest descendants.

St. 1857, § 1, declares that the estate of a deceased person shall go to those of a particular class and their descendants, and if there be no descendants, then, etc. Held, that the word "descendants" as there used meant descendants nearest in degree. Daboll v. Field, 9 R. I. 266, 289.

As personal representative.

See "Personal Representative."

DESCENDIBLE.

The word "descendible" and "devisable" are convertible terms, so that where a contingent remainder is descendible it is also devisable. Collins v. Smith, 31 S. E. 449, 451, 105 Ga. 525.

DESCENT.

See "Collateral Descent"; "Immediate Descent"; "Mediate Descent"; "Title by Descent."

Descent, devise, or otherwise, see "Otherwise."

"Descent" is the title whereby a person, upon the death of his ancestor, acquires the estate of the latter as his heir at law. Starr v. Hamilton (U. S.) 22 Fed. Cas. 1107, 1111 (quoting Bouv. Law Dict.); Meadowcroft v. Winnebago County, 54 N. E. 949, 950, 181 Ill. 504; Bennet v. Hibbert, 55 N. W. 93, 96, 88 Iowa, 154; Springer & Taylor v. Fortune (Ohio) 2 Handy, 52, 56; Barclay v. Cameron, 25 Tex. 233, 242; Freeman v. Allen, 17 Ohio St. 527, 530.

"Property of lands by descent," says Lord Bacon, "is where a man hath lands of inheritance, and dieth not dispossessed of them, but leaves it to go (as the law causeth it) upon the heirs." This is called a "descent in law." Hamilton v. Homer, 46 Miss. 378, 395.

Descent, or hereditary succession, is where the title to land which is acquired by the man on the death of his ancestor is established by right of representation as his heir at law. In re Donahue's Estate, 36 Cal. 329, 332 (citing Bl. Comm. 201, note 1).

Descent is the process by which property is passed from father to son, or from ancestor to descendant. Shippen v. Izard (Pa.) 1 Serg. & R. 222, 224.

Descent, in its common-law sense, means an estate which came to a person by law in right of blood. Brower v. Hunt, 18 Ohio St. 311, 338.

Descent is hereditary succession to an estate in realty. "Descent" usually applies to the devolution of real estate. Adams v. Akerlund, 168 Ill. 632, 639, 48 N. E. 454, 457 (citing Bouv. Law Dict.).

The term "descent," as used in reference to the acquisition of title to real estate, means the acquirement thereof by a man "from his ancestor without writing." Priest v. Cummings (N. Y.) 20 Wend. 338, 349.

St. 1831, § 4, providing that, when any person shall die intestate, without issue, possessed of a title to any real estate, by purchase with the estate of, or by "descent from the mother," it shall go to a living brother or sister of the mother of such person, cannot be construed to mean "descent from the maternal grandfather," or taking the share of the deceased parent. Case v. Wildridge, 4 Ind. 51, 53.

As used in St. 1822, providing that when the title to any estate of inheritance, as to which the person having such title shall die intestate, "came by descent, gift, or devise" from the parent or other kindred of the intestate, and should such intestate die without children such estate shall go to the kin next to the intestate of the blood of the person from whom such estate came or descended, if any there be, means immediate descent, gift, or devise, and makes the immediate ancestor, donor, or devisor the sole stock of descent. Gardner v. Collins, 27 U. S. (2 Pet.) 58, 85, 7 L. Ed. 347.

Devise distinguished.

The word "descent," in its technical legal meaning, denotes the transmission of real estate, or some interest therein, on the death of the owner intestate, by inheritance, to some person according to certain rules of law. In such meaning it is distinguished from "transmission by devise," which is technically by purchase, and also from the transmission of personal property, the title of which passes to the administrator, and, after the payment of all debts and claims against the estate, is governed by certain rules of distribution. Hudnall v. Ham, 49 N. E. 985, 987, 172 Ill. 76.

"Descent" signifies when lands had by right of blood fall onto any one after the death of his ancestors, or a descent is a means whereby only death derived him title to certain lands. This is the noblest, worthiest means whereby lands are derived from one to another, because it is right, and vested by the act of law and right of blood unto the worthiest and next of the blood and kindred of the ancestor. If an estate is derived even from a father in any other shape than the course of descent would take, it is taken by purchase and not by descent. The test of the rule is to strike out of the will the particular devise to the heir, and then if, without that, he would take by descent exactly the same estate which the devise purports to give him, he is in by descent and not by purchase." Springer v. Fortune (Ohio) 2 Cin. R. 52, 55.

Title is acquired by "descent" when the title is vested in a man by the single operation of law. A title by devise is a title by purchase, and not by descent. Allen v. Bland, 33 N. E. 774, 134 Ind. 78.

Mediate and immediate distinguished.

"According to the principles of the common law of England, as well as the act of descents of this state, descents are either lineal or collateral, and both may be either mediate or immediate. The immediate lineal descent at common law is from the father to his son; the immediate collateral descent is from one brother to another; the mediate, when one derives his inheritable blood to another by the medium of a third person; as in lineal descent, if a son claims as heir to his grandfather or great-grandfather, it shall be mediate patre, though the father be dead at the time of the descent; so in a collateral descent from a nephew to an uncle, or from an uncle to a nephew, it shall be made mediate patre." Garner v. Wood, 17 Atl. 1031, 1032, 71 Md. 37 (quoting Stewart's Lessee v. Jones [Md.] 8 Gill & J. 1).

A descent may be said to be mediate or immediate in regard to the mediate or immediate descent of the estate or right, or it may be said to be mediate or immediate in regard to the mediateness or immediateness of the pedigrees or degrees of consanguinity. Thus a descent from a grandfather, who dies in possession, to the grandchild, the father being then dead, is in the former sense in law an immediate descent. On the other hand, with reference to the line of pedigree or consanguinity, a descent is often said to be immediate where the ancestor from whom the party derives his blood is immediate, and without any intervening link or degree, and mediate when the kindred is derived from him mediate altero, another ancestor intervening between them. Thus a descent in lineals from father to son is in this sense immediate, but a descent from a grandfather to a grandson, the father being dead, or from uncle to nephew, the brother being dead, is deemed mediate. Furenes v. Mickelson, 53 N. W. 416, 417, 86 Iowa, 508.

Descent is hereditary succession to an estate in realty. "Descent" usually applies to the devolution of real estate. The word "inheritance" is often used synonymously with "descent," and refers to the devolution of real property. Adams v. Akerlund, 48 N. E. 454, 457, 168 Ill. 632.

As used in a statute providing that it shall be lawful for any married female to receive by gift, grant, demise, bequest, or descent, and hold to her sole and separate use as if she were a single female, real and personal property, and the rents and issues and profits thereof, the word "descent" cannot be construed to apply to personal property, though it may be given that meaning sometimes to effectuate the intention. Its meaning in this case would not be extended by the necessity of giving it some effect, for here the word applies to the real estate mentioned. Horner v. Webster, 33 N. J. Law (4 Vroom) 387, 400.

"Gift, devise, or descent" may be used in a will to indicate the manner of the devolution of both the real and personal property, or of personalty alone. Rountree v. Pursell, 39 N. E. 747, 749, 11 Ind. App. 522.

DESCRIBE—DESCRIPTION.

See "Sufficient Description."

In the statute relating to ejectment, and requiring the property to be described in the summons, the term "described" means the same as "described with confident certainty," for to "describe" a thing or place, and to "describe it with confident certainty," would seem to mean the same. Board of Education v. Crawford, 14 W. Va. 790, 803.

"Description," within the meaning or the mechanic's lien law requiring claimant to file a true description of the property, means such a statement as to its character as will not only identify the property with reasonable certainty as between the parties, but which will be notice to strangers purchasing the property, and relying on the face of the description in the claim for their notice. Mechanics' Planing Mill v. Nast, 7 Mo. App. 147, 149.

"Describing a way," as used in Rev. St. c. 18, § 1, providing for the laying out of a highway by the county commissioners on presentation of a petition describing a way, should be construed to mean a statement of the places where the way is desired to commence and terminate, and its general course between them. Hayford v. Aroostook County Com'rs, 3 Atl. 51, 52, 78 Me. 153.

In an indictment for forgery, a description, "the president, directors and company of the Bank of St. Albans," as the party intended to be defrauded, is a good description of an artificial person. State v. Phelps, 11 Vt. 116, 119, 34 Am. Dec. 672.

Where land is conveyed by a deed bounding it on a way or street, by such description the grantor and his heirs are estopped from denying that there is a street or way to the extent of the land on the side of which the street is described. Such conveyance is not merely a description, but an implied covenant that there is such a street. It probably entered into the consideration of the purchase. Parker v. Smith, 17 Mass. 413, 416, 9 Am. Dec. 157.

The term "description," as used in Ky. St. 1899, § 4241, providing that the auditor's agent shall file in the clerk's office a statement containing a description and value of property to be assessed as omitted property, does not require a particular description or the exact amount of cash, notes, bonds, mortgages, choses in action, etc., that the owner may have in his possession or may have had in the years past. The information on which the court is expected to act under this law must be from the nature of the case somewhat general. Commonwealth v. Collins (Ky.) 72 S. W. 819, 820 (citing Commonwealth v. Singer Mfg. Co. [Ky.] 21 S. W. 354).

It is one of the essential elements in the description of real property in a conveyance that it must be sufficiently certain to furnish the means for identification of the premises intended to be conveyed. McRoberts v. McArthur, 62 Minn. 310, 311, 64 N. W. 903.

Insufficient description distinguished.

"Description," as used in the statute providing that parol testimony may be admitted for the purpose of fitting land to the description contained in a deed, means descriptions which are legal in themselves, but which, in the absence of parol testimony, might be applied to more than one piece of real estate. Thus the court says: "The question is whether the word 'description' is to be taken in its ordinary and legal signification—that is, a description which has a legal susceptibility of being aided by testimony so as to identify the land—or whether it means a description which in law is no description whatever." It is sometimes called an "insufficient description," the court holding itself unable to conceive of any principle on which the latter proposition could be supported. Lowe v. Harris, 17 S. E. 539, 544, 112 N. C. 472, 22 L. R. A. 379.

As substantial representation.

In Act 1870, § 24, providing that any person who has invented any new and useful art, machine, manufacture, or composition of matter not known or used by others in this country, and not patented or "described in any printed publication" in this or any foreign country before his invention or discovery thereof, may obtain a patent therefor, "described" means such a description and drawings as contain and exhibit a substantial representation of the patented improvement in such full, clear, and exact terms as to enable any person skilled in the art or science to which it appertains to make, construct, and practice the invention as they would be enabled to do if information was derived from a prior patent. Downton v. Yaeger Milling Co., 3 Sup. Ct. 10, 12, 108 U. S. 466, 27 L. Ed. 789 (citing Seymour v. Osborne, 78 U. S. (11 Wall.) 516, 20 L. Ed. 33.

A description is a sketch or account of anything in words; a portraiture or representation in language. It is a representation by visible lines, marks, colors, etc.; the act of representing a thing by words or signs, or the account or writing containing such representation; and, as used in conveyances of real estate and in legal instruments in writing, it is the language which depicts the thing under consideration. Black's Law Dictionary defines it as: (1) A delineation or account of a particular subject by a recital of its characteristic accidents and qualities. (2) A written enumeration of items composing an estate, or of its condition, or of titles or documents, like an inventory, but with more particularity, and without involving the idea of an appraisal. (3) An exact written account of an article, mechanical device, or process which is the subject of an application for a patent. (4) A method of pointing out a particular person by referring to his relationship to some other person or his character as an officer, trustee, executor, etc. (5) That part of a conveyance, advertisement of sale, etc., which identifies the land intended to be affected. And hence, as used in a verification to a declaratory statement of a mining claim that the "description" of said lode as given in the location notice is true and correct, it meant merely the delineation or account of the mining claim by the recital of its metes and bounds, or courses and distances, and its geographical position, and did not refer to the whole location notice, so that the affidavit was insufficient. And the description as used in Gen. Laws, div. 5, § 1477, providing that any person who shall discover any mining claim shall make a declaratory statement "describing" such claim, means a description of the claim and of a discovery or location as well. McCowan v. MacLay, 40 Pac. 602, 603, 16 Mont. 234.

DESERT.

Dr. Johnson says that to "desert" is to abandon, to forsake. Crabb, in his book on Synonyms, says that the words "desert," "abandon," and "forsake" are synonymous, and continues: "We 'abandon' those who are entirely dependent for protection and support; they are left in a helpless state, exposed to every danger. A child is 'abandoned' by his parent. We 'desert' those with whom we have entered into coalition; they are left to their own resources. We 'forsake' those with whom we have been in habits of intimacy; they are deprived of the pleasures and comforts of society. To 'abandon' is totally to withdraw ourselves from an object; to lay aside all care for it; to leave it altogether to itself. To 'desert' is to withdraw ourselves at certain times, when our assistance and co-operation are required, or to separate ourselves from that to which we ought to be attached." Pidge v. Pidge, 44 Mass. (3 Metc.) 257, 264.

"Deserted," as used in Rev. St. 1881, § 5132, providing that a married woman may obtain provision for the support of herself and infant children where the husband shall have deserted his wife and children without cause, conveys the same idea as the word "abandoned," in a pleading alleging that the husband, without cause, abandoned plaintiff and children. That is an act of willfully leaving the wife with the intention of causing a palpable separation, a cessation of cohabitation. The words "deserted" and "abandoned" convey the full idea of the act of desertion. Carr v. Carr, 33 N. E. 805, 6 Ind. App. 377.

The words "deserted her," as used in an agreed statement of facts that a pauper was married to a certain person who deserted her, should be construed in their ordinary legal sense, which means that such person utterly forsook and abandoned the pauper, and quit and left her with a view of not returning to her. Town of Pittsford v. Town of Chittenden, 3 Atl. 323, 325, 58 Vt. 49.

The intention of a husband to permanently separate himself from his wife would be, in a legal phrase, an "intention to desert her." Whinyates v. Whinyates (N. J.) 41 Atl. 363.

DESERTER.

A "deserter," within the meaning of the treaty between the United States and England, authorizing the arrest of deserters from English vessels, is one who leaves his vessel without leave, and without intention to return. It would describe a seaman who signs articles for a voyage, and fails to get on board in time to comply with the provisions of his contract. In re Sutherland (U. S.) 53 Fed. 551, 552.

The word "deserter" is generally used to mean a person who has deserted from the United States army. The offense of desertion is one purely of military character, cognizable only by a court-martial, and hence does not constitute a crime so as to render words charging a person with being a "deserter" liable to an action of slander without proof of special damage. Hollingsworth v. Shaw, 19 Ohio St. 430, 432, 2 Am. Rep. 411.

DESERTION (In Divorce Law).

See "Obstinate Desertion"; "Utterly Desert"; "Willful and Malicious Desertion"; "Willful Desertion."

Desertion is a breach of matrimonial duty, and is composed, first, of the actual breaking off of the matrimonial cohabitation, and, secondly, an intent to desert in the mind of the offender; and both must combine to make the desertion complete. Bailey v. Bailey (Va.) 21 Grat. 43, 47; Morrison v. Morrison, 20 Cal. 431, 432; Latham v. Latham (Va.) 30 Grat. 307, 320; Gill v. Gill (Md.) 49 Atl. 557, 558; Harris v. Harris (Va.) 31 Grat. 13, 28; Burk v. Burk, 21 W. Va. 445, 450; Alkire v. Alkire (W. Va.) 11 S. E. 11, 12; Stein v. Stein, 5 Colo. 55, 56.

Desertion is an actual abandonment of matrimonial cohabitation, with an intent to desert, willfully and maliciously persisted in without cause for two years. The guilty intent is manifested when, without cause or consent, either party withdraws from the residence of the other. Eisenberg v. Eisenberg (Pa.) 18 Wkly. Notes Cas. 146, 148 (citing Ingersoll v. Ingersoll, 49 Pa. [13 Wright] 249, 250, 88 Am. Dec. 500); Middleton v. Middleton, 41 Atl. 291, 293, 187 Pa. 612 (citing Ingersoll v. Ingersoll, 49 Pa. 249, 88 Am. Dec. 500); Raver v. Raver, 1 Pa. Dist. R. 177, 180.

Willful desertion is the voluntary separation of one of the married parties from the other, with intent to desert. Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 2740.

Desertion, in the law of divorce, is the voluntary separation of one of the married parties from the other, or the voluntary refusal to renew a suspended cohabitation, without justification either in the consent or wrongful conduct of the other. Droege v. Droege, 55 Mo. App. 481, 482.

In Schouler on Husband and Wife, § 516, it is said: "According to the latest authorities, it may be laid down that legal desertion, in the present sense of our divorce acts, imports three things: (1) An actual cessation of cohabitation for the period specified; (2) the willful intent of the absent spouse to desert; (3) desertion by that spouse against the will of the other. Unless these three things concur, there is no legal desertion established such as to justify a divorce." Barnett v. Barnett, 61 N. E. 737, 739, 27 Ind. App. 466. See, also, Taylor v. Taylor, 28 N. J. Eq. (1 Stew.) 207.

The term "desertion," as used in the law of divorce, contemplates a voluntary separation of one party from the other, without justification, with the intention of not returning. Williams v. Williams, 130 N. Y. 193, 29 N. E. 98, 14 L. R. A. 220, 27 Am. St. Rep. 517.

"Desertion," under the statute, is the willful abandonment of one party by the other, without cause and against the will of the party abandoned, for the period of two years. If the husband's conduct is so cruel towards the wife that she cannot live with him with safety to her health or without peril to her life, or if she has good reason to believe she cannot, and abandons her home, she does not thereby commit the crime of desertion. Kikell v. Kikell, 25 Neb. 256, 41 N. W. 180 (citing Warner v. Warner, 20 N. W. 558, 54 Mich. 492).

"Desertion," as used in the Massachusetts divorce law, is an abnegation on the part of the husband of all the chief duties and obligations resulting from the marriage contract and distinguishing it from others. There is no more important right of the wife than that which secures to her in the marriage relation the companionship of her husband and the protection of his home. His willful denial of this right, with the intentional and permanent abandonment of all matrimonial intercourse, against her consent, is "desertion" within the meaning of the statute. And such conduct is not relieved by the fact that from time to time he contributes to her support and that of her children. Magrath v. Magrath, 103 Mass. 577, 579, 4 Am. Rep. 579.

To constitute "desertion," the deserting party must forsake the other willfully, intending to abandon, and must obstinately continue in such state of separation for the statutory period. Cass v. Cass, 31 N. J. Eq. (4 Stew.) 626. Nor are both separation and non-support sufficient. Howell v. Howell, 48 Atl. 510, 511, 64 N. J. Eq. 191.

To constitute a "desertion," there must be an abandonment against the will of the abandoned party, and persisted in for the statutory period, or what is equivalent to such abandonment. Plimley v. Plimley, 35 N. J. Eq. (8 Stew.) 18, 19.

In our state a "desertion," so as to justify a divorce, must be a willful and obstinate purpose in the wife to abandon her husband and not associate herself with him, and if, during the period, she manifests a disposition to resume their relations, the continuity of the period of desertion, which is absolutely essential, fails. Loux v. Loux, 41 Atl. 358, 359, 57 N. J. Eq. 561.

Desertion is the voluntary separation of one of the married parties from the other, or the voluntary refusal to renew a suspended cohabitation, without justification either in the consent or wrongful conduct of the other. Desertion is a willful termination of the married relation by one of the married parties without lawful or reasonable cause, or refusal without reasonable cause to renew the married relation after the parties have been separated. Ogilvie v. Ogilvie, 61 Pac. 627, 629, 37 Or. 171.

"Desertion," as used with reference to a wife, consists in her refusing to live with her husband according to his desire. Newing v. Newing, 18 Atl. 166, 45 N. J. Eq. (18 Stew.) 498.

"Desertion," as a cause for divorce, exists when either party, without cause or consent, withdraws from the residence of the other. Bealor v. Hahn, 11 Atl. 776, 117 Pa. 169.

"Desertion," within the meaning of the statute making a willful desertion for three years with total neglect a ground of divorce, means, when applied to the husband, the act of willfully absenting himself from the society of his wife, with the intention to continue to live apart in spite of her wish, and without any intention to return to cohabitation. It is not alone a specific act, but a continuing course of conduct. Tirrell v. Tirrell, 45 Atl. 153, 72 Conn. 567, 47 L. R. A. 750.

The word "desertion," as used in Gen. St. 1878, c. 69, § 5, providing that desertion by husband or wife shall be a ground for an action to bar the right of curtesy or dower, is used in the same sense as in a statute making it a ground for divorce, and imports such a willful abandonment by one party of the other, without any sufficient cause or excuse, as constitutes good ground for divorce. It involves violation of marital duty and obligation on the part of the one guilty of the act of desertion, and is therefore wrongful and unlawful. Weld v. Weld, 7 N. W. 267, 27 Minn. 330.

Although a wife leaves her husband's house through his fault, yet if he afterwards sincerely solicits her to return, and she deliberately and persistently refuses to do so, her conduct constitutes "desertion," within the meaning of the divorce act. Hooper v. Hooper, 34 N. J. Eq. (7 Stew.) 93, 97.

The refusal of the wife to accompany her husband on a change of his residence, followed by actual cessation of matrimonial cohabitation, and unattended by any excusing or explanatory circumstances, would constitute sufficient evidence of desertion to authorize a divorce. Hardenbergh v. Hardenbergh, 14 Cal. 654, 657.

Abandonment synonymous.

The word "desertion," as used in connection with the marital relation, is synonymous with "abandonment." People v. Crouse, 83 N. Y. Supp. 812, 813, 86 App. Div. 352.

"Abandonment" is synonymous with "desertion," as used in a statute making desertion a cause for divorce. They are different words to express the same meaning. Stoddard v. Stoddard (Ill.) 11 Chl. Leg. N. 162.

"Desertion" and "abandonment" are used interchangeably. They mean the same thing. It is said that to establish desertion three things must be shown: first, cessation of life together; second, the intention not to resume such relation; and, third, the absence of complainant's consent to separation. Separation by mutual consent of husband and wife is not desertion of either. State v. Weber, 48 Mo. App. 500, 504.

Absence.

Mere absence is not desertion. Taylor v. Taylor, 28 N. J. Eq. (1 Stew.) 207; Rogers v. Rogers, 18 N. J. Eq. (3 C. E. Green) 445, 446; Howell v. Howell (N. J.) 48 Atl. 510, 511.

In legal contemplation, there is no "desertion" by a husband where he is driven by stress of pecuniary difficulties to absent himself from his wife and home in an effort to better provide for his family, an intent to sever and abandon his domestic relationship being necessary to constitute desertion. Walton v. Walton, 25 South. 166, 168, 76 Miss. 662, 71 Am. St. Rep. 540.

In the Illinois law of divorce, the terms "desertion" and "absence" are treated as synonymous terms, and hence absence is desertion, as the term "desertion" is used making such act a ground for divorce. Elzas v. Elzas, 49 N. E. 717, 719, 171 Ill. 632; Fritz v. Fritz, 28 N. E. 1058, 138 Ill. 436, 14 L. R. A. 685, 32 Am. St. Rep. 156 (citing Carter v. Carter, 62 Ill. 439).

As cruel and inhuman treatment.

See "Cruelty."

Nonsupport.

Nonsupport alone is not sufficient to constitute desertion. Proudlove v. Proudlove (N. J.) 46 Atl. 951, 952; Cook v. Cook, 13 N. J. Eq. (2 Beasli.) 263, 264; Howell v. Howell, 48 Atl. 510, 511, 64 N. J. Eq. 191.

Refusal of sexual intercourse.

Refusal of sexual intercourse does not constitute desertion. Fritz v. Fritz, 28 N. E. 1058, 138 Ill. 436, 14 L. R. A. 685, 32 Am. St. Rep. 156.

Desertion "does not signify merely a refusal of matrimonial intercourse, which would be a breach or violation of a single conjugal or marital duty or obligation; so that mere refusal by a wife of sexual intercourse with her husband for five years consecutively, though unjustified by considerations of health or physical disability, does not constitute desertion." Southwick v. Southwick, 97 Mass. 327, 329, 93 Am. Dec. 95.

The word "desertion," in reference to the right to secure a divorce for the desertion of a husband or wife, is used in the sense of "abandon," to the extent that the deserted party must be deprived of all real companionship and every substantial duty which the other owes to him or her, and is not constituted by the cessation of sexual intercourse alone. Anonymous, 28 Atl. 467, 468, 52 N. J. Eq. (7 Dick.) 349.

The refusal of the wife, without justifiable cause, to permit her husband to have sexual intercourse with her during a period of time exceeding two years, is "desertion" within the meaning of the law, and furnishes grounds for divorce. Fritts v. Fritts, 86 Ill. App. 31, 87.

Separation.

The term "desertion," in the law of divorce, means more than a mere separation. Davis v. Davis (N. J.) 30 Atl. 20; Middleton v. Middleton, 41 Atl. 291, 293, 187 Pa. 612; Proudlove v. Proudlove (N. J.) 46 Atl. 951, 952; Loux v. Loux, 41 Atl. 358, 359, 57 N. J. Eq. 561; Ingersoll v. Ingersoll, 49 Pa. (13 Wright) 249, 251, 88 Am. Dec. 500; Warner v. Warner, 20 N. W. 557, 558, 54 Mich. 492.

Separation is not desertion. Desertion is an actual abandonment of matrimonial cohabitation, with an intent to desert, willfully and maliciously persisted in, without cause, for two years. The guilty intent is manifested when, without cause or consent, either party withdraws from the residence of the other. Ingersoll v. Ingersoll, 49 Pa. (13 Wright) 249, 251 (approved in Eisenberg v. Eisenberg, 1 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 590, 593).

A separation between husband and wife implies the consent of both parties, and is not synonymous with "desertion," the very idea of which is to leave without consent of the other, and in violation of duty. Stoddard v. Stoddard (Ill.) 11 Chl. Leg. N. 162.

In a prosecution for perjury, defendant was charged with having sworn in a divorce suit that his wife had willfully deserted him. His testimony was that they separated; that she refused to return. It was contended that the jury should have been instructed as to the difference between "separation" and "desertion," and that a defendant indicted for perjury, who swore that his wife was guilty of desertion, cannot be convicted by proof that defendant swore that himself and his wife separated. It was held that such instruction was not necessary, since the wife testified that the separation was because of her absolute refusal to live with her husband, or to come where he was after he had left his former home, there being no distinction between a separation accompanied by such refusal, and the statutory definition of "desertion." Hereford v. People, 64 N. E. 310, 316, 197 Ill. 222.

Departure or absence of one party from the family dwelling place, caused by cruelty or threats of bodily harm, from which danger would be reasonably apprehended from the other, is not desertion by the absent party. Separation by consent with or without the understanding that one of the parties will apply for a divorce, is not desertion. Absence or separation, proper in itself, becomes desertion whenever the intent to desert is fixed during such absence or separation. Consent to a separation is a revocable act, and if one of the parties afterwards in good faith seeks a reconciliation and restoration, but the other refuses it, such refusal is desertion. If one party deserts the other before the expiration of the statutory period required to make the desertion a cause of divorce, returns, and offers in good faith to fulfill the marriage contract, and solicits condonation, the desertion is cured. If the other party refuses such offer and condonation, the refusal shall be deemed and treated as desertion by such party from the time of refusal. The husband may choose any reasonable place or mode of living, and if the wife does not conform thereto it is desertion. If the place or mode of living selected by the husband is unreasonable and grossly unfit, and the wife does not conform thereto, it is desertion on the part of the husband from the time her reasonable objections are made known to him. Civ. Code Mont. 1895, §§ 136-142.

Same—Compulsory.

Cruelty, on the part of either spouse, carried to such an extent as to drive the other from home, will constitute desertion on the part of the spouse inflicting such cruelty. Barnett v. Barnett, 61 N. E. 737, 739, 27 Ind. App. 466.

To render the withdrawal of a wife from the house of the husband such an abandonment as to constitute a "desertion" in legal estimation, it must appear that she left her husband and remained away from him of her own accord, without his consent and against his will, for the full statutory period. The abandonment is not voluntary where it is compelled by personal violence, coarse language, and constant neglect; and such an abandonment cannot be made the ground of divorce. Meldowney v. Meldowney, 27 N. J. Eq. (12 C. E. Green) 328, 329.

The leaving and abandoning of a husband's home by the wife when his conduct towards her is so cruel that she cannot live and cohabit with him with safety to her health, or without peril to her life, or if she has good reason to believe she cannot, does not constitute desertion. In such case she does not leave her husband or her home in consequence of any willfulness on her part, but is compelled by the cruelty of her husband, and against her will, so to do. The desertion in such case is on his part, and not on hers. He as completely commits the crime of "desertion" when by his cruel conversation and conduct he compels her, for safety, to leave him and his home, as when he willfully and without cause leaves and abandons her. Warner v. Warner, 20 N. W. 557, 558, 54 Mich. 492.

The marriage contract does not furnish an absolute guaranty to the wife that the husband shall at all times be able to relieve her from all efforts to support the family, and separation attributable to the husband's inability to earn support for the wife does not constitute a desertion entitling her to a divorce. Bennett v. Bennett, 43 Conn. 813, 818.

A mere separation by mutual consent is not desertion by either party. Latham v. Latham (Va.) 30 Gratt. 307, 321; Alkire v. Alkire (W. Va.) 11 S. E. 11, 12; Barnett v. Barnett (Ind.) 61 N. E. 737, 739. "Desertion," as applied to a severance of the relations between husband and wife, means the absenting of one of the spouses from the other against the will of such other; hence if a married woman left her husband with his consent and remained away, that was not desertion, but merely a voluntary separation. Lea v. Lea, 90 Mass. (8 Allen) 418, 419.

A separation by mutual consent cannot be desertion; neither can desertion be inferred against either from the mere unaided fact of their not living together, though protracted absence, with other circumstances, may establish the original intent. If the husband, after deserting his wife, repents and offers to return, and she rejects his proposal, the statutory period having elapsed, this, at the date of the refusal, becomes desertion by the wife. A desertion ends with the determination of the intent to desert. It ends when the erring party offers to return and is prevented by the other party. The very idea of a "desertion" is to leave without the consent of the other, and is not synonymous with "separation," for a separation implies consent of both parties to be affected thereby. "Desertion" and "abandonment" are different words to express the same thing. The word "desert" means to part from, to end a connection with, to forsake, to abandon, to leave without permission, to forsake in violation of duty. Stoddard v. Stoddard (Ill.) 11 Chl. Leg. N. 162.

Where a wife left her husband at his suggestion, and there was subsequent correspondence in which both parties suggested conditions for a return, though no satisfactory agreement was reached, the separation would not justify the granting of a divorce. Middleton v. Middleton, 41 Atl. 291, 293, 187 Pa. 612.

A divorce on the ground of desertion will not be granted where the parties have met in friendly relations within two years of the filing of the petition, and defendant within that time has given plaintiff money and repeatedly requested her to live with him. Davis v. Davis (N. J.) 30 Atl. 20.

The voluntary separation of a husband and wife for mutual dislike, incompatibility of temper, incongeniality, or other cause, however long continued, will not constitute "desertion" on either side, within the meaning of a statute authorizing divorce therefor. It will become a desertion, however, from the time when a renewal of the marriage ties is sincerely sought, or, in other words, from the period when the mutual acquiescence in the separation is put to an end by the overtures of one of the parties. Hankinson v. Hankinson, 33 N. J. Eq. (6 Stew.) 66, 70.

DESERTION (In Maritime Law).

"Desertion is, by the law maritime, an unlawful and willful abandonment of a vessel, during her voyage, by her crew, without an intention of returning to their duty. It is not a mere unauthorized absence from the ship without leave." The Union (U. S.) 24 Fed. 537, 539.

"Desertion," in the sense of the maritime law, means, not a mere unauthorized absence from a ship without leave, but an unauthorized leaving or absence from a ship with an intention not to return to the service, or, as it is often expressed, animo non revertendi; that is, with an intention to desert." Coffin v. Jenkins (U. S.) 5 Fed. Cas. 1188, 1190; Per Story, J., in Cloutman v. Tunison (U. S.) 5 Fed. Cas. 1091, 1093.

Desertion is the quitting of a vessel by a seaman, not only without leave or permission, but without justifiable cause, and with the intent not to return again to the ship's duty. The Mary C. Conery (U. S.) 9 Fed. 222, 223.

"Desertion" by a sailor, during a voyage, such as will work a forfeiture of all wages previously due, must be, not merely an absence without leave or in disobedience of orders, but a desertion with an intention to abandon the ship; and if, after desertion, a seaman offers to return to duty in a reasonable time, and offers amends and repents of the offense, the master is bound to receive him back, unless his previous misconduct would justify a discharge. The George (U. S.) 10 Fed. Cas. 201, 204.

DESERVING.

The word "deserving," as used in a will giving the surplus of testator's estate, after payment of legacies, to be distributed to such persons, societies, or institutions as the executors might consider most deserving, denotes worth or merit, without regard to condition or circumstance, and is in no sense of the word limited to persons in need of assistance, or to objects which come within the class of charitable uses. Nichols v. Allen, 130 Mass. 211, 218, 39 Am. Rep. 445.

In a will bequeathing property to selectmen in trust for the special benefit of the worthy, deserving poor of a certain town, the phrase "worthy, deserving poor" was not an indeterminate and uncertain one, but one which the selectmen might well determine. Beardsley v. Selectmen of Bridgeport, 3 Atl. 557, 558, 53 Conn. 489, 55 Am. Rep. 152.

The use of the word "deserving" in a bequest to a trustee, to be used as in his judgment he may think best in aid of the deserving, aged native-born in a certain town needing such aid, does not render the will indefinite, since the word must be construed in connection with the phrase "needing aid," and coupled with that phrase, and donation of money, it means practically the same thing as the "aged poor." Fay v. Howe, 69 Pac. 423, 424, 136 Cal. 599.

DESIGN.

See "Formed Design"; "Premeditated Design."

Designed for exportation, see "Export—Exportation."

The word "design" contemplates the causative act of omission, done or suffered willfully or knowingly. The Strathdon (U. S.) 89 Fed. 374, 378.

Absence of overpowering passion implied.

The expressions "premeditation," "deliberation," "design," "determination," distinctly formed in the mind, used in the charge of a prosecution for murder, all imply the absence of overpowering passion. State v. Ah Mook, 12 Nev. 369, 381.

As designate.

17 Stat. 599, providing that no article or thing "designed or intended for the prevention of conception" shall be carried in the mail, should not be construed "as intended to describe the intent, which must be an element of the crime against the United States, but simply as descriptive of the article made contraband, and the phrase must be understood to indicate as contraband in the mail any article or thing designed in a manner calculated to secure its use by one for the purpose of preventing conception. The same conclusion may be arrived at by giving the word 'designed,' as used in this statute, the signification of 'designated,' which is one of the ordinary meanings of the word." United States v. Bott (U. S.) 24 Fed. Cas. 1204, 1205.

As intend.

"Design" is a purpose or intention, combined with plan, or implying a plan in the mind. State v. Grant, 53 N. W. 120, 121, 86 Iowa, 216; Ernest v. State, 20 Fla. 383, 388; Hogan v. State, 36 Wis. 226, 244.

In an indictment charging that the defendant fraudulently and deceitfully kept in his possession six quires of paper, which was a material devised, adopted, and designed by him for forging and making false counterfeit notes in imitation of those issued by banks and banking companies, the term "designed" was intended to point out the particular purpose to which the instrument or material might be applied. It is not sufficient to constitute an allegation of defendant's criminal intent. Commonwealth v. Morse, 2 Mass. 128, 131.

In an accident insurance policy providing that the insurance should not extend to any case of death or personal injury, unless the claimant should establish by direct and positive truth that the death or injury was not the result of design, either on the part of the deceased or of any other person, the term "design" means the design that intended the actual result accomplished, and not the design of the act itself, which act resulted in the killing of one contrary to the design of the act. The design mentioned in the policy must be considered a design on the part of one killing the insured to kill such insured, and if at the time he fired the pistol shot he did not intend to kill insured, or did not know that the man he was shooting was the insured, death was not the result of design. Utter v. Travelers' Ins. Co., 32 N. W. 812, 813, 65 Mich. 545, 8 Am. St. Rep. 913.

Where a partnership contract provided that one of the partners might purchase, sell, and charter the vessels "designed for the trade," the loss or profit to be charged or credited to the general account, a ship which was built for the trade, but was sold immediately upon being launched, without actually having engaged in the trade, was within the terms of the contract, and the profits of such sale were partnership profits. Foster v. Goddard (U. S.) 9 Fed. Cas. 534, 542.

The words "designed to distinguish such ballots," in Pol. Code, §§ 1206, 1207, providing that when any ballot bears upon it any impression, device, color, or thing designed to distinguish such ballot from other ballots it shall be rejected, operate to require the impression, device, color, or thing to be expressly for the purpose of marking the ballot; and therefore the statute does not authorize the rejection of a ballot for discoloration, not designed, but resulting from the use of ink by the elector in scratching his ballot. Wyman v. Lemon, 51 Cal. 273, 274.

"Designed to mislead the voter," as used in Act 1875, p. 51, § 1, providing that the caption or head lines on ballots shall not in any manner be "designed to mislead the voter" as to the name or names thereunder, means not truly indicating the political character or party affiliations of the persons to be voted for, or representing by the words used in the caption that the ballot is the ticket of one party when in truth and in fact the persons whose names are contained in the body of the ballot represent another and different party. Where the caption of ballots contain the word "Republican," "Independent," or "Greenback," it cannot be said as a matter of law that the ballots were designed to mislead the voter. Turner v. Drake, 71 Mo. 285, 287.

Negligence.

A policy providing that the insurer would be liable for any loss by fire originating in any cause except the "design in the insured," does not include a loss which was produced by the mere negligence or laches of the assured in leaving the property exposed to the peril, where he did not co-operate, directly or indirectly, with those who produced the loss. Design imports plan, scheme, intention carried into effect; and therefore a loss, to be by the design of the assured, must be by incitement, connivance, or co-operation of the assured, directly or indirectly, with the persons who were the agents in the act; and the fact that the insured was negligent in leaving the premises derelict, and thus exposed them to the wanton or criminal acts of intruders, was not sufficient to make the loss one by the design of the assured, since the negligence of the assured cannot be the approximate cause of the loss where he had no co-operation, knowledge, or part in the act causing the loss. Catlin v. Springfield Fire Ins. Co. (U. S.) 5 Fed. Cas. 310, 314.

In a policy insuring against loss by fire not caused by the design of the insured, "design" does not include negligence. There are cases of gross neglect which are in law deemed equivalent to a fraudulent purpose or design, founded on the consideration of doing nothing when the slightest care on the part of the insured would prevent a great injury. Judge Shaw supposes a case where the insured in his own house sees the burning coals in the fireplace roll down on his wooden floor, and does not brush them up. This would be nonfeasance, and evidence of a culpable recklessness and indifference to the rights of others. And where a husband of a wife admitted to be insane is the owner of buildings insured by the defendants, and the care of the wife is intrusted to the husband, and she burns the buildings while thus insane, the insurer is liable for the loss where there is no such negligence shown on the part of the husband as will evince a corrupt design or a fraudulent purpose on his part. Gove v. Farmers' Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 48 N. H. 41, 43, 97 Am. Dec. 572, 2 Am. Rep. 168.

"Design" means "intent" and both words essentially imply premeditation. Perugi v. State, 80 N. W. 593, 597, 104 Wis. 230, 76 Am. St. Rep. 865; Ernest v. State, 20 Fla. 383, 388; Hogan v. State, 36 Wis. 226, 244.

The definitions of "murder in the third degree" and of "manslaughter" use the words "without design to effect death," thus positively excluding such a design, and a design so excluded is necessarily the premeditated design of murder in the first degree. Hogan v. State, 36 Wis. 226, 244.

The design necessary to constitute murder in the first degree is a design to kill willfully; that is, of purpose, with the intent that the act by which the life of the party is taken should have that effect deliberately; that is, with cool purpose and with premeditation; that is, the design must be formed before the act by which the death is produced is performed. Dale v. State, 18 Tenn. (10 Yerg.) 551, 552.

As plan of building.

In a by-law of a land company that no land should be sold or leased without a pledge to build speedily, design of buildings to be approved by directors, "design" was not used in its strictly technical sense, such as architects might understand it, but it only refers to the general plan, and not to the details of construction of the building. Devries v. Cone, 34 Atl. 822, 823, 82 Md. 186.

Where land is conveyed by a land company, with the provision that buildings to be erected shall be according to a "design" approved by the directors of the land company, on the destruction of the building so built the grantee would have a right to rebuild according to the original design; that is, without any such changes as would substantially affect the general plan approved by the directors. Peabody Heights Co. v. Willson, 82 Md. 186, 32 Atl. 386, 389, 36 L. R. A. 393.

DESIGN (In Copyright).

See "Improved Design"; "Novel Design"; "Useful Design."

A "design," in the view of the patent law, is that characteristic of a physical substance which by means of lines, images, configuration, and the like, taken as a whole, makes an impression, through the eye, upon the mind of the observer. The essence of a design resides, not in the elements individually, nor in their method of arrangement, but in the tout ensemble—in that indefinable whole that awakens some sensation in the observer's mind. Impressions thus imparted may be complex or simple; in one a mingled impression of gracefulness and strength, in another the impression of strength alone. But whatever the impression, there is attached in the mind of the observer, to the object observed, a sense of uniqueness and character. Pelouze Scale & Mfg. Co. v. American Cutlery Co. (U. S.) 102 Fed. 916, 918, 43 C. C. A. 52.

The word "design," as used in federal copyright act as a term of art, is used in its popular acceptance, meaning the giving of a visible form to the conceptions of the mind or to the invention; in other words, it is that fac simile or working out of the ideas so that they may be comprehended by the senses. Binns v. Woodruff (U. S.) 3 Fed. Cas. 421, 424.

"Designs," as used in Rev. St. § 4929, relating to copyrights for patterns for designs, fall in line with mechanical patents, and require the exercise of the inventive faculty. Henderson v. Tompkins (U. S.) 60 Fed. 758, 764 (citing Smith v. Whitman Saddle Co., 148 U. S. 674, 13 Sup. Ct. 768, 37 L. Ed. 606).

DESIGNEDLY.

In an indictment for obtaining goods by false pretenses, the word "knowingly," in connection with the word "falsely," by which it is immediately followed, is sufficiently comprehensive without using also the word "designedly." The pretense could not be "knowingly" false without at the same time being "designedly" false. The word "knowingly" is at least the equivalent of the words "designedly" and "unlawfully," and therefore, the latter being sufficient without the former, the former must be sufficient without the latter. State v. Halida, 28 W. Va. 499, 504.

DESIGNATE.

See "To Be Designated."

A city charter authorizing the taxation of such property as the city council may "designate" does not require a specific designation of each particular class and kind of property to be taxed, but a designation of "property of any kind subject to taxation under the laws of the commonwealth" is a sufficient designation. Covington Gaslight Co. v. City of Covington, 84 Ky. 94, 95, 99.

The word "designate," as used in Act July 2, 1839, requiring that each ticket voted for at an election should designate on the outside the office or offices, and on the inside the name of the person voted for to fill such office or offices, means to show, or point out; to indicate by description, or by something known or determinate. Any clear description of the offices, about which there could be no mistake or apprehension, would be sufficient. In re Election of Prothonotary of Luzerne County, 3 Pa. Law J. 155, 157.

As appoint.

The word "designate," when used by the appointing power in making an appointment to office, is equivalent to the word "appoint." People v. Fitzsimmons, 68 N. Y. 514, 519.

As declare or express.

The word "designate," as used in the statute providing that the jury shall designate by their verdict whether it be murder in the first or second degree, does not imply that it will be sufficient for the jury to intimate or give some vague hint as to the degree of murder of which the defendant is found guilty, but is equivalent to the word "express" or "declare," and it was evidently intended that the jury should expressly state the degree of murder in the verdict so that nothing should be left to implication; and a verdict of guilty as charged in the indictment, under an indictment charging grand larceny, was insufficient where the statute divided larceny into two degrees, defining each. McLane v. Territory (Ariz.) 71 Pac. 938, 939. If it be sufficient for the verdict to designate the degree of the crime only by reference to the indictment, it would be equally good, in such case, simply to find the defendant guilty, without reference to the indictment. People v. Campbell, 40 Cal. 129, 139.

As mark or point out.

In a statute which provided that on proceedings for the laying out of a road, after the court had appointed surveyors and fixed a time of their meeting, at least two of the applicants for the road should sign and set up notices designating the time or places from and to which the road is to be laid out, "designate" meant to point out or mark by some particular sign or mark. State v. Green, 18 N. J. Law (3 Har.) 179, 181.

Rev. St. 1875, p. 214, § 3, provides for the appointment of a committee to locate and describe all natural oyster beds in a certain town, which shall be designated by such committee, and their report be recorded, etc. Held, that the word "designated," as there used, is to be taken as referring merely to the act of the commissioners authorized to determine and inform applicants what grounds they may occupy, and that before the applicant can require any right to the exclusive occupation of the ground it is necessary for him to mark and stake out the place designated. White v. Petty, 18 Atl. 253, 57 Conn. 576.

"Designate," according to the dictionary, means to call by a distinctive title; to point out by distinguishing from others; and is so used in Act 24th Gen. Assem., c. 33, § 14, providing that the names of all candidates of any political party shall be placed under the title of such party as designated by them in their certificates of nomination. Lowry v. Davis, 101 Iowa, 236, 239, 70 N. W. 190.

"Designate," as used in the Mexican law of 1825, providing that where projects for new settlements, in which one or more persons offers to bring at their expense 100 or more families, shall be presented to the government, and if found conformable with this law it shall be admitted, and the government shall immediately "designate" to the contractors the land where they are to establish themselves, "does not mean that the government will grant them the land, but simply that it will select and designate the place where a colony may be settled." Interstate Land Co. v. Maxwell Land Grant Co., 11 Sup. Ct. 656, 661, 139 U. S. 569, 85 L. Ed. 278.

Act March 11, 1886 (Supp. Revision, 929), § 86, provides that school trustees shall give notice of the annual meeting, and therein state the object of the meeting, and the amount of money desired to be raised, and that no greater sum than the amount so designated can be raised. Held, that the word "designated," as so used, means to show, to point out, to specify, and does not mean to select or determine upon. State v. Trustees of School Dist. No. 10, 18 A. 683, 684, 52 N. J. Law (23 Vroom) 104.

DESIGNATION.

The term "designation," as used in the by-laws of a mutual benefit society declaring that, if no designation of a beneficiary has been made, the amount which the insured is entitled to receive shall be paid to his heirs, means and refers to the express act of the member specifying and naming some particular person as his beneficiary. Hanson v. Minnesota Scandinavian Relief Ass'n, 60 N. W. 1091, 1093, 59 Minn. 123.

The meaning of "designation," as found in the dictionary, includes "appellation." It, according to Webster, is that which designates distinctive title; appellation. According to Worcester, its meaning is "that which serves to distinguish." As used in a statute requiring ballots to be on plain white paper, clear and plain cut, without any ornaments, "designation," mutilation, symbol, or mark of any kind whatsoever, except the name or names of the person or persons voted for and the office for which such persons are intended to be chosen, it is, on account of its associate words, to be construed to intend only designations in the nature of ornamentations, mutilations, symbols, or marks, as distinct from words or writings, and hence ballots having on them, in the body thereof, the words "National Republican Ticket," "Free Suffrage Ticket," are not illegal or contrary to the purposes of the statute. State v. Saxon, 12 South. 218, 225, 30 Fla. 668, 18 L. R. A. 721, 32 Am. St. Rep. 46.

In Civ. Code, § 2466, requiring every firm doing business under a fictitious name or "designation, not showing the names of the partners," to file and publish a certificate showing the full names and residences of its members, "designation" is not used in opposition or contrast between the phrase "fictitious name"; the former is supplementary to the latter. Pendleton v. Cline, 24 Pac. 659, 660, 85 Cal. 142.

DESIRABLE.

In a railroad charter authorizing the company, for the purpose of constructing its road with all desirable appendages, and for putting and keeping the same in repair, to enter upon, take, and hold all real estate and materials necessary for that purpose, the word "desirable" should be construed to mean "necessary." Prather v. Jeffersonville, M. & I. R. Co., 52 Ind. 16, 37.

Under the charter of a corporation organized for the manufacture and dealing in lumber and other articles, and providing that the company may acquire and transfer, purchase and hold, sell or exchange, any real estate or other property that may be deemed "desirable" in the transaction of its business, the corporation has power to purchase its own stock. Iowa Lumber Co. v. Foster, 49 Iowa, 25, 28, 31 Am. Rep. 140.

DESIRE.

A desire, either natural or otherwise, is not a consideration for a contract. It may be a motive for a party entering into a contract, but we take it that it does not constitute a legal consideration. A friendly feeling and a wish and desire to help are always necessarily present in the mind of an accommodation guarantor. Greer Machinery Co. v. Stains (Tenn.) 59 S. W. 692, 699.

Under a statute authorizing an information in quo warranto by any person desiring to prosecute the same is meant any person who has an interest to be affected, and the words do not give a private relator the writ in a case of private right involving no individual grievance. Commonwealth v. Cluley, 56 Pa. (6 P. F. Smith) 270, 272.

The statute providing that informations in the nature of a quo warranto may be exhibited at the relation of any person desiring to prosecute the same means any person having an interest in the subject of the prosecution; and one claiming the office of a school director, but who is not shown to be a qualified elector of the district, is not in a position to file an information in the nature of quo warranto against the incumbent. State v. Boal, 46 Mo. 528, 531.

As word of intention.

Either of the words "wish," "desire," "command," or "direct," is an apt word to be used in a will to show testator's intent to make a will. Barney v. Hayes, 29 Pac. 282, 284, 11 Mont. 571, 28 Am. St. Rep. 495.

"Desire," as used in a will declaring, "It is my will and desire," etc., is the equivalent of the word "wish," and indicates an intention of the testator to dispose of the property to which the wish refers; the word "will" being stronger in its meaning than "desire." McMurry v. Stanley, 6 S. W. 412, 414, 69 Tex. 227.

As positive direction.

In a will reciting that "I desire that at such time as may be agreeable and mutually consented to by my wife and my son, the homestead may be sold and one purchased in lieu thereof by them at a cost not exceeding $8,000, and any excess in price must be invested and added to my estate," the word "desire" does not bear a sense merely hortatory or precatory, but is equivalent to a positive direction. Stewart v. Stewart, 47 Atl. 633, 635, 61 N. J. Eq. 25.

"Desire," as used in a will providing that "on the death of my wife I desire that one-half of the property," etc., does not import a trust or charge or a command. In re Marti's Estate, 61 Pac. 964, 965, 132 Cal. 666.

In a will in which the testator desires his trustees to apply the residue of his estate to such of a certain class of charitable institutions as the trustees should deem worthy thereof, "desire" should be construed as a command in a polite form. Weber v. Bryant, 37 N. E. 203, 161 Mass. 400.

The words "I desire," in a will in which the testator said, "I desire that all my estate shall be sold and the proceeds invested in first bonds and mortgages," are the equivalent of the words "I will," and amounts to a direction to sell. Appeal of City of Philadelphia, 4 Atl. 4, 5, 112 Pa. 470.

The word "desire," when used in a will, does not necessarily imply a command, but is dependent on the language of the will, and, a will attempting to dispose of all real estate, will be held mandatory. Meehan v. Brennan, 45 N. Y. Supp. 57, 58, 16 App. Div. 395.

Testator devised to his wife all his estate, real, personal, and mixed, to her sole and separate use, behoof, and control forever, but in a subsequent item provided that it was also his "desire and wish," after his wife's death, that his house and lot should go to his daughter for her sole and separate use. Held, that while the words "wish and desire" were sometimes considered to be precatory words, merely, in wills, and not mandatory, as where they are used as expressing a desire for an act to be done by some person or persons named, no such presumption or construction obtains when the words are used to express the intention and will of the testator, as in the devise quoted, in which case such words are to be treated as mandatory; and hence the testator intended to give his wife only a life estate in the house and the lot, with remainder to the daughter. Taylor v. Martin (Pa.) 8 Atl. 920, 922.

In a will in which testator gave a farm to a certain person for his support, and then declared that, if such person should be spared to have family, "I desire" such estate to go to the use of his children, the expression is not merely precatory, but is as mandatory as if the words "I will" or "I order and direct" had been used. Oyster v. Knull, 20 Atl. 624, 137 Pa. 448, 21 Am. St. Rep. 890.

The words "wish and desire," in a will in which testator suggested that it was his wish and desire that all his real estate should be divided between his children, was construed to be not merely the expression of desire on the part of the testator, but to be operative words sufficient to pass the property. Brasher v. Marsh, 15 Ohio St. 103, 111.

Testatrix directed her residuary estate to be divided into three equal parts, one of which she devised absolutely to her daughter. In a codicil to her will testatrix declared her "desire that one-half of the share of the property inherited from me by my daughter be placed in trust," designating the trustee. Held, that the word "desire," as used by the testatrix in the codicil, was not a word of mere request, recommendation, or entreaty addressed to the legatee or devisee, but was an order, direction, or command addressed to the executors of the will. Wood v. Camden Safe Deposit & Trust Co., 14 Atl. 885, 886, 44 N. J. Eq. (17 Stew.) 460.

As creating a trust.

In a will where testator makes an absolute gift of property, saying that he desires it to be used in a certain way, the word "desire" is sufficient to raise a trust where the subject and object of the trust are sufficiently certain. Major v. Herndon, 78 Ky. 123, 128; Maught v. Getzendanner, 5 Atl. 471, 472, 65 Md. 527, 57 Am. Rep. 352; Lines v. Darden, 5 Fla. 51, 72; Curd v. Field, 103 Ky. 293, 45 S. W. 92; Riker v. Leo, 21 N. E. 719, 720, 115 N. Y. 93 (citing 1 Wm. Ex'rs, 88; Vandyck v. Van Beuren, 1 Caines, 84); Cockrill v. Armstrong, 31 Ark. 580, 589.

Where a testator's will recited that he desired his three sons, in case any of his daughters should be inclined to purchase of them certain land bequeathed to them, should let such daughters have it at the same price they had paid for it, the word "desire" raised a trust. Vandyck v. Van Beuren (N. Y.) 1 Caines, 84, 89.

As wish.

In Act March 7, 1887 (St. 1887, p. 46) § 8, reciting that it is "desired and required that all growers and manufacturers, traders, handlers or bottlers of California wine, when selling or putting it up for sale or when shipping it to parties sold, shall plainly stencil, brand or have printed where it may be easily seen, 'pure California wine,' and his name or the firm's name both on the label or bottle or package," "desired and required" should be construed as intended to express rather a legislative wish and permission than a mandate. As words of legislative command, they are singularly inappropriate and inconsistent. The word "desired" cannot be ignored in the construction of the act any more than the word "required," and the former is at least as forcible in its expression of a request as the latter is in its expression of a command. Ex parte Kohler, 15 Pac. 436, 437, 74 Cal. 38.

Within a bond providing that it will be redeemed, if desired, 12 years after date, "desired" is the synonym of "wished for" and of "requested," and gives the option of redemption to the holder of the bond, and not to its maker. Allentown School Dist. v. Derr, 9 Atl. 55, 56, 115 Pa. 439, 19 Wkly. Notes Cas. 189.

DESIRE TO FAVOR.

"Desire to favor," as used in an instruction that "you are not required to find any fact to be proven because you find the same suggested in a verdict, or in the verdict of the party you desire to favor," means "find to have the merits," and the jury could not have understood that their verdict could be bestowed by favor. Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Burton, 37 N. E. 150, 154, 139 Ind. 357.

DESPOIL.

"The word 'despoil' involves in its signification violent or clandestine means by which one is deprived of that which he possesses." Sunol v. Hepburn, 1 Cal. 254, 268.

DESTINATION.

See "Final Destination."

The destination of a vessel, within the meaning of a fire policy insuring it for a voyage to Havana, was construed to mean the inner harbor at Havana, and not the outer harbor or quarantine grounds, which was not a place of safety for vessels. Dickey v. United Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 11 Johns. 358, 363.

A bill of lading providing against liability for articles of freight after their arrival at their "place of destination" and unloading at the company's warehouse, and providing that articles arriving at their "place of destination" must be taken away within 24 hours after being unladen, means the place of ultimate destination of the goods, and does not include an intermediate point where the goods were to be delivered from one carrier to a connecting carrier. Ayres v. Western R. Corp. (U. S.) 2 Fed. Cas. 275, 277.

Rev. St. c. 91, § 34, giving a person who labors at cutting or driving logs a lien thereon, to continue for 60 days after the logs arrive at the "place of destination," means the place of destination of the logs as a collective whole—that is, the boom into which they are rafted—and not the different destinations to which the aggregate logs in different detachments may be sent for manufacture into lumber. Sheridan v. Ireland, 66 Me. 65, 69.

DESTINE.

A grant of land made by the Governor of Louisiana was in the following words: "Exercising the authority which the King has granted to us, we destine and appropriate, in his royal name, the aforesaid twelve leagues." These words are of strong and decisive import, and, it is believed, show the intent of the grantor as fully as any that could have been adopted. To "destine" is to set, ordain, or appoint to a use, purpose, estate, or place. We are all destined to a future state. To fix unalterably by a divine decree; to appoint unalterably. The word "appropriate," in the sense used, signifies to set apart for or assign to a particular use in exclusion of all other uses; to claim or use by an exclusive right. No words of a more determinate character to convey a complete title could have been found in any language. The words as used in the original grant mean to grant and deliver as property. United States v. Philadelphia and New Orleans, 52 U. S. (11 How.) 609, 660, 13 L. Ed. 834.

DESTITUTE.

The words "destitute persons," within the meaning of Rev. St. c. 24, § 24, providing that the overseers are to relieve destitute persons found in their towns and having no settlement therein, includes a person found in distress, although he may prove property of his own not available for immediate relief. A person in jail on execution and actually destitute is entitled to relief, although he refuses to make oath that he is unable to support himself in jail and has not sufficient property to furnish security for his support. Inhabitants of Norridgewock v. Inhabitants of Solon, 49 Me. 385.

The words "destitute of property or means of comfortable subsistence" may be used to characterize minor children who have no property, although they earn their own living. Woods v. Perkins, 9 South. 48, 43 La. Ann. 347.

DESTROY—DESTRUCTION.

See "Sunk or Destroyed"; "Total Destruction"; "Wholly Destroyed."

In Rev. St. § 5358 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3639], declaring that every person who plunders or destroys any goods, merchandise, or other effects from or belonging to any vessel in distress shall be punished, etc., "destroys" is used in a popular sense, to include every kind of a deprivation of the owner by demolishing, making way with, or other subversion of his property. United States v. Stone (U. S.) 8 Fed. 232, 249.

Under Act July 15, 1897, pl. 297, authorizing transfers of licenses from place to place, on partial or complete "destruction" of the building, a destruction may exist where the buildings are rendered useless for the purpose intended. The word must necessarily be construed as synonymous with "demolition," "breaking up in parts," "pulling down." In re McCabe, 11 Pa. Super. Ct. 560, 564.

Rev. St. § 4113, provides that the lessee of any building which shall, without any fault or neglect on his part, be "destroyed" or be so injured by the elements as to be unfit for occupancy, shall not be liable to pay rent after the destruction, but shall surrender possession, etc. Held, that the destruction or injury, within the purview of the statute, did not mean the gradual decay which results from the ordinary action of the elements, nor the injury resulting from the ordinary action of human agents, which a lessee is supposed to have in view when he enters into the contract, but that the statute was designed rather to protect the lessee against unexpected and unusual action of the elements, or of human forces causing a total destruction. The word "destroy" has reference to a sudden and total destruction, acting with unusual power, and the term "injury" meant something short of total destruction occasioned in the same manner. Hilliard v. New York & Cleveland Gas Coal Co., 41 Ohio St. 662, 669, 52 Am. Rep. 99. In New York, under a similar statute, a like meaning was given to the word "destroy." Suydam v. Jackson, 54 N. Y. 450, 455.

The word "destroy" has on more than one occasion been construed to describe the act which, while rendering useless for the purpose for which it was intended, did not literally demolish or annihilate the thing. In re McCabe, 11 Pa. Super. Ct. 560, 564.

The malicious or mischievous destruction or injury of animals, within the meaning of a statute making it an offense to maliciously or mischievously destroy or injure certain animals, is sufficiently described by an indictment charging a defendant who did maliciously and unlawfully injure, maim, and wound such an animal. State v. Merrill (Ind.) 3 Blackf. 346, 347.

As carry away.

Laws 1855, c. 428, providing that persons whose property is destroyed by mobs shall be compensated therefor, does not necessarily mean the actual, immediate destruction of the property; and it would make no real difference whether the rioters actually destroyed the property on the premises, or whether they took it away and then destroyed it, or whether they destroyed the goods taken by using them. Solomon v. City of Kingston (N. Y.) 24 Hun, 562, 564.

As cast away a vessel.

In Act Cong. March 26, 1804, § 2, providing that if any person shall on the high seas willfully and corruptly cast away, burn, or otherwise destroy any ship or vessel of which he is owner, in part or in whole, or permit or procure the same to be done, with intent to prejudice any person who has underwritten any policy of insurance thereon, he shall be punished, etc., "destroy" means to unfit a vessel for services beyond the hope of recovery by ordinary means. "This, in extent of injury, is synonymous with 'cast away.' It is a generic term. Casting away is a species of destroying, as burning is; both mean such an act as causes a vessel to perish or be lost so as to be irrecoverable by ordinary means." United States v. Johns (U. S.) 26 Fed. Cas. 616, 618.

Destruction by fire.

The word "destroyed," in an agreement by a lessee of certain fire extinguishers to pay the lessor the value of the property destroyed, was held to include destruction of the property by fire. "The word 'destroyed' is used without limitation, and hence it is difficult to see why destruction by fire should constitute an exception. True, either party might have insured against loss by fire; but when it is considered that it was the business of the plaintiff to hire out fire extinguishers, and in each instance would have to effect separate insurance unless protection against loss by fire could be secured by some special provision in the contract of bailment, it seems but reasonable to conclude that the contract in this case contemplated to cast the burden of loss, in case of destruction by fire, upon the bailee. Rapid Safety Fire Extinguisher Co. v. Hay-Budden Mfg. Co., 75 N. Y. Supp. 1008, 1010, 37 Misc. Rep. 556.

As disable.

2 Rev. St. p. 665, § 27, defines the offense of mayhem to be the cutting off or disabling any limb or member of another. Held, where an indictment for mayhem charged that defendant did with premeditated design cut, bite, and destroy the thumb of another, the word "destroy" was sufficient instead of "disable," inasmuch as it was more comprehensive, and included everything signified by "disable." Tully v. People, 67 N. Y. 15, 20.

Partial destruction.

"Destroyed," within the meaning of a covenant in a lease that, if the premises are destroyed by fire, the payment of rent and relation of landlord and tenant shall cease at the election of either party, does not characterize a partial destruction of a building by fire which renders a part of it uninhabitable until repaired. Wall v. Hinds, 70 Mass. (4 Gray) 256, 268, 64 Am. Dec. 64.

A "destruction" of property, within the meaning of the law of fire insurance, is shown by evidence that the insured building was so damaged as to render it useless for the purpose for which it had been used. "If rendered useless for the purpose for which the property was used, the plaintiff's right to recover insurance for what was so insured was complete. If what remained of the property so insured was of any value, the insurer was entitled to it." Manchester Fire Ins. Co. v. Feibelman, 23 South. 759, 765, 118 Ala. 308.

The term "destruction," in a covenant in a lease to repair damages occurring during the occupancy, the usual wear and tear, providential destruction, and the destruction by fire excepted, is to be construed as meaning a total destruction of the premises, such as will require a "rebuilding" as distinguished from a "repair." There must be such a destruction as will permanently unfit the premises for occupancy. Spalding v. Munford, 37 Mo. App. 281, 283.

In an act providing that a person who shall willfully break or destroy or injure the door of any building shall be punished, etc., the words "break or destroy" mean to destroy the completeness of. State v. McBeth, 31 Pac. 145, 49 Kan. 584.

Defendants were indicted and convicted for destroying buildings in the nighttime, under a statute providing that "if any person shall in the nighttime maliciously, unlawfully, and willingly burn or cause to be burned or destroyed any houses or buildings," etc., he shall be punished, etc. In construing the statute, the court said: "If the words 'or destroyed' be stricken out of the statute entirely, it is clear that by no rule of construction can its remaining language be made to embrace any injury to a building other than those in which fire is the element used in the work of destruction. But conceding the construction which was contended for in behalf of the state to be correct, namely, that by the insertion of those words into the statute it was meant to include every kind of injury that might be done to a building, whether by fire or otherwise, it would, however, be a strained construction of the words 'or destroyed,' standing alone as they do, and unsustained by anything in the context, to say nothing of the rule which enjoins a strict construction of penal enactments, to hold that these words were intended to embrace within the provisions of this highly penal statute every possible injury, however slight or trivial, that might be done to a building merely because done in the nighttime—such, for example, as the breaking of a door or window, or even to such injuries as those that were done to the building in question by the defendants, by prizing up the end of a smoke-house and taking out three logs, whereby the top was pushed back, so that it nearly fell—when it is manifest, whether we resort to the context as furnishing an index to the scope or design of the authors of the statute, or to the ordinary meaning of the word 'destroy,' that its sole purpose was to include within its provisions such injuries only, whether by fire or otherwise, as would amount either to a total demolition of a building, or such as would unfit it for the purpose for which it had been erected." State v. De Bruhl (S. C.) 10 Rich. Law. 23, 26.

Poisoning.

Under Pen. Code, § 654, relating to injuries against property, and prescribing the punishment for unlawfully destroying another's property, one who poisons the horses of another may be prosecuted for destroying property. People v. Christy, 20 N. Y. Supp. 278, 279, 65 Hun. 349.

"Destruction or injury of personal property," within the meaning of Gen. St. c. 161, § 85, which provides a punishment for willful and malicious destruction or injury of personal property of another in any manner or by any means not particularly described or mentioned in the chapter, includes poisoning the hens of another, notwithstanding the provisions of section 80 for punishing the poisoning of horses, cattle, or other beasts. Commonwealth v. Falvey, 108 Mass. 304, 306.

As prevention of use

Property is destroyed, although not touched directly, when the result of construction is to prevent its use, as in Monongahela Nav. Co. v. Coon, 6 Pa. (6 Barr) 379, 47 Am. Dec. 474. The injury results in these cases from the construction of the works of the corporation; but in the case of a valuable country hotel, the business of which was destroyed by the change of travel from wagons to trains as the result of operation of a railroad, plaintiff was held to be remediless, although the value of his property was destroyed. Jones v. Erie & W. V. R. Co., 25 Atl. 134, 137, 151 Pa. 30, 17 L. R. A. 758, 31 Am. St. Rep. 722.

"Destroyed," as used in Const. art. 16, § 8, providing for the payment of damages by corporations for property injured or destroyed in the exercise of the right of eminent domain, was not designed to change, alter, or limit the nature and effect of corporate contracts, but to impose on those having the right of eminent domain a liability for consequential damages; as, for instance, if, in the exercise of a right, the water of a creek or other stream is cut off from the owner below or backed on the owners above, or if, in the lawful use of a highway, the property of an adjacent owner is injured thereby, damages therefor may be recovered. Edmondson v. Pittsburgh, M. & Y. R. Co. (Md.) 4 Atl. 404, 406.

In relation to instruments.

The cutting of a bank note into two parts, unless done with the intent to destroy the note, is not of itself a destruction of it. While the two parts exist and are retained by the rightful holder, the rights and liabilities of the parties remain precisely the same as before the division. Allen v. State Bank, 21 N. C. 3, 12.

Where, before a marriage, the parties entered into a marriage contract defining the interest the wife should have in the husband's property, and delivered such contract to a trustee to hold for them, and thereafter they demanded and received such contract from the trustee, each declaring that it should be null and void, such act and words were equivalent to a cancellation or destruction of the paper itself. In determining whether a contract has been destroyed, the intention of the parties alone is to be considered, not the mode adopted to signify that intent. In re Gangwere's Estate, 14 Pa. (2 Harris) 417, 426, 53 Am. Dec. 554.

In relation to wills.

"Destroy," within an act relating to wills, includes burning, canceling, and tearing up. A will burned, canceled, or torn animo revocandi is destroyed. Johnson v. Brailsford (S. C.) 2 Nott & McC. 272, 278, 10 Am. Dec. 601.

The term "destroying," in Act April 8, 1833, § 13, authorizing the revocation of a will by burning, cancelling, obliterating, or destroying the same, does not include the act of testator in writing the word "obsolete" on the margin of his will without signing the same. Lewis v. Lewis (Pa.) 2 Watts & S. 455, 457.

"Destroying," as used in a statute providing that a will may be revoked in certain specified ways or by otherwise destroying it, does not include a cancellation of the will with a pen. Stephens v. Taprell (U. S.) 2 Curt. 458.

Destruction of a will, as used in a statute relating to the burning, canceling, obliterating, and destroying a will, is not necessarily annihilation or a change into other forms of matter. Tearing into fragments is unquestionably destruction, though the fragments may be reunited. All the words are used in their popular sense, and thus used they secure the object the Legislature had in view—a complete manifestation of an executed intention to repeal the will. Appeal of Evans, 58 Pa. (8 P. F. Smith) 238, 244.

DESTRUCTIVE.

The question whether the term "noxious or destructive substance or liquid," in a statute making the administering of such substance criminal, includes the substance or liquid administered, is a question for the jury. Dougherty v. People, 1 Colo. 514, 516.

Pen. Code, § 216, providing that every person who, with intent to kill, administers, or causes or procures to be administered, to another, any poison or other noxious or destructive substance or liquid, but by which death is not caused, shall be punished, does not mean merely such as might, when administered, be hurtful and injurious, but, like a poison, it must be capable of destroying life. It includes substances which act on the system mechanically so as to destroy life, as well as those which are capable of destroying life by their own inherent qualities. Pulverized glass or boiling water are included within "noxious or destructive substance or liquid," for when administered in sufficient quantities they will destroy life; but they are not poisonous. People v. Van Deleer, 53 Cal. 147, 148.

"Destructive matter," as used in St. 1 Vict. c. 85, prescribing the punishment for any person who shall cast or throw on or otherwise apply to any person any corrosive fluid or other destructive matter with intent to burn, disfigure, or disable such person, would include boiling water. Regina v. Crawford, 2 C. & K. 129.

DESUETUDE.

"The instances are numerous of statutes being repealed in fact—a kind of silent legislation. As to the abrogation of statutes by nonuser, there may rest some doubt; for myself, I own, my opinion is that nonuser may be such as to render them obsolete when their objects vanish or their reason ceases. * * * The long desuetude of any law amounts to its repeal. Mr. Woodeson in his second lecture (volume 1, 63) of civil, positive and constitutive laws, observes, 'that the last consideration is the period of their existence;' they may be repealed either expressly or by implication founded on disuse. * * * It certainly requires very strong grounds to presume a law obsolete, yet, as the whole community includes as well the legislative power as its subjects, total disuse of any civil institution for ages past may afford just and rational objections against disrespected and superannuated ordinances." James v. Commonwealth (Pa.) 12 Serg. & R. 220, 227.

DETACHABLE.

A patent called for a coffee or similar mill having a detachable hopper and grinding shell formed in a single piece, and suspended within the box by the upper part of the hopper or a flange thereon. Held, that the word "detachable," as so used, did not necessarily imply that the hopper must possess the capacity of being detached from the top of the box; the object contemplated being rather that the hopper might be easily detachable from the box, since by the terms of the claim the hopper and grinding shell, formed in a single piece, are suspended within the box by the upper part of the hopper or a flange thereon. Strobridge v. Lindsay (U. S.) 2 Fed. 692, 693.

in a claim for a patent declaring the same to be the combination of a torpedo, a detachable clip, means for attaching it to the torpedo, and a wire for attaching the clip to the rail, substantially as shown, a removable clip was meant, or one which was not positively attached to, and virtually made a part of, the torpedo shell by riveting or soldering; one which, while it accomplished connection, did not create union. Bennett v. Schooley (U. S.) 75 Fed. 392, 394.

DETACHED.

The word "detached," when used in speaking of an insured building in a fire policy, means "separate or not adjoining another building." Burleigh v. Gebhard Fire Ins. Co., 12 Wkly. Dig. 235.

The word "detached," as used in a fire policy on property described as "buildings adjoining and communicating, * * * and situated detached," is to be construed as meaning that such buildings are detached from other buildings, and not to mean that they are detached from each other. Broadwater v. Lion Fire Ins. Co., 26 N. W. 455, 34 Minn. 465.

Where, in an insurance policy, the dwelling insured is described as standing detached, and the dwelling was 7 feet from any other building, it did stand detached, and an attempt to show that the phrase "standing detached" meant that it was distant 25 feet or thereabouts from any other building was properly rejected. The phrase is not in the slightest degree ambiguous, and extrinsic proof was not admissible to give it a meaning different from its plain import. Hill v. Hibernia Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 10 Hun, 26, 30.

A policy of fire insurance issued to plaintiffs stated that the property insured was contained in their frame storehouse with slate roof, situate detached at least 100 feet, etc., on the east side of Lake Champlain. Held, that the words "detached at least 100 feet" should not be construed as mere words relating to the description of the building, but words relating to the character of the risk, and which amounted to a warranty to the effect that no other buildings of such size and character as to constitute an exposure and increase of risk stood within the distance specified. Burleigh v. Gebhard Fire Ins. Co., 90 N. Y. 220, 223.

As isolated.

"Detached," as used in St. 7 & 8 Vict. c. 61, § 1, providing that the detached parts of a county should be considered for all purposes as part of the counties of which they are part for election purposes, must be taken to embrace "isolated." Regina v. Brecon, 15 Q. B. 813, 825.

DETAIL.

See "Facts Detailed"; "Matters of Detail."

A statement that one has not heard the particulars of a transaction is contradicted by showing that he had heard the details. The words "particulars" and "details" are in fact synonymous, and in ordinary parlance convey the same meaning. Baltimore City Pass. Ry. Co. v. Knee, 34 Atl. 252, 254, 83 Md. 77.

In an agreement of reorganization of a corporation, providing that the bond holders' committee should submit to the certificate holders a detailed plan of reorganization, which should be binding upon all such holders, and requiring the bond holders to dissent within 30 days to the details of the plan, the "details" are the minor particulars necessary to complete the reorganization, but consistent with the original plan, and lawful and honest. In matters of substance nothing might be done under the detailed plan that could not have been done under the original agreement. That was the idea conveyed by the use of the word "detailed." United Waterworks Co. v. Omaha Water Co., 58 N. E. 58, 62, 164 N. Y. 41.

As selected.

"Detailed," as used in a resolution of the common council of Brooklyn appointing a certain person as a detailed fireman, means, simply, selected. People v. City of Brooklyn Fire Com'rs, 8 N. E. 730, 731, 103 N. Y. 370.

As set apart to particular service.

With relation to military service a "detail" is one who belongs to the army, but is only detached or set apart for the time to some particular duty or service, and who is liable at any time to be recalled to his place in the ranks. A "detail" is distinguished from an "exempt," who is one free from any charge, burden, or duty—is not liable to any service. In re Strawbridge, 39 Ala. 367, 375.

"The Century Dictionary defines the verb 'detail' to mean 'set apart for a particular service.'" The word is so used in Acts 1898, c. 123, § 95, directing the police commissioners of Baltimore, at the request of the park commissioners, to detail, from time to time, members of the regular police force for the preservation of order in the parks. Upshur v. City of Baltimore, 51 Atl. 953, 955, 94 Md. 743.

DETAILED REPORT.

Rev. St. § 917, requiring the county commissioners annually to make a detailed report in writing of their financial transactions during the preceding year, will be construed to have been complied with if such report states faithfully the several sources of expenditure and the sums paid on account of each, although it does not state specifically each item of the sum thus expended. State v. Washington County Com'rs, 47 N. E. 565, 568, 56 Ohio St. 631.

DETAIN.

Hold equivalent, see "Hold."

Gen. St. art. 4, c. 29, § 9, providing that whoever shall unlawfully take or detain any woman against her will with intent to have carnal knowledge of her shall be guilty of a felony, should be construed to include the act of a man who goes into the room of a sleeping girl, removes the bedclothes, and exposes her person and his, without awakening her. Malone v. Commonwealth, 15 S. W. 856, 91 Ky. 307.

To take the crutch of a crippled girl, or to hold her by the hand, while pleading with her for carnal knowledge, is a "detention," within the meaning of Ky. St. § 1158, creating the offense of detaining a woman against her will with intent to have carnal knowledge of her. Paynter v. Commonwealth (Ky.) 55 S. W. 687, 688.

Code, § 179, authorizing the arrest of defendant on execution in an action for wrongful taking, detaining, or converting property, is to be construed as wrongfully taking, detaining, or converting personal property, and does not apply to real property. Merritt v. Carpenter, *41 N. Y. (2 Keyes) 462, 466, 33 How. Prac. 428, 432.

Post-Office Law, § 21 (4 Stat. 107), declaring that if any person employed in the post-office department shall unlawfully detain any letter he shall be punished, etc., means letters which are in transit and have not reached their place of destination. Letters deposited in the post office to be forwarded, or handed to the mail carrier on his route between post offices, come within the provision. United States v. Pearce (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 480, 481.

A party who has purposely taken the property of another, or who, having obtained possession lawfully, refuses to restore it to the owner, does, in contemplation of law and in fact, detain it, even after he has delivered it to another who has no more right to the possession than he has. Drake v. Wakefield (N. Y.) 11 How. Prac. 106, 110.

Imprison distinguished.

"Detained," as used in Act 1842, declaring that no person shall be arrested, held to bail, detained, or imprisoned on process, mesne or final, founded on any contract, express or implied, is not without meaning, and cannot be expunged from the act as superfluous, but would apply to one who had been imprisoned for a debt and admitted to the liberties of the prison on bond. Sedgwick v. Knibloe, 16 Conn. 219, 222.

As withholding possession.

In a declaration in detinue, "detain" means that defendant withholds the goods and prevents plaintiff from having possession of them. Clements v. Flight, 16 Mees. & W. 42, 49.

There was a detention where a person was in possession of slaves, and so continued, and refused to deliver them on demand, for which detinue would lie. Tunstall v. McClelland, 4 Ky. (1 Bibb) 186.

DETAINER.

See "Forcible Entry and Detainer"; "Unlawful Detainer."

DETAINMENT.

The words "arrest, restraint, and detention of all kings," in a marine policy insuring against arrest, restraint, and detention of all kings, covers a loss caused by a vessel being unable to enter her port of destination by reason of a blockade, though she proceeds to other ports without attempting to enter the blockaded port. Schmidt v. United Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 1 Johns. 249, 262, 3 Am. Dec. 319.

The "restraints and detention of all kings, princes, or people," within the meaning of a clause of a marine policy in reference to the liabilities of the parties in case of restraints and detention of all kings, princes, or people, mean the operations of the sovereign power by an exercise of the vis major in its sovereign capacity, controlling or divesting for the time the dominion or authority of the owner over a ship, and not proceedings of a mere civil nature to enforce the private rights claimed under the owner for services actually rendered in a preservation of his property. They do not include the mere detention of an officer in admiralty proceedings. Bradley v. Maryland Ins. Co., 37 U. S. (12 Pet.) 378, 402, 9 L. Ed. 1123.

"Arrest, restraints, and detentions of kings, princes, or peoples," within the meaning of a marine policy on a cargo of slaves against such arrest, restraints, and detentions, includes the issuing of a writ of habeas corpus by a judicial officer of a government within the control of which the vessel is driven by stress of weather, which results in the slaves being taken from the vessel and set at liberty. Simpson v. Charleston Fire & Marine Ins. Co. (S. C.) Dud. 239, 242.

DETECTIVE.

See "Private Detective"; "Public Detective."

"Detective" is defined by Webster as a person fitted for or skilled in detecting; employed in detecting, as a police detective; a policeman whose business it is to detect rogues by adroitly investigating their haunts and habits. The literal thing understood by the word "detective" in common affairs is a person who is able and has the facilities to detect criminals with a skill not possessed by nonprofessionals. The word "detect," as defined by Webster, is to uncover; to find out; to bring to light; as, to detect a crime, a criminal, or his hiding place. Its synonyms are "to uncover; to find out; lay open; expose." The occupation of detective does not imply, however, that the detective is engaged in a sneaking and prying business, and therefore a charge to such effect is libelous. Byrnes v. Mathews, 12 N. Y. St. Rep. 74, 81.

Authority to make arrests.

"Detective" has no such settled significance attached to it as of necessity imports authority to arrest criminals or persons charged or suspected of committing criminal acts, so that, without proof of authority by the employer of a detective authorizing him to make arrests, the making of such arrest did not come within the scope of authority of a detective, and the master is not liable. Penny v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co., 53 N. Y. Supp. 1043, 1045, 34 App. Div. 10.

DETENTION.

A charter party providing for a certain rate of demurrage for each day of "detention by default of the charterers" cannot be construed to mean the mere lapse of time, for such lapse was not necessarily a default. Davis v. Pendergast (U. S.) 7 Fed. Cas. 159, 160.

In a marine insurance policy providing that in case of capture or detention of the vessel the assured should not have a right to abandon therefor until proof should be exhibited of a condemnation on notice of a continuance of the detention at least 90 days, "detention" means an illegal arrest, seizure, etc., such as the underwriters were answerable for by the general terms of the policy, but could not be construed to extend or enlarge the risk of the underwriters to cases not provided for or covered by the words in the body of the policy. Archibald v. Mercantile Ins. Co., 20 Mass. (3 Pick.) 70, 74.

The word "detention," as used in a marine policy warranting against any loss on account of capture or detention by any belligerent nation, arises when there is no intention to appropriate, and in fact no appropriation to the detainer's use, but where the property is either simply held as a hostage, as it were, for the payment of ransom, or for the purpose and as a means of obtaining some ulterior object, such as for the suspension of commerce with a port by embargo or blockade, which detains a vessel in that port, or for the exercise of the right of search. Murray v. Receivers of Harmony Fire & Marine Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 58 Barb. 9, 15.

Sup. Ct. Rule 29, requiring, on appeal or in proceedings in error, indemnity in an amount sufficient to secure the sum recovered for the "use and detention" of the property, means sum recovered in the original judgment or decree, such as damages and mesne profits in ejectment, damages in dower and replevin, etc., and does not contemplate security for the use and detention of the property pending the appeal. Omaha Hotel Co. v. Kountze, 2 Sup. Ct. 911, 925, 107 U. S. 378, 27 L. Ed. 609.

DETER.

Under a statute providing that, if a defendant has been guilty of fraud by which plaintiff has been debarred or deterred from his action, the period of limitations shall only run from the time of the discovery of the fraud, by the term "deter" is meant to discourage or stop by fear; to stop from acting or proceeding by danger, difficulty, or other consideration which disheartens or countervails the motive for the act. Printup v. Alexander, 69 Ga. 553, 556.

DETERGENT.

"Detergent" means cleansing, and, as used in a specification in a patent for certain soap, was synonymous with the word "soap," since a "detergent soap" is a cleansing soap, it being of the nature of soap to be detergent or cleansing. Buckan v. McKesson (U. S.) 7 Fed. 100, 103.

DETERMINABLE FEE.

See, also, "Base Fee."

The term "determinable fee" embraces all fees which are liable to be determined by some act or event, expressed in their limitation to circumscribe their continuance, or inferred by law as bounding their extent. Greer v. Wilson, 9 N. E. 284, 287, 108 Ind. 322; McLane v. Bovee, 35 Wis. 27, 36; Vantongerren v. Heffernan, 38 N. W. 52, 73, 5 Dak. 180; Jamaica Pond Aqueduct Corp. v. Chandler, 91 Mass. (9 Allen) 159, 168; Weed v. Woods, 53 Atl. 1024, 1026, 71 N. H. 581 (citing First Universalist Soc. v. Boland, 155 Mass. 171, 29 N. E. 524, 15 L. R. A. 231). Thus, where the commissioner of the General Land Office has authority to cancel a preemption certificate for cause at any time before patent issue, there was a limitation on the fee, and its determinable quality is inferred by law within such definition. Vantongerren v. Heffernan, 38 N. W. 52, 73, 5 Dak. 180.

If land is given to a man and his heirs "as long as he shall pay 70 shillings annually to A.," or "as long as the church of St. Paul's shall stand," his estate is fee simple determinable, in which case he has the whole estate in him, and such perpetuity of the estate which may continue forever, though at the same time there is a contingency which, when it happens, will determine the estate. Plowd. 557. United States Pipe Line Co. v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co., 41 Atl. 759, 762, 62 N. J. Law, 254, 42 L. R. A. 572.

A determinable fee is an estate which may be perpetual, or may be determined by the death of the intestate without surviving lawful issue, and without previous alienation of the land limited over to beneficiaries mentioned. One of the peculiarities of a fee determinable is that it may become a fee simple absolute on the happening of any event which renders impossible the event or combination of events on which such estate is to end. An example given of such determinable fee is where an estate is granted to a man and his heirs until the marriage of B. Friedman v. Steiner, 107 Ill. 125, 131.

A qualified, base, or determinable fee is an interest which may continue forever, but is liable to be determined by some act or event circumscribing its continuance or extent. People v. White (N. Y.) 11 Barb. 26, 28 (citing 1 Rev. St. 722; 4 Kent Comm. 4, note d; Id., 9; 5 T. R. 107).

A determinable fee is such a one as has a qualification subjoined thereto, and it must be determined whenever the qualification annexed to it is at an end. Wiggins Ferry Co. v. Ohio & M. Ry. Co., 94 Ill. 83. Testator's will provided that at the death of testator's wife the estate should go to and be divided amongst testator's children and their descendants. The interest which vested at the death of testator was not a base or determinable fee, subject to be divested as to any devisee by the death of such devisee during the continuance of the life estate, without leaving descendants to take after the death of the widow of the testator. Knight v. Pottgieser, 52 N. E. 934, 936, 176 Ill. 368.

A fee is determinable where its continuance is limited in some manner, as where lands are given to a man and his heirs as long as another man shall have heirs of his body. Richardson v. Noyes, 2 Mass. 56, 63, 3 Am. Dec. 24.

The term "determinable fee" includes the interest acquired by a county in real estate conveyed by a deed providing that the conveyance is for the use of the people of the county as long as the premises shall be used for a county site for the courthouse, jail, and clerk's office, but shall revert to the grantor if the county ceases to use it for such purpose. Gillespie v. Broas (N. Y.) 23 Barb. 370, 381.

DETERMINATION.

See "Actual Determination"; "Final Determination"; "Judicial Determination."

The expression "a determination in the trial court" obviously includes a decision of the court upon a trial without a jury, but, according to common parlance and the general understanding, would not include the verdict of a jury. Code Civ. Proc. § 3343. It would be a peculiar, if not an unprecedented, definition to describe the verdict of a jury as a determination in a trial court. Henavie v. New York Cent. & H. R. Co., 48 N. E. 525, 527, 154 N. Y. 278.

In Code 1874, § 1010, providing that the attorney in an action, suit, or proceeding may be changed at any time before judgment or decree or final determination, the words "action," "suit," and "proceeding" are referred to distributively. Each has its peculiar meaning, and the words "judgment," "decree," and "determination" apply equally to each. Thus, judgment is the final result of action, decree of suit, and determination of proceeding. Shirley v. Birch, 18 Pac. 344, 345, 16 Or. 1.

Rev. St. p. 339, § 77, relating to pleading a judgment or determination, means the judgment or determination of a court or officer of special jurisdiction, and none other. Karns v. Kunkle, 2 Minn. 313, 317 (Gil. 268, 272).

Absence of overpowering passion implied.

The expressions "premeditation," "deliberation," "design," "determination," distinctly formed in the mind, used in the charge of a prosecution for murder, all imply the absence of overpowering passion. State v. Ah Mook, 12 Nev. 369, 381.

Deliberation implied.

The words "a design, a determination, to kill, distinctly formed in the mind" in an instruction, imply deliberation. "Certainly they mean a great deal more than the simple impulse to slay which characterizes manslaughter. The word 'determination' in this instruction is not used in any technical sense; in fact, it has no technical sense in which it means less than it does in its popular signification. Webster defines it to be a 'decision of a question in the mind; firm resolution; settled purpose.' Can it be said that a question can be decided, a wavering resolution made firm, or a hesitating purpose set tled without deliberation?" State v. Ah Mook, 12 Nev. 368, 390.

DETERMINE.

*See "Finally Determine"; "Fully Determined"; "Hear and Determine."

The verb "determine" is thus defined: To fix all boundaries of; to mark off; to separate; to set bounds to; to fix the determination of; to limit; to bound; to bring to an end; to fix the form or character of; to shape; to regulate; to settle; to prescribe imperatively; to ascertain definitely; to bring to a conclusion; to settle by judicial sentence; to decide. McCormick v. State, 42 Neb. 866, 868, 61 N. W. 99.

The word "determined," in a contract for booming logs, providing that defendant's portion of the net expense of booming and of the 10 per cent. of the net cost is to be determined by the proportion which logs bear to the whole amount of logs handled, means simply ascertained or computed. It does not imply any mutual action or agreement by the parties. Rumford Falls Boom Co. v. Rumford Falls Paper Co., 51 Atl. 810, 812, 96 Me. 96.

Within the statute giving police commissioners power to appoint a chief of police for such time as the board shall determine, "determine" means to fix, settle, or decide what that term shall be. In this relation it becomes a time necessarily prospective and future. The clear intent of the command is that the board shall annex to the appointment a time, term, or period through whose duration the consequent duties, privileges, and emoluments are to remain with the appointee. State v. Police Com'rs, 14 Mo. App. 297, 303.

"Determine," as used in the statute appointing commissioners in eminent domain proceedings to determine the compensation of the landowners, means to perform a judicial act limited to fixing the compensation; and as no human tribunal is able to determine judicially what the future value will be in some future period of time, it depending on contingencies which are known to God alone, the commissioners are limited to determine what is the present value, and at such point their functions cease, and they are in no manner to be influenced by the future value. New Jersey R. & Transp. Co. v. Suydam, 17 N. J. Law (2 Har.) 25, 47.

As assess and levy.

The word "determine," in Rev. St. 1881, § 3348, requiring that the amount of general taxes shall be determined by incorporated towns before the third Tuesday of May, means to assess and levy the tax. Worley v. Harris, 82 Ind. 493, 497.

Become void distinguished.

The word "determined," as used in Act Jan. 31, 1811 (4 Litt. 218), for the better regulation of the proceedings in caveats, and providing that no grant should issue to the plaintiff in any caveat entered or to be entered so as to include the land, or any part thereof, within the survey against which such caveat is or may be entered, until such caveat shall be dismissed, decided, or determined, is generic in its nature, and comprehends every mode of terminating or bringing a thing to an end, though it clearly imports simply that the thing has been terminated or brought to an end. It is not a convertible phrase with "to become void," but the latter differs from the former only as a species differs from its genus, and must, therefore, be included in it; for to say that a thing has become void is that it has in effect been terminated or brought to an end, but the expression applies only to its end or termination in one specific mode. Sharp v. Curds, 7 Ky. (4 Bibb) 547.

As conferring power to set aside or abolish.

The words "adjudge, determine, and award," as used by arbitrators in their award, do not necessarily carry with them the idea of a judgment according to law, so as to enable one of the parties to have the award set aside for errors of law. Patton v. Garrett, 21 S. E. 679, 682, 116 N. C. 847.

The word "determine," as used in Laws 1898, c. 182, § 177, giving the common council of cities of the second class authority to determine the number of members of the police department, is defined to mean "to fix or settle definitely; make specific or certain; to decide the state or character of" (Cent. Dict.); "to fix the form or character of; to shape; to prescribe imperatively; to regulate; to settle; to decide" (Webst. Dict.). "I am of the opinion that the word 'determine' cannot be given the meaning 'to abolish,' and the Legislature, by giving the power to the common council to determine the number of members of the police department, did not give it the power to abolish station house keepers." People v. Ham, 66 N. Y. Supp. 264, 266, 32 Misc. Rep. 517.

An agreement that a certain number of shares shall be voted in a block, and that the way it should be voted should be determined by ballot, means to ascertain the result by balloting on a proposition by those entitled to cast the ballots, and by necessary implication declares that such vote should be cast in accordance with the result of the ballot. Smith v. San Francisco & N. P. Ry. Co., 47 Pac. 582, 587, 115 Cal. 584, 35 L. R. A. 309, 56 Am. St. Rep. 119.

In a statute providing that the board of education shall determine the studies to be pursued, "determine" means something more than investigating and arriving at a conclusion by mental process, though these are embraced. Official action is contemplated and required to give a practical effect to the word, and the injunction to do this is mandatory upon the board; and, in order that those who must obey should know the will of the board, it is necessary that it should be declared in such a way that it may be known. State v. Board of Education, 1 Pac. 844, 847, 18 Nev. 173; State v. Board of Education, 35 Ohio St. 368, 384.

As end.

Laws 1860, c. 260, § 10, cl. 1, authorizing an appeal from an order which, in effect, "determines the action," held, that such term properly includes an order denying the application for a change of venue properly made, since such application divests the court of any authority to proceed with the case; and, having no authority to proceed, if it refuses to change the venue, the action would be determined unless an appeal is taken therefrom. Western Bank v. Tallman, 15 Wis. 92.

Finality implied.

"Determine," as used in Act July 27, 1866, § 13, providing that the directors of a certain railroad company should from time to time fix, determine, and regulate the fares, tolls, and charges to be received and paid for transportation of persons and property, does not imply that the action designated by the word should be final, and therefore exempt from government supervision. Atlantic & P. R. Co. v. United States (U. S.) 76 Fed. 186, 193.

A submission to a referee authorizing him to hear and determine, without any condition or limitation, any matter of law or matter of fact, should be construed as authorizing the referee to decide all questions of law or of fact arising in the hearing of the cause, and to give a final determination of the controversy. By the submission of the parties to his judgment he is constituted a court of competent jurisdiction to decide finally and in the last resort the rights of the parties, and his award can no more be disturbed than the judgment of any other court of competent jurisdiction in which no appeal is given. Cutler v. Wall, 9 R. I. 264.

The provision in Pen. Code, § 1611, that the board of supervisors shall have power to "determine what is a reasonable compensation" to be allowed the sheriff for providing all persons committed to the jail by competent authority with necessary food, clothing, and bedding, is equivalent to "find what is justly due," and the determination of the board is no more final than would have been the finding by the board of the amount which was justly due if the account had been presented for any other proper county charge. Fulkerth v. Stanislaus County, 7 Pac. 754, 755, 67 Cal. 334.

In Greater New York Charter, § 86, providing that, if a riparian owner apply to the land commissioners for a grant of the soil under water, the board of docks shall determine whether it will conflict with the public interests, and report their conclusions to the commissioners, "determine" cannot be construed to mean "finally determined," and therefore the right is merely advisory to the commissioners of the land office. The right to determine, as given by the charter, is not to determine whether the grant shall issue, but to determine whether the issue of the grant will conflict with the rights of the city or be otherwise prejudicial to its interest. People v. Woodruff, 68 N. Y. Supp. 10, 12, 57 App. Div. 273.

The distinction between the words "determine" and "prescribe" is far from clear. Mr. Webster defines "prescribe" thus: "To set down authoritatively; to order; to direct; to dictate; to appoint;" while he defines "determine" thus: "To fix permanently; to settle; to adjust." To set down authoritatively, and to fix permanently or to settle, do not admit of a wide distinction. Const. art. 6, § 8, provides that the Attorney General shall receive such compensation as may be "prescribed" by law. Article 4, § 12, provides that the salary of the secretary, treasurer, and auditor of the state shall be "determined" by law. It was held in construing the statutes that the words "determine" and "prescribe" do not admit of a wide distinction, and that the salary of the Attorney General could be reduced during his term of office. "If the framers of our Constitution had intended to provide that the salary of the Attorney General should not be diminished during his term of office, it may be reasonably argued that they would have so provided in that instrument in plain terms; for by the twenty-second section of the same article it is provided, as to the salary of the judges, that the judges shall receive such salary and allowances as may be determined by law, the amount of which shall not be diminished during their term of office. Here they intended that the salary should be fixed beforehand, and not altered; and they do not use the word 'prescribe,' but the word 'determine,' as had been used as to state officers. But while the word 'prescribe' is used as to the salary of the Attorney General, the same word is employed a few lines above in speaking of the compensation and tenure of office of the officers of this commonwealth. The use of the word 'prescribe' cannot be construed to mean settled beforehand in such sense as not to leave in the General Assembly the power to change the compensation during the term." Field v. Auditor, 3 S. E. 707, 710, 83 Va. 882.

As be suspended.

A policy of life insurance providing that, if the premium was not paid on the days named and in the lifetime of the insured, the policy should "cease and determine," should be construed as meaning that it is suspended; that it ceases to bind the company and to protect the assured without any act or declaration on the part of the company. It does not require a formal forfeiture. It is voidable at the election of the company, and that election can be exercised without notice to the assured for the reason that the policy itself is notice that his rights cease with the nonpayment of the premium. As to him it is a dead policy. Lantz v. Vermont Life Ins. Co., 21 Atl. 80, 82, 139 Pa. 546, 10 L. R. A. 577, 23 Am. St. Rep. 202.

As try.

The words "receive, hear, and determine," in Act March 3, 1803, c. 93, § 2, authorizing appeals from the District Courts of the United States to the Circuit Court, and requiring the Circuit Court to receive, hear, and determine such appeals, do not authorize a retrial by jury of a cause which has been tried by jury in the District Court. United States v. Wonson (U. S.) 28 Fed. Cas. 745, 749.

The power to hear and determine is an essential ingredient of original jurisdiction, and the authority to examine and correct errors is the distinguishing characteristic of appellate power. To hear and determine a criminal case is to proceed, after bill found, to try the issues of fact and pass sentence. Commonwealth v. Simpson (Pa.) 2 Grant, Cas. 438, 439 (citing 4 Bl. Comm. 270).

DETERMINE BEFOREHAND.

"Determining on the killing beforehand," as used in an instruction that if defendant purposely killed the deceased, and the killing was determined on beforehand, even a moment before the fatal blow was struck, the defendant is guilty of murder in the first degree, will be construed as being equivalent to an allegation of premeditation. Ragsdale v. Meridian Land & Industrial Co., 14 South. 193, 195, 71 Miss. 284.

DETINET—DETINETIS.

The action of replevin formerly was said to be of two sorts, namely, "in the detinet" or "detinetis"—the former, where the goods are still detained by the person who took them, to recover the value thereof and damages, and the latter, as the word imports, where the goods have been delivered to the party. But the former is now obsolete, and there does not appear in any of the books any proceeding in replevin which was not commenced by writ requiring the proper officer to cause the goods to be replevied to him or by plaint in the sheriff's court, the immediate process upon which is a precept to replevy the goods of the party levying the plaint, both of which proceedings are in rem—that is, to have the goods again. St. Martin v. Desnoyer, 1 Minn. 41, 43 (Gil. 25, 28).

DETINUE.

Detinue is a form of action for the recovery in specie of goods taken by wrongfully withholding for value at the time the property is found and decided to be that of the plaintiff. Penny v. Davis, 42 Ky. (3 B. Mon.) 313, 314.

"In order to ground an action of detinue, these points are necessary: First, that the defendant came lawfully into possession of the goods, as either by delivery to him or by finding them; second, that the plaintiff have a property in them; third, that the goods themselves be of some value; fourth, that they be ascertained in point of identity." Jac. Law Dict. tit. "Detinue." This form of action, and the mode of pleading adapted to it, no longer exist, but the remedy is afforded under a modified form remaining the same. The judgment must still be in the alternative, and the plaintiff cannot elect to have it rendered either for the amount or value of the property. The same rule remains as to the description of the property to be recovered, except so far as reason and justice have served to relax it. The thing must be identified with reasonable certainty. Guille v. Fook, 13 Or. 577, 584, 11 Pac. 277, 280.

It was once a doctrine that detinue would not lie where the goods had been taken from the plaintiff's possession tortiously; but that doctrine may be considered as exploded. Overfield v. Bullitt, 1 Mo. 749, 750; Pierce v. Hill (Ala.) 9 Port. 151, 154, 33 Am. Dec. 306.

"Detinue" is a mode of action given for the recovery of a specific thing and damages for its detention. Though judgment is also rendered in favor of the plaintiff for the alternate value, provided the thing cannot be had, yet the recovery of the thing itself is the main object and inducement to the allowing of the action. The action is not adapted to the recovery alone of the value of the thing detained, nor can it be maintained therefor. Sinnott v. Felock, 59 N. E. 265, 267, 165 N. Y. 444, 53 L. R. A. 565, 80 Am. St. Rep. 736 (citing Caldwell v. Fenwick, 32 Ky. [2 Dana] 333).

A person having no beneficial interest, but only a special property, in a chattel, may maintain detinue for it, and should, if he recover, have a judgment in the alternative for the entire value of the absolute property, because a bailee may, in consequence of the privity of contract, be entitled to restitution from possession of a stranger, and because a recovery and acceptance of the assessed value by the bailee is for the bailor, and would bar an action by him for the same, or any subsequent detention; but the enforcement of a judgment for value in favor of a person owning a limited general property, as for life or years, would not bar an action, by the person entitled to the remainder, for a detention by the same party, after the expiration of the estate for life or years; nor would it transfer any other or greater interest in the property than that of the owner of the limited estate. Glascok v. Hays, 34 Ky. (4 Dana) 58, 60.

Detinue is an action at common law for the recovery of a particular chattel, or, in the alternative, its value. The writ is framed for, and its precise purpose is to recover, the article in specie, and where this is impossible at the time the action was brought, so that the object of the writ cannot be accomplished, the action will not lie. Thus, if the chattel has been destroyed or has died before action brought, the suit must be dismissed. Lindsey v. Perry, 1 Ala. 203; Caldwell v. Fenwick, 32 Ky. (2 Dana) 332. But where a slave sued for in detinue died pending the action, a judgment for the slave or for its value was properly rendered against the defendant after such death. White v. Ross (Ala.) 5 Stew. & P. 123.

Replevin distinguished.

Detinue is an action ex delicto, and is for the most part superseded by replevin. It is preferable to replevin where the plaintiff is indifferent whether he recover the goods or the value (1 Poe, Pl. §§ 152, 156, 301). The difference resulting from the form of allegation in replevin is that, where the declaration is in the detinet, the plaintiff, if he recovers, has adjudged to him the right of possession of the goods and chattels, and damages for their detention only, but, where the declaration is in the detinet, the plaintiff, if he be entitled to recover, is entitled to have awarded him as well the value of the goods as damages for their detention. Brown v. Ravenscraft, 44 Atl. 170, 173, 88 Md. 216 (quoting from Benesch v. Weil, 69 Md. 276, 279, 14 Atl. 666).

Trover distinguished.

The action of detinue lies for the recovery of the property itself, with damages for the wrongful detention of it, while the action of trover lies for the recovery of damages for the wrongful conversion of the property. Richards v. Morey, 65 Pac. 886, 887, 133 Cal. 437.

DETRACTION, DUTIES OF.

See "Duties of Detraction."

DETRIMENT.

Detriment is a loss or harm suffered in person or property. Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 4271; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 2287; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 2724.

Sess. Laws 1862, p. 48, § 13. prohibiting the diversion of any stream to the detriment of any miner or others along the line of said stream, is to be construed as meaning a detriment immediately resulting from such diversion, and does not include a detriment to subsequent settlers. Coffin v. Left Hand Ditch Co., 6 Colo. 443, 451.

DETRITUS.

The word "detritus" is used in the mining law to designate that superficial deposit on the earth's surface which is movable, as contrasted with the immovable mass that lies below. Stevens v. Williams (U. S.) 23 Fed. Cas. 44.

DEVASTAVIT.

Devastavit is a loss suffered to the estate of a deceased person by the negligence of the executor or administrator. Fox v. Wilcocks (Pa.) 1 Bin. 194, 2 Am. Dec. 433; Thomas v. Riegel (Pa.) 5 Rawle, 266, 282.

Devastavit is the mismanagement of the estate of a deceased person in squandering and misapplying assets contrary to the duty imposed on the executor or administrator. Clift v. White, 12 N. Y. (2 Kern.) 519, 531; Ridgway v. Kerfoot, 22 Mo. App. 661, 664. Where executors transfer personalty to legatees, leaving claims against the estate unprovided for, they are personally liable therefor as for a devastavit. In re Oosterhoudt's Estate, 38 N. Y. Supp. 179, 182, 15 Misc. Rep. 566.

A devastavit occurs whenever an executor or administrator wastes the estate, and consists of any act, omission, or mismanagement by which the estate suffers loss; or it may result from the payment of claims which, by the exercise of proper diligence, the administrator might have ascertained to be unjust and illegal. Beardsley v. Marsteller, 120 Ind. 319, 320, 22 N. E. 315.

Devastavit is any act of omission, negligence, or misconduct on the part of an executor or administrator by which loss occurs to the estate. People v. Pleas (N. Y.) 2 Johns. Cas. 376.

A devastavit is a violation of duty by the executor or administrator such as renders him personally responsible for mischievous consequences, and which the law styles a devastavit—that is, a wasting of the assets; or a mismanagement of the estate and effects of the deceased in squandering and misapplying the assets contrary to the duty imposed on him. Steel v. Holladay, 25 Pac. 69, 71, 20 Or. 70, 10 L. R. A. 670.

"Devastavit," as defined by the books and legal lexicographers, is a wasting of the estate; a misapplication of the assets. Howe v. People, 44 Pac. 512, 514, 7 Colo. App. 535.

A devastavit by an executor or administrator is a wasting of the assets, and may consist of any act or omission; every mismanagement by which the estate suffers loss. Ayers v. Lawrence, 59 N. Y. 192, 197.

A "devastavit" results where an administrator purchases the property of the estate of which he is administrator, for himself. Lawes v. Boylston, 9 Mass. 337, 353, 6 Am. Dec. 72.

As to what constitutes devastavit, 2 Lomax, Ex'rs, p. 475, thus states the law: "An executor or administrator is subjected by law to liability personally for various acts of misconduct, amounting to a violation or neglect of duty, and which is called in law a 'devastavit' or wasting of the assets. In law, a devastavit is a mismanagement of the estate and the effects of the deceased, in the squandering and misapplying the assets contrary to the trust and confidence reposed in the executors or administrators, for which they shall answer out of their own pockets as far as they have or might have had assets of the deceased." McGlaughlin v. McGlaughlin's Legatees, 43 W. Va. 226, 238, 27 S. E. 378, 383.

A neglect to collect a debt due an estate, which might with proper exertion be collected, is a devastavit. In re Sanderson's Estate, 15 Pac. 753, 759, 74 Cal. 199.

Payment of legacies.

Devastavit consists not only of the negligent loss of the assets of an estate by the executor or administrator, but also includes an application of assets in the executor's hands to the payment of legacies and distributive shares after the expiration of a year from the executor's appointment, to the prejudice of a creditor of whose claim he had no notice, without requiring refunding bonds of the legatees or distributees. Swearinger's Ex'r v. Pendleton's Ex'r (Pa.) 4 Serg. & R. 389, 394.

DEVELOP.

A power of attorney, which, in consideration of a prescribed royalty, appointed a party sole agent to "work and develop" the business of such patents, does not give the agent power to grant an exclusive license which would transfer substantially the entire interest in the patent; but it does authorize him to grant nonexclusive licenses to manufacture and sell. Union Switch &

Signal Co. v. Johnson R. Signal Co. (U. S.) 61 Fed. 940, 943, 10 C. C. A. 176; Johnson R. Signal Co. v. Union Switch & Signal Co. (U. S.) 59 Fed. 20, 23.

As unfolding.

The word "developed," as used in an indictment alleging that it had been "developed" before the grand jury, which was investigating a charge of bribery, that money had been deposited, and that it became material to the issue to ascertain defendant's knowledge of such money, and the purposes for which it was to be used, did not signify that the fact of the bribery was so fully determined that it would not take testimony to establish it before a petit jury. On the contrary, the word itself, in the connection in which it is used, signifies an unfolding of the crime. State v. Faulkner, 75 S. W. 116, 125, 175 Mo. 546.

DEVIATION.

See "Colorable Deviation."

"Deviation," as used in St. 8 & 9 Vict. c. 20, § 8, authorizing a railroad company to deviate in taking lands for 100 yards from its line, as shown on certain plans, is to be taken with reference to the line of railway only; that is, the line of railway actually laid down shall not deviate more than 100 yards from the line laid down and delineated in the parliamentary plans. Doe v. North Staffordshire R. Co., 16 Q. B. 526, 537.

"Alterations, deviations, or additions," within the meaning of a building contract expressly providing for alterations, deviations, or additions, and the payment for them, include extra work on the building; and therefore an order payable out of the amount due on the builder's contract includes the sum due for such extra work. Dunn v. Stokern, 3 Atl. 349, 350, 43 N. J. Eq. (16 Stew.) 401.

DEVIATION (In Marine Insurance).

Deviation, in marine insurance, is a voluntary departure from the usual course of the voyage, which departure is not necessary or excusable. It would seem that the only reason why leaving a course of a voyage can be excused is its proceeding from some hazard insured against, or from a reasonable apprehension of encountering peril. Robinson v. Marine Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 2 Johns. 89, 95; Hos-tetter v. Park, 11 Sup. Ct. 1, 4, 137 U. S. 30, 34 L. Ed. 568. It is a deviation, and from that time the policy is at an end, and the insurer is discharged from all subsequent responsibility. The liability of the insurer ceases from the commencement of the deviation. It is not a deviation which will discharge the underwriters where the ship is taken from her direct course by an honest mistake of the master. Brazier v. Clap, 5 Mass. 1, 9. Reade v. Commercial Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 3 Johns. 352, 358, 3 Am. Dec. 495. A "deviation in a voyage," sufficient to avoid a marine policy, means any departure from the usual course of a voyage, or stopping at any place, even in the course of the voyage, which is not permitted by the policy, unless it takes place for some justifiable cause, such as to repair, obtain necessary refreshments, avoid an enemy, or the like. Coles v. Marine Ins. Co. (U. S.) 6 Fed. Cas. 65, 66; Thatcher v. McCulloh (U. S.) 23 Fed. Cas. 891, 893; Hostetter v. Gray (U. S.) 11 Fed. 179, 181; Bond v. The Cora (U. S.) 3 Fed. Cas. 838; Riggin v. Patapsco Ins. Co. (Md.) 7 Har. & J. 279, 288, 16 Am. Dec. 302; Murden v. South Carolina Ins. Co. (S. C.) 1 Mill, Const. 200, 211; Lawrence v. Ocean Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 11 Johns. 241, 268.

Strictly speaking, a "deviation" originally meant only a departure from the course of the voyage, but now it is always understood in the sense of a material departure from or change in the risk insured against, without just cause. Wilkins v. Tobacco Ins. Co., 30 Ohio St. 317, 341, 27 Am. Rep. 455.

Deviation is a departure from the course of a voyage insured, or an unreasonable delay in pursuing the voyage, or the commencement of an entirely different voyage. Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 2694; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 4561; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 1907; Post v. Phoenix Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 10 Johns. 79, 83.

Deviation is the increasing or varying of the risk insured against, without necessity or reasonable cause. The term is not limited merely to an increased risk by the vessel going out of her course, but may be any neglect or procedure on her part which tends to increase the risk. Bell v. Western Marine & Fire Ins. Co. (La.) 5 Rob. 423, 445, 39 Am. Dec. 542.

A deviation is a varying from the route insured against, without necessity or just cause, after the risk has begun; and the effect of a deviation is to discharge the underwriters, whether the risk is enhanced or not. It is not confined to a departure from or going out of the direct or usual course of the voyage, but it comprehends unusual or unnecessary delay, or any act of the assured or his agents which, without necessity or just cause, incurs or changes the risks included in the voyage. Audenreid v. Mercantile Mut. Ins. Co., 60 N. Y. 482, 484, 19 Am. Rep. 204.

"A deviation of a vessel is not merely the unnecessary going out of the track or course usually taken, but it is also a departure from either the express or implied terms of the contract. It needs not much reasoning or discussion to show that delays for saving of ships, goods or mariners, producing uncommon risk, cannot be legal excuses on the part of the insured in policies of insurance which are void for any deviation; such delays being breaches of the implied terms of the contract, by exposing to hazards not originally counted on, foreseen, or in the contemplation of the parties. Ships cruising after prizes incur deviation. All excuses for leaving the course or delays must be from necessity, and not with a view to lucrative objects. Putting into port by stress of weather, to stop a leak, obtain provisions, etc.; going out of the track to avoid an enemy, for convoys or other purposes, for the safety of the ship or goods—being beneficial to the insurers, are justifiable." Warder v. La Belle Creole (U. S.) 29 Fed. Cas. 215, 217.

A master of a vessel is guilty of deviation, so as to render a carrier liable for damages sustained even in an inevitable accident or by the perils of the sea, when, without reasonable anxiety, either physical or moral, he departs from the usual route of vessels between the ports between which his vessel is plying, and thereby encounters the danger resulting in the loss. And such facts being given, the question as to whether there was a deviation or not is a question of law, and proper to be determined by the court. Accordingly, where a vessel on a voyage for which the usual track was through Long Island Sound took the outer course, and the only excuse therefor was that the ice was not yet all out of Long Island Sound, and peril of thieves in the harbor of New York compelled him to start on the voyage while such obstruction still continued, such change from the usual track constituted a deviation, and rendered the carrier liable for damages sustained in a storm encountered by reason of such change. Crosby v. Fitch, 12 Conn. 410, 420, 31 Am. Dec. 745.

To establish a "deviation," as the term is understood in the law of marine insurance, the fact must appear that the risks insured against were increased or varied without necessary or reasonable cause. When the fact whether the risk was increased or altered depends on a variety of circumstances peculiar to the pursuit in which the vessel was engaged, and the evidence is not decisive to prove the fact, the decision of the question belongs to the jury. Child v. Sun Mut. Ins. Co., 5 N. Y. Super. Ct. (3 Sandf.) 26, 48.

A deviation is a voluntary departure from the vessel's course, without necessary or reasonable cause. There is no rule of admiralty law that the departure of a ship from her course, when required to procure necessary treatment for a sick or injured seaman, invalidates her insurance on the voyage, or that on her cargo. The Iroquois (U. S.) 118 Fed. 1003, 1005, 55 C. C. A. 497.

A "deviation," within the meaning of the term as used in marine insurance policies, which is a defense against loss, etc., is a voluntary and inexcusable departure from the usual course; the question whether such departure amounts to a deviation to be determined as a question of fact from the motive, consequences, and circumstances of the act. Thebaud v. Great Western Ins. Co., 50 N. E. 284, 286, 155 N. Y. 516.

The word "deviation," when isolated, means a departure, reasonable or unreasonable, with or without necessity. The words "with liberty to make deviation," in a bill of lading, give the carrier the right to make only such departures from the voyage as are necessary and reasonable. When used in a contract of marine insurance, the word "deviation" includes only unnecessary and unreasonable departures from the voyage. Swift & Co. v. Furness, Withy & Co. (U. S.) 87 Fed. 345, 348.

The elementary writers define a deviation to be any unnecessary or unexcused departure from the usual course or general mode of carrying on the voyage. Hence, until the voyage commences, there can be no deviation from the usual course of the voyage. Fernandez v. Great Western Ins. Co., 26 N. Y. Super. Ct. (3 Rob.) 457, 475.

Nothing which conforms to the usual voyage of a vessel can be held a deviation. Donnell v. Amoskeag Mfg. Co. (U. S.) 118 Fed. 10, 13, 55 C. C. A. 178.

Avoiding capture.

A departure from the usual course of a voyage in order to avoid capture by an enemy's vessel of war would not amount to a deviation. Post v. Phoenix Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 10 Johns. 79, 83.

A digression from the course of the voyage to avoid an imminent peril of capture or other disaster, necessarily resulting in the entire loss of the ship or cargo, is not a deviation. Riggin v. Patapsco Ins. Co. (Md.) 7 Har. & J. 279, 288, 16 Am. Dec. 302.

Capturing of prize.

The term "deviation," in the law of marine insurance, when applied to a purely mercantile adventure, includes the capturing of a prize by the insured vessel, although the least possible time is spent in taking possession of it and exchanging crews. Wiggin v. Amory, 13 Mass. 118, 126.

Compulsory deviation.

Where a vessel was by compulsion forced from the direct course of her voyage, there was not a deviation. Savage v. Pleasants, (Pa.) 5 Bin. 403, 417, 6 Am. Dec. 424.

There is no deviation of a vessel when she is driven out of her course by currents.

Patapsco Ins. Co. v. Coulter, 28 U. S. (3 Pet.) 222, 231, 7 L. Ed. 659.

Delay.

"Deviation," in marine insurance law, means any departure from, or unnecessary delay in, the course of a voyage, whether at sea or in port. Coffin v. Newburyport Marine Ins. Co., 9 Mass. 436, 447.

The term "deviation," in the law of marine insurance, includes every unreasonable or inexcusable delay in commencing or prosecuting a voyage, whether the delay be in some port or upon the high seas. Arnold v. Pacific Mut. Ins. Co., 78 N. Y. 7, 16.

In marine insurance the sole ground upon which a deviation discharges the underwriter is that it varies the risk, and, as it is evident that the risk may be as much varied by a delay in commencing or prosecuting the voyage as a divergence from its prescribed course, it follows that such delay, if unreasonable or inexcused, will discharge the underwriter. Augusta Ins. & Banking Co. v. Abbott, 12 Md. 348, 378.

Exposure of goods.

Deviation is any change or varying of the risk without necessity or just cause by which the risk is enhanced. It means voluntary acts or acts of neglect not arising from necessity or just cause, and if it does not come within this exception it is wholly immaterial with what motive the act which is a deviation or a departure is done; for if, after the risk is assumed, the risk is enhanced or varied, the deviation discharges the policy. The exposure of goods in a greater degree to the perils of the sea by stowing them on the deck is an enhancement of the risk and a deviation which will discharge the policy. Atkinson v. Great Western Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 4 Daly, 1, 21.

Saving of life.

For a vessel to go out of her course to save the life of a man will not be considered a deviation. Bond v. The Cora (U. S.) 3 Fed. Cas. 838.

Stopping at port.

It is not a deviation for a vessel to touch and stay at a port out of the course of the voyage, if such departure is within the usage of the trade, and is within the purposes and for the objects authorized by the usage. Bentaloe v. Pratt (U. S.) 3 Fed. Cas. 241, 242; Hostetter v. Park, 11 Sup. Ct. 1, 4, 137 U. S. 30, 34 L. Ed. 568 (citing Coffin v. Newburyport Marine Ins. Co., 9 Mass. 436, 437; Bulkley v. Protection Ins. Co. [U. S.] 4 Fed. Cas. 614, 617; Oliver v. Maryland Ins. Co., 11 U. S. [7 Cranch] 487, 491, 3 L. Ed. 414; Columbian Ins. Co. v. Catlett, 25 U. S. [12 Wheat.] 383, 387, 6 L. Ed. 664; Gracie v. Marine Ins. Co. of Baltimore, 12 U. S. [8 Cranch] 75, 83, 3 L. Ed. 492; Child v. Sun Mut. Ins. Co., 5 N. Y. Super. Ct. [3 Sandf.] 26; Lockett v. Merchants' Ins. Co. [La.] 10 Rob. 339; Vallance v. Dewar, 1 Camp. 503; Ougier v. Jennings, Id. 505; Kingston v. Knibbs, Id. 508; Moxon v. Atkins, 3 Camp. 200; Salvador v. Hopkins, 3 Burrows, 1707). A departure from a direct route between two different ports which was in accordance with the usual course of trade would not amount to a deviation. Thatcher v. McCulloh (U. S.) 23 Fed. Cas. 891, 893; Hostetter v. Gray (U. S.) 11 Fed. 179, 181 (citing Bentalve v. Pratt [U. S.] 3 Fed. Cas. 241, 242). The term "deviation," as used in marine insurance to designate a departure of a ship from her course, and which will avoid the policy, does not include the customary departure from the direct course to an intermediate port, as deviation must be construed according to usage. Bond v. Gonsales, 2 Salk. 445.

The term "deviation," as used in the law of marine insurance, includes a turning aside of a vessel from her course for the purpose of stopping at a certain port for any purpose not connected with the voyage, though the policy authorizes the vessel to stop at such port for any purpose without such stopping being considered a deviation. Solly v. Whitmore, 5 Barn. & Ald. 45, 46.

A policy of marine insurance on a vessel, between two ports, which authorizes the vessel to stop at certain islands, and to discharge, exchange, and take on board the whole or any part of any cargo at such places, without being a deviation, does not include a stopping at such islands for purposes wholly unconnected with the voyage, but such stopping is a deviation sufficient to avoid the policy. Hammond v. Reid, 4 Barn. & Ald. 72.

Undisclosed limitation of master's discretion.

The term "deviation," as used in the law of marine insurance, includes a limitation on the discretion of the master in making a voyage, which requires him to go by one only of several courses, which limitation is not disclosed to the insurers. Middlewood v. Blakes, 7 Term R. 162, 167.

DEVICE.

See "Gambling or Gaming Device."

Webster defines "device" as a synonym of "contrivance," which is also defined as a thing contrived, invented, or planned; and anything, therefore, which was constructed, planned, or contrived for the purpose of gaming or amusement, is within the statute, and prohibited. State v. Blackstone, 22 S. W. 370, 371, 115 Mo. 424.

"Device" is defined as that which is devised or formed by design; a contrivance; a project; a scheme to deceive; a stratagem or an artifice. State v. Smith, 85 N. W. 12, 13, 82 Minn. 342.

The use of the word "device" in a statement by a witness that the sale of branded cherries is a mere device to evade the law makes the statement a mere conclusion, and the rejection of such evidence is proper. Petteway v. State, 35 S. W. 646, 36 Tex. Cr. R. 97.

"Device," as used in an ordinance prohibiting saloon keepers from permitting at or in or about the doors, windows, openings, or in the interior of their saloons any blind, screen, painted or frosted glass, shade, curtain, or "other device," does not include a permanent board partition between the different rooms of a building used for a saloon. Shultz v. Cambridge, 38 Ohio St. 659.

"Means or device," in the statute making it criminal for any person to obtain or attempt to obtain any money or property by means of the use of any bogus checks, or by any means or device commonly called a "confidence game," was construed to mean any means or device which is the direct or proximate cause of obtaining the money or property, and the statute does not extend to cases of property or money obtained on the belief of the ability or disposition of the defendant to pay. Pierce v. People, 81 Ill. 98, 102.

Within a holding that an injunction against combinations and conspiracies formed with the intent and object of crippling the property and embarrassing the operation of a railroad, and holding that such injunction did not embrace the case of employes who, being dissatisfied with the proposed reduction of their wages, merely withdrew on that account from the service of the receivers, using neither force, threats, persecution, or intimidation toward employes who did not join them, nor any device to molest, hinder, alarm, etc., others who desire to take their places, the word "device" is applicable to cases in which it appears that the parties belonging to a labor organization displayed and maintained certain banners in front of the place of business for the purpose of deterring workmen from remaining in or entering the service. Arthur v. Oakes (U. S.) 63 Fed. 310, 320, 11 C. C. A. 209, 25 L. R. A. 414.

Under Pub. Acts 1895, Act No. 200, § 2, providing that it shall not be lawful for any person to use certain specified fishing apparatus or any device of any kind for taking fish, "device" is broad enough to cover hook and line, but, in connection with the other words of the section, will be construed to mean device of like kind. In re Yell, 65 N. W. 97, 107 Mich. 228.

The expression "device for transportation," as used in Act June 7, 1879, imposing a tax on every company leasing to or from another corporation, company, or limited partnership any device for the transportation of freight or passengers, includes palace cars and sleeping cars, as the primary purpose of such cars is the transportation of passengers. Pullman's Palace Car Co. v. Commonwealth, 107 Pa. 148, 150.

As distinguishing mark on ballot.

"It is true, 'device' sometimes means an emblem or pictorial representation, though in the Bible and by Shakespeare it is almost always used in the sense of 'contrivance,' 'plan,' or 'trick.' But these are all secondary or derivative meanings. Webster tells us that the word comes 'from the Latin "dividire,"—to separate; to distinguish.' This is its primary signification, and is that intended by its use in Code, §§ 2687, 2689, providing that ballots shall be without device, and that any ballot having a device on it shall be void. The letters 'O.K.,' written or printed on the outside of the ballots, would serve as fully to destroy the secrecy of the ballot, and give opportunity for intimidation of the voter, as if a cotton ball or an arm and hammer were imprinted there. In either case they fall within the denunciation of the statute, in the purview of which the word 'device' means simply a distinguishing mark." Baxter v. Ellis, 15 S. E. 938, 939, 111 N. C. 124, 17 L. R. A. 382.

In Code 1880, § 137, which excludes any device or mark by which one ticket in an election may be known or distinguished from another, "device" should be construed to include a dotted line across the face of the ticket which distinguishes it from other tickets. Steele v. Calhoun, 61 Miss. 556, 563.

In the statute prescribing the form of election tickets, and prohibiting the printing of any device thereon, by the word "devise" the statute evidently intended some figure, mark, ornament, emblem, or cipher which would distinguish the ticket from other tickets cast in the election. It intended to secure the secrecy of the ballot, and to preserve the voter from undue influence or restraint in exercising the right of suffrage. The statute is not violated by printing on such tickets, voted at a general election at which presidential electors are chosen, the names of popular candidates for president and vice-president, and the counties in which presidential electors reside. Owens v. State, 64 Tex. 500, 509.

The use of stickers or pasters with the name of a candidate printed thereon, and pasted on the face of a ballot, over the printed name of an opponent, is not a cut or device, within Gen. St. c. 1, § 82, prohibiting the use of any ballot containing a cut or device on its face or back to distinguish it from other ballots. Quinn v. Markoe, 35 N. W. 263, 264, 37 Minn. 439.

"Device," as used in Rev. St. art. 1694, requiring the rejection of ballots which have any picture, sign, device, or stamp mark on them, does not include a person's name. Hanscom v. State, 31 S. W. 547, 549, 10 Tex. Civ. App. 638.

The phrase "impression, device, color, or thing," within the meaning of Pol. Code. §§ 1206, 1207, providing that when any ballot bears upon it any impression, device, color, or thing designed to distinguish such ballot from other ballots, it shall be rejected, when construed with the phrase "designed to distinguish such ballots," is to be taken to mean an impression, device, color, or thing expressly designed as a means of designating the ballot, and does not include a mere discoloration appearing on a ballot, which is not designed, but resulting from the use of ink by the elector in scratching his ballot. Wyman v. Lemon, 51 Cal. 273, 274.

As applying to shape of ballot.

"Device," as used in Act 1879, prohibiting a device from being printed or being made in any manner on election ballots by which one may be known or distinguished from another, means a figure, mark, or ornament of a similar character with the pictures, signs, etc., enumerated in the same connection, and placed on the ticket in the same manner—that is, printed, engraved, stamped, or otherwise placed thereon—and does not mean the giving of the tickets a diamond shape. State v. Phillips, 63 Tex. 390, 393, 51 Am. Rep. 646.

Substitute distinguished.

In Code 1876, § 4207, providing for the punishment of one playing at a game of cards or dice, or some device or substitute for cards or dice, at a tavern, public house, highway, or some other public place, "device" means that which is devised or formed by design—a contrivance or invention—and is not synonymous with "substitute," which means that which is put in the place of another thing, or used instead of something else. As used in the statute, "device" seems to have a somewhat more narrow meaning than "substitute." "Substitute" would embrace whatever might be used in place of cards or dice, whether designed or invented for that purpose or not. Henderson v. State, 59 Ala. 89, 90.

DEVICE BY WAY OF SEAL.

The term "device by way of seal," as used in a statute declaring that instruments entitled to record must be executed with a device by way of a seal, is sufficiently satisfied to entitle an instrument to record where the word "Seal" is written in the place where the seal would have been affixed. Cochran v. Stewart, 59 N. W. 543, 544, 57 Minn. 499.

DEVIL.

"Devil" is the name given to a machine used for cleaning cotton. Whitney v. Carter (U. S.) 29 Fed. Cas. 1070, 1071.

DEVILING.

"Deviling," as used by a witness in a prosecution for murder, stating that the defendants were deviling the deceased, was explained to mean such acts as taking his cap from the deceased, placing their hands on his person, threatening to put him in the lock-up, and raising the foot as if to strike him, so as to drive him into a store for protection, etc. State v. Jimmerson, 24 S. E. 494, 118 N. C. 1173.

DEVISABLE.

The words "devisable" and "descendible" are convertible terms, so that, where a contingent remainder is descendible, it is also devisable. Collins v. Smith, 31 S. E. 449, 451, 105 Ga. 525; Varick v. Jackson (N. Y.) 2 Wend. 166, 183, 19 Am. Dec. 571.

DEVISE.

See "Beneficial Devise"; "Executory Devise"; "General Devise"; "Lapsed Devise"; "Void Devise."
Charitable devise, see "Charity."

A devise is the direction of a testator of sound mind as to the disposition of his property after death. Jenkins v. Tobin, 31 Ark. 306, 309.

A will making a specific devise of testator's property, directing all the rest of his property, both real and personal, to be given to his wife, and directing and empowering his executors to sell all the real estate not devised therein, means "specifically devised." Provost's Ex'r v. Provost, 27 N. J. Eq. (12 C. E. Green) 296, 297.

Rev. St. § 2068, provides that a grant or devise made to two or more persons, except as provided for in the following section, shall be construed to create estates in common, not of joint tenancy, unless expressly declared to be in joint tenancy. Rev. St. § 2069, provides that the preceding section shall not apply to mortgages or to devises or grants made in trust, or made to executors or to husband and wife. It was held that a mutual benefit insurance certificate payable to the wife and daughter is in effect a devise, and thus includes a joint tenancy. Farr v. Trustees of Grand Lodge A. O. U. W., 53 N. W. 738, 740, 83 Wis. 446, 18 L. R. A. 249, 35 Am. Rep. 73.

Bequeath or bequest synonymous.

See, also, "Bequeath."

The term "devise" is the proper term to be used in a will to denote a gift of real property, but, where the context shows that it is used by the testator in a different sense, it will be construed as sufficient to pass personal property, and to be synonymous with "bequeath." Borgner v. Brown, 33 N. E. 92, 94, 133 Ind. 391; Oothout v. Rogers, 15 N. Y. Supp. 120, 122, 59 Hun, 97; Cramer v. Cramer, 71 N. Y. Supp. 60, 61, 35 Misc. Rep. 17; Kilber v. Miller, 10 N. Y. Supp. 375, 57 Hun, 14; Rountree v. Pursell, 39 N. E. 747, 749, 11 Ind. App. 522; Wyman v. Woodbury, 33 N. Y. Supp. 217, 220, 86 Hun, 277; McCorkle v. Sherrill, 41 N. C. 173, 176; Pfuehl's Estate (Cal.) 1 Myr. Prob. Rep. 38, 39.

Although the word "devise" is more specially appropriated to a gift of land, the terms "bequest" and "devise" are used indifferently, and legatees may take under a devise of land if the context of the will shows that such was the testator's intention. Ladd v. Harvey, 21 N. H. 514, 528.

In the construction of statutes the words "bequeath" and "devise" shall be held to mean the same thing. Ky. St. 1903, § 467.

Within laws creating a charitable corporation, and authorizing it to take property by devise, and an act providing that devises or bequests to a charitable corporation shall be void unless the will was executed two months before testator's death, the word "devise" includes bequests, and personalty could not be taken under a will made within the time specified. People's Trust Co. v. Smith, 31 N. Y. Supp. 519, 522, 82 Hun, 494.

In Gen. St. § 3481, authorizing testators to devise all their estate in lands, tenements, hereditaments, annuities, or rents charged on or issuing out of them, or goods and chattels and personal estate of every description whatsoever, by will and testament, the word "devise" was not used in its technical and legal sense, which is limited to gifts of real estate or real chattels, but was used by the legislators to apply to gifts of both real and personal estate. Logan v. Logan, 17 Pac. 99, 101, 11 Colo. 44.

In an act giving a widow an election to renounce the benefit of a devise and bequest, and take dower in the lands and her share of the personal estate, "devise" is a convertible term with "bequest," and will include either a gift by will of land or of personal property. Evans v. Price, 8 N. E. 854, 857, 118 Ill. 593.

As used in Act April 13, 1843, subjecting "all legacies given and lands devised" to any person to attachment and levy, the terms "legacies given" and "lands devised" are artistic phrases meaning different things, and neither includes the other, so that an interest in goods and chattels is different from an interest in lands. Appeal of Roth, 94 Pa. 186, 191.

The fact that there was originally no testamentary power over land, so that a will or testament was confined to a disposition of personal estate, seems to have given rise to the term "devise," which was considered as more in the nature of a conveyance than of a testament, and hence was termed a "devise," meaning primarily a dividing or division; a devise in writing being construed as an instrument by which lands are conveyed. "Will" and "testament" had not at first precisely the same meaning as "devise," but in course of time these words came to be implied indifferently to a disposition of land or goods. Per Tarbell, J., in Clark v. Hornthal, 47 Miss. 434, 486.

As effective devise.

The term "devise of lands," as used in Elm. Dig. 145, providing that if a husband shall make a devise of lands to his wife for her life or otherwise, and without expressing such devise as intended to be in lieu of dower or not, and such wife shall survive her husband, she shall not be entitled to dower in any lands devised by her husband, unless she shall, in writing, express her dissent to receiving lands so devised to her in satisfaction and bar of the right of dower in the other lands devised by the will, means such a devise as may and can take effect and be enjoyed by the wife; and there is no difference in a devise of lands to which the testator had no title, and a devise of lands which by the law of the state are first subject to the payment of his debts, and wholly absolved by such payment. Thompson v. Egbert, 17 N. J. Law (2 Har.) 459, 465.

Descent distinguished.

See "Descent."

As purchase.

See "Purchase."

As a testamentary disposition of land.

Every bequest of personal property is a legacy. The word "devise" is especially appropriate to a gift of lands, and the word "legacy" to a gift of chattels. In re Karr (N. Y.) 2 How. Prac. (N. S.) 405, 409.

"Devise," in its technical sense, means a testamentary disposition of land. Ferebee v. Procter, 19 N. C. 439, 440; Fosdick v. Town of Hempstead, 8 N. Y. Supp. 772, 773, 55 Hun, 611; Scholle v. Scholle, 21 N. E. 84, 85, 113 N. Y. 261; Logan v. Logan, 17 Pac. 99, 100, 11 Colo. 44; Pratt v. McGhee, 17 S. C. 428, 429; In re Davis' Will, 79 N. W. 761, 762, 103 Wis. 455.

"Devise" properly means a testamentary disposition of land, and should not be applied to such dispositions of personalty. Dickerman v. Abrahams (N. Y.) 21 Barb. 551, 561; In re Fetrow's Estate, 58 Pa. (8 P. F. Smith) 424, 427; Rountree v. Pursell, 39 N. E. 747, 749, 11 Ind. App. 522.

The word "devise" has a well-defined legal meaning. It is a gift of real property by a person's last will and testament, and the object must therefore be that kind of property. Bouv. Law Dict. And although the courts have, in order to give effect to the testator's evident intention, included personal property as covered by the word "devise," when used in a will, such a meaning has never been given to the word in order to restrict or abridge a right or privilege granted, where it was not necessary to carry a clearly expressed intention into effect. People's Trust Co. v. Smith, 31 Abb. N. C. 422, 424, 30 N. Y. Supp. 342, 343.

In accurate language, the word "devise" applies to land only. It is, however, sometimes inaccurately applied to personal property. Oothout v. Rogers, 59 Hun, 97, 100, 13 N. Y. Supp. 120.

The use of the words "devise" and "devisee" in a codicil of a will indicates that it was in the mind of the testator that his real estate would continue to be real estate when his son arrived at the age of 21 years, if he lived so long. Chandler v. Thompson, 48 Atl. 583, 585, 62 N. J. Eq. 723.

"Although in England, under the Saxons, lands were devisable by will at common law, yet at the Conquest, and upon the introduction of a feudal system, the common law underwent a complete change in this respect, and an estate in fee simple in lands was no longer devisable. It became inconsistent with the nature of that system that a tenant should have an unlimited power to devise his lands, for the reason that he might devise to persons incapable of performing feudal services. The power of alienation by devise, except of a chattel interest, is, in England, then, to be traced to the statute of wills of 32 Hen. VIII, c. 1, and 34 Hen. VIII, c. 5." McCartee v. Orphan Asylum Soc. (N. Y.) 9 Cow. 437, 517, 18 Am. Dec. 516 (quoting 32 Hen. VIII, c. 1, and 34 Hen. VIII, c. 5).

A devise is a conveyance of land. Clapp v. Brown (N. Y.) 4 Redf. Sur. 200, 201.

Testament distinguished.

A "will," or, as it is properly called, a "devise," of real estate, is of an entirely different and opposite character to a "testament." A devise is a conveyance of land, and not under the same jurisdiction as a testament. 2 Black. Com. 501. The deviser must have reached the age of 21 years; and it is complete or may be executed without the appointment or intervention of an executor or administrator. Conklin v. Egerton's Adm'r (N. Y.) 21 Wend. 430, 436.

DEVISE BY IMPLICATION.

A "devise by implication" strictly arises where the testator, meaning to part with his interest, parts expressly with a portion of it only; and the question is whether that which is not in terms given is by the effect of the will, taken all together, disposed of. Where, for instance, an estate is given to B. after the death of A., the question is what is done with it, or whether anything is meant to be done with it, during A.'s life. Zimmerman v. Hafer, 32 Atl. 316, 318, 81 Md. 347.

A devise by implication exists where the testator uses words manifesting an intent to give by so strong a probability that the contrary intent cannot be supposed to have existed in his mind. Hanneman v. Richter, 50 Atl. 904, 906, 62 N. J. Eq. 365.

DEVISEE.

See "First Devisee"; "Next Devisee."

A devisee is one who takes by will. Inhabitants of Elliot v. Spinney, 69 Me. 31, 32.

A devisee indicates the person getting real estate by will. Brown v. Merchants' Bank, 66 Mo. App. 427, 431.

A devisee is a person to whom land or other real estate or chattels real are devised or given by will. Rogers v. Farrar, 22 Ky. (6 T. B. Mon.) 421, 424.

A devisee is an assignee in law. Whitcomb v. Starkey, 2 Atl. 793, 794, 63 N. H. 607.

Where the constitution and by-laws of a beneficiary insurance association provided that the heirs and legatees of a deceased member should be entitled to a named sum, and such sum should be used for no other purpose, the word "devisee" could not have been intended to bear the technical meaning of one to whom real estate is given by the last will of another, and was therefore used in its primary sense of one "separated" or "designated." Nye v. Grand Lodge A. O. U. W., 36 N. E. 429, 436, 9 Ind. App. 131; Lamont v. Grand Lodge Iowa Legion of Honor (U. S.) 31 Fed. 177, 179.

A testator gave certain property to his children, and then provided, "and in case any of my children shall die after me, and after having attained the age of 21 years, then the share, portion or interest of the child so dying shall go to the heirs, devisees, or legal representatives of the child so dying." Held, that the words "heirs, devisees, or legal representatives" were words of purchase, and not of limitation, and that those persons who answered to the description of heirs, devisees, or legal representatives of the deceased child of the testator, having regard to the nature and character of the property, were the persons entitled to take under the will. If the deceased child made a valid will, the devisees named in that will would take the share embraced therein. Drake v. Pell (N. Y.) 3 Edw. Ch. 251, 270.

A devisee does not hold his devise as a trustee for the creditors of the testator. He is the legal owner of the land which is not charged with the testator's debts, and has the same right to sell as had the testator himself, subject only to the rights given to the creditors by statute. Smith v. Grant, 15 S. C. 136, 147.

As assigns.

See "Assigns."

As legal representative.

See "Legal Representative."

Legatee synonymous.

In the construction of statutes, the words "legatee" and "devisee" shall be held to convey the same idea. Ky. St. 1903, § 467.

The word "devisee," in connection with a bequest of personalty, will be held synonymous with "legatee." Wright v. Trustees of Methodist Episcopal Church (N. Y.) Hoff. Ch. 202, 212; People v. Petri, 61 N. E. 499, 503, 191 Ill. 497, 85 Am. St. Rep. 268.

The term "devisee," when used in a will to designate a person to whom a bequest of personal property is made, will be construed to mean "legatee." People v. Petrie, 61 N. E. 499, 503, 191 Ill. 497, 85 Am. St. Rep. 268.

As one taking as heir.

The word "devisee" is sometimes used in common discourse as meaning not necessarily one named in a will or taking by devise, strictly speaking, but as one taking as heir, according to the special limitation in the will, upon the death of the first devisee. Young v. Robinson, 5 N. J. Law (2 Southard) 689, 710.

DEVOLUTION OF LIABILITY.

Code Civ. Proc. § 756, declares that, in case of a transfer of interest or devolution of liability, an action may be continued by or against the original party, unless the court directs, etc. Held, that the term "devolution of liability" contemplated a case wherein there was a transfer, not only of the interest of the defendant in the property in controversy, but also an assumption of the burdens relating thereto. There was therefore no devolution of liability on a receiver, appointed on the dissolution of a corporation, with regard to its debts, since such receiver did not become liable for such debts. Owen v.

Homeopathic Mut. Life Ins. Co., 10 N. Y. Supp. 75, 58 Hun, 455.

DEVOLUTIVE APPEAL

A devolutive appeal is one which does not suspend the execution of a judgment appealed from. State ex rel. Schwan v. Allen, 26 South. 434, 436, 51 La. Ann. 1842.

DEVOLVE.

An estate is said to "devolve" on another when by operation of law, and without any voluntary act of the previous owner, it passes from one person to another; but it does not devolve from one person to another as the result of some positive act or agreement between them. The word is itself of intransitive signification, and does not include the result of an act which is intended to produce a particular effect. It implies a result without the intervention of any voluntary actor. Francisco v. Aguirre, 29 Pac. 495, 497, 94 Cal. 180; First Nat. Bank of San Jose v. Menke, 60 Pac. 675, 677, 128 Cal. 103.

DEVOTE.

Const. § 267, providing that no person shall hold an office of profit without personally "devoting his time" to the performance of the duties thereof, should be reasonably construed as requiring the official to give his own time and personal services to the performance of the duties of his office, but does not prohibit a temporary absence from public office, where such absence is not detrimental to its interests and does not evidence neglect of official duty. Fairley v. Western Union Tel. Co., 18 South. 796, 797, 73 Miss. 6.

The words "devoted solely to the appropriate objects of the institution," in Code, § 797, exempting from taxation property of religious institutions which is devoted solely to the appropriate objects of the institution, do not characterize a town lot held by a religious company under a deed of gift, containing no conditions, and which has not been used by the company for any of the purposes for which it is organized, and which the company has not determined to use in the future for any such purposes. Kirk v. St. Thomas' Church, 30 N. W. 569, 570, 70 Iowa, 287.

DHOLL.

A "dholl" is a round skein of yarn, wound together and tied up, about 30 inches long and 5 inches in diameter, thick at one end and narrow at the other. The Dunbritton (U. S.) 73 Fed. 352, 355, 19 C. C. A. 449.

DIABETES.

"Diabetes" is commonly known as a disease of the kidneys, though primarily a disease of nutrition, and not necessarily affecting their structure in its early stages. It is a very serious disease, of doubtful curability. New York Life Ins. Co. v. Fletcher, 6 Sup. Ct. 837, 840, 117 U. S. 519, 29 L. Ed. 934.

DIAGNOSIS.

A "diagnosis" is said to be little more than a guess, enlightened by experience. Swan v. Long Island R. Co., 29 N. Y. Supp. 337, 338, 79 Hun, 612 (citing Griswold v. New York Cent. & H. R. Co., 115 N. Y. 61, 64, 21 N. E. 726, 12 Am. St. Rep. 775).

DIAMONDS.

"Diamonds," as used in Tariff Act August 27, 1894, par. 467, covers only miners', glaziers', and engravers' diamonds not set, and does not include any other diamonds cut but not set. United States v. Frankel (U. S.) 68 Fed. 186, 188.

DICTATE—DICTATION.

In a technical sense, "dictation" means to pronounce orally what is destined to be written at the same time by another. Prendergast v. Prendergast, 16 La. Ann. 219, 220, 79 Am. Dec. 575.

To "dictate," as defined by 5 Foultier, 350, is to present, word by word, what is designed to be written by another; hence he concludes that a will cannot be made by signs or interrogations. This able writer does not say what, or whether any, variance is fatal. We know that there have been decisions in some courts of France requiring the utmost precision in the amanuensis, but we are not to adopt this doctrine in its utmost extent. It is desirable to have, as much as possible, every word taken down from the testator's mouth; but we cannot adopt the unqualified proposition that the slightest variance is fatal, as, for example, the substitution of the pronoun "which" instead of "that." Hamilton v. Hamilton (La.) 6 Mart. (N. S.) 143, 145.

A person cannot be said to have written a will at the dictation of another when he did not understand the language of such other, but receives his instructions from the testator through an interpreter. Bordelon's Heirs v. Baron's Heirs, 11 La. Ann. 676, 679.

To "dictate to" is to tell another what to write; to indict; to teach; to show another something with authority; to declare with confidence; and a "dictator" is one whose credit or authority enables him to direct the opinion or conduct of another. If a son had such power and authority over his father as to be able to direct him how to make his will, and exerted that power to cause him to make a will in which the son is the principal legatee, it was the use of undue influence, and would destroy the will. Marshall v. Flinn, 49 N. C. 199, 205.

DICTION.

A "dictum" is an opinion expressed by the court, but which, not being necessarily involved in the case, lacks the force of an adjudication. Rush v. French, 25 Pac. 816, 825, 826, 1 Ariz. 99; In re Woodruff (U. S.) 96 Fed. 317, 321; State v. Clarke, 3 Nev. 566, 572.

"Dicta" are opinions of a judge which do not embody the resolution or determination of the court, and made without argument or full consideration of the point, are not the professed deliberate determinations of the judge himself; obiter dicta are such opinions uttered by the way, not upon the point in question pending, as if turning aside for the time from the main topic of the case to collateral subjects. Robrbach v. Germania Fire Ins. Co., 62 N. Y. 47, 20 Am. Rep. 451; Brown v. Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co., 78 N. W. 771, 772, 102 Wis. 137, 44 L. R. A. 579.

Where a judge who writes the opinion of the court expresses a view upon any point or principle which he is not required to decide, his opinion as to such point or principle is obiter dictum. Hart v. Stribling, 25 Fla. 433, 435, 6 South. 455; L. Bucki & Son Lumber Co. v. Fidelity & Deposit Co. (U. S.) 109 Fed. 393, 400, 48 C. C. A. 436.

"According to the more rigid rule," says Bouvier, "an expression of an opinion, however deliberate, upon a question, however fully argued, if not essential to the disposition that was made of the case, may be regarded as a dictum. But it is, on the other hand, difficult to see why, from a philosophical point of view, the opinion of the court is not as persuasive, on all the points which were involved in the cause, that it was the duty of the counsel to argue them, and which were deliberately passed over by the court, as if the decision had hung upon but one point." Such dictum, if it is a dictum, should be regarded as a "judicial dictum," in contradistinction to mere "obiter dictum"; that is, an expression originating with the judge alone, while passing by the way, in writing an opinion, as an argument or illustration drawn from some collateral question. Mere obiter dicta are not always reprehensible; on the contrary, some of the most sacred canons of the common law had their origin in the mere dicta of some wise judge. To be valuable, however, they must of course be right. An opinion of an appellate court, to be of value to a trial court, must deal with the facts presented and the questions involved and discussed at the bar, even though some of them are only indirectly involved in the determination of the question upon which the case turns, so that an expression of the court, while dealing with the case in this way, cannot be regarded as mere obiter dictum. Buchner v. Chicago, M. & N. W. Ry. Co., 19 N. W. 56, 57, 58, 60 Wis. 264.

It frequently happens that, when assigning its opinion on a question before it, the court discusses collateral questions and expresses decided opinions on them. Such opinions, however, are frequently given without much reflection, and without previous argument at the bar; and, moreover, they do not enter into the adjudication of the point before the court. They have only that authority which may be accorded to the opinions, more or less deliberate, of the individual judge who announces it. Rush v. French, 25 Pac. 816, 825, 826, 1 Ariz. 99.

The Supreme Court of the United States has held that, in order to make an opinion a decision, there must have been an application of a judicial mind to the precise question necessary to be determined to fix the rights of the parties. Thus where in an opinion it is stated, while, in view of what has been stated above, it may be unnecessary at present to determine the next question raised in this case, as it is one of great importance and will frequently arise, it may as well be decided now as hereafter, the statement of law which follows will be treated as a dictum. In re Woodruff (U. S.) 96 Fed. 317, 321.

The fact that a decision might have been put upon a different ground, existing in the case, does not place it in the category of a dictum. Clark v. Thomas, 51 Tenn. (4 Heisk.) 419, 421.

It cannot be said that a decision of the court on a certain point is dictum, where that point was properly presented and decided in the regular course of the consideration of the case, merely because something else was found in the end which disposed of the whole matter. Therefore where, in an action by a railroad company for a default in the payment of interest on the companies' bonds received by the state in exchange for state bonds, the company set up the unconstitutionality of the exchange of the bonds, and the court decided that there was statutory authority for such exchange, such decision was not dictum, though the suit was eventually dismissed on entirely different grounds. Florida Cent. R. Co. v. Schutte, 103 U. S. 118, 143, 26 L. Ed. 327.

Where a question was presented and discussed in a case, and the opinion of the court or the majority of the court expressed on it, which question was presented by the instructions, the opinion was not obiter dictum, though the decision of such question might have been omitted. It frequently happens that the decision of a single point in a case will determine the affirmance or reversal of the judgment in that case, but it does not follow that the court may not proceed to examine and decide other points which the record presents; and indeed the latter course is more satisfactory to all parties concerned, and saves the necessity of again resorting to the inferior court. Kane v. McCown, 55 Mo. 181, 199.

The mere dictum of a judge is not the decision of a court. There is nothing authoritative in a case except what is required to be decided to reach the final judgment, and what, by the judgment, becomes res adjudicata between the parties as to the subject-matter of the suit. Love v. Miller, 53 Ind. 294, 21 Am. Rep. 192. "An obiter dictum is a gratuitous opinion, an individual impertinence, which, whether it be wise or foolish, right or wrong, bindeth none, not even the lips that utter it. Old Judge"—taken from the title-page of a work on "Obiter Dicta," published by John D. Allen; New York, 1885. Hart v. Stribling, 6 South. 455, 456, 25 Fla. 433.

DIE.

A die is a piece of metal on which is cut a device which by pressure is to be placed upon some softer body. Rubber Coated Harness Trimming Co. v. Welling, 97 U. S. 7, 10, 24 L. Ed. 942.

DIE BY THE HAND OF JUSTICE.

"'Death by the hands of justice' is a well-known phrase, denoting an execution, either public or private, of a person convicted of crime, in any form allowed by law. The moral guilt of the party executed has nothing to do with the definition. Socrates, though he took the poison from his own hand, 'died by the hands of justice' in this sense of the term." Breasted v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co., 8 N. Y. (4 Seld.) 299, 303, 59 Am. Dec. 482.

To "die by the hands of justice" is dying by the execution of the sentence of the law. Harper's Adm'r v. Phoenix Ins. Co., 19 Mo. 506, 507.

To "die by the hands of justice," as used in a life policy wherein it is provided that the same shall be void if the insured die by the hands of justice, means to die by some judicial sentence imposed for the commission of some felony. Spruill v. North Carolina Mut. Life Ins. Co., 46 N. C. 126, 127.

DIE BY HIS OWN HAND OR ACT.

Accidental self-destruction.

Accidental or unintentional self-killing is not within a condition forfeiting a policy for taking one's own life. Keels v. Mutual Reserve Fund Life Ass'n (U. S.) 29 Fed. 198, 201.

A contract of insurance, providing that the policy should be void in case the assured should die by his own hands, should be so construed as to excuse any such cases as accident or delirium, and to cases in which the self-destruction is clearly shown to have been accidental or involuntary. Van Zandt v. Mutual Ben. Life Ins. Co., 55 N. Y. 169, 177, 14 Am. Rep. 215.

A condition in a policy of life insurance that it shall be void if the insured shall "die by his own hand" has no application where the insured killed himself by accident, or if the insured destroys his life while of unsound mind, if his mind is so impaired by disease that he does not comprehend the wrong character of the deed, though he may have sufficient mental capacity to know the physical consequences of the act. Michigan Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Naugle, 29 N. E. 393, 395, 130 Ind. 79.

A life policy providing that it shall be void if the assured "die by his own hand" means a criminal act of self-destruction, where the mind and hand concur in producing death. It refers to the voluntary, sane act of the assured. Considering the condition avoiding the policy in case the insured die by his own hand literally, it would include a death caused by his own hand even by accident or mistake, as in case of an accidental discharge of a firearm while held by him, or the taking by mistake of poison under the belief that it was proper medicine. Scheffer v. National Life Ins. Co., 25 Minn. 534, 536.

The phrase "die by his own hand," as used in a policy of life insurance providing that in case the insured should die by his own hand the policy should be void, is synonymous with "suicide," and does not include suicide by an insane man in a fit of insanity. It means a felonious death, a case of felo de se, and not a case of death without legal or moral blame—the result of accident, mistake, or disease. The madman, who in a fit of delirium commits suicide, as much dies by his own hand as does the individual who accidentally and unintentionally takes his own life. They each die by their own hands, but without moral responsibility or legal blame. One is no more within the conditions of the policy than the other. The phrase "die by his own hand" may include all cases of death by the person on whose life the policy is effected, or it may receive limitations. The authorities concur in this, that the expression does not embrace all cases of death by one's own hand. If the insured kill himself by drinking poison, not being aware that it was poison, or by snapping a loaded pistol, ignorant that it was loaded, or by leaping from a window in the delirium of a fever, it is conceded that he did not die by his own hand within the meaning of the clause under consideration, though he might literally die by his own hand; that is, by his own act. Eastabrook v. Union Mut.

Life Ins. Co., 54 Me. 224, 225, 89 Am. Dec. 743.

In an action on a life policy which provided that the policy should be void "if the assured shall die by his own hand or act," he having hanged himself, the court said: "It is now too well settled to admit of question that this clause is not to be construed as comprehending every possible case in which life is taken by the party's own act. For instance, all the authorities concur in the view that an unintentional or accidental taking of life is not within the meaning and intention of the clause. Thus if, by inadvertence or accident, a party shoots himself with a gun or pistol, or takes poison by mistake, or in a sudden frenzy or delusion tears a bandage from a wound and bleeds to death, in the literal sense of the term he "dies by his own act"; yet all the decisions agree that a reasonable construction of the proviso, according to the plain and obvious intention of the parties, would exclude such cases from its operation. * * * Knickerbocker Life Ins. Co. v. Peters, 42 Md. 414, 417, 421.

A policy of insurance providing that it should be void if the insured should "die by his own hand" means voluntary and intentional self-destruction by the insured, but has no application to a case in which death resulted from accident, or without intention or expectation, even though it was caused by the hand of the accused. Death resulting from accident, or from an act which, at the time it was entered on or engaged in, was not expected or intended to produce that result, cannot be said to be within the meaning of the policy. Where, from a cause over which the insured had no control, a state of mental and physical weakness resulted, and while in that state he took an overdraft of whisky, without any expectation or intention of destroying his life, he did not "die by his own hand," but by accident. Northwestern Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Hazlett, 4 N. E. 582, 585, 105 Ind. 212, 55 Am. Rep. 192.

A policy containing a condition avoiding it in case the insured should "die by his own hand or act, voluntary or otherwise," is not avoided by a death purely accidental, caused by poison taken by the insured through mistake or ignorance, he being sane at the time. Penfold v. Universal Life Ins. Co., 85 N. Y. 317, 320, 39 Am. Rep. 600.

"By his own hand," as used in a policy of insurance, providing that it should be void if the assured should die by his own hand within two years from the date of the policy, does not mean death by accident. There must be an intent to commit suicide, even though it be but the intent of a drunken man. Equitable Life Assur. Soc. v. Paterson, 41 Ga. 338, 367, 5 Am. Rep. 535.

The clause "die by his own act," as used in a policy exempting the insurer from liability if the insured should die by his own act, is limited to the deliberate act of the insured in ending his own existence, or committing any unlawful malicious act, the consequences of which is his own death. The insured must be of years of discretion and in his senses when committing such act, as "it would be unreasonable to interpret it as including death by accident or by mistake, though the direct or immediate act of the insured may have contributed to it." Supreme Commander of the Knights of the Golden Rule v. Ainsworth, 71 Ala. 436, 448, 46 Am. Rep. 332.

Self-destruction while insane.

A life insurance policy providing that there should be no liability in case assured should "die by his own hand" means an intentional suicide while assured is in full possession of his mental faculties, and a person who ends his life under the influence of an insane impulse which he has not the power to resist, or commits the act without a knowledge at the time of its moral character and its consequences and effects, does not "die by his own hand" within the meaning of the policy. Waters v. Connecticut Mut. Life Ins. Co. (U. S.) 2 Fed. 892; Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Terry, 82 U. S. (15 Wall.) 580, 590, 21 L. Ed. 236; Terry v. Life Ins. Co. (U. S.) 23 Fed. Cas. 856, 857; Manhattan Life Ins. Co. v. Broughton, 3 Sup. Ct. 99 104, 109 U. S. 121, 27 L. Ed. 878; Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Leubrie (U. S.) 71 Fed. 843, 844, 18 C. C. A. 332 (citing Bigelow v. Berkshire Life Ins. Co., 93 U. S. 284, 23 L. Ed. 918; Charter Oak Life Ins. Co. v. Rodel, 95 U. S. 232, 24 L. Ed. 433; Accident Ins. Co. v. Crandal, 120 U. S. 527, 7 Sup. Ct. 685, 30 L. Ed. 740); Connecticut Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Akens, 14 Sup. Ct. 155, 156, 150 U. S. 468, 37 L. Ed. 1148; Breasted v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co., 8 N. Y. (4 Seld.) 299, 304, 59 Am. Dec. 482; De Gogorza v. Knickerbocker Life Ins. Co., 65 N. Y. 232, 235; Mutual Ben. Life Ins. Co. v. Davless' Ex'r, 9 S. W. 812, 815, 87 Ky. 541; St. Louis Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Graves, 69 Ky. (6 Bush) 268, 269; Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Walden (Tex.) 26 S. W. 1012, 1013; Schultz v. Insurance Co., 40 Ohio St. 217, 223, 48 Am. Rep. 676; Knickerbocker Life Ins. Co. v. Peters, 42 Md. 414, 417, 421; New Home Life Ass'n v. Hagler, 29 Ill. App. 437, 439; Eastabrook v. Union Mut. Life Ins. Co., 54 Me. 224, 225, 89 Am. Dec. 743; Cooper v. Massachusetts Mut. Life Ins. Co., 102 Mass. 227, 230, 3 Am. Rep. 451; Blackstone v. Standard Life & Accident Ins. Co., 42 N. W. 156, 160, 161, 74 Mich. 592, 3 L. R. A. 486; Scheffer v. National Life Ins. Co., 25 Minn. 534, 536.

The words "die by his own hand," in a policy exempting the insurer from liability in case the insured die by his own hand, if literally construed, import death caused by the act of the assured, whether intentional or accidental. Some relaxation of their strict sense, however, is required, by the nature of the contract, to effectuate the intention and object of the parties, but no qualification not necessary to this end is warrantable. They are intended to protect the insurer against the consequences of the physical act of the deceased. They refer distinctly to the physical agency by which death may be caused, and only by implication quite speculative to the moral sensibility of the agent. Their sense, then, is entirely satisfied by explaining them as describing an act of the assured resulting in his death as an intended consequence of it, irrespective of his understanding its moral nature. Adopting the language of Erskine, J., in Borradaile v. Hunter, 5 Man. & G. 639, it seems to me that the only qualification that the literal interpretation of the words with reference to the nature of the contract will permit is that the act of self-destruction should be the voluntary and willful act of the assured, having at the time sufficient power of mind and reason to understand the physical nature and consequence of such act, and having at the time a purpose and intention to cause his own death by that act; and that the question whether at the time he was capable of understanding and appreciating the moral nature and quality of his purpose is not relevant to the inquiry, further than to illustrate the extent of his capacity to understand the physical character of the act itself. The proviso exempts the insurers from liability when life is destroyed by the act of the party insured, although it may be distinctly traced as the result of a diseased mind, if the insured committed self-destruction, intending to destroy his life, and comprehending the physical nature and consequences of his act. Nimick v. Mutual Ben. Life Ins. Co., 3 Pittsb. R. 293-295, 18 Fed. Cas. 247, 248.

In a policy of life insurance providing that the policy should be void in case the assured should die by his own hand, the words "die by his own hand," should be construed in their largest ordinary sense, which comprehends all cases of self-destruction. Where the assured voluntarily threw himself into the water, knowing at the time that he should thereby destroy his life, and intending thereby to do so, but at the time of committing the act he was not capable of judging between right and wrong, he "died by his own hand" within the meaning of the policy. Borradaile v. Hunter, 44 Eng. Com. Law, 335, 352.

"By his own hand," as used in an insurance policy providing that the insurer should not be liable in case the insured should die by his own hand, meant an act of self-destruction, sane or insane. Dean v. American Mut. Life Ins. Co., 86 Mass. (4 Allen) 96, 98.

Suicide synonymous.

"The authorities uniformly treat the terms 'suicide' and 'dying by one's own hand' in policies of life insurance as synonymous, and the popular understanding accords with this interpretation. Chief Justice Tindall in Borradaile v. Hunter, 5 Man. & G. 668, says the expression 'dying by his own hand' is in fact no more than the translation into English of the word of Latin origin 'suicide.' Life insurance companies indiscriminately use either phrase as conveying the same idea. If the words 'shall commit suicide,' standing alone in the policy, import self-murder, so do the words 'shall die by his own hand.' " Bigelow v. Berkshire Life Ins. Co., 93 U. S. 284, 286, 23 L. Ed. 918; Moore v. Connecticut Mut. Life Ins. Co. (U. S.) 17 Fed. Cas. 672, 673; Keels v. Mutual Reserve Fund Life Ass'n (U. S.) 29 Fed. 198, 201. See, also, Spruill v. Northwestern Mut. Korneman, 63 Pac. 292, 293, 10 Kan. App. 577; Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Wiswell, 44 Pac. 996, 998, 56 Kan. 765, 35 L. R. A. 258 (citing Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Terry, 82 U. S. Rep. 192; Equitable Life Assur. Soc. v. Paterson, 41 Ga. 338, 367, 5 Am. Rep. 535); Blackstone v. Standard Life & Accident Ins. Co., 42 N. W. 156, 160, 161, 74 Mich. 592, 3 L. R. A. 496; Cooper v. Massachusetts Mut. Life Ins. Co., 102 Mass. 227, 229, 3 Am. Rep. 451; Eastabrook v. Union Mut. Life Ins. Co., 54 Me. 224, 226, 89 Am. Dec. 743; Phadenhauer v. Germania Life Ins. Co., 54 Tenn. (7 Heisk.) 567, 570, 19 Am. Rep. 623.

The clause "die by his own hand," as used in a life insurance policy, includes any form of suicide. Ritter v. Mutual Life Ins. Co., 18 Sup. Ct. 300, 306, 169 U. S. 139, 42 L. Ed. 693.

"Death by his own hand," as used in an insurance policy providing that it should be void if the insured should die by his own hand, includes committing suicide by taking poison. Bachmeyer v. Mutual Reserve Fund Life Ass'n, 52 N. W. 101, 103, 82 Wis. 255.

"By his own hand," as used in a condition of a policy of life insurance that it shall be void if a party shall die by his own hand, means suicide by any means, and includes the case of suicide by swallowing arsenic. Hartman v. Keystone Ins. Co., 21 Pa. (9 Harris) 466, 479.

DIE BY HIS OWN HAND OR ACT, SANE OR INSANE.

Where a life policy provides that it shall be void if the insured "die by his own hand, sane or insane," it covers all cases of self-destruction, whether felonious or not, and relieves the company from liability, though the suicide is the result of insanity, or in itself an insane act. Streeter v. Western Union Life & Accident Soc. of the United States, 31 N. W. 779, 780, 65 Mich. 199, 8 Am. St. Rep. 882.

The term "death by his own hand or act, sane or insane," in a condition in a life policy that the policy shall be void in case of the death of insured by his own hand or act, sane or insane, includes his death by suicide, though insane at the time of the commission of the act. Northwestern Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Maguire, 19 Ohio Cir. Ct. R. 562, 563.

In a policy of life insurance providing that in case of the death of the insured "by his own act or intention, whether sane or insane," the company shall only be liable for the net value of the policy at that time, the clause "by his own act or intention," etc., is equivalent to the words "by his own hand." Adkins v. Columbia Life Ins. Co., 70 Mo. 27, 28, 35 Am. Rep. 410.

Under a policy providing that it should be void if insured "die by his own act, sane or insane," there can be no recovery if insured took his life when he had mind enough to know that the act by which he did so would probably result in his death, and he committed it with the intention that it should do so, though he may not, from mental derangement, have known that the act was wrong, and may not have had power to resist the impulse. Manhattan Life Ins. Co. v. Beard, 66 S. W. 35, 36, 23 Ky. Law Rep. 1747, 1750, 112 Ky. 455.

In an action on a life policy providing that if insured should die by his own hand or act, sane or insane, the policy should be void, the court said: "We are to say from these words what the parties must have intended, and we cannot properly say that additional words having no meaning were inserted in the contract, and if they mean anything it is just what the words commonly import, and that is, if death ensues from any physical movement of the hand or body of the assured, proceeding from a partial or total eclipse of the mind, the insurer may go free. We are not altogether unmindful of the force of the proposition that a man does not die by his own hand who has not sufficient mind to will his own death, and it is not, perhaps, entirely easy to see in what precise words in our language the idea may be accurately and artistically expressed that a totally insane man may take his own life. But the question seems to involve more the refinement of language than the application of practical sense, and we are of opinion that, in the common judgment of mankind, it will be considered that, when a totally insane man blows his brains out with a pistol, he will be said to have 'died by his own hand,' within the meaning of a policy such as we have now under consideration." De Gogorza v. Knickerbocker Life Ins. Co., 65 N. Y. 232, 241, 242.

DIE BY SUICIDE.

See "Suicide."

DIE BY SUICIDE, SANE OR INSANE.

DIE BY SUICIDE, VOLUNTARY OR INVOLUNTARY.

See "Suicide Voluntary or Involuntary."

DIE IN CONSEQUENCE OF VIOLATION OF LAW.

An exception in a policy that the company shall not be liable if insured shall "die in or in consequence of the violation of any criminal law" would not include death of the insured by suicide committed in order to escape arrest for violation of a criminal law. Kerr v. Minnesota Mut. Ben. Ass'n, 39 N. W. 312, 313, 39 Minn. 174, 12 Am. St. Rep. 631.

As used in a life policy containing a clause to the effect that the policy should be void if the assured should die in consequence of the violation of any law, the phrase "in consequence of the violation of any law" meant in consequence of the commission of any crime, the character of which directly increased the risk, although the crime might be below the grade of a felony. Wolff v. Connecticut Mut. Life Ins. Co., 5 Mo. App. 236, 244.

An exception in a policy of life insurance that it should be void if the insured should "die in consequence of the violation of the laws" of any nation, state, or province, should be construed to include the dying from a shot from a pistol in the hands of a person upon whom the insured and his brother had committed a violent assault, even though the pistol might have been accidentally discharged. Murray v. New York Life Ins. Co., 96 N. Y. 614, 616, 48 Am. Rep. 658.

DIE IN KNOWN VIOLATION OF LAW.

The term "known violation of any law," in a life policy containing a clause that the policy shall be void in case insured shall die in a known violation of any law of the state, or of the United States, or any foreign country, means while engaged in a criminal act, known by him at the time to be a crime against the laws of such state or country. Cluff v. Mutual Ben. Life Ins. Co., 95 Mass. (13 Allen) 308, 317.

Where a life policy provides that the same shall be void if the insured "die in the known violation of any law," such phrase means that the policy is to be void if death occur by reason of the violation of law. It cannot be construed to mean that the policy is to be avoided by the mere fact that at the time of the death the insured was violating the law, if the death occurred from some cause other than such violation. Bradley v. Mutual Ben. Life Ins. Co., 45 N. Y. 422, 428, 6 Am. Rep. 115.

A life policy which provided it should be void if the assured should die in a duel, or by the hand of justice, in the commission of a felony, or in the "known violation of the law" of a state, meant a death in the commission of the felony. Harper's Adm'r v. Phoenix Ins. Co., 19 Mo. 506, 511.

"Die in known violation of law," as used in a life insurance policy conditioned that it was avoided if the assured died in the known violation of a law of the state, did not include the death of insured which resulted from a quarrel, unless his slayer was excusable. Harper's Adm'r v. Phoenix Ins. Co., 18 Mo. 109, 110.

Where insured came to his death by a wound received by him in an encounter between himself and another in which pistols loaded with powder and balls were fired by each party at the other, if insured's firing off his pistol was done in lawful defense of his person, when there was reasonable cause for him to apprehend design on the part of the other to do him a great personal injury, and also to apprehend immediate danger of such design being accomplished, then insured did not come to his death in "known violation of the law of the land," within the meaning of a clause in the policy "that in case he should die in the known violation of any law of this state, or of the United States, or of any government where he may be, this policy shall be void and of no effect." A killing under such circumstances, under the statutes of Missouri, would be justifiable homicide, and not a "violation of the law" within the meaning of the policy. Overton v. St. Louis Mut. Life Ins. Co., 39 Mo. 122, 124, 90 Am. Dec. 455.

Under a policy providing that it shall be forfeited in case the assured shall die while engaged in a known "violation of law," a known violation of a positive law, whether a civil or a criminal one, avoids the policy if the natural and reasonable consequences of the violation increase the risk. A violation of law, whether the law is a civil or a criminal one, does not avoid the policy if the natural and reasonable consequences of the act do not increase the risk. An assault and battery upon the person of the wife of another, violently beating, bruising, or choking her, is a known violation of law. Bloom v. Franklin Life Ins. Co., 97 Ind. 478, 484, 49 Am. Rep. 469.

DIE INTESSTATE.

"Dying intestate" means dying without making a valid and operative disposition of one's property by will. Newton v. Griffith (Md.) 1 Har. & G. 111, 131.

DIE LEAVING ISSUE.

The words "leaving issue" in a will, when used in reference to realty, mean leaving issue at the time of death. Downing v. Wherrin, 19 N. H. 2, 86, 49 Am. Dec. 139.

The phrase "if he shall leave issue" is uniformly construed to mean an indefinite failure of issue, unless there be something in the context to qualify the expression. George v. Morgan, 16 Pa. (4 Harris) 95, 107.

The words "die leaving issue," as used in a will making a gift to certain daughters for life, and providing that if such daughters, or either of them, should die leaving issue, the share of such daughter so dying should go to and be equally divided among such issue, and the lawful issue of such as may be dead, naturally and necessarily means issue surviving at the time of the daughter's death. Appeal of Woelpper, 17 Atl. 870, 872, 126 Pa. 562.

A provision in a will that, if any of testator's children should die leaving issue or lawful heirs, such issue or heirs should receive their parents' portion, refers to a death in the testator's lifetime, and not afterwards. Livingston v. Greene, 52 N. Y. 118, 124; Phelps v. Robbins, 40 Conn. 250, 251.

DIE LEAVING NO DESCENDANTS.

A will provided finally that, should either of testator's sons die leaving no legal descendants, then and in that event all the property which should have been his, if living, should go to and become the property of the survivor and his legal descendants, and the property of the survivors of the trustees mentioned. Held, that the words "die leaving no legal descendants" are not used in their technical sense, in which they are held to import an indefinite failure of issue; but, when construed with the whole clause, mean a dying of one son without legal descendants during the life of the other, so that the estate devised will take effect on the death of one and during the lifetime of the other. Armstrong v. Douglass, 14 S. W. 604, 605, 89 Tenn. (5 Pickle) 219, 10 L. R. A. 85.

DIE SEISED.

A will giving to one person certain property, "and all other property of which I shall die seised," passes a life insurance under a certificate payable "to the devisees, or, if no will, to the heirs," though nearly if not all of the property of the insured, except the insurance, is specifically named in the bequest. Aveling v. Northwestern Masonic Aid Ass'n, 40 N. W. 28, 29, 72 Mich. 9, 1 L. R. A. 528.

DIE UNMARRIED OR WITHOUT ISSUE.

It has long been regarded as an established law in Pennsylvania that such words as "in case of his death, unmarried or without issue," as used in a will, are equivalent to simply dying without issue, unless there is something else in the case to warrant a different construction of the will. Barber v. Pittsburgh, Ft. W. & C. R. Co., 166 U. S. 83, 106, 17 Sup. Ct. 488, 41 L. Ed. 925.

DIE WITHOUT CHILDREN.

A devise to one, but, in case he should "die without children," then over, means "die without children living at the time of his death." Morgan v. Morgan (Conn.) 5 Day, 517, 523; Barney v. Arnold, 23 Atl. 45, 15 R. I. 78; Fairchild v. Crane, 13 N. J. Eq. (2 Beasl.) 105, 107; Parish's Heirs v. Ferris, 6 Ohio St. 563, 574, 575.

Where a will bequeathed certain property to the testator's son, to be put on interest for his benefit until he should arrive at the age of 21 years, and that, in case he should "die having no children," then the property should go to certain beneficiaries, the devise over was on the condition of the son's dying under 21 years of age and without issue. Van Houten's Ex'rs v. Pennington, 8 N. J. Eq. (4 Halst. Ch.) 745, 746.

The term "die without children," in a will devising property to testator's son, but directing that if he die without children or their legal representatives the property shall be divided, etc., is to be construed to mean living children. Bullock v. Seymour, 33 Conn. 289, 293.

The words "die without children," as used in a will, mean die in the lifetime of the testator without children. McCormick v. McElligot, 17 Atl. 896, 898, 127 Pa. 230, 14 Am. St. Rep. 837.

Unless a different purpose be plainly expressed in the instrument, every limitation in a deed or will contingent upon a person dying "without heirs," or "without children" or "issue," or other words of like import, shall be construed as a limitation to take effect when such person shall die, unless the object on which the contingency is made to depend is then living, or, if a child of his body, such child be born within 10 months next thereafter. Ky. St. 1903, § 2344.

An absolute devise, followed by a proviso that, if the devisee "die without children, grandchildren, or wife living," the estate shall go over, carries the fee to the devisee if he survive the testator, inasmuch as the limiting words will be taken to refer to the devisee's death in the lifetime of the testator, unless a contrary intention appears. King v. Frick, 135 Pa. 575, 19 Atl. 951, 952, 20 Am. St. Rep. 889.

DIE WITHOUT HAVING CHILDREN.

"Having" as used in a will reciting, after giving and bequeathing a certain house and money to a daughter, that in the event of her dying without "having" any lawful issue such house and money should go to certain others, is capable of two meanings: When applied to realty, it means a general, indefinite failure of issue; when applied to personalty, it means leaving at the time of the death. Cole v. Goble, 13 C. B. 444, 455, 20 Eng. Law & Eq. 234, 237; Downing v. Wherrin, 19 N. H. 2, 86, 49 Am. Dec. 139; Harris v. Smith, 16 Ga. 545, 548.

As used in a will leaving a leasehold estate to a certain daughter, but, if she died without having children, that it should then go to another, etc., "having" does not mean leaving, so that such other person is not entitled to such leasehold in the event of such daughter's ever having had any child, though it dies before her decease. Weakley v. Rugg, 7 Term R. 322, 328.

DIE WITHOUT HAVING ISSUE.

The text-books lay down the general rule that where a devise is to one and his heirs, with a devise over "if he die without issue" or "without having issue," and with no explanatory words defining the time to which this contingency is to apply, it will be construed to be a general failure of issue at any time, however indefinite or remote, and which may not, therefore, happen for many generations. But the decisions upon this subject are exceedingly arbitrary, and without much foundation in reason or common sense. Hence courts will seize hold of slight circumstances to give to executory devises a construction which regards the failure of issue as relating to a definite period of time. The construction of the words as importing an indefinite failure of issue will give way to any explanatory words in the context which can be interpreted as fixing the time of the failure at the death of the first taker. Strain v. Sweeny, 45 N. E. 201, 202, 163 Ill. 603.

It has been long settled that the words occurring in a will referring to the death of a person without issue, whether the terms be "if he die without issue," or "if he have no issue," or "if he die before he has issue," or "for want of or in default of issue," unexplained by the context, and whether applied to real or personal estate, are construed to import a general indefinite failure of issue. The rule, in the language of Lord Redesdale, is that technical words shall have their legal effect, unless from subsequent inconsistent words it is very clear that the testator meant otherwise, or unless, in the language of Lord Alvaney, in Coole v. Coole, 3 Bos. & P. 620, the intent appears so plainly to the contrary that no one can misunderstand it. As to personalty, it seems the word "issue" yields more readily to expressions and circumstances in a will tending to confine it to the restricted sense, than when applied to real estate. Tinsley v. Jones (Va.) 13 Grat. 289, 292.

DIE WITHOUT HEIRS.

The terms "die without issue," "die without leaving issue," and "die without heirs lawfully begotten," are synonymous. Moody v. Walker, 3 Ark. 147, 198.

A will providing that, in case the daughter of the testatrix should "die without heirs," the estate devised to her should vest in others named, should be construed to mean without issue. Kent v. Armstrong, 6 N. J. Eq. (2 Halst. Ch.) 637, 640 (citing Cro. Jac. 415; 3 Lev. 17; 1 P. Wms. 23; 2 Saund. 288, a, b); Niles v. Gray, 12 Ohio St. 320, 328.

As indefinite failure of issue.

The words "die without heirs" import an indefinite failure of heirs, in contradistinction to a failure or extinction within some specified period, which is called a "definite failure of heirs." Gambrell v. Forest Grove Lodge, 5 Atl. 548, 549, 66 Md. 17; Watkins v. Quarles, 23 Ark. 179, 192; Seaman v. Harvey (N. Y.) 16 Hun, 71, 75.

Unless a different purpose be plainly expressed in the instrument, every limitation in a deed or will contingent upon a person dying "without heirs," or "without children" or "issue," or other words of like import, shall be construed as a limitation to take effect when such person shall die, unless the object on which the contingency is made to depend is then living, or, if a child of his body, such child be born within 10 months next thereafter. Ky. St. 1903, § 2344.

In a limitation of real or personal property by deed, will, or other instrument in writing, the words "die without issue," or "die without leaving issue," or "have no issue," or "die without heirs of the body," or other words importing either a want or failure of issue of any person in his lifetime or at the time of his death, or an indefinite failure of his issue, shall, unless a contrary intention clearly appears by the instrument creating such limitation, mean a want or failure of issue in the lifetime or at the time of the death of such person, and not an indefinite failure of his issue. Rev. Laws Mass. 1902, p. 1268, c. 134, § 5.

A devise to a daughter, but in case she should "die without any legitimate heirs," then over, means a definite, and not an indefinite, failure of issue, and is to be construed as if the words "living at the time of her death" had been added after the words "legitimate heirs." Niles v. Gray, 12 Ohio St. 320, 328.

A will providing that, if a beneficiary should "die without an heir before he shall arrive to the age of 21 years," what was bequeathed to him should be divided among his brothers and sisters, should be construed to mean a definite failure of issue, and vests the first taker with a fee simple. Lippett v. Hopkins (U. S.) 15 Fed. Cas. 567, 568.

"A devise, 'If either of my sons John and Jacob should happen to die without any lawful heirs of their own, then the share of him who may first decease shall accrue to the other survivor and his heirs,' should be construed to provide for a definite failure of issue, and that each son took an estate in fee simple conditional, and not an estate tail. It seems to me that the natural construction is, and the real meaning of this testator was, that, if one of these sons should die without issue in the lifetime of the other, the other was to have the whole. If this contingency should not happen, the testator desired to make no further provision on the subject. The best opinion I have been able to form is that, by way of executory devise, the share of the son first dying without issue in the lifetime of the other was to go over to that survivor, and that, subject to this contingency, each took a fee simple." Abbott v. Essex Co. (U. S.) 1 Fed. Cas. 16, 20.

A testator devised certain land to his children in fee, and then added the following clause: "That if any of my said sons [naming them] or my daughter M. shall happen to die without heirs male of their own bodies, that then the land shall return to the survivors, to be equally divided between them." Held, that the devise over to the survivors showed that an indefinite failure of issue was not meant, and that the will should be construed to mean that, if any of the devisees named should die without leaving male issue at the time of his death, his portion should be divided among the survivors. Fosdick v. Cornell (N. Y.) 1 Johns. 440, 448, 452, 3 Am. Dec. 340.

As within lifetime of testator.

Where a future interest is limited by a grant to take effect on the death of any person "without heirs" or "heirs of his body," or "without issue," or in equivalent words, such words must be taken to mean successors, or issue living at the death of the person named as ancestor. Civ. Code Idaho 1901, § 2397.

A will providing for the division of property among testator's children, and, in case any of such children should "die without an heir of their body begotten," their part should be equally divided among the survivors or their heirs, should be construed as meaning the death of the legatee after that of the testator, and before the time for distribution, or when the legacy may be reduced to possession. Pool v. Benning, 48 Ky. (9 B. Mon.) 623.

Testator devised certain land to his wife for life, then to his son W. and his heirs forever. Another clause provided that, if any of his sons to whom he bequeathed property should die without "heirs of his body," the real estate so bequeathed should go to the surviving brother or brothers, and personalty to all the other heirs equally. Other provisions tended slightly to show that testator contemplated that his son should survive him. It was held that, construing all the clauses together, the word "die without heirs of his body" referred to death at any time before or after testator's death, and passed a conditional fee to W., determinable upon his death without lineal heirs. Summers v. Smith, 21 N. E. 191, 192, 127 Ill. 645.

DIE WITHOUT HEIRS AND INTESTATE.

Where a will devised property to a person to be possessed, enjoyed, and occupied by her and her heirs forever, but, if she should die without heirs and intestate, then that all the estate should vest in her brother, the words "without heirs and intestate" implied a power of control and disposition, so as to be inconsistent with and avoid the limitation over, and the devisee took an estate in fee. Armstrong v. Kent, 6 N. J. Eq. (2 Halst. Ch.) 559, 574.

DIE WITHOUT HEIRS LIVING.

"Dying without heirs living or surviving" is always held to import a definite failure of issue. Granger v. Granger, 46 N. E. 80, 84, 147 Ind. 95, 36 L. R. A. 190.

DIE WITHOUT ISSUE.

The terms "die without issue," "die without leaving issue," and "die without heirs lawfully begotten," are synonymous. Moody v. Walker, 3 Ark. (3 Pike) 147, 198.

A will which devised all the testator's estate to G. and his heirs forever, and afterwards provided that, if G. should die without issue who could inherit, the estate given to him in the will should be otherwise disposed of, is of the same effect as though the testator had said without "heirs of his body lawfully begotten," and the word "heirs," in the first devise, will be construed as intended for heirs of the body, G. taking an estate tail. Turrill v. Northrop, 51 Conn. 33, 36.

The words "without issue, that is, without heirs, being his own children lawfully begotten," have the same meaning as if only the words "without issue or without heirs of his body" had been used. The only effect of the use of the words "children lawfully begotten" was to qualify and restrict the meaning of the word "heirs" to the heirs of the body. Moore v. Gary, 48 N. E. 630, 632, 149 Ind. 51.

As indefinite failure of issue.

The term "die without issue," standing uninfluenced by other parts of the will, imports an indefinite failure of issue; that is, a failure not on the death of the first taker, but a failure when all his issue or descendants shall cease. Kent v. Armstrong, 6 N. J. Eq. (2 Halst.) 637, 638; Wardell v. Allaire, 20 N. J. Law (Spencer) 6, 9, 21; Condict's Ex'rs v. King, 13 N. J. Eq. (2 Beasl.) 375, 376; Trumbull v. Gibbons, 22 N. J. The words "die without issue" have been held to import an indefinite failure of issue, when applied to personalty as well as to realty. Chism's Adm'r v. Williams, 29 Mo. 288, 292; Davies' Adm'r v. Steel's Adm'r, 38 N. J. Eq. (11 Stew.) 168, 170; Moody v. Walker, 3 Ark. (3 Pike) 147, 198. But ordinarily they are construed to mean definite failure of issue, when so used. *Forth v. The statutory definition of the phrase "dying without issue" is dying without heirs or descendants of the first taker surviving him. 1 Rev. St. 724, § 22; Bowman v. Tallman, 25 N. Y. Super. Ct. (2 Rob.) 385, 401.

A will executed in New York contained the following clause: "I direct that, in case my daughter M. should die without issue, that my real and personal property should be possessed and enjoyed by my husband, R. P. W., and my sister, D. F., during their natural lives, and after their death the said real and personal property to be divided equally between my brothers H., J., F., and T., or their representatives, share and share alike; the devise over to my husband, sister, and brothers to depend upon my daughter M. dying without issue." Held, that M. took under her mother's will a base or conditional fee, defeasible by her dying without issue living at the time of her death, under the provisions of 1 Rev. St. 724, § 22, and that her issue, should she leave any, would take by inheritance from her, but a conveyance by her in her lifetime would be effectual as against them, and that an indefeasible title in fee could be conveyed, and the contingent expectant estate, limited to the husband, sister, and brothers of the testatrix in the event of M.'s dying without issue, cut off by their joining with her in a conveyance. In re

The text-books lay down the general rule that where a devise is to one and his heirs, with a devise over "if he die without issue," or "without having issue," and with no explanatory words defining the time to which this contingency is to apply, it will be construed to be a general failure of issue at any time, however indefinite or remote, and which may not, therefore, happen for many generations. But the decisions upon this subject are exceedingly arbitrary, and without much foundation in reason or common sense. Hence courts will seize hold of slight circumstances to give to executory devises a construction which regards the failure of issue as relating to a definite period of time. The construction of the words as importing an indefinite failure of issue will give way to any explanatory words in the context which can be interpreted as fixing the time of the failure at the death of the first taker. Strain v. Sweeny, 45 N. E. 201, 202, 163 Ill. 603.

It has been long settled that the words occurring in a will referring to the death of a person without issue, whether the terms be "if he die without issue," or "if he have no issue," or "if he die before he has issue," or "for want of or in default of issue," unexplained by the context, and whether applied to real or personal estate, are construed to import a general indefinite failure of issue. The rule, in the language of Lord Redesdale, is that technical words shall have their legal effect, unless from subsequent inconsistent words it is very clear that the testator meant otherwise, or unless, in the language of Lord Alvaney in Poole v. Poole, 3 Bos. & Pul. 620, the intent appears so plainly to the contrary that no one can misunderstand it. As to personalty, it seems the word "issue" yields more readily to expressions and circumstances in a will tending to confine it to the restricted sense, than when applied to real estate. Tinsley v. Jones (Va.) 13 Grat. 289, 292.

In Kentucky and Ohio the term "die without issue" is construed to import a definite failure, unless a contrary intention is plainly expressed in the will, or is necessary to carry out its undoubted purpose. Daniel v. Thomson, 53 Ky. (14 B. Mon.) 662, 708; Lewis v. Shropshire, 68 S. W. 426, 427, 24 Ky. Law Rep. 331; Birney v. Richardson, 35 Ky. (5 Dana) 424, 427; Armstrong v. Armstrong, 53 Ky. (14 B. Mon.) 333, 344; Moore v. Moore, 51 Ky. (12 B. Mon.) 651, 657; Brown's Heirs v. Brown's Devisees, 31 Ky. (1 Dana) 39, 41; McKay v. Merrifield, 53 Ky. (14 B. Mon.) 322; Brashear v. Macey, 26 Ky. (3 J. J. Marsh.) 89, 90; Lee v. Mumford, 44 S. W. 91, 19 Ky. Law Rep. 15, 85; Carter v. Reddish, 32 Ohio St. 1, 14; Parish's Heirs v. Ferris, 6 Ohio St. 563, 574, 575. The Kentucky statutory provision is as follows: "Unless a different purpose be plainly expressed in the instrument, every limitation in a deed or will contingent upon a person dying 'without heirs,' or without 'children' or 'issue,' or other words of like import, shall be construed a limitation to take effect when such person shall die, unless the object on which the contingency is made to depend is then living, or, if a child of his body, such child be born within ten months next thereafter." Ky. St. 1903, § 2344. In Massachusetts there is a similar statute, which is as follows: "In a limitation of real or personal property by deed, will or other instrument in writing, . . . the words 'die without issue,' or 'die without leaving issue,' or 'have no issue,' or 'die without heirs of the body,' or other words importing either a want or failure of issue of any person in his lifetime or at the time of his death, or an indefinite failure of his issue, shall, unless a contrary intention clearly appears by the instrument creating such limitation, mean a want or failure of issue in the lifetime or at the time of the death of such person, and not an indefinite failure of his issue." Rev. Laws Mass. 1902, p. 1268, c. 134, § 5. And in Maryland there is also a statutory provision: "In any deed of any real or personal estate, the words 'die without issue,' or 'die without leaving issue,' or 'have no issue,' or any other words which may import either a want or a failure of issue of any person in his lifetime, or at the time of his death, or an indefinite failure of his issue, shall be construed to mean a want or failure of issue in the lifetime, or at the time of the death of such person, and not an indefinite failure of his issue, unless a contrary intention shall appear by the deed." Pub. Gen. Laws Md. 1888, p. 275, art. 21, § 83.

The words "die without issue," in a will directing that a bequest shall be divided between other beneficiaries if the first beneficiary "die without issue," are to be construed, in view of Acts 1862, c. 161, to mean a want or failure of issue in the lifetime or at the time of the death of the person so taking, unless a contrary intention appears from the will. Hutchins v. Pearce, 31 Atl. 501, 502, 80 Md. 434.

"Die without issue," as used in a will devising property to testator's children, and providing that, if they should "die without issue," his or her share should be equally divided among the survivors, means death without issue in the lifetime of testator's surviving children. Schively's Estate (Pa.) 42 Leg. Int. 100.

A devise over in case the devisee "dies before the age of 21 years and without issue" imports a definite failure of issue. Dallam v. Dallam (Md.) 7 Har. & J. 220, 236.

When the term "survivor" is used, following the general phrase "dying without issue," and unaccompanied by other words indicating a transferable interest to the heirs of the survivor, the term will always have the effect of controlling the generality of this phrase, and of changing it from an indefinite failure, which it would mean when standing alone, to a failure at a definite time, to wit, the death of the first taker. Mendenhall v. Mower, 16 S. C. 303, 312; Gray v. Bridgeforth, 33 Miss. 312, 313; Kennedy v. Kennedy, 29 N. J. Law (5 Dutch.) 185, 188; Howell v. Howell, 20 N. J. Law (Spencer) 411, 415; Groves v. Cox, 40 N. J. Law (11 Vroom) 40, 44; Cutter v. Doughty (N. Y.) 23 Wend. 513, 518; Lewis v. Claiborne, 13 Tenn. (5 Yerg.) 369, 372, 26 Am. Dec. 270.

As within lifetime of testator.

The words "die without issue" are held to refer to death within the lifetime of the testator. Yocum v. Siler, 160 Mo. 281, 295, 61 S. W. 208; Phelps v. Phelps, 11 Atl. 596, 598, 55 Conn. 359; Coe v. James, 9 Atl. 392, 54 Conn. 511; Lawlor v. Holohan, 38 Atl. 903, 70 Conn. 87; Washbon v. Cope, 39 N. E. 388, 392, 144 N. Y. 287; Coles v. Ayres, 27 Atl. 375, 376, 156 Pa. 197; Appeal of Mickley, 92 Pa. 514, 518; Stevenson v. Fox, 17 Atl. 480, 125 Pa. 568, 11 Am. St. Rep. 922; King v. Frick, 19 Atl. 951, 952, 135 Pa. 575, 20 Am. St. Rep. 889; Fowler v. Duhme, 42 N. E. 623, 631, 143 Ind. 248; Teal v. Richardson, 66 N. E. 435, 160 Ind. 119. But when a contrary intent is indicated, they are not so limited. Huston's Lessee v. Hamilton (Pa.) 2 Bin. 387, 392; Vanderzee v. Slingerland, 8 N. E. 247, 103 N. Y. 47, 57 Am. Rep. 701; Cooksey v. Hill, 50 S. W. 235, 237, 106 Ky. 297, 20 Ky. Law Rep. 1873, 1875.

When a future interest is limited by a grant to take effect on the death of any person without heirs, or heirs of his body, or without issue, or in equivalent words, such words must be taken to mean successors or issue living at the death of the person named as ancestor. Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 1475; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 3526; Liston v. Jenkins, 2 W. Va. 62, 65.

As without having had issue.

In a will creating a remainder in case one of the devisees dies without issue, the words "dies without issue" mean if the devisee dies without having had issue, not without surviving issue. Field v. Peeples, 54 N. E. 304, 305, 180 Ill. 376; Chaplin v. Doty, 15 Atl. 362, 365, 60 Vt. 712.

DIE WITHOUT ISSUE LIVING.

"Dying without issue living or surviving" is always held to import a definite failure of issue. Granger v. Granger, 46 N. E. 80, 84, 147 Ind. 95, 38 L. R. A. 190 (citing Pells v.

Brown, Cro. Jac. 590; Glover v. Condell, 45 N. E. 173, 179, 163 Ill. 566, 35 L. R. A. 360; Vaughan v. Dickes, 20 Pa. (8 Harris) 509, 514.

Testator devised to his son a farm—to him, his heirs and assigns—provided he had living issue, but, if he should die leaving no issue living, then the said property to be equally divided between his sisters. Held, that the phrase “leaving no issue living” meant a failure of issue at the time of the death of the devisee, and not an indefinite failure of issue. Wallington v. Taylor, 1 N. J. Eq. (Saxt.) 314, 318.

“It is well settled that in gifts of personality the phrase ‘die without living issue’ means die without living issue living at the death of the person, the failure of whose issue is spoken of.” Still v. Spear, 45 Pa. (9 Wright) 168, 171.

DIE WITHOUT LAWFUL ISSUE.

In a will, a limitation to T. and his heirs, and, “in case of his death without lawful issue,” the estate to revert to R. and his heirs, the words “in case of his death without lawful issue” qualify the general expression “to T. and his heirs,” and point out the heirs intended to inherit, and confine them to heirs of his body. Handy v. McKim, 4 Atl. 125, 129, 64 Md. 560.

A will devised real estate to children in fee, and then added the following devise over: “But if any one or more of my said children should die before they arrive at full age or without lawful issue then his or her share shall devolve upon and be equally divided among the rest of my surviving children.” Held, that the words “without lawful issue,” in such connection, meant issue living at the time of his death, and that the devise over was good by way of executory devise, and not too remote. Jackson v. Blanshan (N. Y.) 3 Johns. 292, 299, 3 Am. Dec. 485.

Testator, after a devise of a life estate to his children, and the remainder to his grandchildren, provided that, in case any of his children should die without lawful issue, then the portion of his estate which would have gone to such issue should be equally divided among the survivors of his children or grandchildren. Held, that the devise to the survivor or survivors after the death without issue showed that the words “without lawful issue” should be interpreted as though followed by the words “living at the time of his death,” and that therefore the devise to the survivors was not void as a limitation on an indefinite failure of issue. Cutter v. Doughty (N. Y.) 23 Wend. 513, 518.

The phrase “without legal issue” in a will providing for a legacy, should either of testator's three sons die without legal issue, refers to an indefinite failure of issue, and renders the gift over to the survivors a remainder, and not an executory devise. Perry v. Kline, 66 Mass. (12 Cush.) 118, 123.

The words “dying without leaving lawful issue or descendants,” applied to a devise of leasehold property, mean a dying without issue living at the death of the first taker. Alender v. Sussan, 33 Md. 11, 15, 3 Am. Rep. 171.

DIE WITHOUT LEAVING CHILDREN.

The words “leaving no child or children,” in a devise of property directing that if the beneficiary die, “leaving no child or children,” the property shall pass to another, cannot be construed to denote an indefinite failure of issue. Hull v. Eddy, 14 N. J. Law (2 J. S. Green) 169, 175.

A devise over upon the death of a devisee without leaving child or children does not mean a failure of issue at some indefinite future period, but dying without children at the death of such devisee—a definite event. Brooks v. Kip, 35 Atl. 658, 660, 54 N. J. Eq. 462.

As used in a will giving money to a certain person, and, if she should die leaving no children, the legacy should go in another manner, “leaving” should be construed in the sense of the words “having had,” so that the contingency contemplated was the death of the legatee without having had a child or children. “If personal estate,” said Mr. Hawkins (Hawkins' Wills, 216), “be given to the children of A., the shares to vest in them on attaining a given age or marriage, without reference to their surviving the parent, but there is a gift over on the death of A. without leaving a child or children, the word ‘leaving’ will be construed ‘having’ or ‘having had,’ in order not to defeat the prior vested interest.” In Theob. on Wills, 532, it is said that the word “leaving,” under such circumstances, will be taken as equivalent in meaning to the words “without having had children who take a vested interest.” Male v. Williams, 21 Atl. 854, 855, 48 N. J. Eq. (3 Dick.) 33.

DIE WITHOUT LEAVING ISSUE.

The terms “die without issue,” “die without leaving issue,” and “die without heirs lawfully begotten” are synonymous. Moody v. Walker, 3 Ark. 147, 198; Paterson v. Ellis' Ex'rs (N. Y.) 11 Wend. 259, 282.

The expression “without leaving living issue,” as used by a testator in a will making a gift over on the first taker dying without leaving living issue, means lawful issue living beyond the death of the first taker. A testator, after having used expressions which, though containing no words of inheritance, would, standing by themselves, have given a fee simple absolute to his two grandsons, added a provision "that the property willed by me to the said grandchildren should be held in common, and if either of them should depart this life without leaving living issue, then in that case the survivor or the heirs of his body shall inherit all the property and estate devised to both of them." Held that the latter words referred to a death either before or after testator's death, and that each grandson took a base or determinable fee, defensible by his death without living issue, leaving the other grandson surviving. First Nat. Bank v. De Pauw (U. S.) 75 Fed. 775, 777.

The words "without leaving issue," as used in a will providing for the disposition of property "in case of the death of my son S. without leaving issue," mean without leaving issue at the time of the death of the devisee, and not at the time of the death of the deviser. Metzen v. Schopp, 67 N. E. 36, 39, 202 Ill. 275.

As used in a will in which the testator, after giving the remainder of his property to his two children, provided that, if either of them should die without leaving issue, the portion of such child should go to his or her issue in equal shares, is construed to mean "dying without issue" in the testator's lifetime. Hence the children who survive the testator would take an absolute estate. PHELPS v. ROBBINS, 40 Conn. 250, 264.

As indefinite failure of issue.

In the following cases the words "die without leaving issue" have been held to import an indefinite failure of issue: Kay v. Scates, 37 Pa. (1 Wright) 31, 39, 78 Am. Dec. 399; Middleswart's Adm'r v. Blackmore, 74 Pa. (24 P. F. Smith) 414, 419; Parkhurst v. Harrower, 21 Atl. 826, 142 Pa. 432, 24 Am. St. Rep. 507 (citing Taylor v. Taylor, 63 Pa. [13 P. F. Smith] 481, 3 Am. Rep. 565; Middleworth's Adm'r v. Blackmore, 74 Pa. [24 P. F. Smith] 414); In re Miller's Estate, 22 Atl. 1044, 145 Pa. 561; Moody v. Walker, 3 Ark. (3 Pike) 147, 148; Morehouse v. Cotheal, 21 N. J. Law (1 Zab.) 480, 490; Paterson v. Ellis' Ex'rs (N. Y.) 11 Wend. 259, 282. On the other hand, the following cases have held that they do not import an indefinite failure of issue: Atwell's Ex'rs v. Barney (Ga.) Dud. 207, 208; Harris v. Smith, 16 Ga. 545, 548; Nicholson v. Bettie, 57 Pa. (7 P. F. Smith) 384, 387 (citing Porter v. Bradley, 3 Term R. 143); Patterson v. Madden, 54 N. J. Eq. 714, 720, 36 Atl. 273, 274.

In any deed of any real or personal estate, the words "die without issue," or "die without leaving issue," or "have no issue," or any other words which may import either a want or a failure of issue of any person in his lifetime or at the time of his death, or an indefinite failure of his issue, shall be construed to mean a want or failure of issue in the lifetime or at the time of the death of such person, and not an indefinite failure of his issue unless a contrary intention shall appear by the deed. Pub. Gen. Laws Md. 1888, p. 275, art. 21, § 83.

In a limitation of real or personal property by deed, will, or other instrument in writing, the words "die without issue," or "die without leaving issue," or "have no issue," or "die without heirs of the body," or other words importing either a want or failure of issue of any person in his lifetime or at the time of his death, or an indefinite failure of his issue, shall, unless a contrary intention clearly appears by the instrument creating such limitation, mean a want or failure of issue in the lifetime or at the time of the death of such person, and not an indefinite failure of his issue. Rev. Laws Mass. 1902, p. 1268, c. 134, § 5.

It was settled at common law that the phrase "leaving no issue," or "without leaving issue," when applied to a devise of land, meant an indefinite failure of issue, but, when applied to a bequest of personalty, it imported failure of issue at the time of the death of the first legatee. Patterson v. Madden (N. J.) 33 Atl. 51.

DIE WITHOUT LEAVING LAWFUL ISSUE SURVIVING.

Die leaving no issue behind him, see "Behind."

There is a marked difference between a gift over in a will, the first taker's dying with lawful issue, and a gift over on his dying without leaving lawful issue surviving. The latter, if it means anything, must mean lawful issue living beyond the death of the first taker. It is much more expressive than the phrase "leaving no lawful issue behind him," which, in Porter v. Bradley, 3 Term R. 143, was held to denote a definite failure of issue. Nicholson v. Bettie, 57 Pa. (7 P. F. Smith) 384, 387.

DIE WITHOUT LEGAL ISSUE.

See "Die Without Lawful Issue."

DIE WITHOUT LIVING HEIRS.

The words "death without living heirs," as used in a will providing that, in case of devisee's death without living heirs of his own, the whole shall revert to testator's heirs, when given their natural meaning, can only be construed as referring to death at any time, and not simply to death within the lifetime of testator. Thomas v. Miller, 43 N. E. 848, 850, 161 Ill. 60.

DIE WITHOUT LIVING ISSUE.

See "Die Without Issue Living."

DIES JURIDICUS.

The civilians employed this term to denote days for legal purposes or judicial proceedings. Didsbury v. Van Tassel, 10 N. Y. Supp. 32, 33, 56 Hun, 423.

DIES NON.

"Dies non" is an abbreviation of the phrase "dies non juridicus," universally used to denote nonjudicial days—days during which the courts do not transact any business—as Sunday or the legal holidays. Havens v. Stiles (Idaho) 67 Pac. 919, 921, 56 L. R. A. 736.

DIES NON JURIDICUS.

It is frequently said that Sunday is "dies non juridicus," but this means only that process cannot ordinarily issue or be executed or returned, and that courts do not usually sit, on that day. It does not mean that no judicial action can be had on that day. On the contrary, it is laid down in books of authority that warrants for treason, felony, and breach of the peace may be issued and executed on that day. State v. Ricketts, 74 N. C. 187, 193.

The term "dies non juridicus" was used by the civilians to designate the days in which judicial proceedings were prohibited, but, with the exception of Sunday, we have no such days; and hence Laws 1881, c. 30, providing that certain days, including Christmas, shall be considered Sunday, for the purpose of presenting and producing commercial paper, and for the purpose of transacting business in a public office, does not diminish the number of judicial days, and service of a summons on Christmas is valid. Didsbury v. Van Tassel, 10 N. Y. Supp. 32, 33, 56 Hun, 423.

DIETING.

"Dieting," as used in Rev. St. c. 53, § 19, providing that the sheriff shall receive for dieting each prisoner such compensation, to cover the actual costs, as may be fixed by the county board, means providing and furnishing to the prisoners their daily food. Cook County v. Gilbert, 33 N. E. 761, 762, 146 Ill. 268.

DIFFERENCE.

In a contract providing that it is hereby understood that should any difference arise in regard to the proper performance of the contract, etc., then said difference shall be left to the arbitrators, "difference" means disagreement or dispute, and would not include mere failure of one to pay a debt owing to another. Fravert v. Fesler, 53 Pac. 288, 290, 11 Colo. App. 387.

Rejection by an assured of an offer by an insurance company of a certain amount in settlement of the damages to the insured property constitutes a difference between the parties, within the meaning of a condition in the policy that any difference as to the amount of loss shall be submitted to arbitration before action brought. Pioneer Mfg. Co. v. Phoenix Assur. Co., 10 S. E. 1057, 1059, 106 N. C. 28.

Palpable abuse of judicial discretion is not beyond remedy, but "difference in judicial opinion" is not synonymous with "abuse of judicial discretion." Day v. Donohue, 41 Atl. 934, 935, 62 N. J. Law, 380.

DIFFICULT.

The term "difficult and extraordinary case," in statutes providing for an extra allowance in a difficult and extraordinary case, includes all cases of a difficult or extraordinary character, and includes a suit to foreclose a mechanic's lien, if difficult or extraordinary. Horgan v. McKenzie, 17 N. Y. Supp. 174, 175. The term, as so used, should be construed as synonymous with "litigated," and hence all litigated cases are difficult. It should not mean simply a case where a party's debt was doubtful or unfounded, and that, by the skill or ingenuity or the smartness of his counsel, he had performed the difficult task of obtaining a verdict contrary to evidence, for, while this would establish a difficult as well as an extraordinary case, in the literal acceptance of the term, it would not be such in a legal acceptance thereof, which is that defendant has forced plaintiff, the owner of a claim plainly and clearly just, to resort to trouble and expense in order to enforce payment thereof, and it is for the reimbursement of such expenses that he is entitled to an extra allowance. Dyckman v. McDonald (N. Y.) 5 How. Prac. 121, 122. It means the opposite of "common and ordinary." Each case must be determined according to its own peculiar circumstances, and each judge must necessarily be guided by his own individual experience as to what actions and trials are difficult or extraordinary. All litigated trials cannot be considered difficult, within the statute, because such a construction would completely nullify the words "difficult and extraordinary," as used, and contravene the plain intent of the Legislature. "Difficult" should probably be applied to questions of law involved in the action, while "extraordinary" may apply to any other feature or circumstances distinguishing the case from ordinary litigations. Fox v. Gould (N. Y.) 5 How. Prac. 278, 279.

DIFFICULTY.

The words "any difficulty," in a will directing that, in case any difficulty arises, the matter shall be submitted, do not mean only such as may arise outside the will, but will cover the determination of questions of interpretation. In re Phillips' Estate (Pa.) 48 Leg. Int. 232.

The term "difficulty," as applicable to what transpires between parties when it results in some breach of the peace or more flagrant violation of law, is, in general use, well understood by all classes. It is of constant application in legal proceedings and in the reports of adjudicated cases. It is expressive of a group or a collection of ideas that cannot, perhaps, be imparted so well by any other term. This use, therefore, in instructions, avoids a great deal of circumlocution, which generally leads to confusion and misapprehension, and it is uniformly used in preparing instructions in all cases where it is applicable. Gainey v. People, 97 Ill. 270, 279, 37 Am. Rep. 109.

DIFFICULTY WITH HEAD.

An applicant for life insurance was asked, "Have you ever had any difficulty with your head or brain?" to which he answered, "No." In construing this answer, in an action on the policy, the court said: "The question evidently pointed to mental unsoundness or some derangement of the head or brain, and was so understood by the examiner and the applicant; that it did not include a temporary or occasional disturbance, the result of accidental causes. Higbie v. Guardian Mut. Life Ins. Co., 53 N. Y. 603, 605.

DIG.

A deed giving the liberty and privilege to dig a canal across the grantor's land does not give to the grantee a right to the soil or trees dug up in the course of the work. Lyman v. Arnold (U. S.) 15 Fed. Cas. 1143, 1145.

A contract requiring a party to go to California and to dig gold for a certain time and to pay the other parties one-fourth of the amount he should collect while there, was construed to only require him to account for the sums obtained by taking gold, and not for any other sums gained by him. The phrase "digging gold" was not sufficient to indicate any employment in which the obligor might engage. It is true that it is susceptible of a figurative meaning, and is sometimes used in this manner to signify generally any mode by which wealth or property is obtained, of which a fine illustration is given by the great lyrical poet of England in his version of the thirty-ninth psalm:

"Some walk in honor's gaudy show,
Some dig for gold and ore."

—Hoyt v. Smith, 27 Conn. 63, 68.

A contract under seal conveyed both the right and privilege of "digging all the ore" on the grantor's land. Held, that the quoted words constituted an equitable conveyance of the ore in the land in fee, and that the contract could not be construed as a mere license to take minerals. Fairchild v. Dunbar Furnace Co., 18 Atl. 443, 128 Pa. 485.

DIGGING.

In a contract for the excavation of a certain trench, and providing that, for executing the digging, the contractor should receive a certain sum per cubic foot, "digging" is synonymous with the term "excavation," as used in the contract, and cannot be limited to the mere excavation of dirt, in contradistinction to hardpan or rock. Sherman v. City of New York, 1 N. Y. (1 Comst.) 316, 320.

DIGNITY OF OFFICE.

"Dignity of office," in the sense that the term is used in the English cases holding that the compensation of officers is not subject to assignment, does not exist in this country, and yet there is a dignity, or at least should be, attending every office, in the sense that a proper and independent discharge of its duties inspires respect for the officer and for the office; and this is sufficient grounds for holding that his unearned compensation cannot be assigned. National Bank of El Paso v. Fink, 24 S. W. 256, 257, 86 Tex. 303, 40 Am. St. Rep. 833; Sanger v. City of Waco, 40 S. W. 549, 550, 15 Tex. Civ. App. 424.

DILATORY PLEA.

Dilatory pleas are distinguished from pleas to the action, and are defined to be such as tend merely to delay or put off the suit by questioning the propriety of the remedy, rather than by denying the injury; whereas pleas to the action are such as dispute the cause of action. Parks v. McClellan, 44 N. J. Law (15 Vroom) 552, 558.

A dilatory plea is one which seeks to excuse the defendant from pleading to and answering the declaration, and gives reason why he should not be required so to plead or answer. It is not a plea or answer, within the meaning of statutes relating to the removal of cases. Mahoney v. New South Building & Loan Ass'n (U. S.) 70 Fed. 513, 515.

DILIGENCE.

See "Common Diligence"; "Due Diligence"; "Extraordinary Diligence"; "Great Care or Diligence"; "High Diligence"; "Low Diligence"; "Necessary Diligence"; "Ordinary Diligence"; "Reasonable Diligence"; "Slight Diligence"; "Special Care and Diligence."

Care synonymous.

Diligence is defined to be a steady application to business of any kind; constant effort to accomplish any undertaking. The law does not require any unusual or extraordinary efforts, but only that which is usual, ordinary, and reasonable. Ophir Silver Min. Co. v. Carpenter, 4 Nev. 534, 546, 97 Am. Dec. 550; Ennis v. Eden Mills Paper Co., 48 Atl. 610, 613, 65 N. J. Law, 577.

Diligence is such care and prudence as is usually exercised by persons of common or average care and prudence. Lee v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co., 45 N. W. 739, 741, 80 Iowa, 172.

By reasonable and ordinary care and diligence is meant that degree of care which an ordinarily careful and prudent man would be expected to use under similar circumstances. Union Pac. R. Co. v. Estes, 16 Pac. 131, 134, 37 Kan. 715.

"Diligence, when the law imposes it as a duty, implies that we shall do those things we ought to do, and leave undone those things we ought not to do. It requires action, as well as forbearance to act." Grant v. Moseley, 29 Ala. 302, 305.

The diligence to be exacted from a specialist is the diligence which good specialists in his department are accustomed to bestow. Diamond v. Northern Pac. R. Co., 13 Pac. 367, 372, 6 Mont. 580 (citing Whart. Neg. § 872).

The term "diligence," when applied to the management of railroad engines and cars in motion, must be understood to import all the care and circumspection which the peculiar circumstances of the place or occasion reasonably require, and these will be increased or diminished according as the ordinary liability to danger and accident and to do injury to others is increased or diminished in the movement and operation of them. Knopf v. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. (Del.) 46 Atl. 747, 748, 2 Pennewill, 392.

"The word 'diligence,' as used in the definitions of the degrees of negligence, in the definition defining gross negligence to be the want of slight diligence, slight negligence to be the want of great diligence, and ordinary negligence to be the want of ordinary diligence, is synonymous with 'care.' This is shown by the text in Story, immediately following the definition referred to. It is there said: 'For he who is only less diligent than very careful men cannot be said to be more than slightly inattentive, he who omits ordinary care is a little more negligent than men ordinarily are, and he who omits even slight diligence fails in the lowest degree of prudence and is deemed grossly negligent.'" Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Johnson, 103 Ill. 512, 523 (quoting Story, Bailm. § 17 et seq.).

Good faith.

Good faith and diligence are not always the same. Lack of diligence does not necessarily involve absence of good faith, so that failure to discover fraud in the sale of bank stock within a short time is not proof of lack of good faith. Stuttlebeam v. De Lashmutt (U. S.) 101 Fed. 367, 370.

As a relative term.

Diligence is in all cases a relative term, and what is due diligence must be determined by the circumstances of each case. Rue v. Quinn, 66 Pac. 216, 217, 137 Cal. 651; Heintz v. Cooper, 38 Pac. 511, 512, 104 Cal. 608; Carter v. Kansas City Cable Ry. Co. (U. S.) 42 Fed. 37, 38; Nord-Deutscher Lloyd v. Insurance Co. of North America, 110 Fed. 420, 427, 49 C. C. A. 1; Isabel v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co., 60 Mo. 475, 482 (citing Davis v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co., 17 N. W. 406, 412, 58 Wis. 646, 46 Am. Rep. 667); Ennis v. Eden Mills Paper Co., 48 Atl. 610, 613, 65 N. J. Law, 577; Prince v. Alabama State Fair, 17 South. 449, 451, 106 Ala. 340, 28 L. R. A. 716; Lee v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co., 45 N. W. 739, 741, 80 Iowa, 172.

Diligence is a relative term, and depends on the nature of the trust, duty, or subject in hand; hence, if the trust confided or duty imposed required delicate handling or skillful manipulation to preserve the one or to so control the other as to do no mischief, the requisite degree of diligence arises in proportion to the delicacy of danger which attends the service. Greater watchfulness and care are required in the proper custody and preservation of a diamond than need be bestowed on chattels of ordinary value. Greater skill and diligence are exacted in driving a locomotive than in driving a road wagon. Carter v. Chambers, 79 Ala. 223, 230.

Diligence is a relative term, to be judged of according to the nature of the subject to which it is to be directed. Whether a man has exercised the diligence required of him by law in discharging an agency, or not, must be determined by all the considerations surrounding the agency. The circumstances, the general customs of the trade, the course of business of that particular line or character of trade, the common habits of business in the particular matter or article, the situation of the parties, and the way the principal and agent deal with each other, are all to be considered. Elchel v. Sawyer (U. S.) 44 Fed. 845, 847.

Ordinary diligence has been defined by Judge Story to be "that degree of care which men of common prudence generally exercise in their affairs, in the country and the age in which they live." These last words are quite material, quite important, in this case. "In the country and in the age in which they lived." Thus what might be ordinary diligence in one country and in one age may, at another time and in another country, be negligence, even gross negligence. Erie Bank v. Smith (Pa.) 3 Brewst. 9, 14.

Diligence is a relative term, and must be proportionate to the danger against which it is required to guard. More active diligence is required to conduct a locomotive through the streets of a populous town than is necessary to guide a sled drawn by oxen in an unfrequented place. The degree of ordinary care implies a higher state of mental activity in one case than in the other. It demands more skill and science to guide a ship on the ocean than a mud scow in a harbor. With regard to the degree of care or diligence which are recognized in the law Sir Wm. Jones says: "There are infinite shades, from the slightest momentary thought or transient glance of attention to the most vigilant anxiety and solicitude." Brand v. Schenectady & T. R. Co., 8 Barb. 368, 378.

No general standard by which the diligence required of an inventor in applying for and procuring a patent on his invention has been established, by law, nor in the nature of things is such a standard possible. It must be reasonable under the circumstances of the particular case in question. The character of the invention, the help, the means, the liberty of the inventor, his occupation upon kindred or subordinate inventions, are proper subjects for consideration. Such reasonable diligence does not involve uninterrupted effort, nor concentration of his entire energies upon the single enterprise. Von Schmidt v. Bowers (U. S.) 80 Fed. 121, 143, 25 C. C. A. 323.

DILIGENT INQUIRY.

Where a notary, who had protested a bill of exchange, testified that he made diligent inquiry as to the drawer's place of residence, he testified that as a matter of fact he made a careful, thorough, and business-like inquiry. Carrol v. Upton, 3 N. Y. (3 Comst.) 272, 274.

It is diligent inquiry regarding the residence of an indorser of a negotiable note, for the purpose of giving notice of protest, to inquire of such persons, at the place where the bill or note is payable, as may reasonably be supposed capable of giving the required information. Marsh v. Barr, 19 Tenn. (Meigs) 68, 70.

The diligent inquiry required of the holder of a bill in seeking the indorser must be such ordinary or reasonable diligence as men of business usually exercise when their interest depends upon obtaining correct information. Garver v. Downie, 33 Cal. 176, 182.

Rev. St. 1891, c. 120, § 216, excusing personal service of tax notice where the party to be assessed cannot upon diligent inquiry be found in the county, means such inquiry as a diligent man, intent upon ascertaining a fact, would usually and ordinarily make—inquiry with diligence and in good faith to ascertain the truth. Glos v. Sankey, 36 N. E. 628, 635, 148 Ill. 536, 23 L. R. A. 665, 39 Am. St. Rep. 196.

DILIGENT SEARCH.

The term "diligent search," as used in the return of an officer on an execution, reciting diligent search for the debtor, means reasonable effort to find him. In re Bayley, 132 Mass. 457, 461.

DIMENSION STONE.

Where a lease of a stone quarry provides for one rate of compensation for dimension stone shipped, and another lower rate for all other stone, it must be conclusively presumed that the parties to the lease, who were both experienced quarrymen, used the term "dimension stone," which is a term of art, in its technical sense, and as would be ordinarily understood by quarrymen, in the absence of anything in the lease itself indicating that they use it in any other sense. Crawford v. Oman & Stewart Stone Co., 12 S. E. 929, 930, 34 S. C. 90, 12 L. R. A. 375.

DIMINISH.

The power of increasing or diminishing the number of judicial districts and judges, given to the Legislature by Const. art. 6, § 5, is not a power to entirely deprive a district of any judge. To "diminish" means to make less, not to utterly wipe out. Therefore the authority to diminish the number of judges does not apply where a district has but one judge. State v. Kinkead, 14 Nev. 117, 123.

DIMINISHED USE.

In an action for damages for diversion of water from plaintiff's well, the court charged that, if the water could not have been obtained from said well by the use of plaintiff's appliances at a reasonable and moderate cost, the plaintiff would be entitled to recover as damages the value of the diminished use of said property during the time that she was entitled to the use. It was contended that the instruction should have read "diminution of the use," instead of "diminished use." The court held that "technically it may be true that 'diminished use' should be held to refer to the value of the use remaining after the diminution had taken place," but that the words "diminished use," taken in connection with the rest of the instructions, should be construed as practically synonymous with the words "diminution of the use," and to mean the same thing. Willis v. City of Perry, 60 N. W. 727, 732, 92 Iowa. 297, 26 L. R. A. 124.

DIP.

See "Compass Dip"; "Inclination Dip"; "Practical Dip."

Dip is the direction of a vein as it goes downward into the earth; the dip in different veins and in the same vein varying from a perpendicular to the earth's surface to an angle perhaps only a few degrees below the horizon. The dip is spoken of from three different points of view: (1) As to its inclination from a perpendicular to the horizontal, as so many degrees from the perpendicular or from the horizontal. A vein is thus described as having a dip of 20 degrees, 30 degrees, etc. (2) As to the direction it takes from the strike or apex by the points of the compass. If the strike were due east and west, and the vein in its course downward departed from the perpendicular at an angle so that a perpendicular shaft sunk at the apex would leave the vein to the north of such shaft, the dip in this point of view would be said to be due north; or, the conditions reversed, due south. In this respect the dip—that is, the direction of the dip—is said to be, and is, at right angles to the strike. (3) The dip is again spoken of as portions of the vein successively encountered in going down and away from the apex. The miner follows the dip when he works downward leaving the apex further from and above him at each advance. King v. Amy & Silversmith Consol. Min. Co., 24 P. 200, 202, 9 Mont. 543.

The term "dip," as used in mining, means the downward course of a vein. "Dip" and "depth" are of the same origin. Dip is the direction or inclination toward the depth; that is, toward the depth that veins may be followed, and that is surely their downward course. Mr. Riotte gives us a different definition. He says: "Starting upon any line upon the apex of the vein, and running down the vein parallel to the end lines of the location, the inclination that the line has is the downward course of the vein." Duggan v. Davey, 26 N. W. 887, 901, 4 Dak. 110.

DIPLOMA.

A diploma is said to be a document bearing record of a degree conferred by a literary society or educational institution; in short, a statement in writing under the seal of the institution, setting forth that the student therein named has attained a certain rank, grade, or degree in the studies he has pursued. State v. Gregory, 83 Mo. 123, 130, 53 Am. Rep. 565.

A diploma is an instrument, usually under seal, "conferring some privilege, honor, or authority; almost wholly restricted to certificates of degrees conferred by universities and colleges." Halliday v. Butt, 40 Ala. 178, 183 (quoting Worcester's Dict.).

The words "license, diploma, or certificate of qualification," in a statute making it criminal to practice medicine without having first obtained a license or diploma or certificate of qualification, were considered in the case of Brooks v. State, 6 South. 902, 88 Ala. 122, and it was held that the words did not refer to and mean the same thing. Nelson v. State, 12 South. 421, 422, 97 Ala. 79.

DIPLOMATIC OFFICER.

The term "diplomatic officer," when used in the title relating to diplomatic and consular officers, shall be deemed to include ambassadors, envoys extraordinary, ministers plenipotentiary, ministers resident, commissioners, charges d'affaires, agents, and secretaries of legation, and none others. U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1150.

DIPSOMANIA.

Dipsomania is an insatiable thirst, intensified by long indulgence. State v. Potts, 6 S. E. 657, 659, 100 N. C. 457.

Dipsomania is an irresistible impulse to indulge in intoxication, either alcohol or other drugs—opiums. This mania, or dipsomania, is classed as one of the minor forms of insanity. Repeated intoxication for a number of years, which is entirely voluntary, is not dipsomania. One having the power to refrain from the use of intoxicants, and who becomes intoxicated voluntarily, is not affected with dipsomania. Ballard v. State, 28 N. W. 271, 273, 19 Neb. 609.

Dipsomania, or alcoholism, is a disease caused from excessive indulgence in drink. It oftentimes develops into what is called by medical men "mania a potu," wherein the patient becomes a madman, wholly deprived of all sane reason, while the fit is upon him. In that condition he is not legally responsible for his actions, being treated as insane. As the disease has created for him, in his imagination, a totally new existence, the reason which before controlled his conduct no longer exists, but a new and perverted one has taken its place. The will power which attended it has gone with the reason itself. So it is in the case of the mere hard drinker, who, a victim of the disease of dipsomania, loses control of his will with respect to restraint of his thirst for liquor; and though he may be perfectly sane, and have complete control over himself generally, yet from his disease, or passion for drink, and the momentary relief indulgence of it gives his morbid feelings of despondency, he has entirely lost control of himself with respect to such indulgence, and drink he must and will in spite of his reason, his past experience, and the warnings his physician and friends give him. He drinks, not because of desire to taste stimulants, but because his disease demands of him that he get relief at any hazard. State v. Reidell (Del.) 14 Atl. 550, 551, 9 Houst. 470.

DIRECT.

The term "direct," as defined by Webster, means "immediate; express; unambiguous; confessed; absolute." People v. Boylan (U. S.) 25 Fed. 594, 595.

An agreement by one hiring a team to go to a certain place to go direct to such place does not necessarily imply an engagement to go the shortest way, but merely to go by some usual and expeditious route, without diverging therefrom. The doctrine that a person who hires a horse for a specified journey is liable for conversion if he drives the horse further than the stipulated journey, or on another and different trip, cannot be pressed so far as to make the hirer chargeable as for a tort merely by reason of slight and immaterial departures from the general course of the direction outlined in the contract. Young v. Muhling, 63 N. Y. Supp. 181, 183, 48 App. Div. 617.

Either of the words "wish," "desire," "command," or "direct" are apt words to be used in a will to show testator's intent to make a will. Barney v. Hayes, 29 Pac. 282, 284, 11 Mont. 571, 28 Am. St. Rep. 495.

St. 55 Geo. III, c. 184, sched. pt. 3, tit. "Legacies," subjecting legacies payable on the proceeds of "real estate directed to be sold" by a will to a tax, would include real estate devised to trustees in trust to convey the same among certain persons, mentioned in the will, in equal proportions, in severalty, and empowering the trustees, for the purpose of such division and partition, to sell any part of the lands and to stand possessed of the money arising from such sales. Attorney General v. Simcox, 1 Exch. 749, 768.

The word "direct," as used in an insuring clause, "against all direct loss or damage by fire, except as hereinafter provided for," qualifies, not alone "loss," but also "damage by fire," and the phrase has precisely the same meaning as if the insurance was "against loss or damage by fire direct." Hustace v. Phenix Ins. Co., 67 N. E. 592, 593, 175 N. Y. 292, 62 L. R. A. 651.

Where a charter provided that the vessel was to proceed direct to load on the charter, the word "direct" meant that the vessel was to proceed without unreasonable delay and by the usual route, and the contract would have been the same if the word "direct" had been left out. The Onrust (U. S.) 18 Fed. Cas. 728, 733.

As used in a contract by which one of the parties had sold his interest in a stage line to the other parties and pledged himself not to be concerned, "direct or indirect," in any line of stages in opposition to them, the quoted words are used for the special purpose of guarding against any kind of interference in the business of the parties operating the stage line by aiding or in any manner permitting the establishment of or carrying on any opposition. The word "direct" is to be so construed that the party could not set up or carry on, or knowingly aid or intermeddle in any way whatsoever, or be concerned in setting up or carrying on, any line of stages in opposition to his vendees. Davis v. Barney (Md.) 2 Gill & J. 382, 402.

As command or order.

Laws 1892, c. 481, § 12, providing that the proper officers of the city of Brooklyn are authorized and directed to issue water bonds sufficient to pay the award in condemnation proceedings, means that the officers are ordered, and has the same force as an order given to a soldier, whose only answer is obedience. People v. Guggenheimer, 59 N. Y. Supp. 913, 922, 28 Misc. Rep. 735.

Where commissioners are directed to pave any street on the application of the lot holders, no discretion is included. Spring Garden Com'rs v. Wistar, 18 Pa. (6 Harris) 195, 198.

Under a will providing that the executors shall sell the land, a majority of the heirs so "directing," the word imports an order before the power to sell can be exercised. Potter's Ex'rs v. Adriance, 44 N. J. Eq. (17 Stew.) 14, 17, 14 Atl. 16.

As used in a will directing the doing of certain things, "direct" is a mandatory word, unless controlled by something in the context indicating otherwise; and the fact that discretion is given in the execution of the direction is not sufficient to change the mandatory sense. Collister v. Fassitt, 39 N. Y. Supp. 800, 801, 7 App. Div. 20 (reversing 38 N. Y. Supp. 601, 16 Misc. Rep. 395).

The definition of the word "direct," as given by Webster, is "to order; to instruct; to point out a course of proceedings with authority; to command." But direction may be given or a course of proceedings may be pointed out with authority in a will by implication as certainly as by explicit instructions. A clear implication of the testator's intention is as binding upon the court as his express direction, and under Pub. St. c. 189, § 2, providing that the personal estate shall stand charged for debts and expenses in the first instance, unless the deceased has otherwise directed, the word requires no more than that the plain intention or the necessary implication of the will shall exonerate the personal estate. Calder v. Curry, 17 R. I. 610, 615, 24 Atl. 103.

The provision of a charter party that "it is understood that the vessel is now loading for K. or T., and is to proceed thence direct to load on this charter," meant that the vessel is to take a direct course to the port or ports at which she must load under the charter party, without deviation or unreasonable delay, but did not mean that the vessel should depart from T. instantly or immediately, but that she should at that place enter on the voyage provided for in the charter and proceed in a direct course to the place of loading. The Onrust (U. S.) 18 Fed. Cas. 734, 735.

Natural and proximate synonymous.

In the statement of the rule that one is not liable for the results of an act, unless the act was the natural and proximate cause of the injury, the word "direct" is often used as synonymous with "natural" and with "proximate." Lovett v. City of Chicago, 35 Ill. App. 570, 571.

As point out.

"Direct," as used in Act 1863, providing that the court to which the record is remitted is to pass such sentence as the appellate court shall direct, means to point out a law providing for the punishment, and direct the court below to sentence thereunder. People v. Bork, 96 N. Y. 188, 202.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1022, provides that the report of a referee must direct the judgment to be entered thereon. Held, that the word "direct," as used in this connection, is synonymous with the words "to point out; to guide; to show; to regulate." Webst. Internat. Dict. And hence it cannot be held that the Legislature thereby intended that the referee should formulate the judgment, and that the only requirement was that the report should be sufficiently full to show the particular form and terms of the judgment to which the successful party was entitled thereunder. Hinds v. Kellogg, 13 N. Y. Supp. 922, 923.

The verb "direct" ordinarily implies a pointing out with authority, or directing as a superior, and as used in a contract by an attorney with a client for a percentage of the recovery as compensation for his services, providing that no settlement shall be made unless he is present and directs it, is used in such sense, thus limiting the client's control over the action, and does not mean to guide or advise. Davis v. Chase, 64 N. E. 88, 89, 159 Ind. 242, 95 Am. St. Rep. 294.

As require.

The word "directing," in Code, § 346, providing that "a notice of appeal from a judgment directing the payment of money shall not stay the execution of the judgment unless a stay of execution is granted," amounts to neither more nor less than the word "require." When a tribunal invested with the power to enforce its mandates directs by its judgment a payment of money, it is equivalent to saying that it required the payment of such money, and in this connection the two words may be used interchangeably. Pelzer Mfg. Co. v. Cely, 18 S. E. 790, 791, 40 S. C. 430.

As wish.

The term "direct," as used in a will creating a trust, is used in the same sense as "wish" or "will." Bliven v. Seymour, 88 N. Y. 469, 476.

DIRECT ATTACK.

"A direct attack upon a judgment," says Mr. Justice Cooke in Pope v. Harrison, 84 Tenn. (16 Lea) 82, "is by appropriate proceedings between the parties to it, seeking for sufficient cause alleged, to have it annulled, reversed, vacated, or declared void." Meinert v. Harder, 65 Pac. 1056, 1058, 39 Or. 609.

A direct attack on a judgment is an attempt to amend, correct, reform, vacate, or enjoin the execution of same in a proceeding instituted for that purpose, such as a motion for a rehearing, an appeal, some form of writ of error, a bill of review, an injunction to restrain its execution, etc. An attack in trespass to try title by devisees against a purchaser at a sale by the executor, or the judgment of a probate court having jurisdiction over plaintiff which confirmed the sale, is not a direct, but a collateral, attack. Crawford v. McDonald, 33 S. W. 325, 327, 88 Tex. 626.

The phrase "direct attack," in a statement that upon a direct attack on a judgment there is no presumption in favor of the existence of a fact essential to the jurisdiction of the court, refers to appeals from the judgment. Eichhoff v. Eichhoff, 40 Pac. 24, 25, 107 Cal. 42, 48 Am. St. Rep. 110.

Where a statutory method is pursued for avoiding a judgment, the attack on the judgment is direct. Spencer v. Spencer, 67 N. E. 1018, 1020, 31 Ind. App. 321.

When the validity of a record attacked is directly put in issue by the pleadings of the party attacking it by proper averment, the attack is direct, and not collateral; but when there are no proper averments attacking the record, although its validity is drawn in the issue of the case, the attack is collateral. Walker v. Goldsmith, 12 Pac. 537, 553, 14 Or. 125.

A direct attack on a judicial proceeding is an attempt to avoid or correct it in some manner provided by law. In Morrill v. Morrill, 20 Or. 96, 25 Pac. 362, 11 L. R. A. 155, 23 Am. St. Rep. 95, a collateral attack is aptly defined to be "an attempt to impeach a decree in a proceeding not instituted for the express purpose of annulling, correcting, or modifying the decree, or enjoining its execution." It follows, therefore, that if the proceeding was instituted for any one of these express purposes it would be a direct attack. Smith v. Morrill, 55 Pac. 824, 826, 12 Colo. App. 233.

A direct attack upon a judgment is an attempt to amend, correct, reform, vacate, or enjoin the execution of the same, in a proceeding instituted for that purpose, such as a motion for a rehearing, an appeal, some form of writ of error, a bill of review, an injunction to restrain its execution, etc., while a collateral attack is an attempt to avoid its binding force in a proceeding not instituted for one of the purposes aforesaid, as where, in an action of debt on a judgment, defendant attempts to deny the fact of indebtedness, or where, in a suit to try title to property, a judgment is offered as a link in the chain of title, and the adverse party attempts to avoid its effects, etc. Thus, where a plaintiff in an action to recover land sought to set aside on the ground of fraud judgments in partition affecting their title, all parties to the judgments were made parties to the action, the tribunal in which the pending action was brought had rendered the judgments, and had jurisdiction to set them aside. The attack on the judgments was not collateral, but direct, though third parties, defendants to the action, claiming under the judgments, had become possessed of the land. Schneider v. Sellers, 61 S. W. 541, 543, 25 Tex. Civ. App. 226.

DIRECT CAUSE.

By the words "direct and proximate cause" are meant the cause which naturally led to and might have been expected to be directly instrumental in producing the result complained of. McKeon v. Chicago, M. & St. P. Ry. Co., 69 N. W. 175, 177, 94 Wis. 477, 35 L. R. A. 252, 59 Am. St. Rep. 910.

By "direct and proximate cause" is not meant the cause or agency which is nearest in time or place to the result, necessarily. "The active efficient cause, that sets in motion a train of events which brings to a result, without the intervention of any force started and working actively from a new and independent source, is the direct and proximate cause." Lynn Gas & Electric Co. v. Meriden Fire Ins. Co., 33 N. E. 690, 691, 158 Mass. 570, 20 L. R. A. 297, 35 Am. St. Rep. 540.

The direct cause may not be the proximate cause, and the proximate cause may not be the direct cause. Neither time nor distance is essentially a controlling element in determining whether a certain cause of an injury is the proximate cause of such injury; so that an instruction that the words "direct" and "proximate" mean about the same thing, mean the cause which naturally produced the accident, is erroneous. Wills v.

Ashland Light, Power & Street Ry. Co., 84 N. W. 998, 1000, 108 Wis. 255.

The direct cause of an injury is one without which the injury would not have happened. Such was the sense in which the word "directly" was used in an instruction in an action for damages for an injury occasioned by collision between two vessels, stating that the plaintiff would not be entitled to recover if by his negligence he had directly contributed to the accident. Tuff v. Warman, 5 C. B. (N. S.) 573, 586.

DIRECT CONSANGUINITY.

The series of degrees between persons who descend from one another is called direct, or lineal, consanguinity. Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 1856; Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 1390; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 3747.

DIRECT CONTEMPT.

Direct contempts are contempts offered to a court while sitting as such and in its presence. Stuart v. People, 4 Ill. (3 Scam.) 395, 404; Cooper v. People, 22 Pac. 790, 796, 13 Colo. 337, 6 L. R. A. 430; Territory v. Murray, 15 Pac. 145, 148, 7 Mont. 251; Stewart v. State, 39 N. E. 508, 140 Ind. 7; State v. Anders, 68 Pac. 668, 669, 64 Kan. 742.

"A direct contempt is an open insult in the face of the court, in the presence of the judges while presiding, or a resistance to its powers in their presence." Ex parte Wright, 65 Ind. 504, 508. See, also, Holman v. State, 5 N. E. 556, 557, 105 Ind. 513; Whittem v. State, 36 Ind. 196, 198.

Direct contempts are such as are committed in the presence, or such as obstruct or interrupt the proceedings, of the court. State v. McClaugherty, 33 W. Va. 250, 253, 10 S. E. 407, 408.

Direct contempts are those which are committed in the presence of the court while in session, or so near as to interrupt its proceedings. State ex inf. Crow v. Shepherd, 76 S. W. 79, 177 Mo. 205.

A direct contempt is an act committed in the presence of the court, while sitting judicially, or so near to the court as to interfere with or stop its ordinary way of procedure. Indianapolis Water Co. v. American Strawboard Co. (U. S.) 75 Fed. 972, 975; Snyder v. State, 52 N. E. 152, 151 Ind. 553.

Where attorneys during a court day, but while it was not in session, held a meeting at which one of their number presided in a room in the courthouse adjoining the courtroom, and occasionally used as a courtroom, which meeting was attended by the judge at their request, their acts in his presence are not committed in the presence of the court, and hence cannot constitute direct

To constitute a direct contempt of court there must be some disobedience to its powers, judgment, or process, or some open and intended disrespect to the court or its officers in the presence of the court, or such conduct in or near the court as to interrupt or interfere with its proceedings or with the administration of justice. In re Dill, 5 Pac. 39, 47, 32 Kan. 608, 49 Am. Rep. 505.

Contempts are either direct, which openly insult and resist the powers of the court or the persons of the judges who preside there, or else are consequential, which without such gross insolence or direct opposition plainly tend to create a universal disregard of other authority. A direct contempt is one offered in the presence of a court while sitting judicially. A constructive contempt is one which tends to obstruct or embarrass a court, though the act be not done in its presence. State v. Hansford, 28 S. E. 791, 792, 43 W. Va. 773; State v. Henthorn, 26 Pac. 937, 938, 46 Kan. 613; Androscoggin & K. R. Co. v. Androscoggin R. Co., 49 Me. 392, 400.

DIRECT DAMAGES.

Direct damages are such as flow immediately upon the act done. Civ. Code Ga. 1895, § 3911.

DIRECT EVIDENCE.

Direct evidence is given where a witness testifies directly of his own knowledge of the main fact or facts to be proven. State v. Avery, 21 S. W. 193, 197, 113 Mo. 475; State v. Tate, 56 S. W. 1099, 1100, 156 Mo. 119; State v. Dickson, 78 Mo. 438, 441.

"Direct or positive evidence is given when a witness can be called to testify to the precise fact which is the subject of an issue on trial." Commonwealth v. Webster, 59 Mass. (5 Cush.) 295, 310, 52 Am. Dec. 711; People v. Morrow, 60 Cal. 142, 144.

Evidence is direct and positive where the particular facts in dispute are communicated by those who have actual knowledge of them by means of their senses. Pease v. Smith, 61 N. Y. 477, 484.

Direct evidence is that which in the first instance applies directly to the factum probandum. Beason v. State, 67 S. W. 96, 98, 43 Tex. Cr. R. 442.

Direct evidence is that which immediately points to the question at issue. Civ. Code Ga. 1895, § 5143; Pen. Code Ga. 1895, § 983.

Direct evidence is that which proves the fact in dispute directly, without an inference or presumption, and which in itself, if true, conclusively establishes that fact; for example, if the fact in dispute be an agreement, the evidence of a witness who was present and witnessed the making of it is direct. Code Civ. Proc. Cal. 1903, § 1831; Ann. Codes & St. Or. 1901, § 684. Thus where, on a trial for murder, the identity of the person alleged to have been guilty was proved by the direct evidence of an accomplice, corroborated by circumstantial evidence. The death of a human being was proved by the identification of certain teeth and charred bones found in a river near the point where the body was burned, and there was circumstantial evidence to prove the identity of the deceased. The evidence was sufficient to satisfy the requirements of Pen. Code, § 358, that the death of a person alleged to have been killed must be established by direct proof as an independent fact. State v. Calder, 59 Pac. 903, 904, 23 Mont. 504.

1 Greenl. Ev. § 13, defines direct evidence as being given when the thing to be proved is directly attested by those who speak from their own actual and personal knowledge of its existence; circumstantial, when the thing to be proved is to be inferred from other facts satisfactorily proved. See, also, Wills, on Cir. Ev. c. 2, § 1. And in a case of homicide direct proof of death would have been testimony of a witness who knew the person killed in his lifetime, and who would testify that the body found was the body of such person. People v. Palmer, 11 N. Y. St. Rep. 817, 820.

Under the rule that a contract for testamentary compensation for work done by a father for a son, after his majority, can be proved only by direct and positive evidence, a charge that the evidence must be clear and satisfactory is erroneous; the words not being synonymous. Bash v. Bash, 9 Pa. (9 Barr) 260, 262.

DIRECT EXAMINATION.

The examination of a witness by the party producing him is denominated the "direct examination"; the examination of the same witness upon the same matter by the adverse party, the cross-examination. The direct examination must be completed before the cross-examination begins, unless the court otherwise direct. Ann. Codes & St. Or. 1901, § 846.

DIRECT INJURY.

The phrases "direct injury" and "consequential injury" are not of the same meaning as "direct damages" and "consequential damages." The latter phrases are of the terminology of damages and the measure of damages, while the former are not, but are of the terminology of injuries. To illustrate, a direct injury may, in addition to direct damages, do indirect, or, as it is often more loosely phrased, consequential, damages; and the latter are recoverable as well as the former, unless they be not "proximate," but "remote," to use two other words which belong to the terminology of damages. In the case of a direct injury the measure of damages includes both direct and indirect or consequential damages, but in the case of consequential injuries, there are no recoverable damages at all. Consequential damages can only result from a direct injury, while no actionable damages of any kind result from a consequential injury. Sadler v. City of New York, 81 N. Y. Supp. 308, 312, 40 Misc. Rep. 78.

DIRECT INTEREST.

A direct interest, as relating to the competency of a witness in a suit against an executor, is the opposite of an indirect interest, and excludes the idea of contingency. A direct interest is defined in Winfield, Words & Phrases, p. 195, as "one which is certain, and not contingent or doubtful." In Black's Law Dictionary it is defined: "A direct interest, such as would render the interested party incompetent to testify in regard to the matter, is an interest which is certain, and not contingent or doubtful." In re Van Alstine's Estate, 72 Pac. 942, 943, 26 Utah, 193.

DIRECT LINE.

See "By Direct Line."

The direct line is divided into a direct line descending and a direct line ascending. The first is that which connects the ancestor with those who descend from him. The second is that which connects a person with those from whom he descends. Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 3748.

DIRECT LOSS.

In an insurance policy, providing that the insurer would be liable if the falling of the insured building was caused by a direct loss or damage by fire, the word "direct" means merely immediate or approximate, as distinguished from remote; and where a building fell because a portion of the building was burned and fell, thereby causing the partition wall to fall, the loss was direct. Ermentrout v. Girard Fire & Marine Ins. Co., 65 N. W. 635, 636, 63 Minn. 305, 30 L. R. A. 348, 56 Am. St. Rep. 481.

"Direct loss or damage by fire," as used in a fire policy against direct loss or damage by fire, applies to all losses of which fire is the immediate cause. California Ins. Co. v. Union Compress Co., 10 Sup. Ct. 365, 133 U. S. 387, 33 L. Ed. 730.

In a policy of insurance, direct loss or damage by fire meant the loss or damage occurring directly from the fire as the destroying agency, in contradistinction to the remoteness of fire as such agency. Remoteness of agency is the explosion of gunpowder, gases, or chemicals caused by fire; explosion of steam boilers; the destruction of buildings to prevent the spread of fire; or their destruction through the falling of burning walls, etc. California Ins. Co. v. Union Compress Co., 10 Sup. Ct. 365, 372, 133 U. S. 387, 33 L. Ed. 730.

DIRECT PAYMENT.

The term "direct," as defined by Webster, means "immediate, express, unambiguous, confessed, absolute." The word "direct," in the English language, is one of wide acceptance, and has been adopted into the law in many relations. Thus, we have "direct descent," "direct taxes," "direct interest," "direct route," and "direct payment"; and as used in the latter term it means one which is absolute and unconditional as to time, amount, and the persons by whom and to whom it is to be made. People v. Boylan (U. S.) 25 Fed. 594, 595.

The phrase "direct payment of money," as used in Code, § 92, which provides that in all actions brought on overdue promissory notes, bills of exchange, or other written instruments for the direct payment of money, and upon book accounts, the creditor may have a right of attachment entered, means such instruments as provide for the immediate payment of money, such as overdue bills of exchange and promissory notes. Hurd v. McClellan, 23 Pac. 792, 793, 14 Colo. 213.

DIRECT RESULT.

By direct result, as relating to the cause of an injury, is meant the first result or effect. Story v. Chicago, M. & St. P. Ry. Co., 44 N. W. 690, 692, 79 Iowa, 402.

In an instruction, in an action for personal injuries, that the jury should assess such damages as were the direct result of defendant's negligence, "direct" is synonymous with "natural" and "proximate." Lovett v. City of Chicago, 35 Ill. App. 570, 571.

"Direct result," as used in the statement that the diseased mental condition of accused in a prosecution for murder was the direct and immediate result of voluntary drunkenness, means that such mental condition arose during a condition of drunkenness, and pending a single, continuous, voluntary, drunken debauch, which at its origin started with the accused in a condition of sanity. State v. Haab, 29 South. 725, 728, 105 La. 230.

DIRECT ROUTE.

Code, § 3788, provides that a sheriff shall be entitled to mileage for conveying convicts to the penitentiary at the rate of 16 cents for each mile traveled from the county seat to the penitentiary by the most direct route of travel. Held, that the term "most direct route of travel," as so used, meant the route which was most generally used in journeying between the two places. Thus, where the route most generally used was a railway, which was much longer than an old wagon road, which was but seldom used, and then only by private conveyances, the sheriff was entitled to convey his prisoners by the railroad, and was entitled to compensation computed by that route, instead of by the shorter wagon road. Maynard v. Cedar County, 1 N. W. 701, 702, 51 Iowa, 430.

DIRECT TAX.

A direct tax, within Const. art. 1, § 8, providing that no capitation or other direct tax shall be levied, unless in proportion to the census of the inhabitants of the United States, means a capitation or poll tax simply, without regard to property, profession, or any other circumstance, and a tax on land. Hylton v. United States, 3 U. S. (3 Dall.) 171, 174, 1 L. Ed. 556; Pacific Ins. Co. v. Soule, 74 U. S. (7 Wall.) 433, 445, 19 L. Ed. 95; Scholey v. Rew, 90 U. S. (23 Wall.) 331, 347, 23 L. Ed. 99; Springer v. United States, 102 U. S. 586, 602, 26 L. Ed. 253. The tax imposed by Act Cong. July 13, 1866, on notes of state banks, is therefore not a direct tax. Veazie Bank v. Fenno, 75 U. S. (8 Wall.) 533, 542, 19 L. Ed. 482.

Historical evidence shows that personal property, contracts, occupations, and the like have never been regarded as the subjects of direct taxation. The phrase is understood to be limited to taxes on land and its appurtenances, and on polls. Veazie Bank v. Fenno, 75 U. S. (8 Wall.) 533, 541, 19 L. Ed. 482.

A direct tax is a tax demanded from the very person who it is intended or desired should pay it. A tax assessed as a direct tax in this sense may nevertheless fall ultimately upon one other than the one desired to pay it. It is generally agreed that the greater part of a tax assessed against the landlord falls finally upon his tenant. So a tax upon mortgages upon land in the end proves to be a tax upon the borrower. In neither of these cases was it intended or desired that the burden of the tax should fall upon either the renter or borrower. Yet, though it may happen that the renter and borrower have in other forms fully paid their due proportion of tax, the unintended duplication of their burden will not make the tax which they have been indirectly compelled to pay double taxation. South Nashville St. R. Co. v. Morrow, 11 S. W. 348, 850, 87 Tenn. (3 Pickle) 406, 2 L. R. A. 853.

A tax upon rents and income of real estate is equivalent to a tax on the real estate itself, and is therefore a direct tax, within the constitutional prohibition. Pollock v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co., 15 Sup. Ct. 673, 889, 157 U. S. 429, 39 L. Ed. 759. Likewise a tax on personal property or the income thereof. Pollock v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co., 15 Sup. Ct. 912, 916, 158 U. S. 601, 39 L. Ed. 1108.

A tax on real estate is a direct tax on real property. People v. Knight, 67 N. E. 65, 66, 174 N. Y. 475, 63 L. R. A. 87.

DIRECT TESTIMONY.

The term "direct testimony," or "positive testimony," is used to designate the testimony of those who speak of their own actual and personal knowledge of the fact in controversy. The proof in such case rests upon faith in the veracity, impartiality, opportunity for observation, accuracy of memory, etc., of the witnesses. The proof applies immediately to the factum probandum, without any intervening process. State v. Miller (Del.) 32 Atl. 137, 141, 9 Houst. 564.

DIRECT TRUST.

A direct or express trust is one springing from the agreement of the parties, created by words, either expressly or impliedly evincing the intention to create a trust. It is distinguished from a constructive or implied trust, which is a trust created by equity law; a trust not created by any words either expressly or impliedly evincing a direct intention to create a trust, but by the construction of equity in order to satisfy the demands of justice. Currence v. Ward, 27 S. E. 329, 330, 43 W. Va. 367.

DIRECTION.

See "Express Direction"; "Under the Direction of."

In a plea alleging that plaintiff had the "direction, care, and management" of a ship, which defendant was charged with having neglected to load according to contract, was construed to mean the actual direction, care, and management, and not merely the legal direction, care, and management. It is equivalent to a charge of actual bad direction, care, and management, which included such conduct on the part of the master and crew. Taylor v. Clay, 9 Q. B. 713, 723.

The word "direction," as used in a contract by which a contractor agreed to build a sewer under the immediate direction and superintendence of the commissioner of public works, related to the results, and not to the methods to be employed, and did not, therefore, make the contractor a servant of the city, as being one who, though he is to have a stipulated price for a thing, executes it under the direction and superintendence of the employer. Foster v. City of Chicago, 64 N. E. 322, 323, 197 Ill. 264.

As approval.

In the acts of Congress granting lands to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, and providing for the selection of indemnity lands "under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior," the term does not mean subject to the approval of that officer. "Direction," says Mr. Webster, is an "order prescribed, either verbally or written; instructions in what manner to proceed. The employer gives directions to his workmen; the physician, to his patient." Lord Coleridge, defining the phrase "under the direction of," says: "Work is done by the direction of the board, who were represented by the surveyor. It is done in the manner in which they should prescribe, and is therefore done under their direction." Newton v. Ellis, 5 El. & Bl. 124. To make the selections "under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior" is to make them in accordance with the rules and regulations prescribed by him. Northern Pac. R. Co. v. Barnes, 51 N. W. 386, 403, 404, 2 N. D. 367.

As authority to control.

The word "direction," in the clause in Rev. Laws, § 819, providing that writs shall be issued by the clerks under the direction of the judges, is to be construed in the sense of authority to direct as circumstances may require only, and not as requiring "direction" in order to confer authority on the clerk to act. In re Durant, 12 Atl. 650, 652, 60 Vt. 176.

"Direction," as used in Rev. St. §§ 441, 453, 2478 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, pp. 252, 257, 1586], providing that the Commissioner of the General Land Office is to perform, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, all executive duties, etc., is intended as an expression in general terms of the power of the Secretary to supervise and control the operations of the Land Department, of which he is the head. It means that in important matters, relating to the sale and disposition of the public domain, the surveying of private claims, and the issuing of patents thereon, and the administration of the trust devolving upon the government by reason of the laws of Congress or under treaty stipulations, the Secretary of the Interior is the supervising agent of the government, to do justice to all claimants and preserve the rights of the people of the United States. Warner Valley Stock Co. v. Smith, 17 Sup. Ct. 225, 227, 165 U. S. 28, 41 L. Ed. 621 (citing Knight v. United Land Ass'n, 142 U. S. 161, 12 Sup. Ct. 258, 35 L. Ed. 974; Orchard v. Alexander, 157 U. S. 372, 15 Sup. Ct. 635, 39 L. Ed. 737).

Where defendant contracted with a local board of health to dig wells for them according to a specification prepared by the surveyor, the works to be done to the satisfaction of such surveyor, the digging to be under his direction, and he to have power of making the contractor remove materials and power to dismiss workmen, defendant was "a person acting under the direction of the board of health" within St. 11 & 12 Vict. c. 63, § 139, providing that no process should be sued out against any person acting under the direction of the board of health until one month after notice had been delivered to him. Newton v. Ellis, 5 El. & Bl. 115, 123.

As general instructions.

Several actions for a nuisance occasioned by the defendant's dam were referred under a rule of court, accompanied with an agreement that the referees might decide how much the dam should be cut down, and that the same should be done "under their direction." Held, that the phrase "under their direction" meant that they should give general instructions as to the manner of cutting down the dam. Berkshire Woollen Co. v. Day, 66 Mass. (12 Cush.) 128, 130.

As guardianship.

A devise providing that the executors shall have control and direction over a son meant that they should have the power of guardianship over the son. Rock River Paper Co. v. Fisk, 10 N. W. 344, 346, 47 Mich. 212.

DIRECTLY.

Under Comp. St. c. 18, § 146, providing that every unorganized county shall be attached to the nearest organized county directly east for election, judicial, and revenue purposes, where about one-half of the eastern boundary of an unorganized county was an organized county of the state and the remainder of such eastern boundary was another state, the whole of such unorganized county was attached to such organized county, and not merely the portion thereof which was directly west of the organized county. State v. Van Camp, 54 N. W. 113, 116, 36 Neb. 13.

A contract for the sale of a lumber business, which provides that the seller shall not "engage in the lumber business, directly or indirectly," at the town where the business sold is situated, means not only engaging in the business on his own behalf, but engaging in the service of a rival dealer, for the purpose of soliciting and making sales. Nelson v. Johnson, 36 N. W. 868, 38 Minn. 255.

"Directly," as used in a statute relating to the obtaining of a settlement by a pauper coming directly from some foreign port of place into the state, means coming from some port or place out of the United States, without passing through either of the sister states into the state. Stillwater Tp. v. Green Tp., 9 N. J. Law (4 Halst.) 59, 63 (citing Overseers of Chatham v. Overseers of Middlefield [N. Y.] 19 Johns. 56).

As a direct course.

Within instructions to British cruisers to seize all ships laden with goods from Spanish ports, and going directly from them to any port in Europe, does not mean going in a direct course, which would be an absurd construction. Then nothing would be necessary to evade the order but going out of the direct course. The meaning is "going in a direct voyage." A voyage may be direct, and the course indirect. Whether the voyage is direct is a matter of fact, to be determined from the exigencies of the case. The British courts have held that the directness of the voyage from the Spanish colony to the mother country is broken by a bona fide importation into the United States, and there is no instance of any importation being bona fide without landing the goods. Kohne v. Insurance Co. of North America (Pa.) 6 Bin. 219, 225.

As immediately.

Act April 8, 1801 (1 K. & R. Laws, p. 566; Laws 24th Sess. c. 184) § 2, declares that all mariners coming into the state, and having no settlement in the state or in any of the United States, and every other person coming directly from some foreign port or place into the state, shall be deemed to be legally settled in the city or town in which they shall have first resided for the space of one year. Held, that the word "directly" means coming from some port or place out of the United States, without passing through either of the sister states. Overseers of Chatham v. Overseers of Middlefield (N. Y.) 19 Johns. 56, 57.

Act 1774, providing that a healthy person coming directly from Europe into the state should be legally settled in the township in which he should first settle and reside for one year, cannot be construed to apply to a pauper who came to New Jersey from the state of New York nearly two months after he landed from Europe. It would be a perversion of language and a denial of any signification or force to the word to say that he came directly from Europe. Stillwater Tp. v. Green Tp., 9 N. J. Law (4 Halst.) 59, 63.

An instruction, in an action for death, that unless the death was caused directly by the acts of the defendant he could not be held liable, meant that unless the death was proximately caused, etc. McLean v. Burbank, 11 Minn. 277, 290 (Gil. 189, 199).

"Directly," as used in the Washington water tunnel act (22 Stat. 168), providing for compensation to persons directly injured in any property rights, must be understood in its colloquial sense, and means proximate and actual. Lyons v. United States (U. S.) 28 Ct. Cl. 31, 42.

Within an instruction that plaintiff's contributory negligence only could relieve the liability of defendant, and must have directly contributed to his injury, "directly" means approximately, which is the technical and more accurate word used by text writers, and in the opinion of courts generally, where the effect of plaintiff's contributory negligence is scientifically discussed; but in this connection the two words are synonymous. Davis v. Spicer, 27 Mo. App. 279; Missouri, K. & T. Ry. Co. v. Lyons (Tex.) 53 S. W. 96, 97; Gates v. Burlington, C. R. & M. R. Co., 39 Iowa, 45, 46.

As in a straight line.

The word "directly" is derived from the Latin "directus," straight, past participle of "dirigere," to set in a straight line. The primary idea is of space—in a straight line, rectilinearly, undeviating, etc. All the secondary meanings are analogous to the idea of straightness in space. The following are the primary definitions of the leading authorities. Cent. Dict.: "In a straight line or course, literally or figuratively; in a direct manner; rectilinearly." Bouv. Law Dict.: "Straightforward." Anderson, Law Dict.: "Straight; not circuitous; immediate; the first or original." An entrance to a barroom, requiring a circuitous or crooked route of travel from the highway to the barroom, is an entrance other than directly from the public traveled way. State v. Conley, 48 Atl. 200, 201, 22 R. I. 397.

Reasonable time, or as soon as possible.

In Duncan v. Topham, 8 C. B. 225, the proof showed that a contract provided that goods were to be shipped directly, and the court held that within a reasonable time was a much more protracted period than was meant by the word "directly." Metropolitan Land Co. v. Manning, 71 S. W. 696, 699, 98 Mo. App. 248; Lewis v. Hojer, 16 N. Y. Supp. 534, 536; Sentenne v. Kelly, 13 N. Y. Supp. 529, 530, 59 Hun, 512. There is also a distinction between "directly" and "as soon as possible." Sentenne v. Kelly, 13 N. Y. Supp. 529, 530, 59 Hun, 512.

DIRECTLY INTERESTED.

A juror, on being examined as to his qualifications, stated that he had formed an opinion as to the merits of the case from facts which he had heard from the parties directly interested in the case. Held, that this answer could not be considered to justify the court in holding that the juror's opinion was based on public rumor or common notoriety; that it might be conceded that the words "directly interested" are somewhat vague and indefinite, and did not necessarily refer to parties who were competent witnesses to the facts; but the words must be construed to import persons having better opportunities to know and state the facts of the case than mere repeaters of public rumor. People v. Wells, 34 Pac. 718, 719, 100 Cal. 227.

DIRECTLY TEND.

Where, on the trial of a prosecution for murder, the court, in instructing a jury, assumed to distinguish between the occurrences happening after the killing which did, and those which did not, directly tend to prove premeditation, the phrase "directly tend" had no different meaning than "tending." State v. Anderson, 10 Or. 448, 461.

DIRECTOR.

See "Bank Director"; "De Facto Director"; "De Jure Director."
All directors, see "All."

Directors are persons appointed or elected according to law, authorized to manage and direct the affairs of a corporation or company. Brandt v. Godwin, 3 N. Y. Supp. 807, 809.

A director is defined by Webster to be one who or that which directs, especially one of a body of persons who manages the affairs of a corporation. Thus, where the Grand Foreman of a fraternal order was by the constitution of the order to assist the Grand Master Workman, and in his absence preside over the lodge, he was a director of it, within the code provisions providing for service of summons on a director or other official of the corporation. Balmford v. Grand Lodge A. O. U. W., 37 N. Y. Supp. 645, 646, 16 Misc. Rep. 4.

The term "director," as used in the chapter relating to crimes against property, embraces any of the persons who have by law the direction or management of the affairs of a corporation, by whatever name such persons are described in its charter or known by law. Pen. Code Idaho 1901, § 5023; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 7536; Pen. Code S. D. 1903, § 691; Pen. Code Cal. 1903, § 572.

The term "director," as used in the chapter of the Penal Code relating to fraudulent insolvencies by corporations and other frauds in their management, includes any of the persons having by law the direction or management of the affairs of a corporation, by whatever name described. Pen. Code N. Y. 1903, § 614.

The term "directors," as used in the chapter relating to home, life and accident insurance companies, includes the persons duly appointed or designated to manage the affairs of the company. Rev. St. Tex. 1895, art. 3096a.

The word "directors," used in the article relating to general provisions concerning corporations, includes managers and trustees. Ky. St. 1903, § 575.

"Directors," as used in 1 Rev. St. p. 590, § 1, subd. 9, prohibiting the directors of a moneyed corporation from making loan or discounts to the "directors" of a corporation, or on paper on which they or any of them are responsible to an amount exceeding in the aggregate one-third of the capital stock of the company, means the corporation itself, or the board or body exercising the corporate franchises, by whom or under whose direction or authority alone these violations of the statute could occur. Bank Com'rs v. Bank of Buffalo (N. Y.) 6 Paige, 497, 502.

Directors are usually but consulting creditors. They are but occasionally at the place of business of a company, and it would produce endless confusion if we were to hold that a verbal notice, communicated to a director, not at the place of business of the company, but at his house or upon the street, or wherever he might happen to be at the time, is binding upon the company. Bard v. Pennsylvania Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 153 Pa. 257, 262, 25 Atl. 1124, 34 Am. St. Rep. 704.

The directors of a corporation are its chosen representatives, and constitute the corporation to all purposes in dealing with others. What they do to further the purposes of the corporation, the corporation does. If they do an injury to another, though it necessarily involves in its commission a malicious intent, the corporation must be deemed by imputation to be guilty of the wrong and answerable as an individual in such case. Maynard v. Firemen's Fund Ins. Co., 34 Cal. 48, 91 Am. Dec. 672.

As an agent or trustee.

Directors of a corporation are to be considered as agents or mandataries of the stockholders, and as such undertake the management of its affairs according to the rules prescribed by their charter and the by-laws made in pursuance thereof. Campbell v. Watson, 50 Atl. 120, 132, 62 N. J. Eq. 396.

A director of a corporation is a trustee for the entire body of stockholders, and both good morals and common law imperatively demand that he shall manage all the business affairs of the company, with a view to promote, not his own interests, but the common interests, and by assuming the office he undertakes to give his best judgment in the interests of the corporation in all matters in which he acts for it, untrammelled by any hostile interest in himself or others. Bird Coal & Iron Co. v. Humes, 27 Atl. 750, 752, 157 Pa. 278, 37 Am. St. Rep. 727.

The directors of a corporation are the mere agents of the stockholders. They are trustees and representatives charged with the exercise of all the powers of a corporation which do not involve fundamental changes in the purpose of its incorporators or in the relation of the stockholders. Louis- ville Trust Co. v. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. (U. S.) 75 Fed. 433, 449, 22 C. C. A. 378.

Under Burns' Rev. St. 1894, §§ 2922-2925, 2927, 2929, 2934, defining the powers and duties of the directors of a bank, directors are agents of the corporation, having general custody, control, and management of its property and affairs, and as such are liable for losses and waste of money and property through their gross inattention to the business of the bank, or their willful violation of their duties. This general supervision over the business and property of the bank should enable them to know the financial condition of the bank at all times, the character of the men employed, and the correctness of the accounts. They are the agents of the corporation, and as such are liable to account for all property which has been intrusted to their control or management. They are liable for losses or waste occurring through gross negligence or inattention to business, though not for mere errors of judgment. The borrowing of money and executing of worthless paper for the same, the transfer of bills receivable to preferred creditors, etc., by the president of a bank, and the fact that he was permitted to do so, constitutes such negligence and carelessness on the part of the directors of the bank as will render them liable for all such losses to the bank. Coddington v. Canaday, 61 N. E. 567, 572, 157 Ind. 243.

The directors of an incorporated company are not technically trustees. They are the agents of the company, and, so far as the doctrines in reference to trusts are applicable to the relations of principal and agent, the same will be enforced against the directors in favor of the corporation. Charleston Ins. & Trust Co. v. Sebring (S. C.) 5 Rich. Eq. 342, 345.

Directors of a corporation, such as a bank, are not express trustees. In this connection the court says: "The language of Special Judge Ingersoll, in Shea v. Mabry, 69 Tenn. (1 Lea) 319, that 'directors are trustees,' etc., is rhetorically sound, but technically inexact. It is a statement often found in opinions, but is true only to a limited extent. They are mandataries. They are agents. They are trustees, in the sense that every agent is a trustee for his principal, and bound to exercise diligence and good faith. They do not hold the legal title, and more often than otherwise are not the officers of the corporation having possession of the corporate property. They are equally interested with those they represent. They more nearly represent the managing partners in a business firm than a technical trustee. At most they are implied trustees, in whose favor the statutes of limitation do run." Wallace v. Lincoln Sav. Bank, 15 S. W. 448, 453, 89 Tenn. (5 Pickle) 630, 24 Am. St. Rep. 625.

The directors of a bank of discount and deposit, incorporated under the statute, are not, at least in a technical sense, trustees, and it is said that they cannot be held to a very high degree of diligence in their management of the financial affairs of the bank. They usually serve without pay, and the general conduct of the business of the bank is necessarily intrusted to a large extent to the executive officers of the bank; but at the same time the directors are in a very emphatic sense officers of the corporation, and have large powers, which they can neither evade nor delegate. Coddington v. Canaday, 61 N. E. 567, 572, 157 Ind. 243.

Directors of a corporation are fiduciaries, and subject to the rule that persons standing in such relation will not be suffered to retain a personal profit out of transactions respecting the subject-matter of the trust, but will be compelled to account to their cestuis que trust therefor. Forker v. Brown, 30 N. Y. Supp. 827, 829, 10 Misc. Rep. 161.

A director of a stock corporation occupies one of those fiduciary relations where his dealings with the subject-matter of his trust or agency and with the beneficiary or party whose interest is confided to his care are regarded with jealousy by the courts. He must deal with the interest confided to his care with conscientious fairness, and will not be permitted to secure advantages by virtue of his position prejudicial to the interests he represents. The relative duties and obligations of managers and officers of a corporation to it and to its stockholders have been likened to those of trustee and cestuis que trust. Glenwood Mfg. Co. v. Syme, 85 N. W. 432, 434, 109 Wis. 355.

As executive officers.

See "Executive Officer."

As officers of corporation.

See "Officer (Of Corporations)."

DIRECTORY STATUTE.

The distinction between directory statute and imperative statute is that a clause is directory when the provisions contain mere matters of deduction and nothing more, but not so when they are followed by such words as are used here, "that anything done contrary to such provision shall be null and void to all intents"; these words giving direct, positive, and absolute prohibition. A statute directing the mode of proceeding by public officers is to be deemed directory, and a precise compliance is not to be deemed essential to the validity of the proceedings, unless so declared by statute. Nelms v. Vaughan, 5 S. E. 704, 706, 84 Va. 696 (citing Pearse v. Morrice, 2 Adol. & E. 94). A statute authorizing the majority of judges in any county to request the Governor to direct a judge of a superior court in any other county to hold a session of the superior court in the county mentioned is directory merely, and not imperative. State v. Holmes, 40 Pac. 735, 737, 12 Wash. 169.

A clause of a statute is directory when the provision contains mere matter of direction and no more, but not so when it is followed by words of positive prohibition. Prohibitory words can rarely, if ever, be directory. There is but one way to obey the command, "Thou shalt not," which is to abstain altogether from doing the act forbidden. Rev. St. arts. 1694, 1697, directing judges of election to write the voter's poll list number on the ballot, and forbidding the counting of an unnumbered ballot, is mandatory. State v. Conner, 23 S. W. 1103, 1107, 86 Tex. 133.

Statutes may be directory or imperative. The former prescribe privileges, and the latter impose duties. The former leave room for the exercise of a choice or discretion, while the latter are absolute and peremptory. Payne v. Fresco (Pa.) 4 Kulp, 25, 26.

"It would not be, perhaps, easy to lay down any general rule as to when the provisions of a statute are merely directory, and when mandatory or imperative. Where the words are affirmative, and relate to the manner in which power or jurisdiction vested in a public officer or body is to be exercised, and not to the limits of the power or jurisdiction itself, they may be, and often have been, construed to be directory; and negative words, which go to the power or jurisdiction itself, have never been brought within that category. "A clause is directory," says Taunton, J., "when the provisions contain mere matter of direction and no more, but not so when they are followed by words of positive prohibition; and hence where a statute provides that no debt should be binding on a certain city, unless authorized by law or ordinance and an appropriation therein previously made by the council, it was not directory, but mandatory." Bladen v. City of Philadelphia, 60 Pa. (10 P. F. Smith) 464, 466.

DIRECTORY TRUST.

A directory trust arises when by the terms of the trust the fund is directed to be invested in a particular manner until the period arrives at which it is to be appropriated. In such cases, if the fund be not invested, or invested in a different manner from that pointed out, it is an abuse of trust, for which the trustees are responsible, though but one receives the money, because both are bound to attend to the directions of the trust, and must be careful to execute it faithfully according to its terms and the intention of the person by whom it was created. Dederick v. Cantrell, 18 Tenn. (10 Yerg.) 263, 272, 31 Am. Dec. 576.

DISABILITY.

See "Civil Disabilities"; "Legal Disability"; "Physical Disability."
Other disability, see "Other."

The words "under disability" include married women, except as otherwise provided by law, persons under the age of 21 years, insane persons, and convicts while confined in the penitentiary. Code W. Va. 1899, p. 133, c. 13, § 17.

Disability, within the statute of limitations, necessarily presupposes an existing right, which has been disabled. In order for a right to be disabled, it must have accrued. Valle v. Obenhause, 62 Mo. 81, 89.

"Disability," as used in the statute of limitations, is the want of legal capacity to do a thing. The disability may relate to the power to contract or to bring suit, and may arise out of want of sufficient understanding, as idiocy, lunacy, infancy, or want of freedom of will, as in the case of married women and persons under duress, or out of the policy of the law, as alienage, when the alien is an outlaw, and the like. The disability is something pertaining to the person of the party, a personal incapacity, and not to the cause of action or his relation to it. There must be a present right of action in the person, but some want of capacity to sue. Berkin v. Marsh, 44 Pac. 528, 530, 18 Mont. 152, 56 Am. St. Rep. 565.

Death.

An accident insurance policy provided for a weekly indemnity not exceeding 52 weeks for total "disability." Insured died within 24 hours after an accident. Held, that his personal representative was not entitled to recover indemnity for the balance of the period, as death cannot be said to be disability. Rosenberry v. Fidelity & Casualty Co., 43 N. E. 317, 318, 14 Ind. App. 625.

A weekly indemnity insurance policy agreed to indemnify the insured against physical injury, resulting in disability, caused by external or accidental means, and against loss of time at a certain sum per week, for not more than a certain number of weeks, and provided that the death of the insured should immediately terminate all liability under the policy. There was no provision in express terms as to the death of the insured and providing a payment therefor. An identification card given insured provided that notice in accordance with the policy must be given of accidental death or injury. Held, that the death of the insured, caused by accidental means, was not a disability within the policy. Burnett v. Railway Officials' & Employés' Acc. Ass'n, 64 S. W. 18, 19, 107 Tenn. 185 (citing Hall v. American Employers' Liability Ins. Co., 23 S. E. 310, 96 Ga. 413, where it is said death evidently is not the kind of disability to which the policy refers). See, also, Rosenberry v. Fidelity & Casualty Co., 43 N. E. 317, 318, 14 Ind. App. 625; Brown v. United States Casualty Co. (U. S.) 95 Fed. 935, 937.

As physically disabled.

A "disability," as the term is used in an accident or life insurance policy, is a deprivation of ability; the state of being disabled or incapacitated. Any bodily infirmity by which a person is incapacitated from pursuing his usual vocation is a disability, within the policy. Miller v. American Mut. Acc. Ins. Co., 21 S. W. 39, 40, 92 Tenn. (8 Pickle) 167, 20 L. R. A. 765.

"Disability of any kind," as used in an accident certificate, reciting that such certificate would not entitle the holder or any person in interest to indemnity for disability of any kind, unless the disability accrued within 30 days from the date of the accident causing such disability, etc., meant personal hurts, to wit, the loss of a hand or foot, or both hands or both feet, or a hand and foot, or both eyes. Such words do not refer to the incapacity for business specified as one of the losses insured against. Odd Fellows Fraternal Acc. Ass'n v. Earl (U. S.) 70 Fed. 16, 20, 16 C. C. A. 596.

The constitution of a mutual benefit society provided that "disability" benefits should accrue to a member in case he should suffer a disability rendering him unable to perform his usual kind of business or labor. Held, that a switchman on a railroad, by the loss of the fingers of one hand, was disabled within the meaning of the constitution. Hutchinson v. Supreme Tent of Knights of Maccabees of the World, 22 N. Y. Supp. 801, 68 Hun, 355.

"Disability," as used in an accident insurance policy, is defined to be a deprivation of ability; state of being disabled; incapacity. Thus a person who loses a leg or arm or eye, or is otherwise disabled, whether temporarily or permanently, by external and violent means, is one suffering from an imperfection, and is to that extent disabled by a bodily infirmity. Miller v. American Mut. Acc. Ins. Co., 21 S. W. 39, 40, 92 Tenn. (8 Pickle) 167, 20 L. R. A. 765.

Impossibility distinguished.

There is a marked distinction between a disability or inability of a party to perform a contract and the absolute and inherent impossibility of performance in the true sense. To excuse performance of a contract on the ground of impossibility of performance, the impossibility must be more than merely a great inconvenience or hardship, or mere impracticability. Reid v. Alaska Packing Co., 73 Pac. 337, 339, 43 Or. 429.

Failure to elect.

In Const. art. 5, § 16, providing that in case of a death, impeachment and notice thereof to the accused, failure to qualify, resignation, absence from the state or "other disability" of the Governor, the powers, duties, and emoluments of the office for the residue of the term or until the disability shall be removed shall devolve upon the Lieutenant Governor, "disability" does not mean the ineligibility of the person to be elected to the office, but means any disability of the Governor, not specifically enumerated, occurring after the commencement of his term of office. Failure to elect a Governor, on account of the ineligibility of the person receiving the highest number of votes for the office, is not a disability of the Governor, so that the Lieutenant Governor could take the office. State v. Boyd, 48 N. W. 739, 753, 31 Neb. 682.

In the Constitution, providing that, on disability of the Governor, the President of the Senate shall act as Governor, "disability" means something attaching to the person of the Governor and disabling him; and the nonconsideration of the result of the election, so that no one has been appointed as a successor to the Governor, is not a disability of the Governor such as is meant by the Constitution. It is simply nonaction or incomplete action by the agencies assigned to vest the title in the candidate. It is not like insanity, conviction of the officer for crime, continued absence, or other disability connected with the person of the Governor. Carr v. Wilson, 9 S. E. 31, 33, 32 W. Va. 429, 3 L. R. A. 64.

Insolvency.

Within a contract authorizing certain parties to take immediate possession of cattle, if others were prevented by disability from carrying on the business, insolvency of such parties is a disability. Montgomery v. McGuire, 25 Ill. App. 31, 38.

Refusal to act.

Disability implies want of power, and not want of inclination. It refers to incapacity, and not to disinclination. It is founded on want of authority, arising out of some circumstances or other, notwithstanding the amount or degree of willingness or disposition to act. It is so used in 3 Rev. St. p. 475 (5th Ed.) § 29, authorizing a special proceeding to be continued before another officer in case of death, sickness, etc., or other disability of the one before whom it was commenced; and hence the mere refusal of such latter officer to act does not authorize another officer to act in his place. People v. Ulster County Sup'rs (N. Y.) 32 Barb. 473, 480.

Resignation.

Acts 1849, p. 206, provides that, in case of death or disability of one or more of the transportation commissioners provided for by that act, it should be lawful to supply the place so vacated. Held, that the word "disability," as there used, was sufficiently extensive to cover, and was designed to cover, any cause which prevented the commissioners from acting, and thus the resignation of one of the commissioners was necessarily a disability authorizing an appointment of his successor, since no power could compel him to continue to act if he thought proper to decline; the right of resigning an office or employment being universally recognized. State v. City of Newark, 27 N. J. Law (3 Dutch.) 185, 197.

DISABLE.

See "Wholly Disabled."
Otherwise disabled, see "Otherwise."

Under a statute (Act Va. Dec. 17, 1792) making it a felony to disable any limb or member of any person, with intent to disfigure, etc., it was held that an ear could not be disabled, within the meaning of the statute, and hence that the biting off of an ear was not within the statute. United States v. Askins (U. S.) 24 Fed. Cas. 875.

Mental distress.

Const. art. 5, § 13, Rev. Civ. St. art. 3101, providing that where, pending a trial, any number of jurors not exceeding three shall die or be "disabled from sitting," the remainder of the jury shall have power to render a verdict, cannot be construed to include mere distress of mind, caused by information of sickness in the juror's family calling for his presence at home. If a juror became sick, so as to be unable to sit longer, he is plainly disabled from sitting, and if, by reason of some casualty or otherwise, physically prostrated, so as to be wholly incapable of sitting as a juror, or losing his mental powers, so as to become insane or idiotic, he is disabled. Houston & T. C. Ry. Co. v. Waller, 56 Tex. 331, 338.

Permanent injury.

Aik. Dig. 102, declares that if any person or persons, on purpose and of malice aforethought, shall unlawfully cut off the ear or ears, or cut off or disable the tongue, put out an eye, etc., while fighting or otherwise, etc., such person shall be deemed guilty of mayhem. Held, that the word "disable," as used in such statute, meant a permanent injury, and did not include merely a temporary "disabling" of a finger, arm, or eye. State v. Briley (Ala.) 8 Port. 472, 474.

In an indorsement on the back of a certificate of membership in an accident insurance association, reciting that, if the member should sustain bodily injuries by means as provided in such certificate, the payment of weekly relief, whether "totally or partially disabling," for the number of days fixed in the schedule on the back of the certificate, should be in full satisfaction of all claims for such injuries, "disabling" relates to the same kind of total disablement provided for in the certificate; that is, permanent injuries, which are either totally or partially of that character. Hollobaugh v. People's Ins. Ass'n, 22 Atl. 29, 30, 138 Pa. 595.

DISABLED FROM HOLDING OFFICE.

Within the provision that, by the making of a contract letting out the duties of an office, the parties shall be thereby disabled from holding said office, the language, "shall thereby be disabled from holding said office," was construed, in the case of Dryden v. Swinburne, 20 W. Va. 89, to mean that they should be disabled only from holding the particular term of the office in respect to which the illegal contract was made. White v. Cook, 41 S. E. 410, 415, 51 W. Va. 201, 57 L. R. A. 417, 90 Am. St. Rep. 775.

DISADVANTAGES.

Under Sess. Acts 1849, p. 219, authorizing an assessment of damages to land for the disadvantages or injuries resulting from the construction of a road, only such injuries which result to the landowner in respect to the residue of the tract unappropriated from the particular mode in which the part thereof is taken, or the use to which it is applied, are included. Pacific R. Co. v. Chrystal, 25 Mo. 544, 546.

DISAGREE—DISAGREEMENT.

"Disagree," as used in a statute providing that the Supreme Court might review the decision of the Court of Civil Appeals in cases where the judges disagree, means nothing more than a want of unanimity among the judges, which is usually evidenced by dissent; for the law contemplates that there shall have been a judgment rendered, by which the judgment of the trial court is reversed and the case remanded, and which could not occur if the disagreement contemplated was such that no two of the judges could agree upon a judgment. Darnell v. Lyon, 22 S. W. 304, 309, 85 Tex. 466.

In an agreement between a fire insurance company and an insurer that two persons should act as appraisers, together with a third, who should act as umpire in case of disagreement between such two appraisers, on matters of difference, "disagreement" means the forming or expressing to each other of different opinions concerning the matters submitted to the appraisers. If, after the appraisers had examined and conferred about the damage done, they had reached and expressed to each other different estimates of the amount, and thereafter one of the appraisers in bad faith endeavored to prevent further conference or to postpone such conference for some ulterior purpose, then the other appraiser, acting in good faith, would have a right to regard their difference as a final disagreement, and thereupon call in the umpire. Broadway Ins. Co. v. Doying, 27 Atl. 927, 928, 55 N. J. Law (26 Vroom) 569.

DISALLOW—DISALLOWANCE.

As rejected, see "Reject."

"Disallowed," in Rev. Code, p. 754, c. 99, § 24, providing that an appeal from judgments given by justices of the peace to the superior court may be allowed in case any part of the plaintiff's demand or of the defendant's counterclaim or set-off is disallowed by the justice, should be construed to include a case where the plaintiff has failed to prove any sum whatever. It is broad enough to include a case where the justice of the peace has arrived at the conclusion that the plaintiff has not proven anything at all, nor established and maintained his suit. Pepper v. Warren (Del.) 43 Atl. 91, 92, 2 Marv. 225.

Rev. St. c. 13, § 40, relating to proceedings after the disallowance of a claim against a county by its board, should be construed to include the adoption by the board of supervisors of the report of a committee advising the rejection of an account or claim for moneys paid at tax sales for tax certificates. Warner v. Outagamie County Sup'rs, 19 Wis. 611, 613.

DISBAND.

The words "disband" and "dissolve" are of similar import, and a vote taken to "disband" a school district is supported by notice of a meeting to be held for the purpose of voting on a proposition to dissolve the district. Briggs v. Borden, 38 N. W. 712, 714, 71 Mich. 87.

DISBARMENT PROCEEDING.

As civil action, see "Civil Action—Case—Suit—Etc."

As criminal case, see "Criminal Case or Cause."

As prosecution, see "Prosecution."

A disbarment proceeding is not simply for the purpose of punishing the offending attorney, but is to aid in securing a proper administration of the law. As was said by Mr. Justice Hooker in Re Shepard, 109 Mich.

631, 67 N. W. 971: "This is not a proceeding by way of punishment, though the deprivation of the privileges of an attorney may be a matter of serious importance to a practitioner. It is in a measure necessary to the protection of the public, who have a right to expect that courts will be vigilant in withholding, and, if already given, withdrawing, their certificates of qualification and character, upon which the public rely." In re Mains, 80 N. W. 714, 716, 121 Mich. 603.

A disbarment proceeding is not primarily in the interest of members of the legal profession, but in the interest of those who, desiring to have the services of an attorney, may be misled to their injury or defrauded in employing a disqualified or dishonest attorney by reason of the action of the state in admitting him to practice. Hyatt v. Hamilton County, 96 N. W. 855, 856, 121 Iowa, 292, 63 L. R. A. 614.

DISBURSEMENTS.

See "Legal Disbursements"; "Necessary Disbursements."

Receipts and disbursements, within the rule that executors are to receive compensation based upon receipts and disbursements, means receipts and disbursements having an actual, and not merely constructive, existence. Hill v. Nelson (N. Y.) 1 Dem. Sur. 357, 361.

Where a law requires surveyors to give bond for the faithful disbursement of public money, it is evident that it contemplates such surveyors as disbursing officers. Nevertheless, where the statute requires that bond be given both for the disbursement of money and also for the faithful discharge of the duties of the office, and in fact the bond is conditioned only on the latter, a serious question arises as to whether it was open to proof that the disbursement of money was known as one of the duties of the office and included in the general words. Farrar v. United States, 30 U. S. (5 Pet.) 373, 388, 8 L. Ed. 159.

As costs in actions.

Cost distinguished, see "Cost."

"Disbursements" is a term properly used to designate the costs which a party to an action has advanced. Dauntless Mfg. Co. v. Davis, 24 S. C. 536, 540.

Money paid by an attorney for costs which his client was adjudged to pay was a "disbursement" within 2 Geo. II, c. 23, providing that no attorney can commence an action until the expiration of one month after delivering to the parties to be charged a bill of his fees, charges and "disbursements," signed with his proper hand. Crowder v. Shee, 1 Camp. 437, 438.

As used in an agreement by which an attorney stipulated to give his legal services to the administrators until the estate was settled, and by which the administrators agreed that he should be repaid for any and all disbursements necessary on the settlement, the word "disbursements" was employed in its technical meaning, and was confined to such disbursements as were set forth in the Code. Hanover v. Reynolds (N. Y.) 4 Dem. Sur. 385, 386.

Disbursements by an attorney are expenditures or outlays of money which he is authorized by law to make, and which he does make, in the conduct of a cause. Durham Fertilizer Co. v. Glenn, 26 S. E. 796, 797, 48 S. C. 494.

Disbursements are the fees of officers and all other expenses necessarily incurred in the preparation for a trial and costs. Mitchell & Lewis Co. v. Downing, 32 Pac. 394, 395, 23 Or. 448.

"Disbursements," as used in an agreement with an attorney whereby he was to be paid a certain sum out of the proceeds recovered in the suit after the payment of all proper disbursements, is not confined within the narrow and technical meaning it has acquired in the offices of court clerks, as something distinct from costs, counsel fees, and allowances. De Chambrun v. Cox (U. S.) 60 Fed. 471, 479, 9 C. C. A. 86.

"Disbursements," as defined by Gen. St. 1894, c. 67, § 5500, are the expenses necessarily paid or incurred by the prevailing party, and are included in the term "costs," used in section 7314, providing that, on change of venue, the costs accruing from the change shall be paid by the county in which the offense was committed. Hennepin County Com'rs v. Wright County Com'rs, 87 N. W. 846, 847, 84 Minn. 267.

As used in Code, c. 13, § 2182, which provides that an undertaking for stay of proceedings on appeal to the circuit court from a justice's court must be in such an amount as may be deemed sufficient to compensate plaintiff for the use or profits of the claim during the pendency of the appeal, and for costs and disbursements of the action, must be construed to mean that the undertaking includes all costs and disbursements that may be awarded against the appellant on the appeal, and is not limited to include only the costs and disbursements of the trial in the justice's court. "Costs and disbursements of the action" must certainly mean the costs and disbursements which will accrue in the trial of the action, as well as those which have already accrued. Bilyeu v. Smith, 22 Pac. 1073, 1074, 18 Or. 335.

As expenditure.

"Disbursements," as used in an order allowing an administrator a certain per cent. on receipts and disbursements of the estate, did not include the delivery of bonds which were in the hands of the intestate as a trustee, and were delivered by the administrator to the true owner. Such delivery was not an expenditure for the estate. Walton v. Avery, 22 N. C. 405, 411.

A decree allowed a trustee commissions at the rate of 5 per cent. on all collections which he might make, and also a further commission of 5 per cent. on the amount of all disbursements and investments which he had made or might thereafter make. Held that the word "disbursements," as so used, meant merely expenditures during the existence of the trust, as contradistinguished from payments to the cestui que trust. Whyte v. Dimmock, 55 Md. 452.

Battle's Revisal, c. 68, § 35, provides that all orders on the county treasurer for school money shall be signed by the school committee of the township, which orders, duly indorsed by the persons to whom the same are payable, shall be the only vouchers in the hands of the county treasurer for disbursements of school moneys. Held, that the "disbursements" mentioned in the section, and of which the orders taken up are declared to be the only valid voucher for moneys paid out, have reference to the administration of the fund, and contemplate a settlement of the treasurer's account. Wake County Com'rs v. Magnin, 86 N. C. 285, 288.

DISCHARGE.

See "Plea in Discharge."

Webster defines "discharged" to be "paid; released; acquitted; freed from debt; performed; executed." Union Bank of Florida v. Powell's Heirs, 3 Fla. 175, 193, 52 Am. Dec. 367.

"Discharged," as used in a declaration on a contract, alleging that plaintiff was prevented and discharged from delivering goods thereunder, did not mean a release under seal, but only that the act of the defendants was the cause of the nondelivery; and the expression was satisfied by proof of a notice from the defendant that he would not accept goods under the contract. Cort v. Ambergate, N. & B. & E. J. Ry. Co., 17 Q. B. 127, 145.

Gen. St. c. 162, § 1, providing the punishment for the forgery of any order, acquittance, or discharge for money, means any paper that sufficiently demonstrates that it is a discharge, whether it contain the word "discharge" or not. Commonwealth v. Talbot, 84 Mass. (2 Allen) 161, 162.

Composition.

The mere fact that a bankrupt has been refused a discharge on a specification of objection is not an absolute bar to a composition; a composition not being a "discharge." In re Odell (U. S.) 18 Fed. Cas. 575.

As release.

A discharge by statute must of necessity be a legal defense, and, of course, proper matter to be pleaded at law. It is equivalent, when it proceeds from the act of the creditor, to a release, and may therefore be pleaded. Steptoe's Adm'rs v. Harvey's Ex'rs (Va.) 7 Leigh, 501, 535.

Of attachment.

The word "discharge," as used in an opinion, stating that the effect and design of an instrument given under Code, § 112, providing for the release of property from an attachment upon the giving of a bond, is to release the property attached, but not to discharge the attachment, was used as synonymous with "dissolve," and not in the sense of "release." Nichols v. Chittenden, 59 Pac. 954, 957, 14 Colo. App. 49.

Of debt.

Compromise as, see "Compromise."

"Discharge" means "to send away, as a creditor, by payment; to set free, release, absolve, or acquit, as of an obligation, claim, accusation, or service due; to exonerate; to relieve." The manner in which a release is accomplished or the obligation satisfied seems to be material, so that evidence that a claim was compromised was sufficient foundation for a finding that the obligations of the parties were discharged. Rivers v. Blom, 63 S. W. 812, 813, 163 Mo. 442.

A debt is discharged, and the debtor is released, when the creditor has received something from the debtor which satisfies him. It may be in money or its equivalents, and it may consist in setting off mutual demands or wiping out mutual disputed claims by mutual concessions, in which event no money is required to pass from one to another. When a referee held the termination of cross-actions between two parties a discharge of one of them, it meant that the other was satisfied, and had no further cause of complaint against the one discharged. Rivers v. Blom, 163 Mo. 442, 446, 63 S. W. 812.

In a plea in an action on assumpsit on a bill of exchange, alleging an agreement to accept payment of the bill on certain conditions and to discharge defendant from performing his promise, the word "discharge" does not import payment or satisfaction of the debt, but only that the bill was given for and on account of it. Kemp v. Watt, 15 Mees. & W. 672, 680.

Of debtor.

A discharge under the prison bounds act is only a discharge from confinement at the suit of the suing creditor for a year and a day. It cannot, therefore, be a discharge to the sheriff himself from the debt, much less to his sureties. Treasurers of State v. Bates (S. C.) 2 Bailey Law, 362, 384.

Of employé.

In a suit by a workman, who has agreed to do the work to the satisfaction of his employer, there is a distinction between being dissatisfied with his work and discharging him because of dissatisfaction. An employer may be dissatisfied with the work of one of his men, and yet retain the workman in his employment, or he may be dissatisfied, and may discharge the workman, not because of dissatisfaction, but because of some other reason; and in the action by the workmen they are complaining, not of dissatisfaction, but of discharge, and hence the question whether the employer ought to have been satisfied does not arise under the contract, so that it would not be legitimate for either workman to prove that in his opinion or the opinion of the other he had done good work. But proof may be directed to the question whether the employer was dissatisfied, and whether he discharged because of dissatisfaction. Gwynn v. Hitchner, 52 Atl. 997, 998, 67 N. J. Law, 654.

Of guardian.

As used in a statute providing that no action shall be maintained against the sureties on any bond, given by a guardian, unless it be commenced within four years from the time when the guardian shall be discharged, the term "discharged" means any mode by which the guardianship is effectually determined and brought to a close. Loring v. Aline, 63 Mass. (9 Cush.) 68, 70. This may be either by the resignation or death of the guardian, by the marriage of the female ward, by the arrival of the minor ward at the age of 21 years, or otherwise. Perkins v. Cheney, 72 N. W. 595, 596, 114 Mich. 567, 68 Am. St. Rep. 495; Berkin v. Marsh, 44 Pac. 528, 529, 18 Mont. 152, 56 Am. St. Rep. 565; Goble v. Simeral (Neb.) 93 N. W. 235, 236. It means any termination, such as termination by the death of the guardian, and not necessarily a discharge by the court. Paine v. Jones, 67 N. W. 31, 93 Wis. 70. It means the end of the guardianship office, and not his discharge from liability. Probate Judge v. Stevenson, 21 N. W. 348, 55 Mich. 320.

The guardian of a minor ward is "discharged," within the meaning of Gen. St. c. 72, § 20, if not when the ward attains the age of majority, which may be questioned, at latest when he has settled his guardianship account with the probate court and the court has ordered him to pay over to the ward the money in his hands. Probate Court for Orleans Dist. v. Child, 51 Vt. 82, 85.

A guardian is discharged, within the meaning of the statute relating to the liability of his sureties, when he has settled his guardianship account with the court and has been ordered to pay over to the ward money in his hands. Probate Court v. Child, 51 Vt. 82, 85.

To say that the term "discharged" is synonymous with settlement of guardian's account would seem to do violence to the language used. With due deference to courts that have otherwise held, this appears to be quite clear. We are unable to see where a mere settlement of a guardian's account, without the actual compliance with the order of the court, operates as a discharge in any sense. The term "discharged" is synonymous with the termination of the guardianship, not of the relation of the trustee and beneficiary, but of the office or the right to be guardian; and such termination occurs in the event of the death of the guardian, the arrival of the ward at the age of 21, or any other event by which the office of guardian, strictly so called, is brought to a close, though the trust relation in respect to the property may still continue up to the time of the settlement and discharge in respect to such relation. Paine v. Jones, 67 N. W. 31, 93 Wis. 70.

Within a statute limiting the liability of sureties of a guardian, the discharge is practically, in the majority of cases, when he makes a final settlement of his accounts. For instance, when the ward becomes of age, it is the duty of the guardian to settle his accounts and turn over all property in his hands belonging to the ward. The fact that the ward comes of age does not ipso facto change the relation in which the guardian holds the property from that of a statutory trustee to that of a debtor. The death of the guardian ends, of course, all personal control over the property, and death is a discharge of the guardian. Hudson v. Bishop (U. S.) 32 Fed. 519, 521; Id., 35 Fed. 820, 822; Marlow v. Lacy, 2 S. W. 52, 53, 68 Tex. 154.

The word "discharge," in an indorsement by a mortgagee, on the record of the mortgage, that "in consideration of the full payment of all moneys secured to be paid I hereby discharge the same of record," imports an absolute discharge, and not an assignment of the mortgage, and therefore a bona fide purchaser, relying on the record as showing the discharge of the mortgage, will be protected, though the mortgage was only assigned. Lowry v. Bennett, 77 N. W. 935, 936, 119 Mich. 301.

Within an agreement to return certain money on the discharge of two certain mortgages, "discharge" is not synonymous with "payment." By the discharge of a mortgage, as the term is commonly understood, a discharge of record, something that relieves the land from the apparent liens, is intended, not a mere payment, that may rest for proof upon parol, and perhaps disputed, testimony. Blackwood v. Brown, 29 Mich. 483, 484.

The word "discharge," as used in a quitclaim deed, reciting that this release is made at the request of the mortgagors, and is intended to discharge all title acquired by the mortgagee, when taken in connection with the word "release," can mean nothing more than that the mortgagee had no remaining claim upon the property, and whatever title it had acquired was released. Rangely v. Spring, 28 Me. (15 Shep.) 127, 151.

Of prisoner.

See "Lawfully Discharged."

A declaration in an action for malicious prosecution, alleging that the plaintiff was discharged from his imprisonment, is not sufficient to show that he was acquitted, which has a definite meaning. Where the word "acquitted" is used, it must be understood in a legal sense, namely, by a jury on the trial; but there are various ways in which a man may be discharged from his imprisonment without putting an end to the prosecution. Morgan v. Hughes, 2 Term. R. 225, 231; Law v. Franks (S. C.) Cheves, Law, 9, 10; Hester v. Hagood (S. C.) 3 Hill, 195; Bacon v. Townsend (N. Y.) 2 Edm. Sel. Cas. 120, 122.

"Discharge," as used in a statute (Rev. St. § 292) providing that every indictment shall be tried at the term or session in which the issue is joined, or the term after, unless the court, having just cause, shall allow further time for the trial thereof, and that if such indictment be not tried as aforesaid the defendant shall be discharged, means merely a release from imprisonment and bail, and not also a release from further prosecution or indictment, or from the penalty of the crime itself. State v. Garthwaite, 23 N. J. Law (3 Zab.) 143, 145.

"Discharge," as used in a statute providing for the payment of fees to United States marshals in case of the discharge of a person, means an order of discharge which releases the person entirely from custody. It does not apply to the removal of a person from one place to another, or merely bringing the person up to testify or be tried. It means discharge from the custody of the law. Ex parte Paris (U. S.) 18 Fed. Cas. 1104, 1105.

A statute authorized the sheriff to charge for every person committed to jail 35 cents and for every person discharged from jail 35 cents. Held, that the words "committed" and "discharged" should be construed to mean a technical committal and discharge, and could not be so liberally construed as to authorize the sheriff to charge 35 cents for taking out and 35 cents for returning a prisoner to jail in the course of the proceedings against them. Lee v. Ionia County Sup'rs, 36 N. W. 83, 84, 68 Mich. 330.

Of seamen.

A discharge imports, in the natural and ordinary meaning of the word, and as used in Act Cong. Feb., 1803, c. 62, 2 Stat. 203, allowing two months' extra wages to a crew of a vessel upon its sale and their discharge in a foreign country, a voluntary act on the part of the master, not a mere separation from the vessel by the unavoidable breaking up of the voyage by misfortune. Indeed, a seaman cannot in propriety of language be said to be discharged by the master, when the master himself is dispossessed of the vessel, and the whole enterprise is brought to a violent end by an accident of major force. The Dawn (U. S.) 7 Fed. Cas. 200, 202.

Of soldier.

The term "discharge" was used during the period of the Revolution to designate the dismissal from the continental service of troops, either individually or as organizations. Williams v. United States, 11 Sup. Ct. 43, 48, 137 U. S. 113, 34 L. Ed. 590.

In the military service the word "discharge" is the word applied to an order ending the service of the officer at his own request; but in other connections it conveys the notion of a movement beginning with a superior, and more or less adverse to the object, as, for instance, we speak of the discharge of a servant. Usually it is a slightly discrediting verb. United States v. Sweet, 23 Sup. Ct. 638, 639, 189 U. S. 471, 47 L. Ed. 907.

Of tax.

The term "discharge," as used in St. 1867, p. 111, authorizing the board of supervisors of a county to equalize, modify, or discharge a tax, is not synonymous with the other words, "equalize" or "modify," as used in the act, so that, when the board had acted on a petition to equalize, it had not exhausted its powers to subsequently act on a petition to discharge. State v. Ormsby County Com'rs, 7 Nev. 392, 397.

Of vessel.

See "Customary Discharge."

"In a general sense, as well as in a nautical sense, the proper meaning of the word 'discharge,' with reference to a cargo, is to unload it from the ship." As used in a charter party, providing that the freight shall be paid in five days after the vessel's return to and discharge in B., it will be construed to have been used in its ordinary meaning, when the circumstances fail to show that it was used in a different sense; and hence it refers merely to the unloading, and not to the delivery, of the cargo. Certain Logs of Mahogany (U. S.) 5 Fed. Cas. 374, 378; Kimball v. Kimball (U. S.) 14 Fed. Cas. 481, 486; The Bird of Paradise v. Heyneman, 72 U. S. (5 Wall.) 545, 557, 18 L. Ed. 662; Sears v. 4,885 Bags of Linseed (U. S.) 21 Fed. Cas. 934.

DISCHARGE FOR MONEY.

Instruments in the form of ordinary receipted statements of account, by various persons, against the town or county, presented by defendant, who was the clerk of the town and county, to the treasurer, and paid and acted upon as vouchers for money expended by defendant in behalf of the town and county, are properly described in the indictment as "discharges for money," under Pub. St. c. 204, § 1, declaring the punishment for forgery of a discharge for money, and chapter 214, § 26, providing that variances are immaterial if the identity of the instrument is evident and its purport is sufficiently described to prevent prejudice to defendant. Commonwealth v. Brown, 18 N. E. 587, 592, 147 Mass. 585, 1 L. R. A. 620, 9 Am. St. Rep. 736.

DISCHARGE IN BANKRUPTCY.

"Discharge," as used in the bankruptcy act, shall mean the release of a bankrupt from all of his debts which are provable in bankruptcy, except such as are excepted. U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3419.

A discharge in bankruptcy is in the nature of a personal privilege granted to a debtor in consideration of his yielding up all of his property for distribution among his creditors, so that a discharge of a bankrupt in bankruptcy proceedings, by which the bankrupt preferred certain creditors to the exclusion of others, is not such a discharge as will relieve the bankrupt. Southern Loan & Trust Co. v. Benbow (U. S.) 96 Fed. 514, 528.

A discharge in bankruptcy, unlike the bar of statutes of limitations, is a positive extinguishing of the debt, liability, or demand to which it applies. Nothing less than his express promise to pay can remove or revise the bankrupt's liability; and by statute the promise must be put in writing and signed by the party to be charged therewith. Colton v. Depew, 44 Atl. 662, 663, 59 N. J. Eq. 126.

Rev. St. § 5116, declaring that no person who has been discharged, and afterwards becomes bankrupt on his own petition, shall be again entitled to a discharge if his estate is insufficient to pay 70 per cent. of the debts proved against it, unless the assent in writing of three-fourths in value of his creditors, who have proved their claims as filed, etc., is not to be construed in a technical legal sense as meaning a discharge by order of court, but it includes as well a discharge effected by composition proceedings, by which the bankrupt was released from his debts. In re Bjornstad (U. S.) 5 Fed. 791.

A debt discharged is a debt extinguished, and therefore the discharge of a debt by discharge in bankruptcy destroys all legal obligation to pay; but as it has been discharged, not by payment or the act of the creditor, but by operation of law, there remains a moral obligation to pay, which is a sufficient consideration to support a new promise, agreement, or contract to pay. Steward v. Reckless, 24 N. J. Law (4 Zab.) 427, 430.

The word "discharge" has no technical, common, or appropriate meaning in the law of common or voluntary composition; nor would it have in an ordinary statute, authorizing creditors to get together and adopt a composition on such terms as the statute might prescribe, voluntary or compulsory. The word "release" would exactly describe the transaction; or, with equal common significance, the word "satisfy" or "acquit" would define that which was done, so that, in such sense, the word "discharge" would somewhat synonymously express the transaction. Yet, when the word is used in the statute authorizing a debtor to compound his debts with his creditors, which statute at the same time establishes a system of bankruptcy, it borrows not unnaturally a reflected light by association with a technical term of similar import and identical form familiar to all bankruptcy statutes. But this reflected light might be discarded for a proper understanding of the use of the word in the composition sections of the statute. So that, under the bankrupt act, allowing appeals from a judgment granting or denying a discharge, no appeal lies from a refusal of the court of bankruptcy to confirm a composition by a bankrupt. In re Adler (U. S.) 103 Fed. 444, 445.

DISCHARGED PASSENGER.

A discharged passenger is a passenger over whom the care of a common carrier has entirely ceased. One who has left the car, but is using means provided by the carrier for the alighting, and is being assisted by the agent of the company, does not come within the meaning of the term. Hartzig v.

Lehigh Valley R. Co., 26 A. 810, 811, 154 Pa. 364.

DISCIPLES OF CHRIST.

"Disciples of Christ" is the name given to a certain religious sect. The movement resulting in the foundation of the brotherhood was a decided revolt from the ecclesiasticism into which it was conceived Protestant religion had fallen, and in all organic and fundamental polity authority was alone sought in the doctrines of the New Testament and the authentic practice of the Apostles themselves. In a corporate sense, the Church of the Disciples is essentially congregational. The congregation is the unit of organization, and generally the source of corporate authority. In its government the church has discarded all councils, synods, and presbyteries. It recognizes no court of appeal or of last resort, representing and standing for the entire brotherhood of believers. In re Reinhart, 9 Ohio Dec. 441, 447.

DISCLAIMER.

A disclaimer consists in a denial of the insistence upon any claim or right in the thing demanded, and a renunciation of all claim thereto. Moores v. Clackamas County, 67 Pac. 662, 663, 40 Or. 536.

A disclaimer is an admission upon the record of the plaintiff's right, and a denial of assertion of title on the part of the defendant. Snyder v. Compton (Tex.) 29 S. W. 73.

A disclaimer is a renunciation of the title and right to possession. If not falsified, it defeats an action of ejectment. Webster v. Pierce, 83 N. W. 938, 940, 108 Wis. 407. It imports only the disavowal of title or right in the supposed tenant. Inhabitants of Oakham v. Hall, 112 Mass. 535, 539.

Disclaimer is a formal mode of expressing a grantee's dissent to the conveyance of property before the title has become vested in him. The object of a disclaimer is to prevent an estate passing from the grantor to the grantee, and an estate, having once vested, cannot be divested by a disclaimer, though made under seal, duly witnessed, acknowledged, and recorded. Watson v. Watson, 13 Conn. 83, 85 (citing Jackson v. Richards [N. Y.] 6 Cow. 617; Jackson v. French, [N. Y.] 3 Wend. 337, 20 Am. Dec. 699; Jackson v. Wheeler [N. Y.] 6 Johns. 272; Bush v. Bradley [Conn.] 4 Day, 298; Kinne v. Beebe, 6 Conn. 494; Wheeler v. Hotchkiss, 10 Conn. 225).

The word "disclaimer," in St. c. 7, p. 89, providing that the writ in ejectment shall not be abated because all the tenants are not sued, but those on whom service is made shall answer for such part of the premises only as he or they shall distinguish and set forth in his or their plea, and disclaim the remainder, and if any shall disclaim the whole, unless plaintiff shall prove such disclaimer's possession of all or part of the premises demanded, such "disclaimer" shall recover costs against plaintiff, is used for the word "defendant." Marshall v. Wood, 5 Vt. 250, 254, 255.

As a plea.

In real actions in trespass, by force of the statute and in a quare impedit, disclaimer is a plea, and, like pleas in error or in abatement, concludes with a verification, and calls for a replication and issue. But in ejectment, notwithstanding the defendant disclaims title to the land, it is still necessary to try the fact whether defendant was in possession when the writ was served. And consequently, where ejectment was brought against two, and one entered a disclaimer, the court should have compelled him to give judgment which would secure the costs and damages, or to plead instanter the general issue. Bratton v. Mitchell (Pa.) 5 Watts, 69, 71.

A disclaimer, instead of being a plea to an action, resembles so far a release or conveyance of the land that in general no person could disclaim who was incapable of conveying the land. Kentucky Union Co. v. Corbett, 66 S. W. 728, 729, 112 Ky. 677.

DISCONTINUANCE.

See "Involuntary Discontinuance"; "Voluntary Discontinuance."

Of action.

"The term 'discontinuance' is the name applied to the voluntary withdrawal of a suit by a plaintiff, or where he is regarded as out of court by some technical omission or mispleading, and the like." Hadwin v. Southern Ry. Co., 45 S. E. 1019, 1020, 67 S. C. 463.

A discontinuance is a chasm or gap left by neglecting to enter a continuance. Taft v. Northern Transp. Co., 56 N. H. 414, 416.

A discontinuance is, in substance and effect, an abandonment of the moving party of his pending cause. Hence the failure of a clerk to note a continuance on his docket does not amount to a discontinuance. Ex parte Humes (Ala.) 30 South. 732, 733.

A discontinuance is the interruption of a proceeding, occasioned by the failure of the plaintiff to continue the suit regularly from time to time as he ought. Gillespie v. Bailey, 12 W. Va. 70, 85, 86, 29 Am. Rep. 445.

A discontinuance is a gap or chasm in the proceedings, occurring while the suit is pending. Hayes v. Dunn, 34 South. 944, 945, 136 Ala. 528. "A criminal as well as a civil suit may be discontinued." Ex parte Hall, 47 Ala. 675, 680.

A "discontinuance" means no more than a declaration of the plaintiff's willingness to stop the pending action. It is neither an adjudication of his cause by the proper tribunal, nor an acknowledgment by himself that his claim is not well founded. T. & H. Prac. § 564. This, of course, does not apply where actions are groundless, and brought with a vexatious or corrupt purpose. Engle v. Susquehanna Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 8 Pa. Dist. R. 172.

A discontinuance is the result of some act done or omitted by the plaintiff, which legally withdraws his case from the power and jurisdiction of the court. Where the plaintiff did, or omitted to do, nothing to produce such a result, but what was done was done by the court, and which plaintiff could not prevent, his cause was not discontinued. McGuire v. Hay, 25 Tenn. (6 Humph.) 419, 421.

A discontinuance is a break or chasm in a suit, arising from the failure of the plaintiff to carry the proceedings forward in due course of law, and cannot, therefore, ex vi termini, occur after the suit has been brought to an end. This is not only true technically, but in point of essential justice. A discontinuance does not, like a retraxit, operate as an extinguishment of the cause of action, but leaves the plaintiff free to bring another suit. It will not, therefore, be allowed when the effect is to deprive the defendant of an advantage which he is entitled to retain. Kennedy v. McNickle (Pa.) 7 Phila. 217 (citing Mechanics' Bank v. Fisher [Pa.] 1 Rawle, 341, 347).

Same—Dismissal or nonsuit synonymous.

A discontinuance, in practice, is the same as a dismissal, and means that the cause is sent out of court. Thurman v. James, 48 Mo. 235, 238.

Where an order had been rendered which had the effect of discontinuing an action, it was contended that the courts had no authority to order a discontinuance of the cause, such a thing as a discontinuance being unknown to our practice, but it was held that "discontinuance" and "dismissal" are synonymous terms. English v. Dickey, 27 N. E. 495, 497, 128 Ind. 174, 13 L. R. A. 40.

"Discontinuance," at common law, was a failure to continue the cause regularly from day to day, or term to term, between the commencement of the suit and final judgment, and if there was any lapse or want of continuance the parties were out of court, and the plaintiff had to begin anew. The plaintiff having left a chasm in the proceedings of his cause, the defendant was no longer bound to attend. Discontinuance resulted from the necessity of continuances to be formerly entered. As our statutes dispense with the necessity for the entry of formal continuances in order to keep a case in court, and require the attendance of the defendant, it is not perceived that there can be in this state such a thing as a technical discontinuance." Code 1871, § 679, declaring that an action shall be discontinued if the representatives of a deceased person shall not appear and become a party by the second term after the death of the plaintiff, means a nonsuit or dismissal for want of prosecution. Germania Fire Ins. Co. v. Francis, 52 Miss. 457, 467, 24 Am. Rep. 674.

A discontinuance is somewhat similar to a nonsuit, for when a plaintiff leaves a chasm in the proceedings of his case, as by not continuing the process regularly from day to day, and from time to time, as he ought to do, the suit is discontinued. Hunt v. Griffin, 49 Miss. 742, 748. Thus, there is a "discontinuance" of a case by the plaintiff, within the meaning of the statute allowing him to renew the action within six months after his discontinuance, where the case is dismissed by the court for want of prosecution by the plaintiff. Rountree v. Key, 71 Ga. 214.

Same—As final hearing.

See "Final Hearing or Trial."

Same—As indicating settlement.

A charge to the jury that a former suit was discontinued for want of prosecution did not indicate a settlement, nor did it indicate that there was no settlement. It indicated merely that the suit was dropped. Davis v. Hammond (Mich.) 42 N. W. 690, 693.

Of postal service.

Under the act of February 28, 1861, which authorizes the postmaster general to discontinue, under certain circumstances specified, the postal service on any route, a suspension during the late Rebellion, at the postmaster general's discretion, of the route in certain rebel states, with notice to the contractor that he would be held responsible for a renewal when the postmaster general should deem it safe to renew the service there, was held to be a discontinuance. Reeside v. United States, 75 U. S. (8 Wall.) 38, 43, 19 L. Ed. 318.

DISCONTINUOUS EASEMENT.

Easements or servitudes are divided by the Civil Code of France into "continuous" and "discontinuous." "Discontinuous" are those the enjoyment of which can be had only by the interference of man, as rights of way. Lampman v. Milks, 21 N. Y. 505, 515; Outerbridge v. Phelps, 45 N. Y. Super. Ct. (13 Jones & S.) 555, 570.

"Discontinuous servitudes" are such as need the act of man to be exercised. Such are the rights of passage, drawing water, pasturage, and the like. Civ. Code La. 1800, art. 727.

DISCOUNT.

"The word 'discount' denotes the act of giving money for a bill of exchange or promissory note, deducting the interest." Newell v. First National Bank of Somerset, 13 Ky. Law Rep. 775, 777; State v. Boatmen's Sav. Inst., 48 Mo. 189, 191.

By "discount," in the Constitution, is understood to be meant "bank discount," and a bank discount is the purchase of a promissory note, bill of exchange, or other negotiable paper at less than its face. Building Ass'n v. Seemiller (Pa.) 3 Phila. 115, 119.

"Discount" is used in different senses, some judges employing the term to designate the reception of paper in payment of a loan or debt, while others use it to designate the reception of paper on a sale as a piece of property. Baxter v. Duren (16 Shep.) 29 Me. 434, 441, 1 Am. Rep. 602.

"Discounting," as used in Banking Act 1838, § 18, providing that such association shall have power to carry on the business of banking by discounting bills, etc., includes the taking of uncurrent bank bills, due on their face and payable at a distant place, for an amount less than their face value, as well as the taking of paper not yet due for an amount less than its face value. People v. Metropolitan Bank (N. Y.) 7 How. Prac. 144, 148.

Buy distinguished.

See "Buy."

An authority to a bank to discount evidences of debt includes authority to buy; for "discounting," at most, is but another term for "buying at a discount." Atlantic State Bank v. Savery, 82 N. Y. 291, 302; Tracy v. Talmadge (N. Y.) 9 How. Prac. 530, 536; Saltmarsh v. Planters' & Merchants' Bank, 14 Ala. 668, 677; Tracy v. Talmadge, 12 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 302, 306.

Commission distinguished.

The word "discount" is not synonymous with the word "commission." "Discount" is a percentage taken from the face value of the security or property negotiated, while "commission," in its technical as well as its ordinary sense, generally signifies a percentage upon the amount involved in the transaction. Swift v. United States (U. S.) 18 Ct. Cl. 42, 57.

Sale distinguished.

A "discount," as distinguished from a sale of a note, is that where a note is discounted money is loaned thereon by a bank taking interest in advance, and the person offering the note for discount becomes liable thereon as an indorser; while a sale of the note implies a transfer of title only, by which the seller parts with all interest in and liability on the paper. Nellsville Bank v. Tutbill, 30 N. W. 154, 155, 4 Dak. 295.

"Discount," as applied to the ordinary transaction of discounting a note, is the lending of money. The party discounting does in fact lend money on interest, to be repaid either by the person receiving, or by some other party to the bill, at a certain period. The term "discount," in its appropriate mercantile sense, is distinguished from a "sale" of the note or bill, for whoever gets a bill or note discounted at a bank is required to indorse the note, and thereby assume the obligations of an indorser. By the transaction he gets a loan, and literally borrows money, while in the case of a sale of negotiable paper all that would be required would be an assignment, sufficient merely to pass title as an indorsement without recourse. Freeman v. Brittin, 17 N. J. Law (2 Har.) 191, 206.

As a deduction on advances.

By the language of the commercial world and the settled practice of bankrupts, a "discount" by a bank means, ex vi termini, a deduction or drawback made upon its advances or loans of money upon negotiable paper or other evidences of debt, payable at a future day, which are transferred to the bank. Fleckner v. Bank of United States, 21 U. S. (8 Wheat.) 338, 350, 5 L. Ed. 631; Niagara County Bank v. Baker, 15 Ohio St. 68, 87; Youngblood v. Birmingham Trust & Savings Co., 12 South. 579, 95 Ala. 521, 20 L. R. A. 58, 36 Am. St. Rep. 245 (citing 5 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 678, 679); Nicholson v. National Bank (Ky.) 17 S. W. 627 (quoting 5 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 618); Greenville First Nat. Bank v. Sherburne, 14 Ill. App. 566, 568; First Nat. Bank v. Carleton, 59 N. Y. Supp. 635, 636, 43 App. Div. 6 (citing Commonwealth v. Commercial Bank of Pennsylvania, 28 Pa. [4 Casey] 396).

The term "discount," when used in a general sense, is applicable to either business or accommodation paper, and is appropriately applied either to loans or sales by way of discount, when a sum is counted off or taken from the face or amount of the paper at the time the money is advanced upon it, whether that sum is taken for interest upon a loan, or as the price agreed upon a sale. Salmon

Falls Bank v. Leyser, 116 Mo. 51, 71, 22 S. W. 504, 509 (citing Niagara County Bank v. Baker, 15 Ohio St. 68).

A discount is an allowance or deduction generally of so much per cent. made for prepayment or for prompt payment of a bill or account; a sum deducted, in consideration of cash payment, from the price of the thing usually sold on credit; any deduction from the customary price, or from a sum due or to be due at a future time. Carroll v. Drury, 49 N. E. 311, 312, 170 Ill. 571.

The term "discounting," as applied to a banking transaction, means the deduction of a sum, according to the standards of recognized uniformity, as applied to the amount and time for which the paper has to run which is the subject of negotiation. Ridgway v. National Bank of New Castle, 12 Ky. Law Rep. 216, 220.

"Discounting," as used in a note payable in a certain time from date, but bearing the written consent of the makers that the bank may collect it at any time by discounting a proportional amount of interest that shall have been paid in advance, means that a deduction should be made from the face of the note. This is the ordinary meaning of "discount" and "discounting," especially as used by banks and in banking business. Dawley v. Wheeler, 52 Vt. 574, 576.

The "discounting" of notes is the advancing of money on them, the interest being deducted and received by the person discounting, and retained and reserved at the time of, or as a part of, the advance. Bobo v. People's Nat. Bank, 21 S. W. 888, 889, 92 Tenn. 444.

As the difference between the price and debt.

"Discount" is the difference between the price and the amount of the debt, the evidence of which is transferred. First Nat. Bank v. Sherburne, 14 Ill. App. (14 Bradw.) 566, 570; Anderson v. Cleburne Building & Loan Ass'n (Tex.) 16 S. W. 298, 299; National Bank v. Johnson, 104 U. S. 271, 276, 26 L. Ed. 742; Youngblood v. Birmingham Trust & Savings Co., 12 South. 579, 95 Ala. 521, 20 L. R. A. 58, 36 Am. St. Rep. 245. That difference represents interest charged, but at some rate according to which the price paid, if invested until the maturity of the debt, would produce its amount. National Bank v. Johnson, 104 U. S. 276, 26 L. Ed. 742. The discount payable, as understood in the business of banking, is only a mode of loaning money with the right to take the interest allowed in advance. Niagara County Bank v. Baker, 15 Ohio St. 68, 87.

As interest.

"Discount" is defined to be interest reserved from the amount lent at the time of making a loan. The Century Dictionary defines "discount" in finance, "to purchase, or pay the amount of in cash, less a certain per cent., as a promissory note, bill of exchange, etc., to be collected by the discounter or purchaser at maturity. Bank discount is simple interest paid in advance and received, not on the sum advanced in the purchase, but on the amount of the note or bill." Eastin v. Third Nat. Bank of Cincinnati, 19 Ky. Law Rep. 1043, 1044, 42 S. W. 1115, 1116, 102 Ky. 64.

Discount is the taking out of the principal sum, and the retention by the lender, at the time of the loan, of the interest charged for the use of the principal. Planters' & Merchants' Bank v. Goetter, 19 South. 54, 55, 108 Ala. 408 (citing Saltmarsh v. Planters' & Merchants' Bank, 14 Ala. 668, 677; Youngblood v. Birmingham Trust & Savings Co., 95 Ala. 521, 12 South. 579, 20 L. R. A. 58, 36 Am. St. Rep. 245).

The term "discount," as a substantive, signifies the interest allowed in advancing on bills of exchange or negotiable securities. Saltmarsh v. Planters' & Merchants' Bank, 14 Ala. 668, 677. To discount a bill is to buy it for a less sum than that which upon its face is payable. Anderson v. Timberlake, 22 South. 431, 433, 434, 114 Ala. 377, 62 Am. St. Rep. 105 (citing Youngblood v. Birmingham Trust & Savings Co., 95 Ala. 521, 12 South. 579, 20 L. R. A. 58, 36 Am. St. Rep. 245).

"Discount is interest, either paid in advance or reserved in the note." First Nat. Bank v. Childs, 133 Mass. 248, 252, 43 Am. Rep. 509.

"Discount" is the interest reserved from the amount lent at the time of making a loan, or, used as a verb, the term means to purchase or pay the amount of in cash, less a certain per cent., as a promissory note, bill of exchange, etc., to be collected by the discounter or purchaser at maturity. "Bank discount" is simple interest paid in advance, and received, not on the sum advanced in the purchase, but on the amount of the note or bill. Eastin v. Third Nat. Bank of Cincinnati, 42 S. W. 1115, 1116, 102 Ky. 64, 19 Ky. Law Rep. 1043.

The term "discount," as a substantive, means the interest reserved from a sum of money lent at the time of making the loan. State v. Boatmen's Sav. Inst., 48 Mo. 189, 191.

As loan.

When interest is taken in advance it is a "discount," but when taken at the expiration of a credit it is a "loan." Bailey v. De Graff (Mich.) Walk. Ch. 424, 425.

The "discounting" of a note by a bank consists in lending money on it, and deducting the interest or premium in advance. City Bank of Columbus v. Bruce, 17 N. Y. 507, 515. "The word 'discount' does not necessarily imply a purchase and sale. It is quite consistent with a loan upon the security of the notes of a third party, as well as with the sale of them." In re Weeks (U. S.) 29 Fed. Cas. 575; Smith v. Exchange Bank, 26 Ohio St. 141, 151; Niagara County Bank v. Baker, 15 Ohio St. 68, 87; Penn Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Carpenter, 40 Ohio St. 260, 265.

To "discount" paper is only a mode of loaning money with a right of taking the interest allowed by law in advance. The ordinary meaning of the term "to discount" is to take interest in advance, and in banking is a mode of loaning money. It is the advance of money not due till some future period, less the interest which would be due thereon when payable. Black v. First Nat. Bank, 54 Atl. 88, 94, 96 Md. 399.

Although the "discounting" of notes or bills, in its most comprehensive sense, may mean lending money and taking notes in payment, as is said in 2 Cow. (N. Y.) 699, yet it is believed that in its more ordinary sense the "discounting" of notes or bills means advancing a consideration for a bill or note, deducting or discounting the interest which will accrue for the time the note has to run. Philadelphia Loan Co. v. Towner, 13 Conn. 249, 259.

"The 'discounting' of notes is only lending money and taking notes in payment." New York Firemen's Ins. Co. v. Sturges (N. Y.) 2 Cow. 664, 669.

To "discount" a note before its maturity is to advance a sum of money thereon, less than that expressed in the note, on the payee's transfer of the title to the one advancing the money. United States v. Fay (Ala.) 9 Port. 465, 469.

"Discounting," as used in General Incorporation Law, art. 16, § 127 (Gen. St. p. 225), giving saving associations the power of discounting negotiable notes and notes not negotiable, includes purchase as well as loan. "To 'discount' signifies the act of buying a bill of exchange or promissory note for a less sum than that for which on its face is payable." "It is also undeniably clear that the term 'discount,' when used in a general sense, is equally applicable to either business or accommodation paper, and is appropriately applied either to loans or sales by way of discount when a sum is counted off or taken from the face or amount of the paper at the time the money is advanced on it, whether that sum is taken for interest on a loan or as the price agreed on a sale." Pape v. Capitol Bank of Topeka, 20 Kan. 440, 446, 27 Am. Rep. 183 (citing Niagara County Bank v. Baker, 15 Ohio St. 85).

"The ordinary meaning of the term 'to discount' is to take interest in advance, and in banking is a mode of loaning money. It is the advance of money not due till some future period, less the interest which would be due thereon when payable." As used in Act Cong. June 3, 1864, authorizing national banks to "discount" negotiable notes, it does not include the selling of railroad bonds for third parties on commission. Weckler v. First National Bank, 42 Md. 581, 592, 20 Am. Rep. 95.

The "discount" of paper, as it is understood in the business of banking, is only a mode of loaning money, with the right to take the interest allowed by law in advance. To "discount" a bill is to buy it for a less sum than that which on its face is payable. Anderson v. Cleburne Building & Loan Ass'n (Tex.) 16 S. W. 298, 299.

"Discount," in its literal sense, means to pay back or to count back, and a "discount" is the sum expended in a bargain; but the word has acquired a restricted meaning, at least in its legal and commercial use, and is now used among traders, merchants, and bankers as meaning a deduction of a sum for advanced payment, particularly the deduction of the interest on a sum loaned at the time the loan is made; and the word is generally used in its banking sense. Building Ass'n v. Seemiller, 35 Pa. (11 Casey) 225, 226, note.

"Discount," as used in Loc. Laws, vol. 32, p. 343, providing that it shall be lawful for a bank to loan money, buy, sell, or negotiate bills of exchange, checks, and promissory notes, and to discount, on banking principles and usages, bills of exchange, post notes, promissory notes, and other negotiable paper or obligation for the payment of any sum or sums of money certain, providing that such bank shall not take more than 6 per cent. per annum in advance on its loans and discounts, should be construed as referring only to transactions in the nature of a loan. The term "discount" is used in a more limited and technical sense than as a "counting off" of an allowance or deduction made from a gross sum on any account whatever, but is applied to transactions in which the bank may take interest in advance, and is a power distinct from and additional to the power to buy, sell, and negotiate promissory notes. Dunkle v. Renick, 6 Ohio St. 527, 534.

As either loan or purchase.

"The term 'discount,' when used in its general sense, is equally applicable to either loans or sales by way of discount, when a sum is counted off or taken from the face or amount of the paper at the time the money is advanced upon it, whether that sum is taken for interest upon a loan, or as the agreed price upon a sale." Neillville Bank v. Tut-hill, 30 N. W. 154, 156, 4 Dak. 295.

The terms "purchase" and "discount," when used in reference to the transfer of a negotiable paper, are generally used as correlative terms. Nevertheless the legal meaning of "discount" varies according to the transaction to which it is applied. When an accommodation note or bill made for the sole purpose of raising money is "discounted" for that purpose, and with knowledge on the part of the party discounting that it was made for that purpose only, the cases call it a "loan," and hold it subject to the usury laws. But when a valid and subsisting obligation is made by one person and discounted by another, whether at the rate fixed as the legal interest or at some other rate, such discount is held to be a purchase of the paper. Niagara County Bank v. Baker, 15 Ohio St. 68, 74, 75.

As purchase.

A charter authorizing a party to "discount" and negotiate promissory notes, drafts, bills of exchange, and other evidences of debt, is held to expressly confer power to purchase checks. First Nat. Bank v. Harris, 108 Mass. 514, 516.

Under the terms of the national banking act giving national banks power to "discount and negotiate" promissory notes, etc., it is held that such banks have no power to acquire a note by purchase. Lazear v. National Union Bank, 52 Md. 78, 124, 36 Am. Rep. 355.

An allegation that a note was discounted by plaintiff means that plaintiff purchased or acquired the note and advanced upon it, in money, the amount thereof, less such percentage as it retained for interest. First Nat. Bank v. Carleton, 57 N. Y. S. 674, 675, 26 Misc. Rep. 536 (citing National Bank v. Johnson, 104 U. S. 271, 276, 26 L. Ed. 742).

In Saltmarsh v. Planters' & Merchants' Bank, 14 Ala. 677, it is said to "discount" a bill is to buy it for a less sum than that which upon its face is payable. Anderson v. Cleburne Bldg. & Loan Ass'n (Tex.) 16 S. W. 298, 299, 4 Willson's Civ. Cas. Ct. App. 174.

Where a note was taken by a bank and indorsed by the holder, and the proceeds credited to such holder's account, the transaction amounted to a "discount" of the note, within the authority given in the bank charter, though the complaint by the bank alleged that the holder "sold and delivered the note," and the bank's cashier also testified that he "purchased" the note from the holder. Neillville Bank v. Cuthill, 30 N. W. 154, 4 Dak. 295.

Rev. St. § 5197, providing that any national bank may not take more than the rate of interest allowed by the laws of the state where it is located on any loan or "discount" made, should be construed to include the purchase of accepted drafts from the holder without his indorsement, for a "discount" by a bank means a deduction or drawback made on its advances or loan of money on negotiable paper or other evidences of debt, payable at a future day, which are transferred to the bank, and embraces as well a transaction where money is advanced on paper transferred without the indorsement of the previous holder, as a case of a strict loan thereon, where the relation of debtor and creditor is created. The term "discounting" includes purchase as well as loan. "Discount," in the ordinary acceptance of the term, includes what is called "purchase." Danforth v. National State Bank of Elizabeth (U. S.) 48 Fed. 271, 272, 1 C. C. A. 62, 17 L. R. A. 622.

As set-off or counterclaim.

A "discount," properly speaking, is of some cause, matter, or defense not necessarily arising out of or connected with the cause of action. Brown v. McMullen (S. C.) 1 Hill, 29, 31.

The word "discounts" conveys the idea of something to be discounted, or taken from the claim itself by reason of any agreement, express or implied, between the parties; and hence the phrase "over and above all discounts and set-offs," in an affidavit for attachment, does not mean the same as "over and above all counterclaims." Lampkin v. Douglass (N. Y.) 63 How. Prac. 47, 48.

An affidavit of a claimant against the estate of a deceased person, averring that the demand was just and due him and was wholly unpaid, and there was no just set-off against the claim, was insufficient under the statute providing that the claimant shall state that there is no discount against his demand, since the word "set-off" is not sufficiently comprehensive to embrace the word "discount" as used in the statute. A "set-off" is an independent debt or demand which the debtor has against his creditor, while a "discount" is a right which the debtor has to an abatement of the demand against him in consequence of a partial failure of the consideration, or on account of some equity arising out of the transaction on which the demand is founded. Trabue's Ex'r v. Harris, 58 Ky. (1 Metc.) 597, 598.

DISCOVERY.

In St. 1868, c. 320, providing for an additional assessment on personal property on a discovery by the assessors that the taxable personal estate of any person has been omitted from the last annual assessments, "discovery" means becoming satisfied as a board that there has been such omission. The statute contemplates joint action on their part, and private information obtained by one or more individual assessors may prove unsatisfactory to the board. Noyes v. Hale, 137 Mass. 266, 271.

"Discovery," as used in a statute of limitation requiring an action for relief on the ground of fraud to be brought within a certain time after the discovery of fraud, means when the fraudulent act is revealed—made known—to the party aggrieved. Notice or knowledge of the act is a "discovery" of the fraud. Francis v. Wallace, 42 N. W. 323, 324, 77 Iowa, 373.

The word "discovery," when used in reference to past transactions or omissions, cannot have the same literal meaning as when applied to the discovery of a new continent, or a principle in physics. Fraud in a past and consummated transaction cannot be the subject of direct "discovery" or knowledge. The "discovery," then, of which the statute speaks, is of evidence or evidential facts leading to a belief in the fraud, and by which its existence or perpetration may be established, and not of the fraud itself as an existing entity. Parker v. Kuhn, 32 N. W. 74, 80, 21 Neb. 413, 59 Am. Rep. 838.

Within the meaning of the statute providing that a cause of action for fraud shall be deemed to have occurred at the time of the "discovery" of the fraud, the time of discovery means notice of the fraud, and as to what constitutes notice the court quotes with approval the statement of the federal Supreme Court to the effect that "whatever is notice enough to excite attention, and put the party on his guard, and call for inquiry, is notice of everything to which such inquiry might have led." Irwin v. Holbrook (Wash.) 73 Pac. 360, 362.

As used in Code, § 2530, providing that actions for relief on the grounds of fraud, in cases formerly solely cognizable in a court of chancery, shall not be deemed to have occurred until the fraud shall have been discovered by the party aggrieved, means "when the fraudulent act is revealed or made known to the party aggrieved. Notice or knowledge of the acts is a discovery of the fraud." The execution of a fraudulent conveyance being the act which constitutes the fraud on creditors, such creditor is chargeable with notice thereof by the record of the deed. Laird v. Kilbourne, 30 N. W. 9, 11, 70 Iowa, 83.

Same—Knowledge distinguished.

"Discovery," as applied to discovery of facts constituting fraud as affecting the statute of limitations, is not convertible with "knowledge." It must appear that there was no notice of facts or information which would put one on inquiry which would lead to knowledge. Lady Washington Consol. Co. v. Wood, 45 Pac. 809, 810, 113 Cal. 482.

The knowledge which comes to an unsuccessful litigant that he is unable to convince the court of the righteousness of his cause may be a disappointment or even a surprise, but can hardly be called a "discovery" within the meaning of Code, § 3448, providing that in actions for mistake or trespass the cause of action shall not be deemed to have accrued until such mistake or trespass has been "discovered" by the party aggrieved. Sioux City & St. P. Ry. Co. v. O'Brien County, 92 N. W. 857, 858, 118 Iowa, 582.

Same—Recollection distinguished.

"Discovery," as used with relation to evidence as ground for new trial, does not mean the same as "recollection." "Newly discovered" evidence is not the same as evidence which is "newly recollected." In the latter case no new trial can be given because evidence the existence of which was formerly known has been "recollected." "Discovery" refers only to the ascertainment of the existence of that which was previously unknown; "recollection" deals with the known. Howton v. Roberts (Ky.) 49 S. W. 340, 341.

Same—Suspicion distinguished.

"Discovery" of the fraud, within the language of the statute of limitations, implies knowledge, and is not satisfied by the mere "suspicion" of wrong. The suspicion may be such as to call for future investigation, but is not of itself a discovery. A party, even though his suspicions have been aroused, may be lulled into confidence, and take no action, by such representations as are made. Marbourg v. McCormick, 23 Kan. 38, 43; Parker v. Rubin, 32 N. W. 74, 80, 21 Neb. 413, 59 Am. Rep. 838.

In mining law.

When a locator of a mining claim finds rock in place, containing mineral in sufficient quantity to justify him in expending his time and money in developing the claim, he has made a "discovery" of a vein or lode, whether the rock or earth is rich or poor, whether it assays high or low, with this qualification: that the definition of a "lode" must always have special reference to the formation and peculiar characteristics of the particular district in which the lode or vein is found. Migeon v. Montana Cent. R. Co. (U. S.) 77 Fed. 249, 23 C. C. A. 156; Bonner v. Melkle (U. S.) 82 Fed. 697, 703.

"Discovery," within the meaning of Rev. St. U. S. § 2320 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1425], providing that no location of a mining claim shall be made until the discovery of a vein or lode within the limits of the claim located, means when the locator finds rock in place containing mineral, regardless of whether the earth or rock is rich or poor, or whether it assays high or low. It is the finding of the mineral in the rock in place, as distinguished from float rock, that constitutes the discovery and warrants the prospector in locating the mining camp. Book v. Justice Min. Co. (U. S.) 58 Fed. 106, 120; McShane v. Kenkle, 44 Pac. 979, 981, 18 Mont. 208, 33 L. R. A. 851, 56 Am. St. Rep. 579. So in respect to placer claims, if a competent locator actually finds upon unappropriated public land petroleum or other mineral in or upon the ground, and so situated as to constitute a part of it, it is a sufficient "discovery," within the meaning of the statute, to justify a location under the law, without waiting to ascertain by exploration whether the ground contains mineral in sufficient quantities to pay; but where a person found only such rock as indicated the presence of oil, without finding the oil itself, there is no "discovery," though oil exists on adjoining ground. Nevada Sierra Oil Co. v. Home Oil Co. (U. S.) 98 Fed. 673, 676.

The finding of ore or metalliferous rock in place in a defined vein is sufficient to constitute a "discovery," within the provisions of Rev. St. U. S. § 2320 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1424], that no right can be acquired to quartz claim before a discovery of a vein or lode within its limits, though it does not contain ore in paying quantities. If the rock in place is sufficiently encouraging to warrant an ordinarily prudent man in spending his time or money upon it, it is sufficient as against a subsequent locator for mining purposes. Muldrick v. Brown, 61 Pac. 428, 429, 37 Or. 185.

Where, in running a tunnel, small veins of iron oxide, quartz, and small quantities of carbonate of lead were found two or three inches wide, and these indications were of such a character as miners in that district would follow in the expectation of finding ore, and which would justify miners in working the claim for such purpose, and the rock in these seams was different from the country rock, and was of such character as designated by the witnesses who were practical miners as a vein containing "rock in place," bearing minerals, there was a "discovery" of a mineral lode or vein within the meaning of the statute. Shoshone Min. Co. v. Rutter (U. S.) 87 Fed. 801, 806, 31 C. C. A. 223.

In mining parlance, "discovery" has a technical meaning. When applied to the finding of a vein or lode, it means a finding of the top or apex of such vein or lode. Upton v. Larkin, 17 Pac. 728, 733, 7 Mont. 449.

To constitute a "discovery" of a well, the law requires something more than conjecture, hope, or even indications. The geological formation of the country may be such as scientific research and practical experience have shown to be likely to yield oil in paying quantities. Taken with this there may be other surface indications, such as seepage of oil. Though all these things combined may be sufficient to justify the expectation and hope that, upon driving a well to sufficient depth, oil may be discovered, they do not amount to a "discovery." Miller v. Chrisman, 73 Pac. 1083, 1084, 140 Cal. 440.

In patent law.

Webster says: "Discover" differs from "invent." We "discover" what before existed; we "invent" what did not before exist." The word "discovery," as used in the Constitution and patent laws, is synonymous with "invention," and no discovery will entitle a discoverer to a patent which does not amount to the contrivance or production of something which did not exist before. Const. c. 4, art. 1, § 8, cl. 8, among the enumerated powers given to Congress, says: "To promote the progress of science and useful arts by securing, for limited times, to authors and inventors, the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries." There it is evident that the "discoveries," the use of which is to be secured, are the discoveries of inventors only. The applicant must invent, contrive, or produce something that did not exist before. A man may "discover" (i. e., may disclose) his invention, and for that discovery or disclosure he will be entitled to the exclusive use of his invention for a limited time. In re Kemper (U. S.) 14 Fed. Cas. 286, 287.

Invention or "discovery" is the requirement which constitutes the foundation of the right to obtain a patent, and it is held that, unless more ingenuity and skill are required in making or applying the improvement than are possessed by an ordinary machinist acquainted with the business, there is an absence of that degree of skill and ingenuity which constitutes the essential element of every invention. Dunbar v. Meyers, 94 U. S. 187, 197, 24 L. Ed. 34.

The term "discovery," within the meaning of Const. art. 1, § 8, cl. 8, which confers on Congress the power to secure for limited time, to authors and inventors, the exclusive right to their respective writings, inventions, and discoveries, does not include a trademark. Trade-Mark Cases, 100 U. S. 82-93, 25 L. Ed. 550.

In practice.

See "Bill of Discovery."

The right of "discovery" in courts of equity arose from the necessity of searching the conscience of the opposing party in order to ascertain facts and obtain documents, within his knowledge and control, which the complainants could not reach at law because of their inability to compel the examination of the defendant under oath. Every bill for relief exhibited in a court of equity is in effect a bill of "discovery," because it asks or may ask from the defendant an answer upon oath relative to the matters which it charges. The power to enforce such discovery is one of the original and inherent powers of a court of chancery. The federal and state statutes now in force which enable the complainant to obtain such examination have greatly diminished the need of these discoveries. Kelley v. Boettcher (U. S.) 85 Fed. 55, 57, 29 C. C. A. 14.

"Discovery," in relation to evidence, includes only facts or papers which the party or witness is compelled by subpoena, interrogatory, or other judicial process to disclose, whether he will or no, and is inapplicable to testimony voluntarily given, or to documents voluntarily produced. Tucker v. United States, 14 Sup. Ct. 209, 301, 151 U. S. 164, 38 L. Ed. 112.

DISCOVERY IN AID OF EXECUTION.

"Discovery in aid of execution" is the name of a special statutory proceeding, in a court of law, which was not known to the common law. Adler v. Turnbull, 30 Atl. 319, 57 N. J. Law (28 Vroom) 62.

DISCREDIT.

"Discredit," as defined by Webster, means to refuse credence to; not to accept as true; to disbelieve. Howard v. State, 8 S. W. 929, 931, 25 Tex. App. 686.

"Discredit," as used in an instruction of the court to a jury as follows: "If you believe that any witness has willfully testified falsely to any material fact, it is your duty to discredit him"—means to distrust; that is, to look at with suspicion. People v. Clark, 24 Pac. 313, 316, 84 Cal. 573.

DISCRETION.

See "Judicial Discretion"; "Legal Discretion"; "Sound Discretion"; "Sound Memory and Discretion"; "Abuse of Discretion."

"Discretion" implies knowledge and prudence, and that discernment which enables a person to judge critically of what is correct and proper; judgment directed by circumspection. Towle v. State, 3 Fla. 202, 214.

"Discretion" is defined as the knowledge of what is right and proper—as deliberate judgment. Citizens' St. R. Co. v. Heath, 62 N. E. 107, 111, 29 Ind. App. 395.

In its proper sense, the word "discretion" implies judgment—soundness of judgment. Thus, we speak of a "discreet" man, and of his "discretion"; and in this sense the word applies well enough to those qualities of a fence which are in their nature undefined, as when the statute describes it as "of strong materials, put up in a good and substantial manner, with sufficiently small spaces," etc. These things were within their "discretion" or sound judgment, not in their mere option. McManus v. Finan, 4 Iowa (4 Clarke) 283, 286.

"Discretion," when applied to a court of justice, means sound discretion guided by law. It must be governed by rule, not by humor. It must not be arbitrary, vague, and fanciful, but legal and regular. Rex v. Wilkes, 4 Burrows, 2527, 2539; Harris v. Harris (Va.) 31 Grat. 13, 16; Sea Isle City Imp. Co. v. Assessors of Taxes of Borough of Sea Isle City, 39 Atl. 1063, 1064, 61 N. J. Law, 476; Loviner v. Pearce, 70 N. C. 167, 171; Miller v. Wallace, 76 Ga. 479, 484, 2 Am. St. Rep. 48; People v. Superior Court of City of New York (N. Y.) 5 Wend. 114, 126; Platt v. Munroe (N. Y.) 34 Barb. 291, 292; Sharp v. Greene, 62 Pac. 147, 150, 22 Wash. 677; Haupt v. Independent Tel. Messenger Co., 63 Pac. 1033, 1035, 25 Mont. 122; State ex rel. Adamson v. Lafayette County Court, 41 Mo. 221, 222; Ex parte Mackey, 15 S. C. 322, 328.

"Discretion" is defined as deliberate judgment. Stewart v. Stewart, 62 N. E. 1023, 1024, 28 Ind. App. 378.

"Discretion" is defined as the discernment of what is right and proper—as deliberate judgment. Citizens' St. R. Co. v. Health, 62 N. E. 107, 111, 29 Ind. App. 395; Stewart v. Stewart, 62 N. E. 1023, 1025, 28 Ind. App. 378.

"Discretion" does mean and can mean nothing else but exercising the best of the court's judgment upon the occasion that calls for it. Tompkins v. Sands (N. Y.) 8 Wend. 462, 468, 24 Am. Dec. 46; Rex v. Young, 1 Burrows, 556, 560.

When it is said that something is left to the "discretion" of the judge, it signifies that he ought to decide according to the rules of equity and the nature of circumstances. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 3556, subd. 10.

"Discretion," as applied to public functionaries, means the power or right of acting officially, according to what appears just and proper under the circumstances. Rio Grande County Com'rs v. Lewis, 65 Pac. 51, 28 Colo. 378 (citing Murray v. Buell, 74 Wis. 14, 18, 41 N. W. 1010).

"Discretion" is defined, when applied to public functionaries, to be a power or right, conferred upon them by law, of acting officially in certain circumstances according to the dictates of their own judgment and conscience, uncontrolled by the judgment or conscience of others. Farrelly v. Cole, 56 Pac. 492, 497, 60 Kan. 356, 44 L. R. A. 464 (citing Judges of Oneida Common Pleas v. People [N. Y.] 18 Wend. 79; State v. Hultz, 16 S. W. 940, 942, 106 Mo. 41).

To say that granting an application rests "in discretion" does not mean that it may be granted or refused at the mere will or pleasure of the judge, but that he is to exercise a sound judicial judgment, in the interest of justice and prudence. Abbott v. L'Hommedieu, 10 W. Va. 677; Rose v. Brown, 11 W. Va. 122, 123.

"Discretion, when vested in an officer, does not mean absolute or arbitrary power. The discretion must be exercised in a reasonable manner, and not maliciously, wantonly, and arbitrarily, to the wrong and injury of another. This is held to be the rule applicable to public officers, who are bound to exercise their deliberate judgment in the discharge of their official duties, and is applicable to all inferior magistrates and others called to the performance of functions, in their nature and character, quasi judicial, while acting within their jurisdiction and the legal scope of their powers as fixed by law." Taylor v. Robertson, 52 Pac. 1, 3, 16 Utah, 330.

Judicial power, as contradistinguished from the power of the laws, has no existence. Courts are the mere instruments of the law, and can will nothing. When they are said to exercise "discretion," it is a mere legal discretion; a discretion to be exercised in discerning the course prescribed by law, and when that is discerned it is the duty of the court to follow it. Judicial power is never exercised for the purpose of giving effect to the will of the judge; always for the purpose of giving effect to the will of the Legislature, or, in other words, to the will of the law. Osborn v. United States Bank, 22 U. S. (9 Wheat.) 738, 866, 6 L. Ed. 204; State v. Cunningham, 53 N. W. 35, 53, 83 Wis. 90, 17 L. R. A. 145, 35 Am. St. Rep. 27.

"The most odious and dangerous of all laws would be those depending on the discretion of judges." Lord Camden, one of the greatest and purest of English judges, said that: "The discretion of a judge is the law of tyrants; it is always unknown; it is different in different men; it is casual, and depends on constitution, temper, and passion. At best it is often caprice. In the worst it is every vice, folly, and passion to which human nature can be liable." State v. Cummings, 36 Mo. 263, 278.

It is said: "The discretion of a judge is the law of tyrants; it is always unknown; it is different in different men; it is casual, and depends upon constitution and passion. In the best it is often at times capricious; in the worst it is every vice, folly, and madness to which human nature is liable." 1 Bouv. Law Dict., vide "Discretion," p. 473. This may be to some extent an extreme statement of the objection, but every practitioner of experience well knows that it is not without much truth. The writer of this opinion has known a popular judicial officer grow quite angry with a suitor in his court, and threaten him with imprisonment, for no ostensible reason save the fact that he wore an overcoat made of wolfskins. Moreover, it cannot safely be denied that mere judicial discretion is sometimes very much interfered with by prejudice, which may be swayed and controlled by the merest trifles, such as the toothache, the rheumatism, the gout, or a fit of indigestion, or even through the very means by which indigestion is frequently sought to be avoided. In further illustration of what judicial discretion ought to be, but not infrequently is not, I add an extract from an opinion, in a case of national importance, by one of our country's greatest men, and ablest and purest judges. Chief Justice Marshall says: "Courts are mere instruments of the law, and can will nothing. When they are said to exercise a discretion, it is a mere legal discretion; a discretion to be exercised in discerning the course prescribed by law, and when that is discerned it is the duty of the court to follow it. Judicial power is never exercised for the purpose of giving effect to the will of the judge; always for the purpose of giving effect to the will of the Legislature, or, in other words, to the will of the law." Osborn v. United States Bank, 22 U. S. (9 Wheat.) 738, 866, 6 L. Ed. 204. Whatever may have been the construction of this important statute heretofore, it is now evidently unwise longer to keep so indispensable a right as that of a fair and impartial trial in a criminal case under the uncertain security of a power so uncontrollable and liable to error as mere judicial discretion—a power that may possibly be misdirected by a fit of temporary sickness, an extra mint julep, or the smell or looks of a peculiar overcoat, or things more trivial than these, which may imperil the due course of justice in the administration of the law. Ex parte Chase, 43 Ala. 303, 310.

There are different kinds of discretion that may be exercised by the trial court. There is the discretion in the sense of the exclusive right to decide as that court pleases, which will not be revised by the appellate tribunal. There is a discretion in the decision of what is just and proper under the circumstances. The latter kind of discretion will not be reviewed unless there is an abuse of it; that is, unless it appears that it was exercised on grounds or for reasons clearly untenable, or to an extent clearly unreasonable. That would be its abuse. In all cases courts must exercise a discretion in the sense of being discreet, circumspect, prudent, and exercising cautious judgment. Murray v. Buell, 41 N. W. 1010, 1012, 74 Wis. 14.

The use of the word "discretion," in an instruction authorizing a jury to exercise their discretion, was held to be erroneous, as being calculated to convey the impression that the jury were not confined to the facts, but were at liberty to exercise a discretion independent of the evidence; the court saying that, if the word "judgment" had been substituted for "discretion," the charge might have been unobjectionable. Seaboard Mfg. Co. v. Woodson, 11 South. 733, 736, 98 Ala. 378.

The word "discretion," in a statute authorizing an appeal from an order of a municipal court, and providing that it shall be in the discretion of such court, after hearing and considering said application, to allow such order or deny the same, means that the whole matter is to be submitted to the sound judgment of the court, to be exercised according to the rules of law. Lent v. Tilson, 14 Pac. 71, 77, 72 Cal. 404; Lent v. Tillson (U. S.) 11 Sup. Ct. 825, 830, 140 U. S. 316, 35 L. Ed. 419.

The term "discretion," in a statute allowing the county commissioners to make allowance at their discretion, means according to law, at their discretion. Scott v. City of La Porte (Ind.) 68 N. E. 278, 281.

The word "discretion," in an act authorizing the removal of certain officers for cause, means a discretion to be exercised after a hearing for cause, as provided in the act. The mere fact that in the opinion of the council an officer has been guilty of misconduct in office, or that good cause for his removal exists, will not justify the exercise of this discretion in a summary manner. The officer must be furnished with specific charges, and then have an opportunity to call witnesses in explanation of his conduct or acts. People v. McAllister, 10 Utah, 357, 370, 37 Pac. 578, 581.

Absence of fixed rule implied.

"Discretion" implies that, in the absence of positive law or fixed rule, the judge is to decide by his view of expediency, or of the demands of equity and justice. Goodwin v. Prime, 42 Atl. 785, 787, 92 Me. 355 (citing State v. Wood, 23 N. J. Law [3 Zab.] 560).

Within the rule that a master of a vessel must act in good faith and exercise his best discretion for the benefit of all concerned, the term "discretion" implies the absence of a hard and fast rule, for the establishment of a clearly defined rule of action would be the end of discretion. And yet "discretion" should not be a word for arbitrary will or inconsiderate action. "Discretion" means the equitable decision of what is just and proper under the circumstances; it means the liberty or power of acting, without other control, in one's own judgment. The Styria v. Munroe, 22 Sup. Ct. 731, 734, 186 U. S. 1, 46 L. Ed. 1027.

The term "discretion" implies the absence of a hard and fast rule, and the establishment of a clearly-defined rule would be the end of discretion; but the term is not a word for arbitrary will and unstable caprice. Judicial discretion should not be, as Lord Coke pronounced it, "a crooked cord," but rather, as Lord Mansfield defined it, "exercising the best of their judgment upon the occasion that calls for it." Norris v. Clinkscapes, 25 S. E. 797, 801, 47 S. C. 488.

Whenever a clear and well-defined rule has been adopted, not depending upon circumstances, the court has parted with its discretion as a rule of judgment. Discretion may be, and is to a very great extent, regulated by usage, or by principles which courts have learned by experience, when applied to the great majority of cases, will best promote the ends of justice; but it is still left to the court to determine whether a case is exactly alike in every color, circumstance, and feature to those upon which the usage or principle is founded, or in which it has been applied. State v. Hultz, 16 S. W. 940, 942, 106 Mo. 41.

As authorizing submission to arbitration.

"Discretion," as used in a vote authorizing the selectmen of a town to settle a claim against it at their discretion, should be construed to authorize the selectmen to submit the claim to arbitration. Campbell v. Inhabitants of Upton, 113 Mass. 67, 70.

As impartial discretion.

The term "discretion," in Hill's Ann. Laws, § 102, providing that the court rendering a judgment may in its discretion relieve a party from the judgment, means an impartial discretion, guided and controlled in its exercise by fixed legal principles; a legal discretion, to be exercised in conformity with the spirit of the law, and in a manner to subserve and not to defeat the ends of substantial justice; and for a manifest abuse thereof it is reviewable by an appellate jurisdiction. Thompson v. Connell, 48 Pac. 467, 468, 31 Or. 231, 65 Am. St. Rep. 818.

As judicial discretion.

The term "discretion," in the rule that the granting or refusing to grant a temporary injunction is within the discretion of the court, means a sound judicial discretion. When it appears, from the nature of the case and all the facts, that a party is not entitled to an injunction, the granting thereof is error, because unauthorized. The granting of an injunction is not in such cases a matter of discretion. Shilling v. Reagan, 48 Pac. 1109, 1110, 19 Mont. 508.

As legal discretion.

"Discretion," as used in an agreement by one to whom property had been conveyed in satisfaction of a debt, by which he agreed to pay certain demands against the transferor of the goods, and dispose of such goods to the best advantage in his discretion, and pay the balance to the other bona fide creditors of the transferor, means a legal discretion; that is, a discretion to be exercised within the limits which the law fixes in such cases. It must be held to apply to the mode of sale, as to whether it shall be public or private, by the quantity or single article, and the various other details of such transaction, and does not necessarily imply an authority to sell on credit. Norton v. Kearney, 10 Wis. 443, 450.

The "discretion" vested by the Legislature in the city council of Salt Lake City by Comp. Laws 1888, § 1755, subd. 40, to license, regulate, and tax the sale of intoxicating liquors, is not an arbitrary power, to be exercised as the caprice or prejudice of that body may dictate, but a legal discretion, whereby the council is to determine whether or not the applicant has substantially complied with the provisions of law. The common council of a city must be governed by the same rules of law in their action upon the granting of these licenses as other bodies who are called upon by the statute to pass upon the qualifications of others to engage in any business or calling requiring special conditions preliminary to its exercise, and they are bound in all cases to act fairly, and to treat each application upon its own merits impartially; and the mere fact that there is one saloon in the neighborhood already licensed, and the council think this sufficient for the needs of the neighborhood, does not give them the right to deny an application for another license. The council did not decide that the place or neighborhood was improper wherein to carry on the traffic, nor that the relator was disqualified in any manner, but merely said, in effect, that in that neighborhood one man may engage in the business, but another may not. This is not a question of prohibiting the traffic in that locality, but of prohibiting a particular individual against whom no disqualification is alleged, and who has complied with law, from engaging in the business, and at the same time permitting another, under no worse legal circumstances, to do so. This cannot be within the discretionary powers of the council. Perry v. Salt Lake City Council, 25 Pac. 988, 1000, 7 Utah, 143, 11 L. R. A. 446.

Where anything is left to any person to be done according to his "discretion," the law intends it must be done with a sound discretion and according to law. Schlaudecker v. Marshall, 72 Pa. (22 P. F. Smith) 200, 206 (citing Tomlins, Law Dict.).

As subject to control of court.

A will creating a trust, the management of which was left in the "discretion" of the executors or trustees, did not confer an authority not subject to the control of the court. Holcomb v. Holcomb's Ex'rs, 11 N. J. Eq. (3 Stockt.) 281, 290.

DISCRETIONARY POWER.

"A power is discretionary when it is not imperative, or, if imperative, when the time or manner or extent of its execution is left to the discretion of the donee. Generally the courts will not compel the execution of discretionary powers, nor review the discretion, when exercised in good faith." Gosson v. Ladd, 77 Ala. 223, 232.

A "discretionary power" involves an alternative power; that is, a power to do or refrain from doing a certain thing. Bennett v. Norton, 32 Atl. 1112, 1116, 171 Pa. 221.

The terms "discretionary power" and "judicial power" are often used interchangeably; but there are many acts requiring the exercise of judgment which may fairly be considered of a judicial nature, and yet do not in any proper sense come within the judicial power as applicable to the courts. The phrase "judicial power" is commonly employed to designate that department of government which it was intended should interpret and administer the laws and decide private disputes between and concerning persons. By the "judicial power" of courts is generally understood the power to hear and determine controversies between adverse parties and questions in litigation. State v. Le Clair, 30 Atl. 7, 9, 86 Me. 522.

DISCRETIONARY TRUST.

A "discretionary trust" is when, by the terms of the trust, no direction is given as to the manner in which the trust fund shall be invested until the time arrives at which it is to be appropriated in satisfaction of the trust. Denderick v. Cantrell, 18 Tenn. (10 Yerg.) 263, 269, 31 Am. Dec. 576.

DISCRIMINATION.

"Discrimination," as applied to rates charged for freight, consists of the single fact, without other qualification or exception, of charging a greater rate to the one person than to the other or others. Houston & T. C. Ry. Co. v. Rust, 58 Tex. 98, 107.

"Discrimination," as used in Interstate Commerce Act, § 3, cl. 2, relating to the discrimination between connecting carriers, does not apply to that which arises from a refusal to permit the forwarding company to perform an act which involves the use of the track or terminal facilities of the receiving company. Little Rock & M. R. Co. v. St. Louis, L. M. & S. Ry. Co. (U. S.) 59 Fed. 400, 402.

Rev. St. art. 4574, subd. 2, declares that every railroad company failing or refusing to receive or transport the tonnage and cars of any connecting line without delay or discrimination, as prescribed by the regulations of the railroad commission, shall be deemed guilty of unjust discrimination; and article 4575 imposes a penalty on any company guilty of discrimination. Held, that the terms "delay" and "discrimination" were to be used as convertible, and that "delay" was "discrimination," within the terms of the statute; and hence, delay in a shipment having been admitted, it was proper to direct a verdict for plaintiff. Gulf, C. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Lone Star Salt Co., 63 S. W. 1025, 1026, 26 Tex. Civ. App. 531.

The expression "discrimination in freights," as used in Acts 1874-75, c. 240, entitled "An act to prevent discrimination in freight tariffs by railroad companies operating in the state," is a term well understood in the nomenclature of transportation over railroads. "It may have a wider significance, but for the present purpose it implies, to charge shippers of freight as compensation for carrying the same over railroads unequal sums of money for the same quantity of freight for equal distances; more for a shorter than a longer distance, more in proportion to distance for a shorter than a longer distance; more for freight called 'local freights,' than those designated otherwise; more for the former in proportion to distance such freights may be carried than the latter." Hines v. Wilmington & W. R. Co., 95 N. C. 434, 446, 59 Am. Rep. 250.

DISCUSS.

The word "discussed," within the rule that assignments of error which are not discussed will not be considered on appeal, does not include a mere reference by counsel in his brief to the grounds of objection stated in the trial court, and insisting that the objection there made should have been sustained. Baldwin v. Threlkeld, 34 N. E. 851, 853, 8 Ind. App. 312.

The phrase "discussing the propriety of finding a bill of indictment" in Code Civ.

Proc. art. 394, providing that the state's attorney may come before the grand jury at any time except when they are discussing the propriety of finding a bill of indictment, is equivalent to the phrase "deliberating upon the accusation against the defendant" in article 523, providing that an indictment may be set aside for the presence of any person, not authorized by law, when the grand jury were deliberating upon the accusation against the defendant. Stuart v. State, 34 S. W. 118, 35 Tex. Cr. R. 440.

DISEASE.

See "Bad Disease"; "Heart Disease"; "Infectious Diseases."

The term "disease," in an insurance application that insured is free from disease, can hardly be said to characterize an ailment which produces no disorder, and of the presence of which the person affected is unconscious. Continental Life Ins. Co. v. Yung, 15 N. E. 220, 222, 113 Ind. 159, 3 Am. St. Rep. 630.

The word "disease" may include, and is often used to designate, ailments more or less trivial. The false answer by an applicant for insurance, to a question constituting a warranty, as to whether he ever had any of certain enumerated diseases and ailments, will constitute a breach of the contract, though such disease or ailment is not material to the risk, unless the same was not inherent, but temporary, and due to extraordinary and exceptional outside causes, such as excessive work or heat. Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Simpson, 31 S. W. 501, 502, 88 Tex. 333, 28 L. R. A. 765, 53 Am. St. Rep. 757.

As accident.

See "Accident—Accidental."

Cold.

In an application for reinstatement of an insurance policy which stated that the insured had not since the policy was issued been "sick or afflicted with any disease," a cold will not be included, and, in the absence of proof that the cold referred to produced disease or sickness, the words cannot be construed as meaning absolute freedom from any bodily ills, but rather freedom from such ills as would ordinarily be called "disease" or "sickness." Metropolitan Life Ins. Co. v. McTague, 9 Atl. 766, 768, 49 N. J. Law (20 Vroom) 587, 60 Am. Rep. 661.

Fainting spell.

In a broad generic sense, any temporary trouble by reason of which a man loses consciousness is a "disease." It is a condition of the body not normal, and produced by the imperfect working of some function; but as the imperfect working is not permanent, and the body returns at once or in a short period of time to its normal condition, it does not rise to the dignity of a "disease." A fainting spell produced by indigestion or a lack of proper food for a number of hours, or from any other cause which would not indicate any disease in the body, but would show a mere temporary disturbance or enfeeblement, would not come within the meaning of the words "disease and bodily infirmity," as used in an insurance policy providing that the risk shall not extend to death caused by disease and bodily infirmity. Manufacturers' Accident Indemnity Co. v. Dorgan (U. S.) 58 Fed. 945, 955, 7 C. C. A. 581, 22 L. R. A. 620.

Headache

A headache which is produced temporarily by overwork, and leaves no permanent effect upon the constitution, is not, in the sense of an application for insurance, a "disease." Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Simpson (Tex.) 28 S. W. 837, 838.

Insanity.

"Disease," when used without restrictive words, includes "diseases of the mind as well as of the body," so that a clause in a life policy providing that the policy shall be avoided by suicide, unless the same is the direct result of disease, does not render the policy void upon self-destruction as the result of insanity. Connecticut Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Akens, 14 Sup. Ct. 155, 157, 150 U. S. 468, 37 L. Ed. 1148.

As used in an accident policy providing that the insurer shall not be liable for death or disability which may have been caused wholly or in part by bodily infirmities or disease, "disease" does not include a self-inflicted injury or death during the insanity of the insured. Accident Ins. Co. v. Crandal, 7 Sup. Ct. 685, 687, 120 U. S. 527, 30 L. Ed. 740.

Kidney trouble.

An answer in the proofs of death that the injured had had kidney trouble is not inconsistent with an answer in an application that he never had "disease of the kidneys," since there might have been kidney trouble from accident, or from some other temporary cause, such as to produce sickness, when it could not properly be said that there was disease of those organs. Hogan v. Metropolitan Ins. Co., 41 N. E. 663, 664, 164 Mass. 448.

Malignant pustule.

"Disease," as used in a policy of accident insurance providing that the benefits thereof should not extend to any death or disability which might be caused wholly or in part by bodily infirmities or disease existing prior or subsequent to the date of the policy, should be construed to include a malignant pustule, caused by the infliction upon the body of putrid animal matter containing poisonous bacillus anthrax, which results from touching or handling vermin coming from the hide or hair or wool of animals suffering from this disease, from their flesh sometimes, or from the feathers of birds that have been feeding upon this peculiar kind of carrion, and then bringing the matter in contact with the skin or thin mucous membrane, or it may be transported by insects, flies, or mosquitoes. It has been called "wool sorter's disease," because it happens among people who handle wools and hides, such as tanners, butchers, and herdsmen, and those people that are engaged in business where they are brought in contact with that sort of thing, and there have been epidemics of it. Bacon v. United States Mut. Acc. Ass'n, 25 N. E. 399, 123 N. Y. 304, 9 L. R. A. 617, 20 Am. St. Rep. 748.

Sunstroke.

In a policy of insurance against injuries sustained through external, violent, and accidental means, and excepting disease or bodily infirmity, "disease" should be construed to include sunstroke or heat prostration, which is a disease of the brain. "Sunstroke" is a term applied to the effects on the central nervous system, and through it on other organs of the body, by exposure to the sun or to overheated air. Dozier v. Fidelity & Casualty Co. of New York (U. S.) 46 Fed. 446, 447, 13 L. R. A. 114.

Temporary ailment or disorder.

A temporary ailment from which a person recovers cannot be considered a "disease" within the meaning of a life insurance policy. Corbett v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 55 N. Y. S. 775, 780, 37 App. Div. 152 (citing Cushman v. United States Life Ins. Co., 70 N. Y. 72).

In an application for a life policy stating that insured had no disease, the term "disease" does not include any slight ill in no way seriously affecting the applicant's health or interfering with his usual avocations; but a temporary ailment in the nature of a headache or a cold may be of such a serious nature that it is a sickness, within the meaning of such a representation. Manhattan Life Ins. Co. v. Francisco, 84 U. S. (17 Wall.) 672, 680, 21 L. Ed. 698.

The words "disease or bodily infirmity," as used in a provision in an accident policy exempting insured from liability for injuries caused thereby, mean practically the same thing, and only include an ailment or disorder of a somewhat established or settled character, and merely a temporary disorder arising from sudden and unexpected derangement of the system, though it produces unconsciousness. Meyer v. Fidelity & Casualty Co., 65 N. W. 328, 96 Iowa, 378, 59 Am. St. Rep. 374.

The term "disease," in an application for a life policy containing representations as to the freedom of insured from disease, does not include any temporary ailment, unless it be such as to indicate a vice in the constitution, or so serious as to have some bearing, at least, on the general health and conditions of life, or such as, according to common understanding, would be called a "disease." Rand v. Provident Sav. Life Assur. Soc., 37 S. W. 7, 8, 97 Tenn. 291.

"Disease," as used in a life insurance policy providing that the insurance did not cover injuries resulting from any disease or bodily infirmity, is practically synonymous with "infirmity," and will not be held to refer to a slight or temporary disorder. Meyer v. Fidelity & Casualty Co., 65 N. W. 328, 330, 96 Iowa, 378, 59 Am. St. Rep. 374 (citing Northwestern Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Heimann, 93 Ind. 24; Metropolitan Life Ins. Co. v. Metague, 49 N. J. Law [20 Vroom] 587, 9 Atl. 766, 60 Am. Rep. 661; Pudritzky v. Supreme Lodge, Knights of Honor, 76 Mich. 428, 43 N. W. 373; Brown v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 65 Mich. 306, 32 N. W. 610, 8 Am. St. Rep. 894; Mutual Benefit Life Ins. Co. v. Daviess' Ex'r, 87 Ky. 541, 9 S. W. 812).

Wounds or injuries.

The representation, in an application for life insurance, that the insured had not been subject to or had any "disorders or diseases," such as open sores, lumps, or swellings of any kind, should be construed to mean only such as result by defective action of some function, and which were to some extent permanent or continuous, and of such nature as would be of reasonable significance for the purpose of the inquiry, and not from wounds or injuries. Home Mut. Life Ass'n v. Gillespie, 1 Atl. 340, 343, 110 Pa. 84.

DISFIGURE.

"Disfigure," as used in Code, § 2678, making it criminal to maliciously kill, maim, or disfigure any horse, cattle, etc., includes injuries which are not of a permanent character. "It embraces any injury, however slight, which is made with malice toward the owner, and which is of a character to lessen the value of the animal." State v. Harris, 11 Iowa, 414, 415.

Within a statute punishing the mutilation or disfigurement of an animal the shaving off of all the hair from the mane and tail of a horse would be sufficiently described by the word "disfigure." It is the very term which would be used, and maliciously to impair the use and value of a horse by injuring his appearance and marring his beauty in removing of those parts alike ornamental and useful, falls entirely within the mischief which the act seeks to prevent. Boyd v. State, 21 Tenn. (2 Humph.) 39, 40.

DISFRANCHISEMENT.

Distinguished from amotion, see "Amotion."

Disfranchisement destroys or takes away the franchise or right of being a member of a corporation. Richards v. Clarksburg, 4 S. E. 774, 778, 30 W. Va. 491.

The disfranchisement of a member of a corporation is an expulsion of the member and the taking away of his franchise, which cannot be done unless the power is given by the charter creating the corporation, or the member has been guilty of a crime, the conviction of which would work a forfeiture of all civil rights, or has committed acts which tend to the destruction of the corporation, such as the defacing of its charter, the alteration of its records, or other acts tending to impair or destroy its title to its rights or privileges. White v. Brownell (N. Y.) 4 Abb. Prac. (N. S.) 162, 192.

DISGRACE.

Disgrace is a sense of shame or reproach; that which dishonors; a state of ignominy, dishonor, or shame. And this is the gravamen of an aggravated assault, which is defined as an assault which inflicts disgrace. Slawson v. State, 45 S. W. 575, 39 Tex. Cr. R. 176, 73 Am. St. Rep. 914.

DISGUISE.

"In disguise" is an expression importing a meaning totally different from the phrase "in ambush," or the word "concealed." The word "disguised," when employed as a noun, means a counterfeit habit; a dress intended to conceal the person who wears it. So it is held that, where the evidence showed that a murder was committed by one in ambush or concealed in bushes, a charge relative to the commission of the crime by a person in disguise was unsupported by the evidence. The attempt, says the court, to construe the mere position of a person in ambush or concealed in the bushes as synonymous with, or similar to, the mere dress or mask of a person in disguise, would be a wanton outrage upon good sense and logic. A person in disguise is one who is visible to the eye, but who cannot be identified because of the dress or mask which he wears. A person in ambush or who is concealed is one not visible to the eye, and may not be in disguise. "Disguise" has reference solely to the dress or mask assumed by which the party cannot be recognized when near. "Ambush" and "concealment" have reference alone to the position in which the person hides himself. Dale County v. Gunter, 46 Ala. 118, 128.

DISHERISON.

Waste is the "disherison" of the remainderman or reversioner. "Disherison" is defined to be disinheriting, depriving, or putting out of an inheritance (Burrill, Law Dict.), and the old writ of waste called upon the tenant to appear and show cause why he had committed waste and destruction in the place named to the "disherison" of the plaintiff. Abernethy v. Orton, 71 Pac. 327, 329, 42 Or. 437, 95 Am. St. Rep. 774.

DISHONOR.

See "Notice of Dishonor."

"Webster defines the word 'dishonor' to be to refuse or decline to accept or pay, when it is used in a commercial sense; and Mr. Bouvier, in his Law Dictionary, gives a similar meaning. In Shelton v. Braithwaite, 7 Mees. & W. 436, the Court of Exchequer held that the word 'dishonor' had a technical signification, and imported that the bill had been presented for payment and had not been paid." Brewster v. Arnold, 1 Wis. 264, 276.

A negotiable instrument is dishonored when it is either not paid or not accepted according to its tenor on presentment for the purpose, or without presentment where that is excused. Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 4070; Rev. St. Wyo. 1899, § 2368; St. Okl. 1903, § 3634; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 4895; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 2210.

DISHONORABLE CONDUCT.

Unprofessional or dishonorable conduct, as ground for refusing a certificate to practice medicine, is (1) the procuring or aiding or abetting in procuring a criminal abortion; (2) the obtaining of a fee on the assurance that a manifestly incurable disease can be permanently cured; (3) betrayal of a professional secret to the detriment of a patient; (4) causing the publication and circulation of advertisements of any medicine or means whereby the monthly periods of women can be regulated, or the menses can be established if suppressed; (5) causing the publication and circulation of advertisements of any kind relative to diseases of the sexual organs, tending to injure the morals of the public. Cobbey's Ann. St. Neb. 1903, § 9428.

DISINTER.

To "disinter" means to unbury; to take out of the grave; to exhum; so that as used in Pen. Code, § 290, providing that every person who disinters or removes a dead body of a human being without authority of law is guilty of a felony, it will not include one who merely dug down to a coffin to search the body for valuables, without removing it. People v. Baumgartner, 66 Pac. 974, 975, 135 Cal. 72.

DISINTERESTED.

As impartial or fair-minded.

A statute providing that a motion for change of venue must be supported by the oath of two disinterested persons will be held to mean not merely persons qualified at common law to testify, but, rather, that those who were to inform the court and set in motion judicial action should be indifferent to the cause in the broader sense of being impartial and fair-minded. Territory v. Leary, 43 Pac. 688, 689, 8 N. M. 180 (citing Warren v. Baxter, 48 Me. 193, 194; Ætna Ins. Co. v. Stevens, 48 Ill. 31, 33).

The term "disinterested," as applied to appraisers, does not simply mean lack of pecuniary interest, but requires the appraiser to be one not biased or prejudiced. Hickerson v. German-American Ins. Co., 33 S. W. 1041, 1043, 96 Tenn. 193, 32 L. R. A. 172; Bradshaw v. Agricultural Ins. Co., 32 N. E. 1055, 1058, 137 N. Y. 137; Brock v. Dwelling House Ins. Co., 61 N. W. 67, 70, 102 Mich. 583, 26 L. R. A. 623, 47 Am. St. Rep. 562; Hall v. Western Assur. Co., 32 South. 257, 258, 133 Ala. 637; Insurance Co. of North America v. Hegewald (Ind.), 66 N. E. 902, 905 (citing Brock v. Dwelling House Ins. Co., 102 Mich. 583, 61 N. W. 67, 26 L. R. A. 623, 47 Am. St. Rep. 562).

In Connecticut, where a statute provides that appraisers at an execution sale shall be indifferent freeholders, it has been held that, where one of the appraisers was a nephew by marriage, the levy was void for that reason. Fox v. Hills, 1 Conn. 295. The court say that "indifferent" means "impartial," and that it may reasonably be presumed that a near relative will be under the influence of partiality. Worcester defines "indifferent" as having no choice or preference. Wolcott v. Ely, 84 Mass. (2 Allen) 338, 340.

A son-in-law of a judgment creditor is not a disinterested person within Rev. St. c. 73, § 3, providing for the appointment of appraisers on execution sale of a disinterested and discreet person. One of the definitions of "disinterested" given by Webster is "indifferent." Worcester gives as one meaning "superior to private regards," and he defines "indifferent" as having no choice or preference. It does not mean only one having no pecuniary interest. Wolcott v. Ely, 84 Mass. (2 Allen) 338, 340.

As without pecuniary interest.

"Disinterested," as used in a statute requiring that the commissioners appointed on a petition for laying out a highway should be disinterested freeholders, meant those so situated that the establishment of the highway, or refusal to establish it, would not directly affect their pecuniary interests, and did not exclude one who happened to be related to one of the petitioners. Chase v. Town of Rutland, 47 Vt. 393, 399.

"Disinterested freeholders," as used in Act April 22, 1856, providing for the appointment of seven disinterested freeholders whenever the burgesses and town council shall open or widen a street, which viewers shall assess and allow to all persons injured thereby such damages as they should have sustained, cannot be construed to include property owners whose lands abutted on the street to be improved, for they were directly interested in the assessment. In re Burgess and Town Council of Borough of Big Run, 20 Atl. 711, 137 Pa. 590.

A statute requiring a commissioner for the establishment of a highway to be a disinterested freeholder residing in another town from that in which the highway petitioned for was located should be construed to include one who was not interested in laying out and establishing the highway further than every citizen is interested in having convenient and proper highways established. The fact that he had a grand list in the town in which the highway was to be laid out for the current year, and not beyond that period, did not affect it, for he had no direct interest in the establishment or nonestablishment of the highway, as petitioner, landowner, or person who would be peculiarly accommodated by its establishment. His interest was indirect and remote—the liability that some portion of the expense of its construction might be assessed on his grand list for that current year, which was an impossibility, because the highway could not be constructed in season so that a tax could be assessed on such list. Gray v. Middletown, 56 Vt. 53, 55.

As not previously interested.

Within the statutes relating to highways, and providing for appeals in certain cases from the action of the board of supervisors of the town, and that on such appeal commissioners shall be appointed who are disinterested persons, the term would not include a person who had previously acted as supervisor of the town in the matter of the same highway relative to which the appeal was made. Brock v. Hishen, 40 Wis. 674, 679. Persons who have signed a petition for a proposed alteration in a highway cannot be said to be disinterested, so as to authorize their appointment as commissioners. Williams v. Mitchell, 5 N. W. 798, 801, 49 Wis. 284.

Rev. St. c. 113, § 28, requires an application by a debtor to disclose and take the poor debtor's oath to be made before two disinterested justices of the peace. Held, that the word "disinterested" meant a legal, positive interest, either by way of relationship to some of the parties, or by way of some accruing pecuniary gain or loss from the result, and not a mere intellectual, moral, or sympathetic interest; hence it did not follow, because a justice had heard and adjudged a prior application by the same petitioner, that he was disqualified, or was not disinterested to hear subsequent applications. McGilvery v. Staples, 16 Atl. 404, 405, 81 Me. 101.

As not related.

"Disinterested," as used in Rev. St. c. 1, § 4, rule 22, requiring disinterestedness on the part of those performing judicial acts, means those who are not related to the parties to the action by blood or marriage, and who have not any pecuniary interest in the matter to be decided. Loving v. Lamson, 50 Me. 334.

In a statute providing that the appraisers on an execution shall be judicious and disinterested freeholders, "disinterested" means something more than being devoid of pecuniary interest. The appraisers should stand in no such relation to either party as would disqualify them for the execution of judicial power between them. Blodget v. Bruinsmaid, 9 Vt. 27, 30.

Rev. St. c. 1, § 4, rule 22, requiring disinterestedness and indifference on the part of those performing judicial acts, excludes those who are related to the parties in the action within the fourth degree, as well as those who are peculiarly interested in the adjudication. Lyon v. Hamor, 73 Me. 56, 58 (citing Couant v. Norris, 58 Me. 451).

Comp. Laws, § 5057, declares that, where beasts are distrained damage feasant, there shall be an appraisal by two disinterested persons. Held that, while the statute does not undertake to define precisely what it means by "disinterested persons," the phrase clearly means persons free from prejudice or partiality, and it is evident that one cannot be regarded as disinterested who is a relative of the parties. Hasceig v. Tripp, 20 Mich. 216, 218.

A justice of the peace is not disinterested if he was once married to a sister of the plaintiff, whether at the time of the suit she were living or not. Spear v. Robinson, 29 Me. (16 Shep.) 531, 543.

A justice is not disinterested, where within the fourth degree of relationship, though he is equally related to each party. Bard v. Wood, 30 Me. (17 Shep.) 153, 156.

DISINTERESTED WITNESS.

In Rev. St. 1857, c. 74, § 1, authorizing the subscription of wills by "three disinterested and credible witnesses," "disinterested" means the opposite of "interested," as applied to a witness; that is, one who would neither gain nor lose by the direct, legal operation and effect of the judgment, and for whom the record would not be legal evidence in some other action. Jones v. Larrabee, 47 Me. 474, 475.

"Disinterested and credible witnesses," as used in St. 1857, c. 74, § 1, authorizing the attestation of wills by three "disinterested and credible witnesses," means competent witnesses who have no present, certain, legal, vested interest. Warren v. Baxter, 48 Me. 193, 195 (citing 4 Stark. Ev. 745; Armory v. Fellowes, 5 Mass. 219).

A disinterested witness to a will, within a statute requiring that wills should be attested by such witnesses, is one who has no legal interest in the will. Appeal of Combs, 105 Pa. 155.

The term "disinterested," as applied to a witness, means devoid of pecuniary interest; having no prospect of gain or loss. Therefore the mere relationship of brother to one of the parties is not such interest as would disqualify him from being a witness to the contract. State v. Easterlin, 39 S. E. 250, 251, 61 S. C. 71.

The term "disinterested witnesses," in Act April 26, 1855, requiring wills containing a bequest to charity to be attested by two credible and at the same time disinterested witnesses, includes a person who is named as executor in the will. In re Jordan's Estate, 29 Atl. 3, 161 Pa. 393.

DISMISS.

See "Motion to Dismiss for Want of Equity."

"Dismiss," when applied to proceedings in law, means the removal of a cause out of court without any further hearing. Bouv. Law Dict. It is applied to the removal or disposal of the cause itself, and not to the mere annulment of the writ. Bosley v. Bruner, 24 Miss. (2 Cushm.) 457, 462.

The usual course of a person who for any reason desired to abandon the further prosecution of his libel for divorce is to move that it may be dismissed. In such a case the entry dismissed is distinguishable from the same entry made by order of the court on a full examination on the merits. The latter, as a decision on the merits, is final, while the former, as a mere nol. pros., is no evidence. Brown v. Brown, 37 N. H. 536, 538, 75 Am. Dec. 154.

As discharge.

Where a court, in causing the dissolution of an injunction, uses the words "dismissed and vacated," the word "dismissed" will be held to mean "discharged." Browne v. Edwards & McCullough Lumber Co., 62 N. W. 1070, 1071, 44 Neb. 361.

As end.

In Taft v. Northern Transp. Co., 56 N. H. 417, the court said: "The entry, 'dismissed by order of court,' appears to have been devised by the court for the purpose of absolutely putting an end to such defective actions; and the term 'dismissed' has acquired a technical meaning in suits at law, and signifies a final ending of the suit—not a final judgment of the controversy, but an end of that proceeding." So that, where a judgment is entered that the complaint be dismissed, such proceeding was ended. Greeley v. Winsor, 52 N. W. 674, 675, 3 S. D. 138.

"The term 'dismissed' has acquired a technical meaning in suits at law in our practice. * * * It is a final ending of the suit—not a final judgment in the controversy, but an end of that proceeding." Taft v. Northern Transp. Co., 56 N. H. 414, 417.

As final disposition.

A bill or suit in equity is said to be dismissed when finally disposed of adversely to the plaintiff, and, unless the decree of dismissal is declared to be without prejudice, it is a bar to any further litigation of the matter between the parties. Goldsmith v. Smith (U. S.) 21 Fed. 611, 614.

Where the decision of the court that has examined a bill in equity with the pleadings and evidence is entered on the docket, "dismissed," without any words of qualification, such word shows a final determination of the controversy between the parties, both in equity and at law. Gove v. Lyford, 44 N. H. 525, 528.

As nonsuit.

The entry of a judgment, "that the said suit is not prosecuted, and be dismissed," was nothing more than the record of a nonsuit, though the customary technical language was not used. Such an amendment did not imply that the plaintiffs had no cause of action, or if they had that they intended to renounce it, or that it was adjusted. Halde-man v. United States, 91 U. S. 584, 585, 23 L. Ed. 433.

As reject.

In an action against heirs to recover a sum paid to the administrator of an estate as the purchase price for land sold at an administrator's sale which was set aside as illegal, the defendants alleged that a claim for the same money was presented as a claim against such estate, and, on due hearing, was by the court dismissed, and that such judgment had never been appealed from, modified, or vacated. The plaintiff claimed that such findings showed only a dismissal of the claim. This is a dispute about words, rather than to reason upon things. Perhaps the more appropriate word to have used would be "disallowed" instead of "dismiss," although the term "dismiss" is quite commonly used to show the rejection of a claim against an estate. It is clear that there had been a final adjudication of the case upon the merits, and such adjudication is a bar to the present action. Stults v. Forst, 34 N. E. 1125, 1128, 135 Ind. 297.

Remand distinguished.

The words "dismiss" and "remanded" are not used interchangeably or indiscriminately in section 5 of the act of 1875, relating to the disposal of cases in the circuit courts. The former has reference only to a suit brought in the circuit court, and the latter to one removed there from the state court. In the one case, if it appear that the suit is not cognizable in the circuit court, it is dismissed, and in the other it is remanded to the state court. Consequently a motion under the jurisdiction of the circuit court in regard to an action brought there from the state court would properly have been an action to remand, rather than to dismiss. Northern Pacific Terminal Co. v. Lowenberg (U. S.) 18 Fed. 339, 341.

DISMISSAL.

A dismissal of a motion for a new trial is really nothing more than a denial of it. Davis v. Hurgren, 57 Pac. 684, 685, 125 Cal. 48.

As a final decree or judgment.

See, also, "Final Hearing or Trial."

A dismissal of an action is a final decree determining the cause, which concludes the parties. Striking the case from the docket is not equivalent to the dismissal of a bill for want of equity. Frederick v. Connecticut River Sav. Bank, 106 Ill. 147, 149.

In effect, a dismissal is a final judgment in favor of the defendant; and, although it may not preclude the plaintiff from bringing a new suit, there is no doubt that, for all purposes connected with the proceedings in the particular action, the rights of the parties are affected by it in the same manner as if there had been an adjudication on the merits. Dowling v. Polack, 18 Cal. 625, 627 (quoted and approved in Lewis v. Smith, 43 Atl. 542, 543, 21 R. I. 324).

A dismissal of a case is to send it out of court without a trial upon any of the issues involved in it. It is the final disposition of a particular case, and not a trial of it. Brackenridge v. State, 11 S. W. 630, 632, 27 Tex. App. 513, 4 L. R. A. 360.

A dismissal of a suit without prejudice is no decision of the controversy on its merits, and leaves the whole subject of litigation as much open to another suit as if no suit had ever been brought. Newberry v. Ruffin (Va.) 45 S. E. 733.

Discontinuance synonymous.

"In practice, a dismissal and a discontinuance amount to the same thing, and are but different words employed to convey the same idea, namely, that the case is sent out of court." Thurman v. James, 48 Mo. 235, 236.

Where an order had been rendered which had the effect of discontinuing an action, it was contended that the courts had no authority to order a discontinuance of the cause, such a thing as a discontinuance being unknown to our practice; but it was held that "discontinuance" and "dismissal" are synonymous terms. English v. Dickey, 27 N. E. 495, 497, 128 Ind. 174, 13 L. R. A. 40.

As nonsuit.

A dismissal, as the term is used in modern practice, does not amount to a retraxit at common law. Nor does a dismissal constitute a nonsuit. Bullock v. Perry (Ala.) 2 Stew. & P. 319.

Voluntary nonsuit.

See "Voluntary Nonsuit."

DISMISSAL AGREED.

A "dismissal agreed" is an adjudication of the matters in dispute between the parties by themselves. Root v. Topeka Water Supply Co., 26 Pac. 398, 400, 46 Kan. 183.

"Agreed dismissal," as used in an entry of judgment reciting an agreed dismissal, does not show a termination of a controversy between the parties. "The words do not of themselves import an agreement to terminate the controversy, nor imply an intention to merge the cause of action in the judgment. The general entry of the dismissal of the suit by agreement is evidence of an intention not to abandon the claim on which it was founded, but to reserve the right to bring a new suit thereon if it becomes necessary." Haldeman v. United States, 91 U. S. 584, 586, 23 L. Ed. 433.

DISOBEDIENCE.

See "Lawful Disobedience."

Resistance distinguished, see "Resistance."

Rev. St. § 725 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 583], provides that the power of the federal courts to punish contempts shall not be construed to extend to any case except the misbehavior of any person in their presence, or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice, the misbehavior of any of the officers of such courts in their official transactions, and the "disobedience or resistance to any lawful writ," etc. Held, that the intention of Congress by the use of the clause "disobedience or resistance to any lawful writ," etc., was to refer only to a case wherein the course of judicial proceedings was or would be actually obstructed, and thus did not include a case where a civil right only had been invaded, which right could be tried according to the usual course of the law. Steam Stone Cutter Co. v. Windsor Mfg. Co. (U. S.) 3 Fed. 298, 301.

DISORDER.

As ailment or disease.

The representation in an application for life insurance that the insured had not been subject to or had any disorders or diseases such as open sores, lumps, or swellings of any kind, should be construed to mean only such as result by defective action of some function, and which were to some extent permanent or continuous, and of such nature as would be of reasonable significance for the purposes of the inquiry, and was not to be construed to include trivial ailments or injuries which were literally within the meaning of the representation. Home Mut. Life Ass'n v. Gillespie, 1 Atl. 340, 343, 110 Pa. 84.

Dyspepsia is not a disorder that tends to shorten life, in regard to a life insurance application. Watson v. Mainwaring, 4 Taunt. 763, 764.

Belgium Treaty, March 9, 1830, art. 11, provides that consuls shall have exclusive charge of the internal order of the merchant vessels of their nation, and shall alone take cognizance of all differences which may arise, either at sea or in port, between the captains, officers, and crews, without exception, particularly with reference to the adjustment of wages and the execution of contracts. The local authorities shall not interfere except when the disorder that has arisen is of such a nature as to disturb tranquillity and public order. Held, that disorder, as the word is there used, meant a disturbance of the public peace, or, as some writers term it, the "public repose" of the people, who look to the state for protection, and therefore the local authorities were not deprived of jurisdiction of a homicide committed on board a Belgian steamship moored to a dock in the port of the United States, arising from an affray between two Belgians belonging to the crew of the vessel, though the affray occurring below deck, and was only witnessed by other members of the crew. Mall v. Keeper of the Common Jail, 7 Sup. Ct. 385, 890, 120 U. S. 1, 30 L. Ed. 563.

DISORDERLY.

As disobedience of law.

"Disorderly," as used in a liquor dealer's bond, conditioned that the principal will not suffer his place to be disorderly, is used in its ordinary sense, and is not limited to its legal signification, as applied to a disorderly house, but means not regulated by the restraint of morality; not complying with the restraints of order and law. Thus the selling of liquor to a minor rendered the premises disorderly, within the condition of the bond. People v. Eckman, 18 N. Y. Supp. 654, 658, 63 Hun, 209.

DISORDERLY CONDUCT.

As to the phrase "disorderly conduct," standing alone, there is no such offense. If, under that phrase, policemen and magistrates were free to call anything they chose "disorderly conduct," and to arrest and hold therefor, no one would be safe. But policemen and magistrates cannot create or define criminal offenses. That can only be done by the Legislature, and cannot, under our form of government, be delegated. People v. Keeper of State Reformatory for Women, 77 N. Y. Supp. 145, 152, 38 Misc. Rep. 233.

A conviction of disorderly conduct is not a valid conviction for a misdemeanor, and therefore within the purview of the state charities law, unless the offense constitutes a misdemeanor as defined by other statutes; and where the record fails to show that the disorderly conduct came within the meaning of Consolidation Act, § 1458 (Laws 1882, p. 366, c. 410), or that of Pen. Code, § 675, relating to the offense of disorderly conduct as therein defined, and therefore a misdemeanor, the person so convicted is properly discharged from custody on habeas corpus. People v. Keeper of New York State Reformatory for Women at Bedford, 68 N. E. 884, 176 N. Y. 465.

Disorderly person distinguished.

The offenses which constitute disorderly conduct under Acts 1833, c. 11, and Acts 1860, c. 508, are different from the offenses which will constitute a disorderly person under the act of 1833 and the Revised Statutes. In common parlance, one who is guilty of disorderly conduct may be regarded as a disorderly person, but these terms, "disorderly person" and "disorderly conduct," are used in the statutes as distinguishing distinct and different offenses. In re Miller (N. Y.) 1 Daly, 562, 563.

As disturbance of public peace.

Disorderly conduct does not constitute any crime known to the law. It is only when it tends to a breach of the peace that it constitutes a minor offense cognizable by the police magistrates of the city of New York. People v. Davis, 80 N. Y. Supp. 872, 875, 80 App. Div. 448.

While disorderly conduct may in many cases be a breach of the peace, it is not necessarily so. Therefore the offense of disorderly conduct is not the same as the offense of a breach of the peace. City of Mt. Sterling v. Holly, 57 S. W. 491, 492, 108 Ky. 621.

Drunkenness.

"Disorderly conduct," as used in Rev. St. art. 363, authorizing a city marshal and his deputies to arrest without warrant all who are guilty of any disorderly conduct, should be construed to include drunkenness in a public place. "Disorderly" does not only mean "confused" or "out of order," but also lawless or contrary to law. Webster. There is good authority for holding that any conduct which is contrary to law is within the definition of "disorderly conduct" as given by standard lexicographers. Pratt v. Brown, 16 S. W. 443, 445, 80 Tex. 608.

Gambling in private.

Quietly playing and betting for money at a game of cards in a private room, although the room be situated over a barroom, and the gaming be done on a Sabbath morning, is not disorderly conduct, as against the municipal ordinances of the city; it not appearing that the offense was in any sense publicly committed, or that the public was in any manner disturbed thereby, or even had any knowledge of the same until the participants in the game were discovered and detected by the police officer who made a raid upon the room for that purpose. Kahn v. City of Macon, 22 S. E. 641, 95 Ga. 419.

Keeping house of ill fame.

The keeping of a house of ill fame is declared to be disorderly conduct by an ordinance of the city of Buffalo. Arhart v. Stark, 27 N. Y. Supp. 301, 302, 6 Misc. Rep. 579.

Under the charter of the city of Buffalo, empowering the common council to pass ordinances "to define and prevent disorderly conduct," etc., the common council had power to pass an ordinance defining what disorderly conduct was, and who should be deemed disorderly persons, and might include keepers of houses of ill fame, and persons voluntarily residing therein, in the latter class, and provide for their punishment. The ordinances passed under such charter (chapter 2, § 1) defined "disorderly conduct" as "the conduct, or commission of any of the acts prohibited by this chapter," etc., and, in section 2, prohibited the keeping of a house of ill fame, or the contribution in any manner to the support of such house, or the voluntary residence therein. The keeper of a house of ill fame is a disorderly person, and his conduct tends to disturb the peace of the community where the brothel is located, and it did not need legislation to declare him such. People v. Miller (N. Y.) 38 Hun, 82, 83.

Violation of official duty.

"Disorderly conduct," as used in a city charter giving the common council the power to expel a member for disorderly conduct, is not limited to acts of turbulence, violence, or disorderly conduct in the body and during the session of the common council, but refers to the conduct of a member of the council as such, not as a member of the corporation nor as a citizen, but as a member of the council, acting in his official character, no matter where or when. He who, intrusted with official power, violates his public obligation, betrays his official trust, and loses the public confidence by selling his official influence or vote in the body of which he is a member, is guilty of disorderly conduct of a far deeper dye than he who merely forgets the proprieties of official business and intercourse. The violation of a rule of morals is a more erroneous offense than the violation of a rule of order. His crime is more base and malignant than turbulent. Any conduct which is contrary to law is within the definition of disorderly conduct, as given by standard lexicographers, and, of course, violation of official duty on the part of a member of the common council is within the legal meaning of the words used in the charter. Tyrrell v. Common Council of Jersey City, 25 N. J. Law (1 Dutch.) 536, 540.

DISORDERLY HOUSE.

A disorderly house is one kept in such a way as to disturb, annoy, or scandalize the public generally, the inhabitants of a particular vicinity, or the passers-by on a particular highway. State v. Wilson, 93 N. C. 608, 609 (citing 2 Whart. Cr. Law, § 2392); Commonwealth v. Bessler, 30 S. W. 1012, 1013, 97 Ky. 498; Hawkins v. Lutton, 70 N. W. 483, 484, 95 Wis. 492, 60 Am. St. Rep. 131; State v. Maxwell, 33 Conn. 259.

A disorderly house is any house used or resorted to for the purpose of gaming, prostitution, or other immoral or illegal practices. People v. Clark (N. Y.) 1 Wheeler, Cr. Cas. 288.

A disorderly house is defined to be a house or other place to which people resort, to the disturbance of persons lawfully in the place, or the disturbance of the neighborhood. Hickey v. State, 53 Ala. 514, 516 (citing 1 Bish. Cr. Law, § 1046); Price v. State, 11 South. 128, 129, 96 Ala. 1; Overman v. State, 88 Ind. 6, 8.

The matter of repetition or frequency of the acts of disorder is an essential element in the acts to constitute the offense of keeping a disorderly house. Commonwealth v. Bessler, 30 S. W. 1012, 1013, 97 Ky. 498; Overman v. State, 88 Ind. 6, 8 (citing State v. Reckards, 21 Minn. 47).

To constitute a disorderly house, an habitual violation of law must be permitted by its occupant. Brown v. State, 7 Atl. 340, 341, 49 N. J. Law (20 Vroom) 61.

The term "disorderly house," as used in Revision 1886, tit. 12, § 133, providing for the punishment of every person who keeps a disorderly house, is synonymous with a house where lewd, dissolute, or drunken persons resort. A house may become a nuisance to its immediate neighborhood without acquiring a general reputation of being disorderly. It must become disorderly and a nuisance before it would acquire a general reputation of being so, and, as soon as it becomes a house of this description, it is, we think, liable to prosecution under this statute. The persons immediately injured by such a house would know that it was in fact disorderly long before its general character would be acquired, and it was not the intention to shield it from prosecution until its general character was established. State v. Maxwell, 33 Conn. 259. To constitute a disorderly house, it is not necessary that the whole building, with every room and apartment in it, shall be used for the unlawful purpose. State v. Garity, 46 N. H. 61, 62.

The term "disorderly house," as defined by the common law, is one of very wide meaning, and includes any house or place, the inmates of which behave so badly as to make it a nuisance—such as a gambling house, dancing house, or other like places. State v. Grosowski, 94 N. W. 1077, 1078, 89 Minn. 343.

A "disorderly house," in its restricted sense, is a house in which people abide, or to which they resort, disturbing the repose of the neighborhood; but, in its more enlarged sense, it includes bawdyhouses, common gaming houses, and places of like character, to which people promiscuously resort for purposes injurious to the public morals or health or convenience or safety. Nor is it essential that there be any disorder or disturbance, in the sense that it disturbs the public peace or the quiet of the neighborhood. It is enough that the acts there done are contrary to law and subversive of public morals, and the result is the same whether the unlawful acts are denounced by the common law or the statute. Cheek v. Commonwealth, 2 Ky. Law Rep. 339, 341, 79 Ky. 359.

Evidence that the witness got drunk at the house kept by defendant, on liquor obtained elsewhere, did not prove that defendant kept a disorderly house, where it did not appear that it was a drinking place, or that drinking and drunken people were wont to assemble there, or that defendant lived in a thickly settled neighborhood, or that the people about there were disturbed, or knew of the conduct at the house. State v. Calley, 10 S. E. 455, 456, 104 N. C. 858, 17 Am. St. Rep. 704.

In keeping a disorderly house, the nuisance consists in drawing together dissolute persons engaged in unlawful and injurious practices, thereby endangering the public peace and corrupting good morals. The gist of the offense is the keeping or managing such a house to the public detriment, and, under a general charge, particular instances may be proved. That notoriously reputed prostitutes and libertines were in the habit of frequenting the house during the time laid in the indictment had a direct tendency to support the allegations of the indictment and establish the guilt of the defendant, if the house were managed or controlled by him at the time. State v. McGregor, 41 N. H. 407, 413.

A complaint for keeping a disorderly house may be maintained by proof that only one person in the neighborhood or community was disturbed or annoyed, if the acts done were of such a nature as tended to annoy all good citizens. Commonwealth v. Hopkins, 133 Mass. 381, 43 Am. Rep. 527.

Bawdyhouse.

See "Bawdyhouse."

Gambling house.

An actual disturbance of the public peace is not indispensable, to constitute the offense of keeping a disorderly house, but it is enough that acts be done that are contrary to law, and subversive of public morals, health, or safety; and consequently it has been held that a common gambling house is, in legal contemplation, a disorderly house. Knefler v. Commonwealth, 22 S. W. 446, 94 Ky. 359.

As house of prostitution.

As used in an ordinance providing for the punishment of any person found in a disorderly house or place, or a house of ill fame, or a place resorted to for purposes of prostitution, the term "disorderly house" does not necessarily mean a house of prostitution. Hawkins v. Lutton, 70 N. W. 483, 484, 95 Wis. 492, 60 Am. St. Rep. 131.

"A disorderly house is defined to be one kept for the purpose of public prostitution, or a common resort for prostitutes, vagabonds, etc." Thompson v. State, 2 Tex. App. 82, 83.

Pen. Code, art. 396, defining a "disorderly house" to be "one kept for the purpose of public prostitution, or as a common resort for prostitutes and vagabonds," does not include every house to which prostitutes and vagabonds resort, but every house kept for the purpose of public prostitution. McElhaney v. State, 12 Tex. App. 231, 232.

The common-law offense of keeping a disorderly house may be proved in various ways—by showing that the accused kept a common bawdyhouse, a common gaming house, or a disorderly place of entertainment. See Steph. Dig. Cr. Law, art. 179. A prosecution for the common-law offense of keeping a disorderly house may be sustained by proof that such house was resorted to by immoral persons for the purpose of prostitution, without evidence that it was otherwise disorderly. Commonwealth v. Goodall, 165 Mass. 588, 594, 43 N. E. 520, 521.

The term "disorderly house," as used in the Penal Code, includes all premises which by common fame or report are used for the purpose of prostitution or assignation. Pen. Code N. Y. 1903, § 718.

As a noisy place.

A disorderly house, in its restricted sense, is a house in which people abide, or to which they resort, disturbing the peace of the neighborhood; but, in its more enlarged sense, it includes bawdyhouses, common gaming houses, and places of like character, to which people promiscuously resort for purposes of injury to the public morals or health or convenience or safety. Nor is it essential that there be any disorder or disturbance, in the sense that it disturbs the public peace or the quiet of the neighborhood. It is enough that the acts there done are contrary to law and subversive of public morals, and the result is the same whether the unlawful acts are denounced by the common law or by statute. Cheek v. Commonwealth, 79 Ky. 359, 362.

That a disorderly house is a resort at which criminal practices are there pursued, offending the moral sense, or endangering the security of persons or property, fixes its character as a public nuisance. The quiet of the locality may be unbroken, but the influence from the evil influence it exerts; from the temptations and opportunities for the commission of crime it affords. It is not essential that there should be any disorder or disturbance in the sense that it disturbs the public peace or the quiet of the whole neighborhood. It is enough that the acts done at such house are contrary to law and subversive of public morals. Price v. State, 11 South. 128, 129, 96 Ala. 1.

Keeping a disorderly house may consist in allowing the house or place to be so noisy and disorderly as to disturb the public peace and annoy the neighborhood, but it is not necessary to show such noise in all cases. The keeping of such a house may consist in its drawing together idle, vicious, dissolute, or disorderly persons, engaged in unlawful or immoral practices, thereby endangering the public peace and promoting immorality. If the doors are practically open to the public, alluring the young and unwary into it, to indulge in or witness anything corrupting to their general good morals, the keeper cannot excuse himself by alleging that the public is not disturbed. 1 Bish. Crim. Law (6th Ed.) §§ 1110-1120; Thatcher v. State, 2 S. W. 343, 344, 48 Ark. 60.

A "disorderly house," the inmates of which behave so badly as to become a nuisance to the neighborhood, has a wide meaning, and includes bawdyhouses, common gambling houses, and places of like character. In Commonwealth v. Hopkins, 133 Mass. 381, 48 Am. Rep. 527, it is held that a house is disorderly which tends to public annoyance, although only one person may have been disturbed, so that where there was evidence that there was noise and confusion inside and outside of a saloon, of such character as to disturb the public, that parties had been drinking there on Sunday, and that other persons had been singing vulgar songs and that witness had been annoyed by the same set of drunkards, there was sufficient evidence to give to the jury as to what constituted a disorderly house. State v. McGahan, 37 S. E. 573, 575, 48 W. Va. 438.

Instrumental music and songs and dancing by volunteers, the whole constituting an entertainment of doubtful decency, attracting a noisy crowd, which fills the room and obstructs the sidewalk, and resulting in the indiscriminate selling of liquor to intoxicated persons, renders a licensed tavern a disorderly house. Commonwealth v. Elliott, 16 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 122.

A barroom and dance hall, with music, kept with intent to bring together and entertain undesirable characters, if they habitually assemble there to drink and dance together, may be a disorderly house, though it is quietly kept, and no conspicuous improprieties are permitted there. Beard v. State, 17 Atl. 1044, 71 Md. 275, 4 L. R. A. 675, 17 Am. St. Rep. 536.

To constitute a house a disorderly house, in law, the noises, etc., must be ordinary and usual or common, and the disturbance must be general, and not of only one person in a thickly settled neighborhood. Heard v. State, 39 S. E. 118, 120, 113 Ga. 444 (citing Palfus v. State, 36 Ga. 280).

A disorderly house is punishable because it disturbs the peace and quiet of the neighborhood. The disorder must be such as can be seen or heard by outsiders. Commonwealth v. Murr, 7 Pa. Super. Ct. 391, 394.

Poolroom.

A house to which people promiscuously resort for purposes injurious to the public morals is a disorderly house. It includes a room kept to which persons commonly resort for the purpose of betting on horse races. Haring v. State, 17 Atl. 1079, 1080, 51 N. J. Law (22 Vroom) 442 (quoting McClean v. State, 9 Atl. 681, 47 N. J. Law [18 Vroom] 471).

Saloon.

The term "disorderly house," as used in Pen. Code, art. 339, defining a disorderly house as one kept for purposes of prostitution, or as a common resort of prostitutes and vagabonds, cannot be construed to include a combined retail grocery store and beer saloon, frequented by prostitutes and vagabonds for the purpose of drinking beer. Harmes v. State, 9 S. W. 487, 26 Tex. App. 190, 8 Am. St. Rep. 470.

The term "disorderly house" has in law a well-settled and well-defined meaning, which is not identical with, and does not necessarily include, the term "tippling shop," which is defined by Bouvier as a place where spirituous liquors are sold and drank in violation of law. City of Emporia v. Volmer, 12 Kan. 622, 633.

Single room.

A disorderly house, within the meaning of a statute prohibiting the keeping of disorderly houses, may include the keeping of a single room. Moore v. State, 4 Tex. App. 127, 128.

To constitute a disorderly house, it is not necessary that the whole building, with every room and apartment in it, shall be used for the unlawful purpose. Ordinarily but a single apartment would be used for the disorderly purpose, though the whole might be so used, and the nuisance to the public would be the same, whether it was in one room or several in the same house. State v. Garity, 46 N. H. 61, 62.

DISORDERLY MANNER.

The words "disorderly manner," in Rev. St. 1881, § 2097, providing that whoever keeps a place where intoxicating liquors are sold, bartered, or given away, or suffered to be drank in a disorderly manner, to the annoyance or injury of any part of the citizens of the state, shall be fined, etc., applies not only to a selling, etc., in a disorderly manner, but also applies to the manner of keeping the house. Nace v. State, 19 N. E. 729, 117 Ind. 114.

DISORDERLY PERSON.

Disorderly conduct distinguished, see "Disorderly Conduct."

The term "disorderly person" is broader than the term "vagrant." "Disorderly" means lawless; contrary to law; violating, or disposed to violate, law and good order; inclined to break loose from restraint; unruly; in a manner violating law and good order; contrary to rules or established institutions. It is very extensive in its signification, and includes all who violate the peace and good order of society, either as vagrants, disorderly, or for breach of the public peace. In re Aldermen and Justices of the Peace (Pa.) 2 Pars. Eq. Cas. 458, 464.

The words "disorderly person," as used in Laws 1896, c. 112, § 40, providing that any person intoxicated in a public place is a disorderly person, and may be arrested, etc., is the nomination of the offense as a crime, being merely descriptive of it, or, as said by Mr. Judge Strong in Hill v. People, 20 N. Y. 368, persons who are found intoxicated in public places may well be considered disorderly at the time. So may persons when perpetrating almost any crime. People v. Markell, 45 N. Y. Supp. 904, 907, 20 Misc. Rep. 149.

Where a complaint against one was for willful refusal and neglect to provide for his wife, which neglect constitutes one a disorderly person, under the fifth section of the act relative to disorderly persons, a finding that such person was "guilty of being a disorderly person, under the provisions of the act concerning disorderly persons," was insufficient; it not being equivalent to a determination that he had been guilty of willfully refusing and neglecting to provide for his wife. O'Shaughnessy v. McLorinan, 43 N. J. Law (14 Vroom) 410, 413.

Under Code Cr. Proc. § 899, describing, among others, disorderly persons as persons who actually abandon their wives or children in the city of New York without adequate support, or who leave them in danger of becoming a burden upon the public, or who neglect to provide for them according to their means, a husband may be proceeded against as a disorderly person, in that he failed to support his wife, though she had previously, in an action for a limited divorce, obtained a decree of separation without alimony, as such decree did not terminate the marital relation. People v. Cullen, 40 N. Y. Supp. 1, 2, 7 App. Div. 118.

One convicted of playing at bowls is not a disorderly person. Rex v. Clarke, 1 Cowp. 35, 86.

One who keeps a public saloon, to which persons resort for the purpose of playing pool, is a disorderly person, under Code Cr. Proc. § 899, subsecs. 4, 7, defining disorderly persons as, among others, keepers of houses for the resort of gamblers, and persons who keep in a public place an apparatus or device for the purpose of gaming. People v. Cutler, 1 N. Y. Cr. R. 178, 179.

The following are disorderly persons: (1) Persons who actually abandon their wives or children, without adequate support, or leave them in danger of becoming a burden upon the public, or who neglect to provide for them according to their means; (2) persons who threaten to run away and leave their wives or children a burden upon the public; (3) persons pretending to tell fortunes, or where lost or stolen goods may be found; (4) keepers of bawdyhouses, or houses for the resort of prostitutes, drunkards, tipplers, gamblers, habitual criminals, or other disorderly persons; (5) persons who have no visible profession or calling by which to maintain themselves, but who do so, for the most part, by gaming; (6) jugglers, common showmen, and mountebanks, who exhibit or perform for profit, puppet shows, wire or rope dancers, or other idle shows, acts, or feats; (7) persons who keep in a public highway or place an apparatus or device for the purpose of gaming, or who go about exhibiting tricks or gaming therewith; (8) persons who play in a public highway or place with cards, dice, or any other apparatus or device for gaming; (9) habitual criminals within the provisions of this Code. Code Cr. Proc. N. Y. 1903, § 899.

Pub. Acts 1889, No. 264, entitled "An act relative to disorderly persons," section 1 of which enumerates those who come under the term "disorderly persons," is not unconstitutional, as embracing more than one object; the term "disorderly persons" being comprehensive, and properly including all those who are designated in the body of the act. People v. Kelly, 99 Mich. 82, 84, 57 N. W. 1090.

DISPARAGEMENT.

"Disparagement," as used in statutes prohibiting a guardian from allowing marriage of his ward in disparagement, contemplates some personal or social defect or disqualification, such as deformity, lunacy, disease, villenage, alienage, or corruption of blood, and does not include inequality of fortune. A marriage which brought no disgrace on the ward or her kin, which did not put her or them below their proper station, but only united her to a man of less fortune than herself, is not a marriage in disparagement. Shutt v. Carliss, 36 N. C. 232, 240.

DISPATCH.

See "Cipher Dispatch or Message."

Dispatches, treated of in the decisions as warlike or contraband communications, are defined to be official communications of official persons on the public affairs of the government. The Tropic Wind (U. S.) 24 Fed. Cas. 212, 214.

DISPATCH.

See "Convenient Dispatch"; "Customary Dispatch"; "Quick Dispatch"; "With All Dispatch"; "With All Possible Dispatch."

In a charter party, by which the owners guaranteed that for a certain rate per ton the ship should be dispatched from a certain place within a certain time after arrival, "dispatched" means not detained at the place mentioned. It cannot be said that a vessel which has continued in the harbor for more than 21 days has been dispatched within that time. Sharp v. Gibbs, 40 Eng. Law & Eq. 383, 387.

Where a charter party provided that a vessel was to have "dispatch in discharging," it was not obliged to await its turn in respect of other vessels which the consignees of her cargo were discharging, nor yield to any custom to that effect obtaining with such consignees. Keen v. Audendried (U. S.) 14 Fed. Cas. 177.

As without delay.

The word "dispatch," employed in bills of lading requiring a cargo to be discharged with dispatch, has been held to mean that the consignee is to take the cargo as rapidly as the vessel can deliver it. Terjesen v. Carter (N. Y.) 9 Daly, 193, 194.

A charter party, obligating the charterer to furnish and receive cargo with all possible "dispatch," meant that the charterer should designate a berth and furnish cargo at the place of loading as fast as it might be possible for the vessel to receive it. Moody v. 500,000 Laths (U. S.) 2 Fed. 607, 608.

The term "dispatch," as used in a charter party requiring the vessel to be discharged with dispatch, means without delay. It does not mean with diligence, nor does it refer to, nor is it controlled by, any usages, customs, or rules of the port where the discharge is made. It is a term that does not need construction by reference to extrinsic circumstances. A charterer, who stipulates for a dispatch in a discharge, takes all risks of being able to effect such discharge. Though without his fault, by stress of weather, ice, the impossibility of obtaining necessary hands to receive the cargo, or other cause, he is obliged to detain the ship, he must pay the stipulated damage. Sleeper v. Puig (U. S.) 22 Fed. Cas. 321, 322.

DISPENSARY.

As a saloon, see "Saloon."

In the legislation of the state the phrases "question of dispensary," and "the issue of dispensaries" were in common and universal use when reference was had to the agitation prevalent throughout the state or in any county or municipality looking to committing and confining the sale of spirituous, vinous, or malt liquors to government agencies and on governmental account; and wherever this has been done it was said that a dispensary had been established. Hence, while there may be dispensaries for the disposition of commodities other than these liquors, when reference is made to them by use of the word "dispensary," there must be some express differentiation, or else the reference will be understood to be dispensary of liquors; and hence the use of such word in the title of an act sufficiently expresses the purpose of the act. Mitchell v. State, 32 South. 687, 689, 134 Ala. 392.

The Dispensary Act of December 24, 1892, is not a law prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors, as it not only permits, but absolutely encourages, such sale to an unlimited extent; for by its profit feature it holds out an inducement to every taxpayer to encourage as large sales as possible, and thereby lessen the burden of taxation to the extent of the profits realized. McCullough v. Brown, 41 S. C. 220, 278, 279, 19 S. E. 458, 470, 23 L. R. A. 410.

DISPENSE.

To dispense is to deal out, to distribute, to give. So that giving liquors is included in a charge of dispensing liquor, in a prosecution under an ordinance making it a misdemeanor to sell, deal out, or give away liquors on Sunday. Johnson v. City of Chattanooga, 36 S. W. 1092, 1093, 97 Tenn. (13 Pickle) 247.

As suspend.

Under Code Iowa, § 489, providing that a municipal ordinance shall be read on three different days, unless three-fourths of the council vote to dispense with the rules, an ordinance is valid if passed by three-fourths vote upon a motion to suspend the rules; there being no substantial difference in the terms. Town of Bayard v. Baker, 40 N. W. 818, 819, 76 Iowa, 220.

DISPENSATION.

"License," as a term of real estate law, is defined to be an authority to do a particular act or series of acts upon another's land, without possessing any estate therein, and is generally created by parol, though it may be inferred from circumstances in the relationship of the parties. It is distinguished from an easement, which must be created by grant or prescription, in the fact that the latter always implies an interest in the land upon which it is imposed, while a dispensation or license passes no interest, nor does it alter or transfer property in anything, but only makes an action lawful which without it would have been unlawful. Baldwin v. Taylor, 31 Atl. 250, 251, 166 Pa. 507.

The waiver or dispensation is not in the nature of a contract, which requires the support of a consideration, but rather of an estoppel, whereby the underwriter is precluded from denying the validity of the contract on account of acts or admissions, either recognizing it as of binding force after the forfeiture or holding out to the assured that the performance of the condition is dispensed with. Viele v. Germania Ins. Co., 26 Iowa, 9, 56 (quoted in Knarston v. Manhattan Life Ins. Co., 73 Pac. 740, 742, 140 Cal. 57).

DISPLACE.

In a provision in articles for a whaling voyage that, if any officer or seaman should be judged by the master incompetent, the master may displace him and substitute another, the word "displace" imported that, if the master found an officer or seaman incompetent or otherwise unfit to perform the duties of his station, the master might degrade or reduce him to a lower station, but did not authorize the discharge of one who had shipped under the articles. Potter v. Smith, 103 Mass. 68, 69.

DISPLAY.

"Display," as used in Act Cong. Sept. 28, 1888, c. 1039, 25 Stat. 496 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2661], prohibiting the mailing of any matter in envelopes with a style of display intended to reflect on the character or conduct of another, is as applicable to delineations as it is to writing or printing, and includes the use of a black envelope addressed in white letters, which signifies to those who may see it that the letter is a third demand for an overdue debt. United States v. Dodge (U. S.) 70 Fed. 235, 236.

A gaming table.

Displaying a gaming table for the purpose of obtaining bettors is a different and distinct act from keeping a table for gaming, though the punishment may be the same. Keeping tables for gaming is an offense continuous in its nature, but it does not follow that the act of displaying such table is continuous. The act of displaying the table for the purpose of obtaining bettors is not included in the charge of keeping a table for the purpose of gaming. Kain v. State, 16 Tex. App. 282, 309.

DISPONET.

Disponet means to have the disposal or administration of a thing. Smith v. Bonhoff, 2 Mich. 115, 116, 121.

DISPOSAL.

See "Absolute Disposal."

"Disposal" is a word of broad significance, and is thus defined by Webster: "To determine the faith of; to exercise control over; to fix the condition, application, employment, etc., of; to direct or assign for a use; to exercise finally one's power of control over; to pass over into the control of some one else; to alienate; to bestow; to part with; to get rid of, as to dispose of a house, or dispose of one's time." The word being so varied in meaning, the sense to be attributed to it in a statute providing that an action may be maintained for a debt contracted during infancy, where defendant after becoming of age has ratified the contract by a disposal of the property, must be determined with reference to the law as it stood prior to the passage of the act. The law as it stood in this state was that the contract could not be enforced unless it had been ratified by a writing of the infant after he became of age. If a mere retention of the property after full age had been intended as an act of ratification, the addition of the clause as to disposal of the property would have been meaningless. We think the sense to be attributed to the word, as used in the statute, should be its most common one, to wit, to alienate as by sale, gift, or devise. Koerner v. Wilkinson, 70 S. W. 509, 511, 96 Mo. App. 510.

In Comp. Laws, c. 32, § 28, prohibiting the fraudulent sale, transfer, secretion, or disposal of property with intent to defraud creditors, "disposal" means to pass the property over into the control of another, to part with it or get rid of it, to exercise finally one's power of control over it. Herold v. State, 31 N. W. 258, 261, 21 Neb. 50, 51.

Act Cong. June, 1878, Rev. St. § 2380 et seq. [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1455], authorizes the county judge to enter land so settled and occupied, and hold the same in trust for the sole use and benefit of the occupants thereof according to their respective interests; the execution of which trust as to the disposal of the lots in such town, and the proceeds of the sale thereof, to be conducted under such regulations as may be prescribed by the legislative authority of the state or territory in which the same may be situated. So far as the word "disposal" referred to lots actually occupied when the entry was made, it must be understood to mean distribution; the words "disposal" and "distribution" being often used synonymously, since as to such lots they were already disposed of, and there was no authority to sell them at public sale. Goldberg v. Kidd, 58 N. W. 574, 577, 5 S. D. 169.

As power to mortgage.

Gen. Laws 1874, p. 283, § 869, subd. 6, providing that the county court as a court of probate has power to order the renting, sale, or other disposal of the real and personal property of minors, cannot be construed to include a power to mortgage. The word "disposal" has no technical meaning, and must be of the same character as a sale; that is, a transfer of the estate. A mortgage, not being a conditional sale, does not transfer an estate. It may create a power which may lead to a disposal, but is not in itself a disposal of real estate. A disposal is effected by a foreclosure and sale, but a county court has no power to order a foreclosure and sale. A foreclosure in the circuit court is not a disposal by order of the county court. The power to dispose implies and requires a disposal for full value. It might possibly authorize an exchange. A power to mortgage is neither necessarily implied in the word "disposal," nor does its association with the word "sale" indicate that any such interpretation can be legitimately put on it. Trutch v. Bunnell, 4 Pac. 588, 589, 11 Or. 58, 50 Am. Rep. 456.

DISPOSE OF.

See "Specially Disposed Of"; "Sell and Dispose Of"; "Sell, Exchange, and Dispose Of"; "Sold and Disposed of." Otherwise dispose of, see "Otherwise."

To dispose of means "to part with; to relinquish; to get rid of—as to dispose of a house." Webster's Dictionary. After every appeal actions commenced in the circuit court are remanded to that court for final disposition. Until the action is thus "disposed of" therein, no second notice of trial is required. In re Olson's Estate (S. D.) 94 N. W. 421, 422.

Acts 1899, p. 55, c. 40 (Shannon's Code, § 6057), provides that, if any case is pending and on trial and undetermined at the time the existing term expires, the term shall be extended and continued into the succeeding term for the purpose of disposing of the case. Held, that a motion for a new trial, partially considered and not determined at the beginning of a new term, was within the meaning of the phrase "disposing of the case"; it being considered that a case is not disposed of so long as the motion for a new trial is not considered. Jackson & S. St. R. R. & Tel. Cos. v. Simmons, 64 S. W. 705, 706, 107 Tenn. 392.

In the Chickasaw treaty of July 1, 1834, and the treaty of Pontotoc of March 1, 1833, providing that the reservations to individuals should not be sold, leased, or disposed of, except in the particular manner pointed out by the treaty, the words "disposed of" might seem to embrace other dispositions than those of sale and lease, and yet they cannot, on the principle "noscitur a sociis," be extended so as to include any other than those of a character like those specially named; that is, of a voluntary nature, effected by the personal will of the possessor. Love v. Pamplin (U. S.) 21 Fed. 755, 760.

"Dispose of" means "to alienate; to effectually transfer." The clause specifying intent in Act June 3, 1878, c. 151, 20 Stat. 90, 1 Supp. Rev. St. 168 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1529], declaring it unlawful "to cut, or cause or procure to be cut, or wantonly destroy, any timber growing on any lands of the United States, . . . or remove or cause to be removed, any timber from said public lands, with intent to export or dispose of the same," qualifies the cutting, as well as the removal, of timber; and an indictment for cutting timber on the public lands specified in the act, which does not allege that the defendant intended to export or dispose of the timber so cut, is fatally defective. United States v. Hacker (U. S.) 73 Fed. 292, 294.

"Disposed of," as used in Sess. Laws 1867, p. 110, c. 76, authorizing an attachment whenever the plaintiff shall make affidavit that the defendant has assigned, secreted, or disposed of his property with intent to delay or defraud his creditors, signifies any actual removal or disposition in fact of the property other than the transfer of the legal title or a hiding in fact. Guile v. McNanny, 14 Minn. 520, 522 (Gil. 391, 393) 100 Am. Dec. 244.

"Dispose," as used in a statute punishing the disposal of forged paper, means to transfer to any person, to put into the hands of another, or to put away by any means. People v. Rathbun (N. Y.) 21 Wend. 509, 526.

In Rev. St. 1879, § 398, authorizing an attachment where the defendant has fraudulently concealed, removed, or disposed of his property or effects, so as to hinder or delay his creditors, "disposed" covers all such alienations of property as may be made in ways not otherwise pointed out in the statute; for example, such as pledges, gifts, pawns, bailments, and other transfers and alienations as may be effected by mere delivery and without the use of any writing, assignment, or conveyance. Bullene v. Smith, 73 Mo. 151, 161.

A will giving a house and lot to testator's widow to use, occupy, or dispose of as she may think proper, authorizes her to dispose of the property in any manner, whether by sale, mortgage, lease, or otherwise. Benz v. Fabian, 35 Atl. 760, 763, 54 N. J. Eq. 615.

A power in a will to executors to "dispose and sell real estate at their discretion" does not operate to create a conversion of the property. Sage v. Lockman (N. Y.) 53 How. Prac. 276.

"Disposed of," as used in the restrictive clause in the residuary bequest to one of property not heretofore disposed of, should be construed as though the testator had said that "all of my estate which shall not pass by the preceding bequests in my will to the legatees therein named, I give to the residuary legatee," for "heretofore" has relation to the several preceding paragraphs in the will, and "disposed of" means an effectual transfer or disposition by the will, which could not be until the death of the testator. In re Crane (Conn.) 2 Root, 487, 488.

The word "dispose," as used in the provision of a will, giving property to a wife, "to use and dispose of the same" as she may think proper, includes a conveyance absolute and in fee simple. Woodbridge v. Jones, 67 N. E. 878, 879, 183 Mass. 549.

The word "dispose" has a broader signification than the word "transfer." A fraudulent transfer of property is a fraudulent disposition of it. Howard v. Caperon, 3 Willson, Civ. Cas. Ct. App. § 313.

Absolute title implied.

"Dispose of as they think best," as used in a will providing that, when testatrix was done with her property, she wanted certain persons to pay her debts, give certain articles, and pay money to persons named, and the remainder to keep and "dispose of as they think best," did not qualify or cut down the interest in the estate, which was an absolute one. Cheney v. Plumb, 48 N. W. 603, 79 Wis. 602.

A will by which testator gave and bequeathed to his son a certain estate, "to do and dispose of as he may think proper," should be construed as conveying a fee, and not a life estate. King v. Ackerman, 67 U. S. (2 Black) 408, 415, 17 L. Ed. 292.

Construing the clause of a will giving property to the wife of testator, with power to dispose of the same at her death, the court, under a long line of decisions, adopts this construction: "If land be devised to a person with general power to dispose of the same, an estate in fee simple passes. Such power of disposition amounts to an absolute gift of the property." So, where the clause in the will provides that "if, at her death, there is any property in her possession, one-half shall revert to his nephew." She would receive an estate in fee simple from trust. Dalrymple v. Leach, 61 N. E. 443, 445, 192 Ill. 51.

The words "dispose of all or any part thereof at her discretion," as used in a will, where testator bequeathed the use and income of his residuary estate to his widow during her life, she to use as much of the principal as she might need, with power to dispose of all or any part at her discretion, and with a gift over at her death, meant that testator intended the widow should have only a life estate in that part of the estate which she did not need to consume. Stevens v. Flower, 19 Atl. 777, 780, 48 N. J. Eq. 340.

Advancement.

In a lease providing that, if the landlord shall not "dispose of said premises" before the expiration of the term, the tenant shall have a renewal, etc., the term "dispose of" includes a conveyance by way of advancement. Elston v. Schilling, 42 N. Y. 79.

Assignment for security.

The word "dispose" in the rules and regulations of a board of exchange, providing that each member could dispose of his seat, subject to the condition that, before the purchaser could participate in the proceedings of the board, he must be elected a member thereof, includes the power to dispose of it absolutely or conditionally, and he may assign it as security for indebtedness. Clute v. Loveland, 9 Pac. 133, 136, 68 Cal. 254.

Confession of judgment.

Pamph. Acts 1896-97, pp. 1089, 1090, providing that every person who sells, removes, or otherwise disposes of property subject to execution, with intent to hinder or defraud his creditor, may be punished by fine, etc., means some act of the debtor operating on the property itself to place it beyond the reach of the creditor, such as the removal or secreting of the property; but the act of the debtor in confessing a judgment or procuring an attachment against himself is not a disposition of his property, within the meaning of the term as used in the statute. Builders' & Painters' Supply Co. v. Lucas, 24 South. 416, 418, 119 Ala. 202.

Disposition by will.

"Dispose of," as used in St. April 17, 1850, providing that the husband shall have the entire control of the common property, "with absolute power to dispose of it," should be construed to include power to dispose of it by devise. Beard v. Knox, 5 Cal. 252, 256, 63 Am. Dec. 125.

A will by which the testator willed and bequeathed to his wife all his property, real and personal, including the house and lot of ground that he resided on, during her natural life, with power to "dispose of the same as she may think best," should be construed as giving a general power to dispose of the property in specie, and not a mere interest in it, in any manner, including the power to dispose of it by will. Forsythe v. Forsythe, 108 Pa. 129, 130.

A will in which testator directed that, after his wife's death, part of his estate should be transferred to G. for her sole and entire use during her life; that she should not alienate it, but enjoy the interest; and at her decease she might dispose of it as she thought fit—gave only a power of disposal by will, and not an absolute interest with a superadded power. Archibald v. Wright, 9 Sim. 161, 165.

In a will giving to testator's daughters, whatever may be found and disposed of by his executor, the residue and remainder, not otherwise "disposed of," the words "disposed of" as first used mean transferred to others in pursuance of the trust reposed in the executor, and as last used mean disposed of by the testator in his will. Mace v. Mace, 49 Atl. 1038, 1039, 95 Me. 283.

The words "dispose of," in a will authorizing one as trustee to execute and deliver any and all deeds, leases, contracts, and other instruments of writing that he may deem necessary in order to dispose of any and all of the described real estate, is a far more generic expression than "to sell," and has been held to include a greater number, higher, lower, and more varied acts than "to sell"; but they ought not to be extended to a disposition by devise. Andrew v. Auditor, 5 Ohio Dec. 242, 251.

As to divide.

The word "dispose" is sufficiently comprehensive in its meaning to include every possible mode of alienation or disposition of property, and therefore, in an antenuptial contract, includes the right to divide the property. American Home Missionary Soc. v. Wadhams (N. Y.) 10 Barb. 597, 601.

A will left property in trust to R., subject to the power of the beneficiary to dispose thereof by grant or devise. The beneficiary exercised the power by will, devising the property to her husband, in trust to receive the rents and profits to apply on the education and maintenance of their children, and authorized the husband at any time to sell and convey the estate and receive the consideration, and to invest and dispose of the same for the benefit of the children. Held, that the word "dispose" was used in a double meaning. With reference to the power to dispose, given to the daughter, it meant an unrestricted power to give to any ownership the entire property. As used by the daughter, giving the power to her husband, it meant at the most power to determine the proportions among the owners of the ownership already given, and to substitute one form of the property so owned for another. He could not dispose of the estate, or any part of it, in the first sense of the word; for others already owned the whole. Crooke v. Kings County, 97 N. Y. 421, 441.

Exchange.

A deed of gift, conveying realty to certain minors and giving their legal guardian power to "sell and dispose" of the same whenever in his discretion it should be necessary for their support, includes not only a power to sell, but a power to sell and receive other lands in exchange therefor. Thurmond v. Faith, 69 Ga. 832, 838.

Give.

An ordinance of a city, providing that no person shall sell, vend, deal in, or dispose of any spirituous, vinous, fermented, or malt liquors within such city without a license, should be construed to include other forms of disposal than indicated by the preceding words in the ordinance, though consistent with them as respects its intent and purpose. The word "dispose," as used in the ordinance, covers and forbids the furnishing and delivery to a person of malt liquors without a license, whether he receives any compensation for such liquor or not. A person may dispose of liquor by gift, as well as by sale or barter, within the meaning of the ordinance. State v. Deusting, 22 N. W. 442, 33 Minn. 102, 53 Am. Rep. 12.

"Dispose of" as used in Act Feb. 26, 1881 (Pamph. Acts, p. 171), making it unlawful for any person or persons, except on a written prescription, to make, sell, or otherwise dispose of any spirituous or malt liquors or other intoxicating drinks within certain counties, cannot be construed to include the giving of two or more drinks of whiskey to a friend by a person at his private residence. "To dispose of, in popular sense, when used in reference to property, means to part with a right to or ownership of it; in other words, a change of property. If this does not take place, it would scarcely be said the property is disposed of. Taking a glass of spirits or wine with a friend or visitor in one's own residence is one of the forms in which hospitality not infrequently shows itself. In this act of hospitality, no one would entertain the thought of a change of property or ownership—that he was thereby disposing of the article thus used and consumed." Reynolds v. State, 73 Ala. 3.

Under an act making it unlawful with-in certain described limits to sell or dispose of any spirituous liquors, "dispose of" is equivalent to the word "give." Franklin v. State, 12 Md. 236, 248.

Lease.

"Dispose of," as used in a contract by a co-owner of a mine to another co-owner, by which the latter is to develop the mine and pay the former the purchase price from the first profits thereof, or that such price should become due and payable if the latter should dispose of or sell the mine, is broader than the term "sell," and includes leasing the mine for a term of years for a royalty. Hill v. Sumner, 10 Sup. Ct. 42, 43, 132 U. S. 118, 33 L. Ed. 284.

Const. U. S. art. 4, § 3, which provides that Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all legal rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States, not only vests in Congress the right to sell the land belonging to the United States, but also to lease the same. United States v. Gratiot, 39 U. S. (14 Pet.) 526, 537, 10 L. Ed. 573.

Manage.

Where a clause of a will did not direct the trustees to sell, but to dispose of, all the testator's real and personal estate, the word "dispose" did not import to sell, but meant to manage to the best advantage for the family. Sheffield v. Orrery, 3 Atk. 282, 287.

Mortgage.

Act Cong. July 1, 1862, § 3, incorporating the Union Pacific Railroad Company, declares that for the purpose of aiding in the construction of the railroad and telegraph line, and to secure the safe and speedy transportation of the mails, troops, munitions of war, and public stores thereon, it was enacted that all such land not sold or disposed of by the company before the expiration of three years after the completion of the entire road should be subject to settlement and pre-emption, like other lands. Held, that the words "or disposed of" were not redundant, nor were they synonymous with "sold," but contemplated a use of the lands granted different from the sale of them, which properly included a mortgaging of the land for the benefit of the company. Platt v. Union Pac. R. R. Co., 99 U. S. 48, 59, 25 L. Ed. 424.

A charter authorizing a corporation to purchase all such lands as should be necessary and convenient, and giving it power to sell and dispose of the same at its pleasure, conferred power to mortgage. According to the principle in the case of Launcester v.

Dolan (Pa.) 1 Rawle, 231, 18 Am. Dec. 625, the power to sell includes the power to mortgage, even under the statute of uses; and the superadded words "dispose of," which would otherwise be redundant, leave no doubt of the existence of an intent to confer power to the corporation to part with its real estate by any voluntary act, without regard to the mode of its operation. Gordon v. Preston (Pa.) 1 Watts, 385, 386, 26 Am. Dec. 75.

The phrase "dispose of, sell, and exchange," following a general authority of control given to trustees, was not a restriction of such authority, but conferred a more absolute power and extended the trustee authority of disposition. But, even if the clause be regarded as a limitation on the trustee's power, he still has authority to incumber the estate by deeds of trust, authorizing the trustee, on the failure to pay the money borrowed, to sell the land. It is laid down in many cases that a power of sale implies a power to mortgage. Faulk v. Dashiell, 62 Tex. 642, 649, 50 Am. Rep. 542.

"Dispose of," as used in a will giving the executors full power and authority to dispose of testator's real estate at any time they deemed it for the benefit of the estate, does not authorize mortgaging the property. To dispose of imports finality, and only where a power to sell would include a power to mortgage would these words, unmodified or undefined, imply such a power. Rutherford Land & Improvement Co. v. Sanntrock, 46 Atl. 648, 60 N. J. Eq. 471.

"Sell and dispose," as used in a will providing that "my said trustee shall have power to invest and change the investment of such moiety, and for that purpose to sell, convey and dispose thereof, or any part thereof, as often as he may think proper," means an out and out sale, and did not authorize the trustee to mortgage the property to secure the payment of a loan. Wilson v. Maryland Life Ins. Co., 60 Md. 150, 153.

Sell.

As used in a will giving power to dispose of all testator's real estate, "dispose of" means to sell. In the ordinary, and according to the common, understanding of the word, the power to dispose of the property must be considered as a power to sell it. Williams' Lessee v. Vench, 17 Ohio, 171, 181, 49 Am. Dec. 453; Hunt v. Hunt, 11 Nev. 442, 449.

"Dispose of," as used in the articles of association of an unincorporated trust, organized for the purpose of acquiring, holding, and disposing of the capital stock of corporations engaged in a particular line of business, authorizing the trustees to acquire, receive, hold, and dispose of the title to shares of the capital stock of such companies, corporations, and joint-stock associations, should be construed to mean to sell any such stock to third persons; such being its obvious meaning in common acceptation. The term "dispose of," in its dictionary definition, has among its meanings that of "bargain; alienation; passing from one into the control of another; parting with." Webst. Dict. Gould v. Head (U. S.) 41 Fed. 240, 245.

In the preamble to a statute passed in 1753, reciting that the proprietors of lands lying in common have power to manage, dispose of, and divide the same in such way and manner as has been or shall be concluded and agreed on by the major part of the interested, and as used in a law of the colony of Massachusetts passed in 1636, giving authority to the freemen of every town to dispose of their lands, "dispose of" includes the power to sell and convey the lands. Rogers v. Goodwin, 2 Mass. 475, 477.

"Dispose of," as used in an attachment affidavit charging that the defendant has sold, assigned, and disposed of a portion of his property with intent to defraud his creditors, etc., and in an allegation in the answer denying that defendant is about to sell and dispose of, is much broader and more comprehensive than the word "sell," as the selling of property is but one means of disposing of it. Therefore the allegation in the denial that defendant was about to sell and dispose of was simply a denial that he was about to dispose of by selling, which was insufficient. Noyes v. Lane, 45 N. W. 327, 328, 1 S. D. 125.

An act giving a right of way over intervening lands, with authority to dispose of any coal within the boundaries of such right of way on paying for the same, gives a power of sale; the words "dispose of" being defined by Webster as "to part with, to sell, to alienate," as "the man has disposed of his house and removed." Appeal of Waddell, 84 Pa. 90, 96.

An allegation in an answer that mortgaged property was "squandered and disposed of," to defendant's injury, necessarily implies that the property was sold, or an interest in it transferred to others. Burr v. Boyer, 2 Neb. 265, 267.

In a will providing that testator's property shall be disposed of as deemed best by his executor, the phrase "disposed of" is equivalent to the phrase "shall be sold." In re Hesdra's Estate, 20 N. Y. Supp. 79, 80, 2 Con. Sur. 514.

The words "disposed of," "conveyed," and "sold," though not necessarily synonymous, are often used to properly describe the same transaction. Cook v. Burnham, 44 Pac. 447, 3 Kan. App. 27.

Sell on credit.

"Disposing," as used in an assignment wherein the assignee accepts the trust and agrees to execute the same by disposing of the property and applying the proceeds to the payment of the debts, should not be construed to authorize the assignee to sell on credit, though the term "disposing" may mean a sale for cash or on time, or an exchange for other property. Sprecht v. Parsons, 25 Pac. 730, 7 Utah, 107.

Vest by law.

In Gen. St. 1899, § 5583, providing that, when a person is imprisoned for life, his estate shall be administered and disposed of as if he were naturally dead, the expression "disposed of" is not broad enough to reach to and embrace the act of law which vests the ownership of property in an heir of inheritance. Smith v. Becker, 64 Pac. 70, 62 Kan. 541.

Secrete distinguished.

"Dispose," as used in a statute giving a right to attach defendant's goods where he had attempted to secrete or dispose of the same, was employed in its ordinary sense, meaning to "alienate it; assign it to a use; bestow it; direct its ownership." In the statute it had a distinct meaning from that imported by the word "secrete," and an affidavit for attachment, alleging that defendant had secreted his property and had disposed of his property was inconsistent and contradictory. Pearre & Co. v. Hawkins, 62 Tex. 434, 437.

Gen. St. 1878, c. 66, tit. 9, § 147, authorizes an attachment on proof that the debtor has assigned, secreted, or disposed of part of his property. Held, that the words "assigned, secreted, or disposed of" were not intended to have a separate, distinct, and exclusive meaning, but the word "disposed," as used in the statute, was a comprehensive term, intended to include any disposition intended to put the property of the debtor beyond the reach of creditors. Auerbach v. Hitchcock, 9 N. W. 79, 28 Minn. 73.

DISPOSABLE PORTION.

The term "disposable portion" was used in ancient common law to designate the property of a man's goods which he could dispose of without reference to his wife or children. 2 Bl. Com. p. 492, says: "By the ancient common law a man's goods were divided into three equal parts, of which one went to his heirs or lineal descendants, another to his wife, and the third was at his own disposal; or, if he should die without a wife, he might then dispose of one moiety, and the other went to his children, and so, e converso, if he had no children, the wife was entitled to one moiety, and he might bequeath the other; but, if he die without either wife or issue, the whole was at his own disposal." Hopkins v. Wright, 17 Tex. 30, 36; Crain v. Crain, 17 Tex. 80, 93.

DISPOSING MIND AND MEMORY.

See "Sound Mind and Memory."

A disposing mind has the mental capacity to know and understand what disposition testator may wish to make of his property and on whom he will bestow his bounty. Freeman v. Easley, 7 N. E. 656, 658, 117 Ill. 317, 321; Yardley v. Cuthbertson, 108 Pa. 395, 406, 1 Atl. 765, 56 Am. Rep. 218.

A disposing mind and memory is a mind and memory which has the capacity of recollecting, and discerning and feeling, the relations, connections, and obligations of family and blood. Merritt v. Johnson, 5 N. J. Law (2 Southard) 454, 458, 8 Am. Dec. 610; Den v. Vancleve, 5 N. J. Law (2 Southard) 589, 678.

A disposing mind and memory is a mind and memory which have a capacity for regarding and discriminating and feeling the relations, connections, and obligations of family and blood; and a person may have upon some subjects, and even generally, mind and memory and sense to know and comprehend ordinary transactions, and yet upon the subject of those who would naturally be the objects of his care and bounty and of a reasonable and proper distribution as to them of his estate he may be of unsound mind. Farmer v. Farmer, 31 S. W. 926, 129 Mo. 530.

"A disposing mind and memory, in the view of the law, is one which the testator is shown to have had at the making and execution of a last will; a full and intelligent consciousness of the nature and effect of the act which he was engaged in; a full knowledge of the property he possessed; and an understanding of the disposition he wished to make of it by the will, and of the persons and objects he desired to participate in his bounty." Leech v. Leech, 21 Pa. (9 Harris) 67, 68; Id., 1 Phila. (Pa.) 244, 246, 247. This description of testamentary capacity has been many times approved, and never questioned. While modifications of it may be needed in particular cases to meet particular facts developed, it contains all the substance of a correct general definition, and may at all times be expounded to juries, as a guide to them in their deliberations, with entire safety. Reichenbach v. Ruddach, 127 Pa. 564, 590, 18 Atl. 432, 436.

A disposing mind and memory may be said to be one which is capable of presenting to the testator all his property, and all the persons to come within the range of his bounty, and if a person has sufficient understanding and intelligence to understand his ordinary business, and to understand what disposition he is making of his property, then he has sufficient capacity to make a will. Benoist v. Murrin, 58 Mo. 307, 322; Jackson v. Hardin, 83 Mo. 175, 180. Mere peculiarities and eccentricities of character are not inconsistent with his sanity; and where the testator always attended to his own business affairs, and from all that appears did it as well as anybody could have done it, he will be held to have had a disposing mind and memory. Fulbright v. Perry County, 46 S. W. 955, 958, 145 Mo. 432.

A disposing mind involves the exercise of so much mind and memory as would enable a person to transact common and simple kinds of business with that intelligence which belongs to the weakest class of sound minds, and a disposing memory exists when one can recall the general nature, condition, and extent of his property and relations; those to whom he gives, and also those from whom he excludes, his bounty. The requirement of a sound and disposing mind does not imply that the powers of the mind may not have been weakened or impaired by old age or bodily disease. A person may be incapacitated by age and failing memory from engaging in intricate business, and incapable of understanding all parts of a contract, and yet be able to give simple directions for the disposing of property by will. Hall v. Perry, 33 Atl. 160, 161, 87 Me. 569, 47 Am. St. Rep. 352.

DISPOSING POWER.

The right which was in the settlor to defeat the voluntary settlement by selling the estate was not a "disposing power," within the meaning of St. 1 & 2 Vict. § 13, enacting that a judgment entered up shall operate as a charge on all the lands of which the person shall at the time of entering up the judgment be seised or possessed or entitled for any estate or interest whatever, at law or in equity, or over which such person shall at the time of entering up judgment or at any time afterwards have any disposing power, which he might, without the consent of any other person, exercise for his own benefit. Beavan v. Oxford, 35 Eng. Law & Eq. 267, 279.

DISPOSITION.

See "Final Disposition"; "Testamentary Disposition."

In the articles of association of an incorporated trust, organized for the purpose of acquiring by purchase, exchange, or otherwise, and the holding, management, and disposition of shares of the capital stock of companies, corporations, and joint-stock associations organized for certain purposes, the word "disposition" should be restricted to its more primitive and general import, which does not necessarily imply a barter, sale, or alienation. Gould v. Head (U. S.) 41 Fed. 240, 244.

The term "disposition," in the factors act of 1830, providing that factors shall be deemed the owners of goods for the purpose of sale or disposition of the whole or any part thereof, is certainly broad enough to embrace a contract of pledge made by a factor to a person believing him to be the owner, although the word in the English act has been given a much more limited interpretation. Bonito v. Mosquera, 15 N. Y. Super. Ct. (2 Bosw.) 401, 431.

Absolute title implied.

Testator declared: "It is my will that my daughter E.'s portion be paid to her, to make whatever disposition of it she may think proper. * * * It is my will that my daughter T.'s portion be paid over to the guardian of her children for their special benefit." Held that, construing both clauses together, the words "to make whatever disposition of it she may think proper" only operated to vest an absolute title in the daughter, and did not operate to exclude her husband from his marital rights in the property, either during coverture or as her survivor. Noland v. Chambers, 2 S. W. 121, 122, 84 Ky. 516.

"Disposition," as used in a will providing that the portions of property given thereby to testatrix's granddaughters should be so secured to their use and benefit as not to be subject to the control and disposition of their husbands, means the disposition in the exercise of the husband's marital rights, and not from any disposition procured by the just and natural influence arising from the marital relation. Deering v. Tucker, 55 Me. 284, 288.

As arrangement.

In a city ordinance providing for the appointment of a dock master to direct the removal and disposition of vessels, the word "disposition" clearly implies arrangement or classification, and it clearly imports authority to give those orders and directions upon a plan or system. These officers have by immemorial usage exercised the authority for promoting public convenience and increasing the accommodation for ships and vessels, and classifying them in their use of the basins, piers, and wharves by habitually sending large ships to basins having deep water and small vessels to slips having shallow water, distributing them also according to the locations for business, and generally so arranging the use of the basins and slips as in their judgment would best promote the general convenience. Hecker v. New York Balance Dock Co. (N. Y.) 24 Barb. 215, 221, 222.

DISPOSSESS.

A lease provided that, in case the sale of the land from the state to the lessee should be rescinded during the term, the lessee should pay only for that portion of the term up to the time he should be legally dispossessed. Held, that the word "dispossessed" meant put out of possession. Mattoon v. Munroe (N. Y.) 21 Hun, 74, 82.

DISPOSSESSION.

Disseisin is an estate gained by wrong and injury, and therein it differs from dispossession, which may be by right or wrong. This is the uniform language of the best authorities from the time of Littleton. Smith v. Burtis (N. Y.) 6 Johns. 197, 217, 5 Am. Dec. 218; Slater v. Rawson, 47 Mass. (6 Metc.) 439, 444; Draper v. Monroe, 28 Atl. 340, 18 R. I. 398.

DISPROVE.

The amendment of April, 1887, to Code, § 831, provides that "a husband or wife is not competent to testify against the other, except * * * to disprove an allegation of adultery." Held, that the word "disprove" means to prove to be false or erroneous; and hence a husband or wife is competent to give all testimony material in convincing or persuading the minds of the jury, either directly or by necessary inference, that the allegations are unfounded, and is not confined merely to denying such allegation. Irsch v. Irsch, 12 N. Y. Civ. Proc. 181, 182.

DISPUTABLE PRESUMPTION.

Disputable presumptions are inferences which the law requires to be drawn from given facts, and which are conclusive until disproved by evidence to the contrary. Thus an infant between 7 and 14 is considered incapable of committing a felony, but evidence may be given to prove a felonious intent. Joyner v. South Carolina Ry. Co., 1 S. E. 52, 55, 26 S. C. 49.

Disputable presumptions are inferences of law, which hold good until they are invalidated by proof or a stronger presumption. Brandt v. Morning Journal Ass'n, 80 N. Y. Supp. 1002, 1004, 81 App. Div. 183.

DISPUTE.

See "Amount in Dispute"; "Matter in Dispute."

All disputes, see "ALL"

A dispute, as it is found in Wharton's definition of the word "lis," as meaning a suit, action, controversy, or dispute, means a conflict or contest. State ex rel. Hamilton v. Guinotte, 57 S. W. 281, 283, 158 Mo. 513, 50 L. R. A. 787 (citing Stand. Dict.).

"Dispute," as used in Act May 29, 1885 (P. L. 34, § 12), providing that the court shall settle a dispute between natural gas companies and boroughs, etc., should be construed to include a dispute arising from the passage of an ordinance requiring a gas company to pay a license fee alleged to be exorbitant before it could make excavations for relaying its pipes. A dispute which arises from the denial of the right to the company to make excavations in order to reach and repair its pipes is as clearly a dispute within the meaning of the statute as one which arises from the refusal of the company voluntarily to make needed repairs; and a dispute may exist, although the denial of the right is not absolute and unqualified, but is conditional upon the payment of a license fee which the company considered unreasonable in amount and unauthorized by law. Ft. Pitt Gas Co. v. Borough of Sewickley, 47 Atl. 957, 958, 198 Pa. 201.

A dispute arises when there are conflicting claims made to the same property, which, unless abandoned by the one or the other of the parties, or compromised, will result in litigation; and it is as to such a matter that communications made in a consultation in relation thereto with an attorney are privileged. Slaven v. Wheeler, 58 Tex. 23, 25.

The term "dispute," as employed in Rev. St. § 639, declaring that any suit commenced in any state court wherein the amount in dispute, exclusive of costs, exceeds the sum or value of $500, may be removed for trial in the Circuit Court, is to be construed as exactly synonymous with the term "controversy" in the second section of the third article of the Constitution, which declares that the judicial power of the United States shall extend to "controversies" between citizens of different states, etc. In order, therefore, that there be a controversy or dispute, there must be a matter either of law or fact asserted on one side and denied on the other. Thus, if the matter alleged by the plaintiff is admitted by the defendant, there is no controversy and no dispute, and therefore no case for removal. Keith v. Levi (U. S.) 2 Fed. 743, 745.

Denial of liability.

Public Health Act 1848, § 144, giving a board power to arbitrate as to the amount of compensation for damages done to land by certain improvements, where there was a "dispute as to the amount of compensation," gave the board power to arbitrate where it was denied that any damage was done and that any amount was due. Bradby v. Local Board of Health, 4 El. & Bl. 1014, 1020.

St. 11 & 12 Vict. c. 112, § 69, enacting that compensation is to be given to all persons sustaining damage to their property by reason of certain improvements, and that in case of a "dispute as to the amount" the matter shall be referred to arbitration, would not include cases where the liability to make any compensation is denied. Reg. v. Commissioner of Sewers, 1 El. & Bl. 694, 701.

DISPUTED CLAIM.

Rev. Laws, § 2148, authorizing the reference of a disputed claim between an executor and administrator, includes disputed claims of every character. Noyes v. Phillips, 57 Vt. 229, 230.

2 Rev. St. p. 89, § 38, in substance enacted that one having a disputed or rejected claim against a decedent should be barred of any action within a certain time. Held that, to entitle an administrator or executor to the benefit of the statute, his act in disputing or rejecting the claim must be decided and absolute, and whatever the language, if at the same time he does or says anything from which the claimant may reasonably infer that the determination to reject is not final, the claim is not disputed or rejected within the meaning of the statute. Plaintiff presented to defendant, as executor of W., claims against the estate, and the executor served a notice that he declined to pay the claims, stating that he had no means of information as to them and would like a bill of particulars. The claims were against two firms in which testator had been a partner. No steps had been taken to collect them of the surviving partners. Held, that the claims had not been disputed or rejected within the statute. Hoyt v. Bonnett, 50 N. Y. 538, 543.

DISPUTED DEMAND.

Within the rule that a promise by a creditor, having a liquidated and undisputed demand against his debtor which is wholly due and payable, to discharge the residue upon receiving payment of a part, is nudum pactum, a demand is not a disputed demand merely because the debtor refuses to pay or recognize it; for, if this were true, no case would ever arise for the application of the rule. It is disputed, within the meaning of the rule only, when it is so far disputable as to present a proper case for litigation. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Clark (U. S.) 92 Fed. 968, 985, 35 C. C. A. 120 (citing Tuttle v. Tuttle, 53 Mass. [12 Metc.] 551, 46 Am. Dec. 701; Zoebrisch v. Von Minden, 120 N. Y. 406, 24 N. E. 795; Honeyman v. Jarvis, 79 Ill. 318).

DISQUALIFY.

Otherwise disqualify, see "Otherwise."

Webster defines the verb "disqualify," of which "disqualified" is the past participle, as follows: "(1) To deprive of the qualities or properties necessary for any purpose; to render unfit; to incapacitate; usually with 'for.' (2) To deprive of a legal capacity, power, or right; to disable, as a conviction of perjury disqualifies a man to be a witness." The natural and ordinary sense of "disqualify" is to incapacitate, to disable, to devert or deprive of qualifications; and that is the sense in which it is used in Const. art. 20, § 18, which provides that "no person shall, on account of sex, be disqualified from entering upon or pursuing any lawful business vocation or profession." Hence an ordinance prohibiting the employment of females in dance cellars, etc., is unconstitutional and void. In re Maguire, 57 Cal. 604, 606, 40 Am. Rep. 125.

Under Rev. St. c. 3, § 18, which provides that administration shall be granted to the husband upon the estate of his wife, if he will accept the same and is not disqualified, a husband is not "disqualified," so as to justify the county court in refusing him letters of administration, because of a postnuptial contract by which he relinquished all his right and interest in his wife's estate. Orear v. Crum, 25 N. E. 1097, 1098, 135 Ill. 294.

"Disqualified," as used in Const. art. 2, § 6, providing that every person shall be "disqualified" for holding office during the term for which he may have been elected who shall have given or offered a bribe, etc., to secure his election, is synonymous with, and means the same as, the word "ineligible," as used in Rev. St. 1894, § 6312 (Rev. St. 1881, § 4756, subsec. 2), which provides that an election may be contested when the contestee was ineligible. Hence, in an election contest, where it is alleged that the contestee was ineligible, evidence of having given bribes for votes at such election is competent. Carroll v. Green, 47 N. E. 223, 224, 148 Ind. 362.

Generally speaking the disqualification of a judge consists either in any interest in the subject-matter of the litigation, relationship to one or more of the parties to it, and statutory prohibitions. In re Nevitt (U. S.) 117 Fed. 448, 451, 54 C. C. A. 622.

"Disqualification," as used with reference to the disqualification of a judge, in its ordinary signification, means some interest in the subject-matter or a relationship to the parties in interest. The disqualification or inability, however, may result from physical causes, as well as from interest or relationship; and this is the sense in which the expression "legal disqualification" is used in statutes declaring that disqualified judges shall not sit. State v. Blair, 53 Vt. 24, 28.

A justice of the peace was not disqualified from presiding in a case when one of the parties married a cousin of the justice's wife; the party and the justice not being otherwise related. Blalock v. Waldrup, 10 S. E. 622, 84 Ga. 145, 20 Am. St. Rep. 350.

A person is disqualified when he is deprived of legal capacity, power, or right, as a conviction of perjury disqualifies a man to be a witness. In re Tyers' Estate, 84 N. Y. Supp. 934, 935, 41 Misc. Rep. 378.

DISQUALIFYING OPINION.

A disqualifying opinion in relation to a juror must be a fixed, positive, absolute, definite, settled, decided, unconditional opinion. The rule is uniformly laid down by the use of one of these words, or words of equivalent force. State v. Hebert, 28 South. 898, 104 La. 227.

The opinion which disqualifies a juror is not a merely passing or transitory inclination of the mind, based on such account of the defendant's alleged offense as the juror has read, having made no inquiry as to the truth of the account, and no investigation in reference to the crime imputed to the defendant, for the purpose of satisfying the mind as to his guilt or innocence. Such an opinion is merely the opinion an intelligent man almost irresistibly forms from hearing or reading newspaper accounts of crime, relying on the truthfulness of the published accounts, which are always subject to be changed and altered by contradictory accounts. Such opinions rarely disqualify intelligent men from fairly considering the evidence given on a trial, and rendering an impartial verdict thereon, when called on to act as jurors. The mere formation and expression of an opinion of a juror as to the guilt of a defendant, based on newspaper reports, is not a disqualification; but, in order to be a disqualification, the opinion must be an abiding bias of the mind, based on the substantial facts in the case, in the existence of which the juror believes. State v. Meyer, 3 Atl. 195, 197, 58 Vt. 457.

DISQUE.

The word "disque," when used as part of the name of an electric battery, is descriptive of the form of the battery, and is used to distinguish it from the prism and other forms of battery. Leclanche Battery Co. v. Western Electric Co. (U. S.) 23 Fed. 276, 277.

DISREGARD.

In an instruction to the jury that "you are not at liberty to disregard the testimony of a witness, where you may believe from the evidence that such witness is corroborated by other competent evidence and the circumstances in proof in the case," the word "disregard" will be construed to have been used in the sense of "reject," so that the instruction is erroneous. People v. Compton, 56 Pac. 44, 46, 123 Cal. 403.

A report of a commissioner, stating that he disregards the evidence of the tax returns, does not mean that he rules it to be inadmissible, but that, as a judge of facts, he finds it untrustworthy and uninformative. National Bank of Commerce v. City of New Bedford, 56 N. E. 288, 289, 175 Mass. 257.

A clause in a will that testator's executor shall disregard the statute of limitation and pay the principal of testator's debts, but not the interest, operates to require the executor to pay such debts, even though it may not constitute a new promise which will take the same out of the bar of the statute of limitations. Campbell v. Shotwell, 51 Tex. 27, 35.

DISSATISFACTION.

In a suit by a workman, who has agreed to do the work to the satisfaction of his employer, there is a distinction between being dissatisfied with his work and discharging him because of dissatisfaction. An employer may be dissatisfied with the work of one of his men, and yet retain the workman in his employment, or he may be dissatisfied, and may discharge the workman, not because of dissatisfaction, but because of some other reason; and in the action by the workmen, they are complaining not of dissatisfaction, but of discharge, and hence the question whether the employer ought to have been satisfied does not arise under the contract, so that it would not be legitimate for either workman to prove that in his opinion or the opinion of the other he had done good work, but proof may be directed to the question whether the employer was dissatisfied, and whether he discharged because of dissatisfaction. Gwynn v. Hitchner, 52 Atl. 997, 998, 67 N. J. Law, 654.

DISSECT—DISSECTION.

To dissect means to cut apart or to piece. Wehle v. United States Mut. Acc. Ass'n, 31 N. Y. Supp. 865, 866, 11 Misc. Rep. 36.

Dissection is the cutting apart of a dead body, or the cutting of it into pieces; and, while a dissection includes an examination of a body, authority to examine the body of insured after his death will not authorize a dissection. Sudduth v. Travelers' Ins. Co. (U. S.) 106 Fed. 822, 823.

The word "dissection," as used in a statute punishing a person who shall remove a dead body from the grave for the purpose of dissection, is to be understood as it is ordinarily used. It is defined as the act of dissecting or cutting in pieces an animal or vegetable for the purpose of ascertaining the structure and uses of its parts, and the removal of a body from the grave by a parent, and taking from the body a small portion of fractured bone, to be used as evidence in an action for malpractice, is not within the meaning of the word as used in the statute. Rhodes v. Brandt (N. Y.) 21 Hun, 1, 3.

DISSEISE.

The word "disseised," in an inquisition in the case of a forcible entry and detainer, stating that the prosecutor was "disseised," necessarily implied a previous seisin. Commonwealth v. Fitch (Pa.) 4 Dall. 212, 1 L. Ed. 805.

Though the word "disseisvit" may be taken to imply a freehold, yet it is not sufficient, when used in an indictment for forcible entry and detainer, without showing what estate the person disseised had; but an indictment that plaintiff "was peaceably possessed in his demesne as of fee in certain lands, and continued so seised and possessed until F. and L. thereof disseised him, and him, so disseised and expelled, did keep out," etc., seems sufficient to show that plaintiff was seised of a freehold estate. Fitch v. Rempubliam (Pa.) 3 Yeates, 49, 50.

DISSEISIN.

A disseisin occurs when one enters on land, intending to usurp the possession and to oust another of his freehold, and therefore "querendum est a iudice quo animo hoc fecerit" why he enters and intrudes. Blunden v. Baugh, Cro. Car. 302, 303 (citing Lord Coke, 1 Inst. 153); Probst v. Trustees of Board of Domestic Missions, 9 Sup. Ct. 263, 265, 129 U. S. 182, 32 L. Ed. 642; Bond v. O'Gara, 58 N. E. 275, 276, 177 Mass. 139, 83 Am. St. Rep. 265; Bates v. Norcross, 31 Mass. (14 Pick.) 224, 227, 228; Griffith v. Huston, 30 Ky. (7 J. J. Marsh.) 385, 390; Hoey v. Furman, 1 Pa. (1 Barr) 295, 300, 44 Am. Dec. 129; Moody v. Fleming, 4 Ga. 115, 120, 48 Am. Dec. 210. It was observed in Warren v. Ritter, 11 Mo. 354, that the term "disseisin, which is strictly applicable to freehold estates, was not employed in the forcible entry and detainer act in its technical sense, and was intended to apply to an entry which is lawful and without force upon the actual possession of another; and the obvious design of the statute is to prevent the intrusion of a person on the lawful possession of another without his consent, and to secure a peaceable possession from being changed without authority of law against the will of the occupant." Spalding v. Mayhall, 27 Mo. 377, 378.

A disseisin is the wrongful putting out of him that is seised of the freehold. Mitchell v. Warner, 5 Conn. 497, 518.

Actually taking possession of land under claim or color of title is a disseisin. Inhabitants of Town of Weston v. Inhabitants of Town of Reading, 5 Conn. 255, 257.

"Disseisin" is defined by Littleton to be "where a man entereth into any land or tenements where his interest is not congeable and ousteth him who hath the freehold." Unger v. Mooney, 63 Cal. 586, 590, 49 Am. Rep. 100; Bates v. Norcross, 31 Mass. (14 Pick.) 224, 228.

Disseisin is a privation of seisin; the act of wrongfully depriving a person of the seisin of land. Roberts v. Niles, 49 Atl. 1043, 1044, 95 Me. 244.

Disseisin is the act of divesting the owner of real estate of his seisin and possession of the land, and substituting in its place the ownership and possession of the disseisor. In its origin, when the seisin constituted the title of the owner to his freehold, it was the forcible expulsion of the tenant or the wrongful entry upon him, and the forcible holding by the intruder was called a "disseisin"; and in those days force would naturally be employed to effect a change of possession by a wrongdoer. But in after times, when titles to lands became more complex and possessions more diversified, other acts were held to be disseisins. It would be as preposterous to look for the same acts of disseisin in our day that usually occurred in the simple times of high antiquity as to expect to find the same customs and manners in these days that were characteristic in those. Clapp v. Bromagham (N. Y.) 9 Cow. 530, 553.

Disseisin is an estate gained by wrong and injury. The rightful owner must have been expelled, either by violence or by some act which the law regards as equivalent in its effect. A mere entry on another's land is no disseisin, unless it be accompanied by expulsion. Arden v. Thompson (N. Y.) 5 Cow. 371, 374.

Disseisin is not only the dispossession of the freeholder, but also a substitution of the disseisor as tenant to the lord and as one of the pares curiæ in place of the disseisee. McCall v. Neely (Pa.) 3 Watts, 69, 71.

There are two kinds of disseisin: A disseisin at the election of the owner of the land, and a disseisin in spite of the true owner. Porter v. Hammond, 3 Me. (3 Greenl.) 188, 190.

Building on mortgaged premises.

The erection of buildings on mortgaged premises by the mortgagor while remaining in possession will not operate as a disseisin of the mortgagee, but will be regarded as improvements made to enhance the value of the equity of redemption. Hunt v. Hunt, 31 Mass. (14 Pick.) 374, 386, 25 Am. Dec. 400.

Claim of right.

"Disseisin is an actual, visible, and exclusive appropriation of land, commenced and continued under a claim of right, either under an openly avowed claim, or under a constructive claim arising from the acts and circumstances attending the appropriation, to hold the land against him who was seised." Portis v. Hill, 3 Tex. 273, 279; Gildehaus v. Whiting, 18 Pac. 916, 919, 39 Kan. 706.

Disseisin is an actual entry on land, with palpable intention to claim possession as owner; and this claim of possession must not be the assertion of a previously existing right, but the assuming of a right to the land from that time and a subsequent holding with assertion of right. This intention to claim and possess the land is one of the qualities indispensable to constitute a disseisin, as distinguished from a trespass. Washburn v. Cutter, 17 Minn. 361, 368 (Gil. 335).

Blackstone defines "disseisin" as a wrongful putting out of him that is seised of the freehold. 3 Bl. Comm. 169. Disseisin, therefore, must mean in some way or other turning the tenant out of his tenure, and usurping his place and feudal relation. Taylor v. Horde, 1 Burrows, 107. It must be with intent to usurp the place of the true owner and put him out of possession. Unger v. Mooney, 63 Cal. 586, 49 Am. Rep. 100. Richardson, C. J., in Towle v. Ayer, 8 N. H. 57, says "there is an actual disseisin when one man wrongfully enters upon the land of another with intent to usurp, and, retaining the possession, actually turns the owner out, or at least keeps him out." Occupation such as will constitute a disseisin of the true owner and give title by adverse possession must be accompanied by a claim of title. Altsch v. O'Neill (Or.) 58 Pac. 95, 96.

Dispossession distinguished.

All the books seem to agree that the ancient learning on the subject of the general doctrine of disseisin has become abstruse. Disseisin, in the age of Bracton, was considered in an extensive sense, and far beyond the idea which was first applied to it. Disseisin by election, in opposition to actual disseisin, was introduced very early, and became prevalent, in order to extend the remedy by writ of assize, which was devised by Glanville in the reign of Henry II. It must therefore be difficult in many cases to know what species of disseisin was intended, though it is said that the old books, and particularly the book of assize, when they mentioned disseisins, generally relate to disseisins by election. A mere entry upon another is no disseisin, unless it be accompanied with expulsion or ouster from the freehold. Disseisin is an estate gained by wrong and injury, and therein it differs from dispossession, which may be by right or wrong. This is the uniform language of the best authorities from the time of Littleton. Smith v. Burtis (N. Y.) 6 Johns. 197, 217, 5 Am. Dec. 218.

It is essential to a disseisin that there shall be an entry with intention to usurp and oust the true owner of his freehold. There was a distinction between dispossession and disseisin, for disseisin was a wrong to the freehold, and made in defiance and contempt of the true owner. It was an open, adverse entry and expulsion, whereas dispossession might be by right or wrong, and it was necessary to look at the intention in order to determine the character of the act. Thus, where it appears that a person supposed that under his deed he had acquired a title to a lot and had taken possession, under such belief, his possession did not amount to disseisin. Draper v. Monroe, 28 Atl. 340, 18 R. I. 398.

According to the modern authorities there seems to be no legal difference between the words "seisin" and "possession," although there is a difference between the words "disseisin" and "dispossession"; the former meaning an estate gained by wrong and injury, whereas the latter may be by right or wrong; the former denoting an ouster of the dissee or some act equivalent to it, whereas by the latter no such act is implied. Slater v. Rawson, 47 Mass. (6 Metc.) 439, 444.

Enjoyment of easement.

The mere enjoyment of an easement, being the exercise of a right, cannot amount to a disseisin of the owner of the land to which the easement is annexed, for a disseisin is of itself a wrong; nor is it any bar to the maintenance of a writ of entry, by the owner of a piece of land, that the tenant is entitled to an easement in it. Stetson v. Veazie, 11 Me. (2 Fairf.) 408, 410.

Occupation by mistake.

Mere occupation by inadvertence or mistake, without any intention to claim title, may not be a disseisin, as where a fence is erroneously erected, not on the dividing line. Winn v. Abeles, 10 Pac. 443, 445, 35 Kan. 85, 57 Am. Rep. 138 (citing Abbott v. Abbott, 51 Me. 575).

Payment of taxes.

The term "disseisin," in Gen. St. 1856, c. 187, concerning forcible entry and detainer, is not used in its ancient technical sense, but implies actual possession in plaintiff. Hence mere payment of taxes and acts of ownership by plaintiff will not authorize an action for disseisin when another takes actual possession. McCartney's Adm'r v. Alderson, 45 Mo. 35, 38.

Possession.

To constitute a disseisin of the true owner, it is well settled that the possession must begin and continue to be adverse to his title. Abbott v. Sturtevant (17 Shep.) 30 Me. 40, 45.

To constitute disseisin, the possession must not only be in its nature adverse to the rights of the true owner, but it must be open, notorious, continued, and exclusive. Kennebec Purchase v. Laboree, 2 Me. (2 Greenl.) 275, 283, 11 Am. Dec. 79.

To constitute a disseisin, the person claiming to have gained a title by disseisin must prove that his possession has not only continued a sufficient length of time, but has been open, notorious, exclusive, and adverse. Little v. Libby, 2 Me. (2 Greenl.) 242, 247, 11 Am. Dec. 43.

The possession, to amount in law to a disseisin sufficient to bar the right of entry or confer a title, must be an actual occupation of such nature and notoriety as that the owner may be presumed to know that there is a possession of the land. The occupation must be actual, visible, and notorious. Whitehead v. Foley, 28 Tex. 268, 285.

To constitute a disseisin, the possession of the dissee must be adverse in its character, importing a denial of the true owner's title in the land claimed. Worcester v. Lord, 56 Me. 265, 269, 96 Am. Dec. 456.

To constitute a disseisin by a co-tenant of his tenants in common there must be outward acts of exclusive ownership of an unequivocal character, overt and notorious, and of such a nature as by their own import to impart information to give notice to the co-tenants that an adverse possession and an actual disseisin are intended to be asserted against them. Busch v. Huston, 75 Ill. 343, 347 (citing Warfield v. Lindell, 38 Mo. 561, 90 Am. Dec. 443).

To constitute a disseisin, there must be outward acts of exclusive ownership, of an unequivocal character, avowed and notorious, and of such a nature as by their own import to impart information and give notice to the co-tenant that an adverse possession and actual disseisin are intended to be asserted against him. In order that the possession of one co-tenant may be regarded as adverse to the others, it is not sufficient that he continues to occupy the premises and appropriates to himself the exclusive rents and profits, makes slight repairs and improvements on the land, and pays the taxes; for all this may be consistent with the continued recognition of the rights of his co-tenants. Ball v. Palmer, 81 Ill. 370, 372.

To constitute a disseisin by the entry and possession of another person, within the statute against selling pretended titles, an actual exclusive possession as owner is sufficient. Where a school district took possession of a parcel of land, and built a schoolhouse thereon, and occupied it for school purposes for nearly 40 years, when, on the building being destroyed by fire, the district contracted with a third person for the purchase of the land, received a deed thereof from him, and built a new schoolhouse on the site of the old one, which the district afterwards occupied exclusively, claiming the right to do so under the deed of purchase, and thereafter, while the district was thus in possession, the third person conveyed the same land to another, the third person was at the time of his last conveyance disseised within the statute. Sherwood v. Waller, 20 Conn. 262, 269.

Disseisin is the taking and holding of a hostile and exclusive possession of property, not in submission to the rights of the owner or under an acknowledgment of his claim. Where the occupation is open, exclusive, and adverse to the rights and claims of all others, the occupier claiming the right in himself, there is a disseisin. It must be hostile in its commencement to the rights of the true owner, and a mixed possession will not constitute a disseisin. Kinsell v. Daggett, 11 Me. (2 Fairf.) 309, 314.

To constitute a disseisin there must be an actual expulsion of the true owner for the full period prescribed by the statute to constitute adverse possession. Springer v. Young, 12 Pac. 400, 403, 14 Or. 280.

The doctrine of disseisin, its effect, and limitations is laid down with great precision in the leading case of Proprietors of Kennebec Purchase v. Laboree, 2 Me. (2 Greenl.) 275, 11 Am. Dec. 79. It is there stated that if a man enters upon a tract of land under a deed duly registered, although from one having no legal title, and has a visible occupation of part of it only, the true owner is disseised of the whole tract. This tract must be continuous. The doctrine cannot be extended to detached parcels of a part, of one of which the party may have actual possession. By no fair construction or intentment could he be said to be in possession of the other parcels. It is the occupation and improvement, and not the deed alone, which creates the adverse seisin. The party, entering by apparent title and actually keeping part of the land, is deemed to be in possession of the whole tract to which his deed extends. Farrar v. Eastman, 10 Me. (1 Fairf.) 191, 195.

Taking of rents.

Disseisin is any act by the legal proprietor of real estate by which he enters and takes possession of the land as his own. It is not necessary, in order that an entry may constitute a disseisin, that it should be made by a party claiming title, or denying the title of the legal owner. The taking of rents and profits by the disseisor and the management of the property as owner is sufficient. French v. Pearce, 8 Conn. 439, 443, 21 Am. Dec. 680.

Disseisin results from an entry on vacant or uncultivated land by one claiming to hold it, having no right, and without permission of the owner, accompanied with occupation or open visible possession. Disseisin does not necessarily imply a forcible entry, or an actual ouster by violence or fraud; for, in cases of vacant possessions, a simple tortious entry, and open, exclusive possession under claim of adverse title, are equivalent to such entry and ouster. A disseisin may be purged either by the disseisor's abandonment of the possession or his consent to hold under the disseesee. Small v. Procter, 15 Mass. 495, 498.

As to what constitutes disseisin is well stated by Parsons, C. J., in the leading case of Proprietors of Kennebeck Purchase v. Springer, 4 Mass. 416, 3 Am. Dec. 227: "When a man is once seised of land, his seisin is presumed to continue until disseisin is proved. When a man, not claiming any right or title to the land, shall enter on it, he acquires no seisin but by the ouster of him who was seised, and he is himself a disseisor. To constitute an ouster of him who was seised of land, the disseisor must have the actual, exclusive occupancy of the land, claiming to hold it against him who was seised, or he must actually turn him out of possession. To constitute a disseisin of the owner of uncultivated lands by the entry and occupation of a party not claiming title to the land, the occupation must be of that nature and notoriety that the owner may be presumed to know that there is a possession of the land adverse to the title; otherwise, a man may be disseised without his knowledge, and the statute of limitations may run against him while he has no ground to believe that his seisin has been interrupted." Schwaback v. Chicago, M. & St. P. Ry. Co., 34 N. W. 128, 131, 69 Wis. 292, 2 Am. St. Rep. 740. See, also, Bates v. Norcross, 31 Mass. (14 Pick.) 224, 228 (citing Small v. Procter, 15 Mass. 495).

To constitute a disseisin of forest lands in an uncultivated state, decisive acts, tending to a dispossession of him in whom the title might be, must be proved. The common-law definitions of disseisin are collected by Mr. Justice Wilde, in delivering the opinion of the court in Bates v. Norcross, 31 Mass. (14 Pick.) 224. The one quoted from Lord Holt is that "a bare entry on another, without an expulsion, makes such a seisin only that the law will adjudge him in possession that has the right, but it will not work a disseisin or abatement without expulsion." And the one from Parsons, C. J., is that "to constitute an ouster of him who was seised the disseisor must have the actual and exclusive possession of the land, claiming to hold it against him who was seised, or he must actually turn him out of possession." By the statute of Maine, however, it is provided that "to constitute disseisin it shall not be necessary that such lands shall be surrounded with fences or rendered inaccessible by water, but it shall be sufficient if the possession and improvement are open and notorious, and comporting with the ordinary management of a farm, although that part of the same which composes the woodland belonging to such farm, and used therewith as a wood lot, shall not be inclosed." Tilton v. Hunter, 24 Me. (11 Shep.) 29, 32, 33.

DISSEISIN BY ELECTION.

Two kinds of disseisin are mentioned in the English law books. The one was a disseisin in fact, which actually changed and devested the seisin of the original owner of the freehold, and deprived him of all right in relation thereto, except the mere right of entry and of property, and which, under certain circumstances, was still further reduced to a mere right of action; the right of entry being lost. By this species of disseisin the wrongdoer acquired a fee simple and the actual seisin of the property, together with nearly all the rights of the real owner, and all estates depending on the original seisin were devested or displaced. The other kind of disseisin was called "disseisin by election," because the owner might elect to consider himself disseised for the sake of the remedy by action of novel disseisin; but, if he did not elect to consider himself disseised, the freehold was not devested, but still continued in him. Varich v. Jackson (N. Y.) 2 Wend. 166, 201, 19 Am. Dec. 571.

DISSEISOR.

"A disseisor," says Lord Coke, "is where one enters intending to usurp the possession and to oust another of his freehold." So that, in determining whether the acts of the disseisor will constitute adverse possession, the inquiry is reduced to the fact of entering and the intent of the disseisor to usurp possession for himself to the exclusion of others. Carpenter v. Coles, 77 N. W. 424, 75 Minn. 9.

A person who is in possession of the land demanded in a writ of entry, claiming an estate of freehold therein, may be considered as a disseisor for the purpose of trying the right, irrespective of the manner of his original entry therein. Rev. Laws Mass. 1902, p. 1614, c. 179, § 5.

DISSIMULTANEOUS.

The adjectives "simultaneous" and "dissimultaneous" are words of comparison. The former means that two or more occurrences or happenings are identical in time; the latter that they are successive, that is to say, with an interval between each two in succession. The arc-forming separation which takes place between the first pair of carbons burned in the electric light and the arc-forming separation which takes place several hours later between an added pair of carbons are certainly successive and, loosely speaking, dissimultaneous; but these separations lack the unity or continuity of movement implied in the term "dissimultaneous," when used in a claim for a patent on an electric lamp having more than one set of carbons, the combination of said carbon sets with mechanism constructed to impart to them independent and dissimultaneous separating and feeding movements, whereby the electric light would be established between the members of but one of said pairs or sets at a time. Brush Electric Co. v. Western Electric Co. (U. S.) 43 Fed. 533, 538; Id. (U. S.) 69 Fed. 240, 244.

DISSIPATED.

The common understanding of the expression "dissipated man" is that he uses intoxicating drinks frequently and excessively, or, in plainer terms, that he is often intoxicated; and evidence in a prosecution for sale of liquor to an habitual drunkard of such fact is evidence that the man was an habitual drunkard. State v. Pratt, 84 Vt. 323, 324.

DISSOLUTION.

Of corporation.

Assignment for benefit of creditors distinguished, see "Assignment for Benefit of Creditors."

The dissolution of a corporation is that condition of law and fact which ends the capacity of the body corporate to act as such, and necessitates a liquidation and extinguishment of all the legal relations existing in respect of the corporate enterprise. The dissolution of a corporation may happen in the following ways: (1) By the expiration of the time limit in the charter; (2) by the happening of a contingency prescribed by the charter; (3) by the surrender of the franchise of the state; (4) by act of the Legislature; (5) by failure of an integral part of the corporation; (6) by forfeiture of the franchise in a proper judicial proceeding. Matthews v. Bank of Allendale, 38 S. E. 437, 440, 60 S. C. 183.

By Rev. St. art. 607, "dissolution," as used in relation to the dissolution of a corporation, means that result which follows the expiration of time limited by its charter, or the result of a judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction declaring the dissolution. The mere insolvency of a corporation, followed by a cessation of business, with no intent to resume, will not operate what is technically known as "dissolution"; but it has been held in many cases with much reason that such condition of affairs will confer on creditors practically the same rights as they would have under a technical dissolution. Lyons-Thomas Hardware Co. v. Perry Stove Mfg. Co., 24 S. W. 16, 20, 86 Tex. 143, 22 L. R. A. 802.

The charter of a corporation provided that, in case of the dissolution of such company by act of law or otherwise, certain debts should have preference. Held, that in order to work a dissolution in effect, as distinguished from a dissolution in fact, the corporation must be insolvent to such an extent that its creditors will suffer, or must have lost the power to resume its business. The mere appointment of a receiver, with power to pay the debts of a corporation, but not to distribute the surplus among the stockholders, does not amount to a virtual dissolution thereof. Dewey v. St. Albans Trust Co., 56 Vt. 475, 483, 48 Am. Rep. 803.

"Dissolution," as used in Acts 1800, c. 9, requiring complainants in equity who obtain injunctions to enter into a bond with security conditioned for the sum complained of on the "dissolution" of the injunction, should be construed in a general sense, and includes every case where, on account of anything whatever, the injunction is dissolved. It is not confined to a dissolution on the merits. Jones v. Hill, 6 N. C. 131.

Of partnership.

There is a vast difference between the dissolution of a partnership and a mere suspension in the conduct of its business or operation. The terms are not synonymous. Partnership results from contract, and its dissolution, when not brought about by death, bankruptcy, or some operation, at law rests in the same source—the will or action of the partners themselves. Thus it can be correctly said that an assignee made by a partnership suspended the business of that firm, without saying that it dissolved the partnership. Williston v. Camp, 22 Pac. 501, 502, 9 Mont. 88.

Every alteration which shall be made in the names of the partners or nature of the business, in the capital or in the shares thereof, or in any other matter specified in the original certificate, shall be deemed a dissolution of such limited partnership. Comp. Laws Mich. 1897, § 6037.

Dissolution, as between partners, is a matter of intention, and it may be shown by the sale of the whole property and business, as well as in other ways. Thus, where it was found as a fact that a firm had sold its entire plant, equipment, and good will, and by common consent ended its business, a finding that the case was analogous to that of a partnership which was dissolved by mutual consent was justified. Appeal of Haerberly, 43 Atl. 207, 191 Pa. 239, 44 Wkly. Notes Cas. 174, 177.

Dissolution of a partnership by operation of law is of a public, and not a private, nature, and is presumed to be taken notice of by every one, and hence no notice is necessary. Dissolution by marriage and by death are dissolutions by operation of law. Little v. Hazlett, 47 Atl. 855, 859, 197 Pa. 591.

A dissolution of a partnership does not necessarily involve the disposition of its property or a settlement between partners. The power to wind up its business, settle its accounts, and distribute the assets continues after dissolution. Hamilton v. Smith, 94 N. W. 268, 120 Iowa, 93.

"If, in an action for the dissolution of a copartnership, the parties cannot agree as to the value of their pecuniary interest, the only mode of determining it is by a sale of the whole of the partnership property at public auction." Clark v. Brooks (N. Y.) 2 Abb. Prac. (N. S.) 385, 402.

DISSOLVE.

The words "dissolve" and "disband" are of similar import, and hence a vote taken to disband a school district is supported by a notice of a meeting for the purpose of voting on the proposition to dissolve the district. Briggs v. Borden, 38 N. W. 712, 714, 71 Mich. 87.

Corporation.

Under a statute providing that the capital stock of corporations shall be payable in two years from and after the incorporation of the company, or such corporation shall be dissolved, it is held that the provision that the corporation shall be dissolved applies only to proceedings instituted by the state for the dissolution of the corporation itself, and cannot be taken advantage of or enforced collaterally or incidentally, or in any other mode than by proceedings instituted for the purpose against the corporation; in other words, that the requirement that the corporation shall be dissolved is not self-executing. Musgrave v. Morrison, 54 Md. 161, 166.

The phrase "dissolving a corporation" is used sometimes as synonymous with annulling the charter or terminating the existence of the corporation, and sometimes as meaning merely a judicial act which alienates the property and suspends the business of the corporation without terminating its existence. This is paralysis, not necrosis; a suspension of corporate action, not a cessation of corporate life. A corporation may for certain purposes be considered as so dissolved as to be incapable of injury to the public, and yet as retaining all the vitality which may be essential for the protection of the rights of others. In re Independent Ins. Co. (U. S.) 13 Fed. Cas. 13, 16.

Marriage.

To dissolve is to annul, so that a marriage which is dissolved is annulled or void. Wait v. Wait (N. Y.) 4 Barb. 192, 505.

The word "dissolve," as used in Civ. Code, § 61, declaring a subsequent marriage void, unless the former marriage has been annulled or dissolved, means and can only mean a dissolution of the marriage—a divorce. In re Wood's Estate, 69 Pac. 900, 901, 137 Cal. 129.

DISSOLVING BOND.

A dissolving bond simply stands in the place of the thing attached, and its effect is to eliminate the proof of grounds of attachment, and the bond is to be answerable for whatever judgment is rendered. Sanger v. Hibbard, 53 S. W. 330, 331, 2 Ind. T. 547.

DISTANCE.

See "Equal Distance."

The word "distance," as used in Rev. St. § 863, authorizing the taking of depositions of a witness living at a greater distance from the place of trial than 100 miles, means the ordinary, usual, and shortest route of public travel, and not the distance measured by a mathematically straight line between the place of residence of the witness and the place of trial. Jennings v. Menaugh (U. S.) 118 Fed. 612.

Distance should be computed by the usual traveled route, not the mail route, unless this be also the usual traveled one. Smith v. Ingraham (N. Y.) 7 Cow. 419.

DISTILLATION.

"Distillation," according to its scientific, as well as its popular, sense, embraces condensation. It is its primary meaning, and more nearly expresses the full sense of the term as it is used in scientific works and in the statutes of the United States than the mere generation of vapor. The generation or vapor is not distillation, else every old woman who boils her teakettle is a distiller, and every steamboat is a distillery, not of spirits, it is true, but of water. The chemist or other person who boils sea or other water, and thus vaporizes the more volatile parts, and then condenses the vapor into water, is, in truth and in fact, a distiller, and the product is distilled water; but, if the vapor be never condensed and collected, there is no distillation. United States v. One Still (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 320, 322.

"It was ruled in United States v. Tenbrook, 2 Wheat. 248, that rectified spirits were not dutiable as a product of distillation, because rectification, though strictly a process of secondary distillation, by which alcohol is produced in its highest state of concentration, is not distillation in the sense to which Congress had regard." Schuylkill Nav. Co. v. Moore (Pa.) 2 Whart. 477, 491.

DISTILLED LIQUOR.

"Distilled liquor," within the meaning of a statute prohibiting the sale of fermented or distilled liquor, includes whisky, and an indictment charging the sale of whisky is sufficient, without alleging that it is a distilled liquor. State v. Williamson, 21 Mo. 496, 498; Caldwell v. State (Fla.) 30 South. 814, 815.

DISTILLED SPIRITS.

See "Domestic Distilled Spirits."

The term "distilled spirits" has an ordinary and literal meaning which implies distillation. It is so used in Rev. St. § 3296, prohibiting a removal of distilled spirits on which the tax has not been paid to a place other than the distillery warehouse. United States v. Anthony (U. S.) 24 Fed. Cas. 833.

Under Rev. St. § 3289, providing that "all distilled spirits found in any cask or package containing five gallons or more," without having a stamp thereon, shall be forfeited, and section 3299, providing that "all distilled spirits" found elsewhere than in a distillery shall be forfeited, all spirits which have been distilled, whether they have been subsequently rectified or not, are included. Boyd v. United States (U. S.) 3 Fed. Cas. 1098, 1099.

Distilled spirits, spirits, alcohol, and alcoholic spirits, within the true intent and meaning of an act relating to distilled spirits, is that substance known as ethyl alcohol, hydrated oxide of ethyl, or spirit of wine, which is commonly produced by the fermentation of grain, starch, molasses, or sugar, including all dilutions and mixtures of this substance. U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2107.

Apple brandy.

Apple brandy is embraced in the term "distilled spirits." United States v. Ridenour (U. S.) 119 Fed. 411, 416.

Malt liquor synonymous.

The expression "distilled spirits," when used in the statutes of the United States, is not synonymous with "malt liquors." Sarlis v. United States, 152 U. S. 570, 572, 14 Sup. Ct. 720, 722, 38 L. Ed. 536.

Patent medicines.

"Distilled spirits," as used in the law requiring retail liquor dealers to pay a special tax to the United States before engaging in the business, does not include patent or proprietary medicines manufactured and sold in good faith for curative or health-imparting purposes, although they may contain a large percentage of distilled spirits as one of their essential ingredients; nor does the fact that men with strong appetites for drink occasionally buy such preparations and by the use of them become drunk furnish any adequate reason for classifying them as distilled spirits. United States v. Wilson (U. S.) 69 Fed. 144, 145.

DISTILLER.

Every person who produces distilled spirits, or who brews or makes mash, wort, or wash, fit for distillation or for the production of spirits, or who, by any process of evaporation, separates alcoholic spirits from any fermented substance, or who, making or keeping mash, wort, or wash, has also in his possession or use a still, shall be regarded as a distiller. U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2107.

14 Stat. 481, defines a distiller as every person, firm, or corporation who distills or manufactures spirits or alcohol, or who brews or makes mash, wort, or wash for distillation, or the production of spirits. One Vaporizer (U. S.) 18 Fed. Cas. 726, 727.

To make one in possession of a still a distiller, within Rev. St. § 3247, because he keeps mash, wort, or wash, the mash, wort, or wash kept must be such as will produce spirits on distillation. United States v. Frerichs (U. S.) 25 Fed. Cas. 1218.

Distillers were originally defined, under 12 Stat. 456, as persons who distilled or brewed for sale; but the word "brewers" has been left out of all the later statutes. It is conceded on all hands that a person who distills spirits or brews beer, though not for sale, carries on the business of a distiller or brewer. United States v. Wittig (U. S.) 28 Fed. Cas. 744, 745.

Chemist.

A chemist, who distills spirits for the purpose of making, by the addition of nitric acid, sweet spirits of niter for sale, is a "distiller of spirits," within St. 6 Geo. IV, c. 80, §§ 6, 7, requiring an excise license, and imposing penalties on persons having any private or concealed still, etc., for making or distilling low wines or spirits. Attorney General v. Bailey, 16 Mees. & W. 74, 76.

Manufacturer of apple brandy.

A manufacturer of apple brandy is a distiller. United States v. Ridenour (U. S.) 119 Fed. 411, 416.

Rectifier.

The term "distiller," in common language and as used in 4 Stat. 42, authorizing a license tax on distilleries, does not include one who merely rectifies distilled spirits. United States v. Tenbroek (U. S.) 28 Fed. Cas. 33, 34.

DISTILLERY.

A distillery is a place or building where alcoholic liquors are distilled or manufactured, and not every place where the process of distillation is used; and a building in which the business of manufacturing paraffin oil is carried on is not a distillery, within a covenant in a deed prohibiting the purchaser from carrying on a distillery on the premises. Atlantic Dock Co. v. Libby, 45 N. Y. 499, 502.

Ky. St. § 4224, providing that licenses may be granted to distillers of spirituous liquors to retail such liquors at their distillery or place of manufacture, means actually and literally at the distillery or place of manufacture, and does not authorize the granting of a license to sell at a warehouse from 60 to 100 yards distant. Commonwealth v. Holland, 47 S. W. 216, 104 Ky. 323.

Still.

"Distillery," as used in Act July 13, 1866, § 45, making it criminal to aid or abet in the removal of distilled spirits from a "distillery" otherwise than to a bonded warehouse as provided by law, means "the place where spirits are distilled; not the tail of the worm or the still itself, but the distillery premises." United States v. Blaisdell (U. S.) 24 Fed. Cas. 1162, 1170.

DISTILLERY BONDED WAREHOUSE.

Under Ky. St. § 4103 et seq., providing for the assessment of distilled spirits in "distillery bonded warehouses," such phrase means, not only the bonded warehouses kept at the distillery, but the bonded warehouses, wherever kept or by whomsoever owned, in which the products of the distillery were stored, pursuant to United States laws and under the supervision of its officers. City of Louisville v. Louisville Public Warehouse Co., 53 S. W. 291, 292, 107 Ky. 184.

DISTILLERY WAREHOUSE.

"Distillery warehouse," as used in Act Cong. July 30, 1868, § 15, providing that every distiller shall provide at his own expense a warehouse in which to store the liquor, is a bonded warehouse, within the joint resolution of Congress of March 29, 1869, which declares that the proprietors of all internal revenue bonded warehouses shall reimburse to the United States the expenses and salary of all storekeepers put by it in charge of them. United States v. Powell, 81 U. S. (14 Wall.) 493, 494, 20 L. Ed. 726.

DISTINCT.

The word "distinct," in Horner's Rev. St. 1901, § 4438, making each civil township and each incorporated town or city a distinct municipal corporation for school purposes, is used to differentiate the school corporation from the civil corporation, and not to separate school corporations into distinct classes. "As said by this court in McLaughlin v. Shelby Tp., 52 Ind. 114, 117, the language is: 'Each civil township and each incorporated town or city is hereby declared a distinct municipal corporation for school purposes,' etc.," by which is meant that such corporations are distinct from the corporations of the civil townships, towns, and cities. State v. Ogan, 63 N. E. 227, 228, 159 Ind. 119.

Pub. St. c. 75, § 8, provides that if mortgaged premises consist of distinct farms, tracts, etc., they shall be sold separately on foreclosure. Held, that the word "distinct" means a separation by some natural means or boundary, or by intervening space, and not simply a portion which may be described by arbitrary imaginary lines. Worley v. Naylor, 6 Minn. 192, 202 (Gil. 123).

A statute providing that if mortgaged premises consist of distinct farms, tracts, or lots, they shall be separately sold, and no more farms, tracts, or lots shall be sold than shall be necessary to satisfy the amount due, is equivalent to saying that, if the mortgaged premises consist of separate farms or different farms, then they shall be sold separately. The word "distinct," as here used, means separate or different, not the same. A farm might be susceptible of being subdivided, according to the governmental survey, into several distinct parcels or lots, or it might be divided by a highway, and yet its character as one farm remain the same. Neither highways nor sectional lots can cut and carve one farm into several, so long as the owner occupies and treats it as a whole, or as one farm. Larzelere v. Starkweather, 38 Mich. 96, 104.

The word "distinct," as used in Act June 18, 1883, § 2, providing that, whenever the road commissioners desire to expend on any bridge or other distinct and expensive work on the road a large sum of money, they may have a town meeting called, must be given its appropriate meaning, and that is that the work contemplated by the language used is distinct from the road itself, confined to some particular part of it, and is of a more expensive character, like that of a bridge; otherwise, the word "distinct" would be given no meaning whatever; and it would seem to follow that the word excludes the work of constructing the road itself, and provides only for some distinct and more expensive work on some part of it. St. Louis, A. & T. H. R. Co. v. People, 65 N. E. 715, 716, 200 Ill. 365.

DISTINCT PARCEL.

A "distinct parcel" of real property is a part of the property which is or may be set off by boundary lines, as distinguished from an undivided share or interest therein. Code Civ. Proc. N. Y. 1899, § 8343, subd. 16.

DISTINCTLY.

The term "distinctly," as used in a statement that questions of law which are made in a trial court must be distinctly stated, means so stated as to bring to the attention of the court the precise matter on which its decision is asked. Woodruff v. Butler (Conn.) 55 Atl. 167, 168.

The word "distinctly," as used in an instruction that, if the jury are satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that when defendant shot and killed the deceased, he did so pursuant to an intent then distinctly formed in his mind, is used as synonymous with "clearly," "explicitly," "definitely," "precisely," "unmistakably," so that the jury must have understood the words "intent then distinctly formed" to be the equivalent of premeditated design as an element in the murder. Perugi v. State, 80 N. W. 593, 597, 104 Wis. 230, 76 Am. St. Rep. 865.

In Code, § 507, which provides that the defendant may set forth, etc., as many defenses or counterclaims, or both, as he has, whether they are such as were formerly denominated legal or equitable, that each defense or counterclaim must be separately stated and numbered, and, unless it is interposed as an answer to the entire complaint, it must distinctly refer to the cause or action which it is intended to answer, "distinctly" means definitely refer or plainly point out, and a separate defense, containing allegations and denials which under no possibility could refer to any but a particular cause of action set out in the complaint, would come within the meaning of the words. Crasto v. White, 5 N. Y. Supp. 718, 719, 52 Hun, 473.

DISTINGUISHING MARK.

See "Device."

Burns' Rev. St. 1894, § 6248, providing that any ballot bearing a distinguishing mark shall be invalid, means such a mark as fairly imports upon its face a design and a dishonest purpose. The slight soiling of a ballot, which reasonably appears to have been the result of accident or want of due care, is not sufficient to condemn it, if otherwise fair. Tombaugh v. Grogg, 59 N. E. 1060, 1063, 158 Ind. 355.

DISTRACTED PERSON.

Rev. St. 1874, c. 86, § 1, providing for the appointment of a conservator of any distracted person having any estate, means one incapable of acting rationally in the ordinary affairs of life and of comprehending the nature and value of property, so as to be incapable of transacting or procuring to be transacted ordinary business. Snyder v. Snyder, 31 N. E. 303, 304, 142 Ill. 60.

DISTRAIN.

At common law to distrain was to take the personal property of another into possession and hold it as a pledge or security until satisfaction was obtained by the payment of a debt, the discharge of some duty, or reparation for an injury done, with the right in certain cases to sell it to obtain satisfaction, of which the impounding of cattle for damages feasant, or the taking by the landlord of the goods and chattels of the tenant upon the premises for the nonpayment of rent, are familiar examples. Boyd v. Howden (N. Y.) 3 Daly, 455, 457.

"Distrain," as defined by Bouvier, is "to take as a pledge property of another and keep the same until he performs his obligation or until the property is replevied by the sheriff." Ackerman v. Delude (N. Y.) 29 Hun, 137, 138.

Byers v. Ferguson, 68 Pac. 5, 41 Or. 77, contains a discussion of the meaning of the term "distrained" in Hill's Ann. Laws, § 42, which provides that actions for recovery of personal property distrained for any cause shall be commenced and tried in the county in which the subject of the action is situated, and it is there held that, while the word "distrained" originally meant the taking of the property of another as security for the performance of some obligation, the term "distrained" as used in the section of the statute quoted undoubtedly signifies the holding of the personal property of another for any purpose whatever.

DISTRESS.

See "Signal of Distress"; "Warrant of Distress."

Action of.

Distress is itself not an action, but a remedy summary in its nature and extraordinary in its character, a process whereby a personal chattel is taken from the possession of one to secure satisfaction for a demand, formerly remaining in the hands of the distrainor as a pledge to compel performance, now from the first taking in the custody of the law. Hewitson v. Hunt, 8 S. C. (8 Rich. Law) 106, 110.

Of vessel.

A vessel is in distress when in a state of danger or necessity, as from want of provisions or water, etc. (Webst. Dict.); or "in a situation of misfortune or calamity, as a steamer in distress" (Stand. Dict.). A vessel, of course, is also in distress when wrecked and needing salvage service. The Sae-helm (U. S.) 99 Fed. 456, 458, 39 C. C. A. 600.

See "Sufficient Distress"; "Unreasonable Distress."

Distress is the right of the landlord to seize and hold property for the payment of rent. The liability to distraint arises from the fact that the property found on the premises and not from the ownership. The goods of a stranger are liable, with those of the tenant. This right is an ancient privilege of the common law, which had its origin in the feudal tenures. Lord Coke informs us that it was an inseparable incident of the seignior. It is a remedy which is confined to the land out of which the rent issues, and does not follow the person of the tenant. The tenant, it is true, owes the rent; but the remedy is enforced against the land, and not against him. His personal liability is not regarded, and the proceeding is conducted as if the land were the debtor. Distresses seem to have originated from two more ancient remedies of the common law. By the process of gavellet and cessavit the landlord could seize the land itself for rent in arrear and hold it until payment was made. These processes have been obsolete for ages, and exist only in the memory of legal antiquaries. Emig v. Cunningham, 62 Md. 458, 460.

Distress is the taking of a personal chattel out of the possession of a wrongdoer into the custody of the party injured to procure satisfaction for a wrong committed, as for nonpayment of rent. Hard v. Nering (N. Y.) 44 Barb. 472, 488 (citing 3 Bl. Comm. 6); Owen v. Boyle, 22 Me. (9 Shep.) 47, 61.

It is well settled in England that whatever goods and chattels a landlord finds on the premises of the tenant who is in arrears for rent are distrainable by the landlord, whether they in fact belong to the tenant or a stranger; but there are exceptions to this rule, and certain articles are exempt from distress, not only those belonging to strangers, but to the tenant himself. Animals ferre naturæ cannot be distrained. Whatever is in the personal use and occupation of any man is for the time privileged and protected. Valuable things in the way of trade are not liable to distress, as a horse standing at a smithshop to be shod or in a common inn, or cloth at a tailor's house, or corn sent to a mill; for all these are protected and privileged for the benefit of trade, and are supposed in common parlance not to belong to the owner of the house, but to his customers. Owen v. Boyle, 22 Me. (9 Shep.) 47, 61.

Distress is a remedy that can be employed only for the recovery of what is properly rent and is reserved as such. It may be sustained where the sum originally stipulated for has been increased by agreement, but covenants that relate to the use of the premises, but not to the payment to the lessor for the use, do not give the right to distress, and a breach of a covenant in a lease not to engage in a certain business on the premises under penalty does not give a right to distress for such penalty. Evans v. Lincoln Co., 54 Atl. 321, 322, 204 Pa. 448 (citing Latimer v. Groetzinger, 139 Pa. 207, 227, 21 Atl. 22).

For taxes.

"Distress," as used in Gen. Laws, c. 58, § 5, authorizing the collection of delinquent taxes by distress or sale, means a seizure of personal property, and hence confers no power to arrest the person of the taxpayer. Marshall v. Wadsworth, 10 Atl. 685, 686, 64 N. H. 386.

DISTRIBUTE.

Where a contract for the grading of a street provided that certain material should be distributed as the engineer in charge might direct, the word "distributed" meant spreading and grading. Morgan v. City of Baltimore, 58 Md. 509, 519.

As relating to division of money.

Where, throughout the whole of an act in regard to the descent and distribution of intestate's property, the word "descend" is used where land is to go to the heirs, and the word "distribute" where money is to be divided, the use of the word "distribute" in a part of the act which provides that, if land be sold for more than the computation of the value thereof, then the administrator shall "distribute the same as by this act is required for the intestate's real estate," is significant as showing that the proceeds of the land, though to go to the heirs, is to have the character of and otherwise be treated as money. Grider v. McClay (Pa.) 11 Serg. & R. 224, 232.

As postponing vesting of estate.

A will giving to a beneficiary a certain sum absolutely, to be "distributed" to him at the expiration of three years, or in a certain contingency in five years, from the testator's death, gives to such beneficiary a vested interest in fee in the devise, postponed merely in enjoyment. Williams v. Williams, 14 Pac. 394, 396, 73 Cal. 99.

Testator devised to his children a certain portion of his real estate and all his personal estate to be distributed, when required, at mature age or maturity, in equal parts. Held, that the word "distributed" related to the division of the estate at the time fixed by the will, and not to the vesting of the estate, so that until that time the devisees took the lands as tenants in common. Chighizola v. Le Baron, 21 Ala. 406, 411.

DISTRIBUTABLE PROPERTY.

The movable property of a railroad other than its rolling stock is termed, for the purpose of taxation, "distributable property." State ex rel. Gottlieb v. Metropolitan St. Ry. Co., 61 S. W. 603, 605, 161 Mo. 188.

Distributable property of a railroad company, for the purposes of taxation, is defined in Acts Tenn. 1897, c. 5, § 7, as consisting of the roadbed, rolling stock, franchises, choses in action, and personal property having no actual situs. Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. R. Co. v. King (U. S.) 120 Fed. 614, 621, 57 C. C. A. 278.

DISTRIBUTABLE SURPLUS.

With respect to decedents' estates, the term "distributable surplus" is applicable to personal estate only. Williams v. Stone-street (Va.) 3 Rand. 559, 561.

DISTRIBUTE.

As legal representative, see "Legal Representative."

The word "distributees" means "persons who are entitled, under the statute of distribution, to the personal estate of one who is dead intestate." Henry v. Henry, 31 N. C. 278, 279.

The word "distributees" is popularly used to mean the persons who are entitled, under the statutes of distribution of the state, to the personal estate of one dying intestate. No other word has been used to convey the same idea, and the word commends itself because it has not been appropriated to any other use. The word is in common use among the legal profession, and the fact that it had been adopted by the profession and by the legislature, notwithstanding the severe rebuke given to it by Hindman, C. J., in Croom v. Herring, 11 N. C. 393, is a convincing proof that a necessity for a new word really existed. Henry v. Henry, 31 N. C. 278, 279. Ruffin, C. J., in a dissenting opinion, however, says: "Distributees" is not a word at all known in the law, and, until my Brothers told me that they understood what it meant, I must humbly beg pardon for saying that I looked upon it as a newly invented barbarism and without settled sense; indeed, I do not now understand from what source the meaning of the term is derived. I believe it is a phrase which is sometimes used in common parlance by persons who are not speaking of the profession, and do not aim at accuracy in speaking on legal subjects. Some members of the bar have fallen into the use of it, sometimes in discussion, when precision of expression is of the less importance, as there is opportunity for exception; but those who indulge themselves in that mode of speech are so sensible of its impropriety that, as Judge Henderson remarked in Croom v. Herring, 11 N. C. 393, they seldom use 'distributee' without an apology, knowing that it is not to be found in any English dictionary or English book, much less in a lawbook. I believe that up to this day it has not obtained admission into any American dictionary, though at least one of them has been supposed to have taken every word that can possibly be tolerated, but when used it has not seemed, to me at least, to be in any definite sense." In a subsequent case, Mardree v. Mardree, 31 N. C. 295, 306, Judge Ruffin himself uses the words "the only distributees," placing them in quotation marks.

A creditor of an estate who has recovered a judgment on his claim in the county court is not a "distributee" of the estate, within Rev. St. c. 3, §§ 116, 117. Wolf v. Griffin, 13 Ill. App. (13 Bradw.) 559, 560.

DISTRIBUTION.

See "Final Distribution"; "Valid Distribution."

"Distribution is the act of dividing or making an apportionment." In re Creighton, 11 N. W. 313, 12 Neb. 280.

In a contract for the publication of an advertisement in a certain periodical, and to pay therefor at the rate of $20 for each and every thousand copies of the total number printed and delivered for distribution, the term "distribution" means a delivery for the purpose of supplying subscribers or purchasers of the paper. The act of leaving the periodical at houses in the principal streets of the city, four copies at a time, by boys employed for that purpose, is not a "distribution" within the meaning of such contract. Dawley v. Alsdorf (N. Y.) 25 Hun, 226, 227.

In a will by one who had deeded his property to his wife subject to the distribution of his legal heirs, reciting that he deemed it proper that he should make a distribution of the property, "distribution" should not be construed in the sense of taking by the statute of distribution, but in the sense of division by himself among his heirs as he saw fit. Sasser v. McWilliams, 73 Ga. 678, 683.

"Distribution," has been defined to be the division of an intestate's estate according to law. Rogers v. Gillett, 9 N. W. 204, 205, 56 Iowa, 266 (citing 1 Bouv. Law Dict. 438).

The "distribution" of an estate includes the determination of the persons who by law are entitled thereto, and also the proportions or parts to which each of these persons is entitled. A proceeding for distribution is in the nature of a proceeding in rem, the res being the estate which is in the hands of the executor, under the control of the court, and which he brings before the court for the purpose of receiving direction as to its final distribution. William Hill Co. v. Lawler, 48 Pac. 323, 116 Cal. 359.

Same—As relating to real estate.

With respect to decedents' estates, the term "distribution" is applicable to personal estate only. Williams v. Stonestreet (Va.) 3 Rand. 559, 561.

Act 1839, art. 4, § 1, relative to married women, provides that any married woman may become seised or possessed of any property, real or personal, by direct bequest, demise, gift, or distribution. Held, that the word "distribution" applied as well to real estate derived by descent, as to personalty received from the estate of an ancestor. Robinson v. Payne, 58 Miss. 690, 707.

A father died leaving six children, devising all his land to a son, subject to a life estate to his mother. A controversy between a daughter and the administrator was settled by a stipulation, signed by all the children, that, in consideration of her dismissing her claim, she, in the distribution of their father's estate, should receive an equal share with each other child. In such contract the word "distribution" was used in the statutory and ordinary sense, and had reference to the personal property and money arising from the sale of real estate by the administrator among the heirs after the payment of the debts and legacies. The distribution could not have had relation to the lands, because the other children were not to share in them under any contingency. Beard v. Lofton, 102 Ind. 408, 2 N. E. 129, 131.

Same—Dower distinguished.

Distribution and dower are two separate and distinct things. Dower is a lien created by law on the property of a husband at the time of the marriage, which necessarily takes precedence over all other subsequent, accruing rights, and attaches to the specific property, and is carved out of it. Distribution occurs after administration and the payment of debts, and the estate is then divided between the heirs and legatees. The widow is not entitled to any portion or distributive share after her dower has been allotted to her. Johnson v. Knight of Honor, 13 S. W. 794, 795, 53 Ark. 255, 8 L. R. A. 732 (citing Hill's Adm'rs v. Mitchell, 5 Ark. [5 Pike] 608, 618).

Same—Partition distinguished.

Distribution neither gives a new title to property, nor transfers a distinct right in the estate of the deceased owner, but is simply declaratory as to the persons upon whom the law casts the succession, and the extent of their respective interests, while partition, in most, if not all, of its aspects, is an advisory proceeding, in which a remedial right to the transfer of the property is asserted, and resulting in a decree which, either ex proprio vigore or as executory, accomplished such transfer. Robinson v. Fair, 9 Sup. Ct. 80, 84, 128 U. S. 53, 32 L. Ed. 415.

Same—Payment of debts.

In general, the term "distribution," when applied to the estate of a deceased person, refers to the ultimate division of the estate of the deceased among the next of kin, in case of intestacy, or among the beneficiaries under a will after the estate is free from debt. Bouvier describes "distribution" to be the division, by order of the court having authority, among those entitled thereto, of the personal estate of an intestate after payment of the debts and charges, and sometimes the division of a residue of real and personal estate, and the division of an estate according to the terms of the will. There is no recognition in the work referred to of the applicability of that term to the payment of the debts of a deceased person, and such word, as used in an act providing that, on appeal from a decree admitting a will to probate, the executors shall not distribute the effects, relates to the "distribution" in the legal sense of the term, and does not prevent the payment of the debts. Thomson v. Tracy, 60 N. Y. 174, 180.

Of prizes.

A scheme for the "distribution" of prizes by chance (definition of a lottery given by Webster and Bouvier) may provide for distributing them all at one time, or at several times, absolutely to one set of persons, or conditionally to that set or class. It may allow one person to exhaust all his chances before other persons accept a chance, and still the scheme is within that definition. Fleming v. Bills, 8 Or. 286, 291.

DISTRIBUTION POLICY PLAN.

The "distribution policy plan," in the insurance business, is a plan whereunder all the policies issued in any one year to policy holders in the different parts of the world constitute a class, and all profits and surplus derived from premiums on all said policies during a period of 20 years were accumulated until the end of said period, and then distributed for the benefit of such policies as should be in force at the end of such period, and thereby each of the said policy holders of said class acquired a contingent interest, in the event of survivorship of said period, in the profits and surplus which might be realized from the premiums on their policies in said class. Horton v. New York Life Ins. Co., 52 S. W. 356, 357, 151 Mo. 604.

DISTRIBUTIVE JUSTICE.

"Distributive justice" is described as "that virtue whose object is to distribute rewards and punishment to each one according to his merits, observing a just proportion by comparing one person or fact with another." Bowman v. McLaughlin, 45 Miss. 461, 495 (quoting Bouv. Law Dict.).

DISTRIBUTIVE SHARE.

Dividend synonymous, see "Dividend."

"Distributive share" means the share which a person takes in personal property in case of intestacy. People v. Beckwith, 10 N. Y. St. Rep. 97.

An antenuptial contract providing that the wife, if the survivor, should only receive one-sixth part instead of a one-third part as her "distributive share" in the husband's personalty, entitled her to take such part though he died testate, since to confine the words "distributive share" to an intestate estate, or to an estate made intestate by the widow by her waiving the will, would be to give the contract too strict and technical a construction. Taft v. Taft, 40 N. E. 860, 861, 163 Mass. 467.

Where sums of money are received by claimants under a deceased person's will, under a compromise contract made by them with the executor of the will, sanctioned by a court having jurisdiction of the will and of the estate devised, the sums of money so received do not fall within the category of legacies or "distributive shares" in intestates' estate, which are subjected to an internal revenue tax by the United States. Page v. Rives, 18 Fed. Cas. 990, 992.

DISTRICT.

See "Assessment District"; "Collection Districts"; "Fire Districts"; "Judicial District"; "Land District"; "Levee Districts"; "Mineral District"; "Mining District"; "Road District"; "School District."

Acts 17th Gen. Assem. c. 162, authorizes cities of the first class to divide themselves into sewerage districts for the construction of city sewers and for the assessment of the cost on adjacent property. Held, that the word "districts" as so used did not necessarily show an intention of the Legislature to require a city of the first class to be divided into two or more sewerage districts, but the word "districts" in the plural included the singular, and therefore authorized such a city to create itself into one single sewerage district. Grimmell v. City of Des Moines, 57 Iowa, 144, 10 N. W. 330.

"District," as used in Wyoming Railroad Assessment Act Dec. 13, 1879, providing that it shall be the duty of the assessors of the county or "district" in which the shops, other buildings, or real estate of the railroad is situated to assess the same, etc., refers to any subordinate territorial division less than a county. Union Pac. R. Co. v. Ryan, 5 Sup. Ct. 601, 604, 113 U. S. 516, 28 L. Ed. 1098.

The word "district," as used in the Nebraska Constitution, in reference to general elections, is held to refer to districts created by the Legislature, as well as those provided for in the Constitution, inasmuch as the Constitution expressly excepts school districts, thus mentioning a district which must be created by the Legislature, but which would be included unless so specially excepted. State v. Moores (Neb.) 96 N. W. 1011, 1014.

The word "district" shall be construed to mean township, village, city, or ward, as the case may be. Gen. St. Minn. 1894, § 1511; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 1176; Rev. St. Tex. 1895, art. 5064.

As city or town.

In Act 1874, providing that water companies incorporated under its provisions should have the power to supply water in the town, borough, city, or "district" where they may be located, having no qualifying adjective to indicate its extent or meaning, "district" is not to be construed as extending the territorial limits in which the corporation may supply water beyond those given it by the prior words used in that connection. It may embrace a township, or a part of one of the political divisions mentioned immediately preceding it, but not two or more of them. Bly v. White Deer Mountain Water Co., 46 Atl. 929, 932, 197 Pa. 80.

The term "district," as used in Const. art. 1, § 6, providing that in all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy trial by a jury of the county or district wherein the crime was committed, may properly be held to designate an area larger or smaller than a county. A city, though a part of a county, might by proper legislation be elected into a district by itself, and the meaning of the constitutional provision is that the accused shall have a right to a trial by a jury of the county where his crime was committed, if the criminal jurisdiction of the court before which he is tried embraces and is confined to crimes committed anywhere in the county, and a right of a trial by jury of the district where his crime was committed, whether such district be larger or smaller than a county, when the criminal jurisdiction of the court before which he is being tried embraces and is confined to crimes committed anywhere in such district. State v. Kemp, 34 Minn. 61, 62, 24 N. W. 349.

The "town or district" of a justice, within a statute providing that a chattel mortgage must be acknowledged before a justice of the peace of the town or district where the mortgagor resides, means the town or district by which he is elected. The "district" of a police justice is the village in which he was elected. Ticknor v. McClelland, 84 Ill. 471, 477.

As county.

The term "district treasury," as used in Rev. St. c. 53, § 36, requiring all excess of commissions and fees due town or district collectors to be paid into the town or district treasury, means the county treasury of counties not organized under township organizations, but does not include counties so organized, as section 140 provides that each county not under township organization shall be a collection district for the purpose of the act. Ryan v. People, 6 N. E. 37, 41, 117 Ill. 486.

As defined portion of state.

Rev. St. 1898, § 8, declares that counties on the shores of Green Bay shall have jurisd-diction in common of all offenses committed on that part of the bay lying within the limits of the state. Const. art. 1, § 7, provided that in all prosecutions by indictment or information the case shall have a speedy trial by a jury of the "county or district" wherein the offense shall have been committed, which county or district shall have previously been ascertained by law. It was held that where one was informed against for taking fish with nets in the waters bordering on Door county, and the offense was committed 40 miles from Brown county and 5 miles at least from the nearest point of any other county than Door, the circuit court of Brown county had jurisdiction. The word "district" in the Constitution not being used synonymously with "county." State v. McDonald, 85 N. W. 502, 506, 109 Wis. 506.

In Laws 1899, c. 370, § 10, giving the civil service commission power to prescribe rules for the classification of the offices, places, and employments in the classified service, and section 17, providing that where the labor service of any department or institution extends to separate localities the commission must provide separate registration lists for each district or locality, "district" means some political subdivision of the state created and existing by legislative act at the time the registration lists are furnished. For a district or locality thus created, and not otherwise, the commission may provide separate registration lists; but it cannot of its own volition, independent of the statute, first create a district and then furnish the list. People v. Shea, 76 N. Y. Supp. 679, 681, 73 App. Div. 232.

Webster defines the word "district" as a defined portion of the state, and it is so used in the definition of a "town" as a "district of certain limits." Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co. v. Town of Oconto, 6 N. W. 607, 608, 50 Wis. 189, 36 Am. Rep. 840.

In the act of Congress of 1872 providing for the collection of direct taxes, and speaking of an entry of a commanding general into an insurrectionary state or district, the word "district" means simply a part or portion of the state, and not large divisions, such as counties. Keely v. Sanders, 99 U. S. 441, 448, 25 L. Ed. 327.

In Act Cong. 1862, § 6, directing tax commissioners to enter upon their duties whenever the commanding general of the forces of the United States, entering into any insurrectionary state or district, shall have established the military authority throughout any parish or district of the same, the word "district" means, not necessarily any civil division in the state occupied, but is synonymous with "region," "section of country," or "locality" occupied. The same word is used in describing the whole territory into which the commanding general entered, and the subjugation of parts of which will authorize the tax. Within the nomenclature of the law, there is necessarily an insurrectionary district, the whole of which need not be occupied in order to justify the tax. Within this law, on the occupation of the entire city of Memphis, having a distinct municipal organization, it becomes a taxing district. It is not a parish or a county; but both the title and the reason of the law show that distinct political divisions and tax districts are contemplated by it. Sharpleigh v. Surdam, 21 Fed. Cas. 1173, 1174; Keely v. Sanders, 99 U. S. 441, 448, 25 L. Ed. 327.

As judicial district.

The word "district," as used in Minn. Const. art. 1, § 6, providing that in all criminal cases the accused shall enjoy the right to a trial by a jury in the county or district wherein the crime shall have been committed, means the territory within the jurisdiction of the court, which may be in area greater or smaller than a county. State v. Kemp, 34 Minn. 61, 24 N. W. 349, 351. It means trial district, and not the senatorial or judicial district. State v. Miller, 15 Minn. 344, 347 (Gil. 277, 279).

Under a bill of rights which provided that in all criminal prosecutions the accused shall be allowed a speedy public trial by an impartial jury of the county or district in which the offense is alleged to have been committed, it was held that the word "district," like the word "county," as used in such section, was used in a restrictive sense, and intended to designate the precise portion of territory or division of the state over which the court, at any particular sitting, may exercise power in criminal matters. State v. Knapp, 19 Pac. 728, 729, 40 Kan. 148; Olive v. State, 7 N. W. 444, 446, 11 Neb. 1 (approved and followed in State v. Crinklaw, 59 N. W. 370, 371, 40 Neb. 759); McCauley v. Fulton, 44 Cal. 355, 360.

In Wash. Code, § 47, providing that local actions shall be tried in the county or district wherein the subject of action is situated, the word "district" refers only to a case where two or more counties are joined together for jurisdictional purposes, one of them not having the privilege of sessions of courts within its limits. McLeod v. Ellis, 26 Pac. 76, 78, 2 Wash. St. 117.

Act May 19, 1874, § 17, relating to contested elections of senators, provides that, in case there shall be no law judge of the district in which any contest shall arise qualified to act, a judge, learned in the law, residing nearest the courthouse of the county in which by the provisions of the act the trial in any such case is required to be had, shall proceed to the trial, etc. Held, that the word "district" as used in such statute meant judicial district, and not the senatorial district in which the state was divided. Cumberland County v. Trickett, 107 Pa. 118.

In Bill of Rights, § 10, which guaranties the right of an accused person to have a trial by an impartial jury of the county or district in which the offense is alleged to have been committed, "district" should not be construed to limit the right to a change of venue to such counties as are in the same judicial district in which the indictment is found, the word not being used in the sense of "judicial district," but in the sense of "vicinity," and hence an order may be had that an accused shall be tried in any adjoining county. State v. McCarty, 39 N. E. 1041, 1042, 52 Ohio St. 363, 27 L. R. A. 537.

Comp. St. c. 10, § 1, providing that all "district officers" shall, before entering on their respective duties, take and subscribe a certain oath, which shall be indorsed on their bonds, refers solely to judicial district officers, and does not include school district officers. Frans v. Young, 46 N. W. 528, 529, 30 Neb. 360, 27 Am. St. Rep. 412; Laird v. Leap, 60 N. W. 1043, 1044, 42 Neb. 834.

As place or locality.

"District," as used in Rev. St. § 5134, requiring national banking associations, in their certificates, to name the place where their operations of discount and deposit are carried on, designating the state, territory, or district, means simply the place—the locality—in which the business is carried on. Silver Bow County Com'rs v. Davis, 12 Pac. 688, 690, 6 Mont. 306.

As port.

In the revenue laws, "district" and "port" are often used as of the same import in cases where the limits of the port and the district are the same. Ayer v. Thacher (U. S.) 2 Fed. Cas. 269, 270.

As school district.

In Revenue Act, § 110, providing that the county clerk shall distribute the value of railroad track, certified to him by the auditor, to the county, and to the several towns, districts, villages, and cities in his county entitled to a proportionate value of such railroad track, the term "districts" means school districts, and has no reference to road districts. Ohio & M. R. Co. v. People, 10 N. E. 545, 548, 119 Ill. 207.

As territory.

Within the article of the Constitution providing that all the judges shall be elected by the electors of the districts over which they are to preside, "district" may be construed to mean territory, so that, in the case of an election for a president judge of a district, the voters of the entire territory over which he is to preside might vote at such election. Commonwealth v. Dumbauld, 97 Pa. 293, 304.

In Pol. Code, § 1837, relating to the levying of a tax for the purpose of building schoolhouses, and providing that if the electors of a district vote therefor the trustees are to certify this fact to the board of supervisors, and the supervisors, when levying the county taxes, must levy a tax sufficient to raise the amount voted on all the taxable property in the "district" voting such tax, the word "district" is synonymous with "corporations voting the tax," and is not an equivalent of "territory within the district." Hughes v. Ewing, 28 Pac. 1067, 1068, 93 Cal. 414.

DISTRICT ATTORNEY.

As district officer, see "District Officer."

The district attorney is the duly constituted prosecuting officer of the commonwealth. He represents the public, and the duty of prosecuting all offenders is laid upon him. Special counsel employed by private prosecutors are allowed to assist in certain cases, but they merely take part by his courtesy. The burden of the case is always in contemplation upon him. The boards of health of cities of the third class have no authority to employ private counsel to prosecute indictments for nuisance. Smith v. City of Scranton (Pa.) 3 C. P. Rep. 82, 84.

The Constitution calls the prosecuting attorney the district attorney. The law prescribing his duties says that he shall be a public prosecutor, so that the terms "district attorney" and "prosecuting attorney" are one and the same thing, and the fact that an indictment is signed "Prosecuting Attorney," and not "District Attorney," is immaterial. State v. Salge, 2 Nev. 321, 324.

The district attorney is a quasi judicial officer. He represents the commonwealth. Commonwealth v. Bubnis, 47 Atl. 748, 750, 197 Pa. 542.

DISTRICT JUDGE.

Code Civ. Proc. § 252, providing that injunction may be granted in an action at the time of commencing it, or at any time afterwards, before judgment, by the Supreme Court, or any judge thereof, the district court, or any judge thereof, is not comprehensive enough to authorize any district judge to grant temporary injunctions throughout the state, no matter whether the judge of the court in which the action is brought be absent from his district or not; but the words clearly refer alone to the particular court in which the action is brought, and to the judge having for the time being jurisdiction within that district. Ellis v. Karl, 7 Neb. 381, 386.

DISTRICT MEETINGS.

Under Pub. Laws May 29, 1884, c. 447, § 1, providing that any town may at a "town meeting" abolish all the school districts therein, a town divided into voting districts cannot legally vote in district meetings on the question of abolishing its school districts, as the words "district meetings," in the act, are not equivalent to "town meetings." Comstock v. School Committee, 17 R. I. 827, 828, 24 Atl. 145, 146.

DISTRICT OF ALASKA.

The phrase "District of Alaska," as used in 15 Stat. 241, extending the laws of the United States relating to customs, commerce, and navigation over the territory ceded to the United States by Russia, and as used in the executive order made pursuant to such act, includes that portion of the sea along its coasts, which lies inside of a line drawn from the promontory of Point Hope to Cape Prince of Wales. The Louisa Simpson (U. S.) 15 Fed. Cas. 953, 958.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

As state, see "State."

DISTRICT OFFICER.

A county tax collector is not a "district" officer within the meaning of Const. § 234, providing that all district officers shall reside within their respective districts. Commonwealth v. Blackwell, 30 S. W. 642, 643, 97 Ky. 314.

A "district attorney" is not a county or precinct, but a district, officer. Merwin v. Boulder County Com'rs, 67 Pac. 285, 287, 29 Colo. 169.

DISTRICT SEWERS.

"District sewers," as defined in a city charter establishing a sewer system, are those constructed or acquired, under authority of ordinance, within the limits of an established sewer district, and paid for by special assessments. Prior v. Buehler & Cooney Const. Co., 71 S. W. 205, 170 Mo. 439.

DISTRICT TELEGRAPH BUSINESS.

A "district telegraph business" consists in securing the attendance of messenger boys to carry telegraph messages, run miscellaneous errands, carry packages, distribute posters, invoices, invitations, etc. The business also includes night-watchman signals, fire and burglar alarms, and police calls. City of Toledo v. Western Union Tel. Co. (U. S.) 107 Fed. 10, 14, 46 C. C. A. 111, 52 L. R. A. 730.

DISTURB.

The word "disturbed" means agitated, aroused from a state of repose, molested, interrupted, hindered, perplexed, disquieted, or turned aside, or diverted from the object for which they are assembled. Richardson v. State, 5 Tex. App. 470, 472.

Act April 11, 1873, § 2, providing that, if any two or more persons shall confederate for the purpose of "intimidating, alarming, or disturbing" any person or persons, they shall on conviction be fined, implied the use of physical force and menace, and involved a breach of the peace; and hence an allegation of a threat to prosecute for selling whisky without a license was not an intimidation, alarming, or disturbing within the statute. Embry v. Commonwealth, 79 Ky. 439, 441.

"Disturb" primarily means to throw into disorder or confusion, to derange, to interrupt the settled state of; so that, under an allegation that by reason of defendant's neglect and careless conduct plaintiff was greatly disturbed in body and mind, proof that plaintiff was injured physically does not constitute a variance. Watkins v. Kaolin Mfg. Co., 42 S. E. 983, 984, 131 N. C. 536, 60 L. R. A. 617.

A school is as much "interrupted or disturbed" by preventing the assembly as by breaking it up after school is assembled, within the meaning of Pub. St. c. 241, § 7, providing a punishment for persons who willfully interrupt or disturb any public or private school. Douglass v. Barber, 28 Atl. 805, 18 R. I. 459.

DISTURBANCE.

"Disturbance" is defined as any conduct which, being contrary to the usages of the particular sort of meeting and class of persons assembled, interferes with its due progress and services, or is annoying to the congregation, in whole or in part. State v. Stuth, 39 Pac. 665, 666, 11 Wash. 423 (citing 2 Bish. Cr. Law, § 309).

A valid contract cannot be made on Sunday if it relates to the business of one's secular calling and is not an act of necessity or mercy, because two or more must necessarily be engaged in making such contract, and, however willing and desirous they both and all might be to consummate it on that day, yet in doing it they would each necessarily "disturb the other or others," in the sense in which that term is used in Rev. St. c. 118, § 1, Comp. Laws, 271, providing that the work, labor, or business of a person's secular calling shall not be done to the "disturbance of others" on the Lord's Day. The word "disturbance" is not to be understood in the sense that a person cannot be disturbed by business, unless it annoys him or interferes in some way with his devotion, or his meditation or his rest, against his wish. Smith v. Foster, 41 N. H. 215, 218.

A statute prohibiting any work on Sunday, to "the disturbance of others," includes all secular work, business, or labor, the spirit of the act being to advance the interests of religion, to turn a man's thoughts from worldly concerns, and to direct them to the duties of piety and religion. But the execution of a will on Sunday is not an act, secular in its character, tending to the disturbance of others. George v. George, 47 N. H. 27, 33.

An act prohibiting any person from doing any work on the Lord's Day, to the "disturbance" of others, applies to anything which throws into confusion things settled, which interrupts the movements, pursuits, or thoughts of another; so if it distracts his attention, and calls his mind off from one train of thought and diverts it to another, it may be said to "disturb" him. The only safe meaning to be given to the word is a comprehensive one, going upon the ground that the main purpose of the law was to release an individual from a penalty who had been guilty of no act that actually did or that tended to disturb the minds of others from those religious observances which the act unquestionably intended to respect. If a person should desire to buy a horse, he would have no right to go to the owner on the Sabbath and make his proposition for the sale, because that would tend to disturb the quiet of the owner on the day which the statute intended should be respected; and where a contract for the sale of a horse was made on Sunday, and a note executed, and the wife of one of the parties and a witness were the only persons present, it was a disturbance within the law. Varney v. French, 19 N. H. 233, 238.

Of others.

Rev. St. c. 118, § 1, provided that no person should do any work, business, or labor of his secular calling, to the "disturbance of others," on the Lord's Day. Held, that any business tends to the "disturbance of others," and is consequently prohibited, which withdraws the attention from the appropriate duties of the Sabbath, and turns it to other things. Varney v. French, 19 N. H. 233, 235.

In this state, under the construction of our statute prohibiting unnecessary labor on Sunday, the execution and delivery of a promissory note upon Sunday has been declared "business of a person's secular calling, and generally an act to the disturbance of others, and, as such, is prohibited under a penalty." State Capital Bank v. Thompson, 42 N. H. 369, 370.

Of religious worship.

Of religious worship, see "Disturbing Religious Worship."

Of a right.

"A 'disturbance' of a right cannot necessarily of itself be held to mean a refusal of permission to exercise such right. A refusal, unaccompanied with threats, express or implied, is a bare negation; it has nothing active in its nature, nor can it fairly be implied that the person who refused had it in contemplation to do any unlawful act. He may doubt the right of him who asked permission, and intend to take his remedy at law in case that person persisted in the exercise of the right, and such an intention could be no legal disturbance. A bare refusal does not amount to a disturbance." Downing v. Baldwin (Pa.) 1 Serg. & R. 298, 303.

DISTURBING THE PEACE.

See "Seriously Disturb or Injure The Public Peace."

An ordinance of St. Charles, providing that every person who shall willfully "disturb the peace * * * by loud or unusual noise, by blowing horns * * * shall be deemed guilty of misdemeanor," means the disturbance of some person or persons; the mere making of noise without disturbing any one is insufficient. City of St. Charles v. Meyer, 58 Mo. 86, 89.

Where defendant has been convicted of "unlawfully and willfully using loud and vociferous language in a manner calculated to disturb the inhabitants of the said public place," an appeal should be dismissed which is based on recognizances stating that appellant has been convicted of "disturbing the peace," since there is no such offense, eo nomine, as disturbing the peace. Yokum v. State (Tex.) 21 S. W. 191.

DISTURBING RELIGIOUS WORSHIP.

A statute making it an offense to "disturb religious worship" meant to derange its quiet and order. Lancaster v. State, 53 Ala. 398, 399, 25 Am. Rep. 625.

The cracking and eating of nuts during religious services, thereby disturbing members of the congregation, may constitute a "disturbing religious worship" within Pen. Code, art. 284 (Acts 1874, p. 43). Hunt v. State, 3 Tex. App. 116, 30 Am. Rep. 126.

The announcement, to a congregation assembled for public worship, by a third person, that defendant was engaged in a fight near the church, which had the effect of stopping the service temporarily, such fight occurring at such a distance that the congregation, while in the church, could not hear it, is not "disturbing public worship" within the North Carolina statute. State v. Kirby, 12 S. E. 1045, 108 N. C. 772.

Rev. Code, § 8612, providing that "any person who willfully interrupts or disturbs any assemblage of people met for religious worship, by noise, profane discourse, rude or indecent behavior, or any other act, at or near the place of worship, must on conviction be fined," etc., requires not only that there shall be an actual interruption or disturbance as described in the Code, but that such interruption or disturbance shall be "willfully" made by the person or persons accused. The offense may be committed without necessarily stopping or hindering the progress of a worshiping assembly in effecting the objects and purposes for which such assembly was met together. Brown v. State, 46 Ala. 175, 183.

Where one having a paper title to land on which a church stands asserts a claim to the building, and locks up the same to exclude the entrance of the congregation claiming adversely to him, he is not guilty of a "disturbance of religious worship" under a statute punishing such offense. Davis v. State (Miss.) 16 South. 377.

A "disturbance" of a religious congregation, within the meaning of a statute prohibiting such act, is shown by the fact that defendant entered a church with a large stick in his hand, and afterward went outside and used profane language in a tone of voice loud enough to be heard over the church, which disturbed certain persons, though not shown to have disturbed the entire congregation. McElroy v. State, 25 Tex. 507, 509.

A congregation of persons which had just been lawfully assembled under a bush arbor for divine worship could, in legal contemplation, be "disturbed" by such acts as are specified in Pen. Code, § 418, although the persons composing the congregation may have been dismissed from the arbor, but remained assembled around it for the purpose of attending to their animals and preparing and eating their own dinners. Minter v. State, 30 S. E. 989, 991, 104 Ga. 743.

DITCH.

The words "ditch" and "drain" have no technical or exact meaning. They both mean a hollow space in the ground, natural or artificial, where water is collected or passes off. Wetmore v. Fiske, 5 Atl. 375, 378, 15 R. I. 354 (citing Goldthwait v. Inhabitants of East Bridgewater, 71 Mass. [5 Gray] 61, 64).

As building.

See "Building (In Lien Laws)."

As drain.

See "Drain."

As fence.

See "Fence."

As water course.

See "Water Course."

Sewer distinguished.

The distinction between "ditches" and "sewers" is that ditches are drains which are or may be open, and so arranged as to take surface water, while sewers are closed or covered waterways. State Board of Health v. Jersey City, 35 Atl. 835, 838, 55 N. J. Eq. 116.

DITTO.

"Ditto" marks are to be read as a repetition of what appears on the line above them, and are as much a part of the English language as are punctuation marks, such as the comma, semicolon, colon, and period, etc. They are often given an important, and sometimes a controlling, part in the construction of general writings, and in the interpretation of legal documents and statutes and constitutions. Being regarded as a part of the language, the court will, of course, take judicial notice of their meaning. Hughes v. Powers, 42 S. W. 1, 2, 99 Tenn. 480.

"Ditto" marks are generally understood to mean "the same as above." A statute requiring the index to a judgment record to contain the names of the plaintiff and defendant is satisfied, where the same party has been defendant in several actions, by the writing of his name once as defendant in the action first indexed, and the using of ditto marks in place of his name in the titles to the other actions. New England Loan & Trust Co. v. Avery (Tex.) 41 S. W. 673, 675.

Where articles of association were subscribed as follows:

Subscribers' Names.	Place of Residence.	No. of Shares Taken.
N. R. Lindsay.....	Howard County, Ind.	10
Mathew W. Miller..	" "	5

—The double commas are by common usage equivalent to the repetition of the words "Howard County, Indiana." Miller v. Wild Cat Gravel Road Co., 52 Ind. 51, 59.

The use of a double comma following the name of the subscriber to articles of association, under the name of the specified locality, sufficiently designates such subscriber's residence. Steinmetz v. Versailles & O. Turnpike Co., 57 Ind. 457, 460.

DIV.

"Div.," as used in a notice to the "Chicago W. Div. R. R. Co.," will be understood as an abbreviation of the word "division," where sent to the Chicago West Division

Railway Company. West Chicago St. R. Co. v. People, 40 N. E. 599, 600, 155 Ill. 299.

DIVE.

The term "dive," as in popular use, designates a place of infamous resort. Gartenstein & Sindel's License, 15 Pa. Co. Ct. R., 612, 614.

DIVERS.

"Divers" is a term which may be used in an indictment charging the stealing of various articles of one kind for the purpose of describing the property, and when the word "divers" is so used it is sufficient, without stating any specific number of the articles stolen. Commonwealth v. Butta, 124 Mass. 449, 452.

The phrase "divers days and times," in an indictment charging the commission of an offense on the day now last past, and on divers days and times before and since that day, may be rejected as surplusage if the offense be but a single offense. United States v. La Coste (U. S.) 26 Fed. Cas. 826, 829.

"Divers times," as used in Rev. Laws, § 3859, providing the form of information for selling intoxicating liquors contrary to law, providing that it shall read that a certain person on a certain day, at a certain place, did at divers times furnish or give away liquor, notifies the defendant that he may be called upon to meet more than one offense committed in one of the ways named. State v. Hodgson, 28 Atl. 1089, 1094, 66 Vt. 134.

"Divers persons," as used in an allegation in a slander suit that the words had been spoken in the presence and hearing of divers good and worthy persons, means in the presence of one or more persons. Harris v. Zanone, 28 Pac. 845, 847, 93 Cal. 59.

As all.

In a submission to arbitration of sundry controversies touching the division fence between the farms of the parties, and touching "divers other matters," such words are operative, and equivalent to a general submission of all questions of controversy between the parties. They are used as forming an independent part of the submission, and it is impossible not to perceive that the parties intended by them to embrace different and more general matter than that which had already been specified. Munro v. Alaire (N. Y.) 2 Caines, 320, 326.

DIVERSION.

Of attention.

"Diversion of attention," when used in reference to the law of negligence, has been adopted to express conditions under which the watchfulness of one traveling on a sidewalk might be relaxed consistently with ordinary care, and hence is obviously inapplicable to the duty of vigilance resting on one about to cross a railway track, which is not, like a city sidewalk, an assurance of probable safety, but, on the contrary, a proclamation of peril. Guhl v. Whitcomb, 85 N. W. 142, 144, 109 Wis. 69, 83 Am. St. Rep. 889.

Of a note.

"Diversion" means the turning aside or altering the natural course of a thing. Thus the "diversion" of an accommodation note is any use other than that intended, and a note is "diverted" when not returned on the execution of a renewal note. Ives v. Jacobs, 1 N. Y. Supp. 330, 331, 21 Abb. N. C. 151.

Of water.

"Diversion," as applied to a water course, means a turning aside or altering the natural course of the stream. The term is chiefly used in law to mean the unauthorized changing of the course of a stream to the prejudice of a lower proprietor. Merritt v. Parker, 1 N. J. Law (Coxe) 460, 463; Parker v. Griswold, 17 Conn. 288, 299, 42 Am. Dec. 739.

DIVIDE.

See "Lawfully Divided."

Divided or otherwise, see "Otherwise."

The words "divided among them," in a will in which testator devises certain real estate between his wife and children, to be divided among them according to law, is simply declaratory, not of the quantity of the estate conveyed, but how the devisees shall hold it, to wit, in severalty, the partition to be made in the mode prescribed by law. Pruden v. Paxton, 79 N. C. 446, 448, 28 Am. Rep. 333.

Where some of the legacies of a will were specific and some general, a direction that the executors should divide the land, negroes, etc., "to be given off in the order herein named," was not sufficient to change the specific to general legacies. The word "divide" was not used to indicate the intention that the legacies were to be paid in specie out of the money and property, but to designate the duty to appropriate the assets of the estate to the accomplishment of the testator's purpose. Gilmer's Legatees v. Gilmer's Ex'rs, 42 Ala. 9, 16.

As applying to realty.

The term "divided equally," in a direction in a will that testator's estate is to be divided equally, is alike applicable to real and personal property, and may very appro-privately be used in reference to both. Pennfield v. Tower, 46 N. W. 413, 417, 1 N. D. 218.

The general expression "divide and pay" as used in a will giving a life estate to a certain person, and directing the executor, from and after the death of the life tenant, to divide and pay over the corpus of the trust estate to certain others, per se includes real and personal estate. Land as well as personalty may be the subject of division in kind. Seeds v. Burk, 37 Atl. 511, 513, 181 Pa. 281.

As creating tenancy in common.

The words "divided between," in a will directing that certain real estate be divided between certain beneficiaries, operates to create an estate in common in the beneficiaries. Walker v. Dewing, 25 Mass. (8 Pick.) 520, 521.

The words "divided equally between them," in a will devising property to certain beneficiaries, to be divided between them, import the granting of an estate in common, and not a joint estate. Sturm v. Sawyer, 2 Pa. Super. Ct. 254, 257; Weir v. Tate, 39 N. C. 264, 276; Griswold v. Johnson, 5 Conn. 363, 366; Emerson v. Cutler, 31 Mass. (14 Pick.) 108, 114.

As change boundary.

"Divide" means to make something into smaller parts, and not to enlarge, and hence the provisions of the Constitution of New York giving the Legislature power to divide counties and to erect new counties does not authorize it to change the boundary lines of counties. In re McGinness' Estate, 35 N. Y. Supp. 820, 823, 13 Misc. Rep. 714.

As devise.

Where a testator devises property to his wife and children, and afterward executes a codicil directing his executor to have all his property divided between the wife and children, the word "divide" will not be construed as being equivalent to "devise," and will only authorize a change in the division of that portion of the estate devised by the will to the wife and children. Boyd v. Boyd (U. S.) 2 Fed. 138, 145.

As divide equally.

"Divide," as used in a will directing the residue of the personal estate to be divided for personal charitable purposes, does not necessarily imply equality of division. Mills v. Farmer, 1 Mer. 54, 102.

As distribute.

The word "divided," in a will, held to mean "distributed." Duffield v. Morris (Pa.) 8 Watts & S. 348, 349.

As implying joint interest.

Where two parties are engaged in running an ice wagon, one of whom runs the business and divides with the other any portion of the returns of the business, "divide" will not be held to convey the idea that both were jointly interested, but is entirely consistent with the idea of payment for service. McCormack v. Nassau Electric R. Co., 44 N. Y. Supp. 684, 686, 16 App. Div. 24.

DIVIDE (noun).

A "divide," when used with reference to the flow of water, is an elevation of land or other obstruction by which the natural flow of water is arrested and the water caused to flow in different directions. Anderson v. Henderson, 16 N. E. 232, 235, 124 Ill. 164.

DIVIDED REPUTATION.

When the courts use the term "divided reputation" with reference to the fact that there is a divided reputation in a community as to the question whether or not persons are married, it is not meant that an individual can have such a thing as two opposite general reputations at the same time. A condition of that sort is an impossibility. A reputation cannot be general if it is not general, and no reputation of a marriage but a general reputation is competent evidence to establish marriage. Jackson v. Jackson, 83 Atl. 317, 320, 82 Md. 17, 84 L. R. A. 773.

DIVIDING LINE.

A "dividing line," asserted as having been agreed on and recognized by the adjoining owners, must have been acquiesced in by them with knowledge of the facts of its situation and marking; but it need not appear that they knew of the terms, or even existence, of the distribution which first divided their land. Rathbun v. Geer, 80 Atl. 60, 61, 64 Conn. 421.

DIVIDEND.

See "Preferred Dividend"; "Stock Dividend."

"Dividend," both in common and legal parlance, is "a portion of the principal or profits divided among the several owners of a thing." Bouv. Law Dict. Webster defines it as "a part or a share." In speaking of it in connection with moneyed corporations, we always understand it to be the share or profit going to each holder of stock. Commonwealth v. Erie & P. R. Co. (Pa.) 10 Phila. 465, 466.

"Dividend," when applied to incorporated companies, means that amount which is set aside and designated, by the managers of the company, from its property to be divided among its members. State v. Comptroller of State of New Jersey, 23 Atl. 122, 54 N. J. Law (25 Vroom) 135.

The word "dividends," ex vi termini, imports a distribution of the funds of a corporation among its members, pursuant to a vote of the directors or managers. Williston v. Michigan, S. & N. L. R. Co., 95 Mass. (13 Allen) 400, 404.

A duebill payable from the first "dividends" declared by a certain company is payable out of the maker's share of the assets of such company on its dissolution without declaring a dividend. "There may be dividends out of profits, and there may be dividends out of insolvent estates. The one is as much a dividend as the other." Cozad v. McKee, 18 Atl. 618, 130 Pa. 406.

Act June 1, 1889, § 21, provides that if the dividends made or declared by a corporation during any year amount to more than 6 per cent. on the par value of the stock, the corporation shall be taxed, etc. Held, that where a certain corporation saved a certain amount of money during the tax year from rents and the sale of real estate, and divided the sum amongst the stockholders, the money so divided constituted a "dividend" within the meaning of the term as above used. Commonwealth v. Land & Imp. Co., 26 Atl. 1034, 156 Pa. 455.

A "dividend," as applied to mutual life insurance companies, is "a distribution of existing overpayments, resulting mainly from savings on the annual cost of insurance and expenses of management, and in part from savings on the future cost of insurance; that is, the net gain from lapsed policies." Fuller v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 41 Atl. 4-11, 70 Conn. 647.

As capital.

A "dividend" is not capital, but the product of capital; and it is this product which the law taxes by a provision imposing a tax on the capital stock of companies at the rate of one-half mill for every one per cent. dividend made or declared by the company. Commonwealth v. Pittsburg, Ft. W. & C. R. Co., 74 Pa. (24 P. F. Smith) 83, 90.

Distributive shares synonymous.

"Dividends" is a word of very general and indefinite meaning. It has not in law any particular and technical signification. As used in Const. art. 9, § 6, appropriating to the university all the property accruing to the state from escheats, unclaimed dividends, or distributive shares of the estates of deceased persons, it is synonymous with "distributive shares," and used as a convertible term meaning the same thing, to wit, "dividends or distributive shares of estates of deceased persons." Trustees of University v. North Carolina R. Co., 76 N. C. 103, 105, 22 Am. Rep. 671.

As division from any source.

A "dividend" is a sum of money distributed pro rata among the stockholders of a corporation or company, without reference to the source from which it was taken or paid. Osgood v. Laytin (N. Y.) 5 Abb. Prac. (N. S.) 1, 9. The term was so used in an act providing for the incorporation of insurance companies, section 20, as amended in 1857 (4 Edm. Rev. St. p. 210), providing that no "dividend" shall ever be made by any company incorporated under this act when its capital stock is impaired, or when the making of such dividend will have the effect of impairing its capital stock. Osgood v. Laytin (N. Y.) 37 How. Pract. 63, 65, *42 N. Y. (3 Keyes) 521, 523.

As division of profits.

The term "dividend" ordinarily means the profits of a corporation apportioned among shareholders. Fitzgerald v. Fitzgerald & Mallory Const. Co., 59 N. W. 838, 855, 41 Neb. 374; Taft v. Hartford, P. & F. R. Co., 8 R. I. 310, 333, 5 Am. Rep. 575; City of Allegheny v. Pittsburgh, A. & M. Pass. R. Co., 39 Wkly. Notes Cas. 366, 368, 36 Atl. 161, 179 Pa. 414.

A "dividend" is defined as a corporate profit set aside, declared, and ordered by the directors to be paid to the stockholders on demand or at a fixed time. De Koven v. Alsop, 68 N. E. 930, 931, 205 Ill. 309, 63 L. R. A. 587; Parks v. Automatic Bank Punch Co., 14 N. Y. St. Rep. 710, 711.

"Dividends" mean proportionate shares of the profits earned by the capital stock of a concern. When we speak of a "dividend-paying stock," we characterize the whole capital stock, and express its quality. Struthers v. Clark, 30 Pa. (6 Casey) 210, 213.

"Dividend," as used in reference to corporate stocks, has a technical but well-understood meaning, and indicates corporate funds, derived from the business and earnings of the corporation, appropriated by a corporate act to the use of and to be divided among the stockholders. Hyatt v. Allen, 56 N. Y. 553, 556, 15 Am. Rep. 449.

Testator devised a sum in trust for his daughters, and directed the trustees to invest it in stocks, and to pay the dividends as they should be received to the daughters from time to time. Held, that the word "dividends" as used in the will meant all distributions to corporators of the profits of the corporation, whether such distributions were large or small, or whether made at long or short intervals, and without any regard to the manner or place of their declaration or payment. Clarkson v. Clarkson (N. Y.) 18 Barb. 646, 657.

"Dividends," as used in Act Cong. 1864, as amended in 1866, imposing a tax on all dividends thereafter declared due, wherever and whenever the same should be payable to depositors as part of the earnings, income, or gain of any savings institution, should be construed to include the division of profits among the several contributors, according to the manner of their contributions, arising from the interest received for the loans of the depositors, all of which were placed in a common fund, instead of being paid to the depositor after deducting a charge to cover expenses. Cary v. San Francisco Savings Union, 89 U. S. (22 Wall.) 38, 41, 22 L. Ed. 779.

Within the meaning of the charter, providing that stockholders of a railroad company shall be entitled to 6 per cent. dividends from earnings, and shall never be entitled to greater dividends, "dividends" is used in its ordinary sense, as a description of divided profits and gains arising from the use and management of the capital. As said in Rorer, R. R. 188: "Dividends are of the earnings or product of the road, and not of, nor can be of, corporate capital." On a proper occasion there may be a dividend of capital, but in the charter above there is no agreement that on partition the whole of it that is divided shall go to one class of its owners. Jones v. Concord & M. R. R., 38 Atl. 120, 125, 67 N. H. 119.

A "dividend" is a fund which a corporation sets apart from its profits to be divided among its members. A "dividend" is a corporate profit set aside, declared, and ordered by the proper corporate authorities to be paid to the stockholders on demand or at a fixed time. A dividend becomes the property of the shareholder, and the shareholder acquires his legal right thereto, only when it is regularly declared. State v. Bank of Commerce, 31 S. W. 993, 998, 95 Tenn. (11 Pickle) 221.

The term "dividend," as used in the statute providing that no tax shall ever be laid on said railroad which will reduce the dividends below 8 per cent., has reference to dividends on the capital stock held and owned by the shareholders, and, in its technical as well as in its ordinary acceptation, means that portion of its profits which the corporation, by its directory, sets apart for ratable division among its shareholders; and hence the provision of such statute is not void for indefiniteness. Mobile & O. R. Co. v. Tennessee, 14 Sup. Ct. 968, 971, 153 U. S. 486, 38 L. Ed. 793.

"A 'dividend' to the stockholders of a corporation, when spoken of in reference to an existing organization engaged in the transaction of business, and not of one being closed up and dissolved, is always, so far as we are aware, understood as a fund which the corporation sets apart from its profits to be divided among its members. A 'dividend' among preferred stockholders inclusively is understood to imply that the sum divided has been realized as profits, though the earnings did not yield a dividend to the stockholders in general." Lockhart v. Van Alstyne, 31 Mich. 76, 79, 18 Am. Rep. 156.

Act April 18, 1884, providing incorporated companies are liable to a franchise tax at a percentage calculated, first, upon gross receipts, and, second, upon "dividends earned or declared" during the specified year, refers to those profits of the company which have been divided, or those which ought to have been divided. State v. Comptroller of State of New Jersey, 23 Atl. 122, 123, 54 N. J. Law (25 Vroom) 135.

As income or interest.

"Dividend," as used with reference to corporate stock, is synonymous with "income" and "interest," and hence, where dividends were bequeathed to a tenant for life, the bequest must be construed to vest in such tenant the income, and the income only, of the shares included in the bequest owned by the testator at the time of his death, and that the capital of the shares bequeathed should go to the remaindermen as legatees in remainder. Gibbons v. Mahon, 10 Sup. Ct. 1057, 1062, 136 U. S. 549, 34 L. Ed. 525.

The "dividends" of a copartnership of which a decedent was a member, and which continued after his death, do not constitute a part of the corpus of his estate, any more than interest money constitutes a portion of the principal invested, but go as income to the life tenant of his estate. It has been held that the words "dividends" and "income," used in a will bequeathing stock, mean the same thing. Heighe v. Little, 63 Md. 301, 305, 52 Am. Rep. 510.

"Dividends," as used in Act March 25, 1870, authorizing manufacturing corporations to issue and dispose of preferred stock, and to guaranty the holders of such stock semi-annual dividends not exceeding a certain amount, should be construed to mean "interest." Burt v. Rattle, 31 Ohio St. 116, 128.

As payable in money.

The term "dividend" is usually used to denominate the profits in a corporation or other form of commercial partnership which may be reasonably set apart, and is in fact set apart, by the management as the separate part of the shareholders. The word "dividends," if unqualified, signifies dividends payable in money. Spooner v. Phillips, 24 Atl. 524, 525, 62 Conn. 62, 16 L. R. A. 461.

"The word 'dividend,' if unqualified," said the Supreme Court of Errors of Connecticut, "signifies dividends payable in money." The words "dividends and income," in a will devising property in trust, the dividends and income thereof to be paid to his daughter, with remainder over after her death, do not include the increase in the value of the corpus caused by the investment of the funds and stocks, and their sale and investment in other stocks at a profit. Smith v. Hooper, 51 Atl. 844, 846, 95 Md. 16.

It is a matter of no difference whether a dividend is declared in stock, or paid in cash and thereafter converted into stock by the shareholders. In either event it is a distribution of the surplus profits of the corporation. Rose v. Barclay, 43 Atl. 385, 386, 191 Pa. 594, 45 L. R. A. 392.

Profits distinguished.

As defined by Webster, a "dividend" is "the share of a sum divided that falls to each individual; a distributive sum, share, or percentage applied to the profits as apportioned among stockholders." It differs from "profits" in being taken by a competent authority out of the joint property of the partnership or company and transferred to the separate property of the individual partners or stockholders. No safely conducted business, corporate or other, distributes all its earned profits. There must be a fund reserved for contingencies, for repair or renewal of deteriorated material, etc., and the amount, absolute or proportionate, to be held for such purpose, must be determined by the authority which conducts the business. The power to control this matter is necessarily implied in all authority to make dividends, and in the present case it is expressly vested in the directors, who are to declare such dividends as "shall appear advisable" to them, not exceeding net profits, so that the words "dividends declared," as used in a charter of a street railway company requiring it to pay to a city a tax on the dividends declared, which by another provision were to be such as should appear advisable to the directors, not exceeding the net earnings, a lease of the property of a company to a new corporation for a nominal rental, and the exchange by the stockholders of all its stock for stock in the new corporation, have a substantial and settled meaning; and it is upon such dividends only, and not on par or market value of stock, or on profits earned, that the tax is laid. City of Allegheny v. Pittsburgh, A. & M. P. Ry. Co., 36 Atl. 161, 179 Pa. 414.

DIVIDEND (In Bankruptcy).

Sums to be paid as "dividends," on which referees and trustees are allowed commissions by Bankr. Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, §§ 40a, 48a, 30 Stat. 556, 557 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, pp. 3436, 3439], are what remains after payment of taxes and prior claims in full, section 65a (30 Stat. 563 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3448]), providing that dividends shall be paid on all allowed claims except such as have priority or are secured. In re Mammoth Pine Lumber Co. (U. S.) 116 Fed. 731, 735.

The term "dividends," as used in section 65 of the bankruptcy act (Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, 30 Stat. 563 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3448]), which provides that dividends of an equal per centum shall be declared and paid on all allowed claims except such as have priority or are secured, means the aliquot portion of the bankrupt estate which was to be divided proportionally among the creditors after the payment of such claims as were entitled to priority by the act, and which were to be paid in full. In re Goldville Mfg. Co. (U. S.) 123 Fed. 579, 587.

The word "dividend," as used in Bankr. Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, § 65a, 30 Stat. 563 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3448], does not include payments made by a trustee from funds collected by him on claims entitled to priority under section 64b (30 Stat. 563 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3447]); therefore such trustee is not entitled to commission. In re Sabine (U. S.) 1 Am. Bankr. R. 322, 326.

Payments to secured creditors.

"Dividends," as used in the bankruptcy act (Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, 30 Stat. 544 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3418]), allowing the referee and trustee certain commissions on dividends paid by the state, sums paid to mortgagees from the proceeds of the mortgaged property on its sale by order of the court of bankruptcy are not dividends. In re Utt, 105 Fed. 754, 758, 45 C. C. A. 32.

The word "dividends," as used in a bankruptcy act providing that the referee shall receive a commission on dividends paid, does not include partial payments made on claims of secured creditors. A "dividend," within the meaning of the law, is declared and paid on unsecured claims only. In re Ft. Wayne Electric Corp. (U. S.) 94 Fed. 109, 110.

Both in common and legal parlance the term "dividend" implies a portion of a fund divided among several others. Bouvier defines it primarily as a portion of the principal or profit divided among several owners of a thing. Black defines it as a fund to be divided. In bankruptcy or insolvency practice a "dividend" is a proportional payment to the creditors out of the insolvent estate. These definitions carry with them the idea of the division of a fund owned by several parties, and the "dividend" is the aliquot portion of the estate of the common owners. So that under Bankr. Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, 30 Stat. 544 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3418], providing that referees and trustees in bankruptcy shall be entitled to commission on sums received as "dividends," they are not entitled to commissions on disbursements made in payment to creditors who are entitled to priority of payment and to full satisfaction before distribution to general creditors begins. In re Fielding (U. S.) 96 Fed. 800, 801.

The word "dividend" is a business term applied to the division among stockholders of a fund arising from the profits, or to the division among creditors of an insolvent of the fund arising from the assets of the insolvent's estate. In either case it is the fund that is divided and parceled out among those who are entitled to a part of the fund so allotted to a stockholder as his dividend. A "dividend," in bankruptcy, is a parcel of the fund arising from the assets of an estate rightfully allotted to a creditor entitled to a share of the fund, whether in the same proportion with other creditors or in a different proportion, and thus includes payments on secured claims. In re Barber (U. S.) 97 Fed. 547, 550.

Bankr. Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, §§ 40, 48a, 30 Stat. 556, 557 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, pp. 3436, 3439], prior to its amendment, provided that referees should be entitled, as compensation, to a fee of $10, and to 1 per cent. commissions on sums to be paid "as dividends and commissions," or one-half of 1 per cent. on the amount to be paid to creditors on confirmation of a compensation. Section 48a declared that trustees should be entitled to receive a fee of $5, and such commissions on sums to be paid as dividends and commissions as should be allowed by the courts, etc. Held, that the word "dividends" included only such sums as were paid to creditors who had provable and allowed claims, and did not include sums paid by the trustee to satisfy fixed liens on real estate sold by him, though the property was sold free of all incumbrances, and the trustee paid such liens from the proceeds of the sale. In re Hinckel Brewing Co. (U. S.) 124 Fed. 702, 703.

DIVIDEND IN SCRIP.

"Dividends in scrip," as used in Internal Revenue Act June 30, 1864, declaring that any railroad company which may have declared any dividends in scrip or money due and payable to its stockholders as part of the earnings, dividends, income, or gains of such company, carried to the account of any fund or used for the construction, should be subject to a tax on the amount of such dividends or profits, should be construed to include certificates, issued to stockholders of the company, declaring on their face that such stockholder was entitled to 80 per cent. of the amount of the capital stock held by him, payable, ratably with the other certificates issued at the option of the company, out of their future earnings, which were issued as evidence to the stockholders that an equal amount of the earnings of the company beyond the current expenses had been expended for the objects stated in the preamble of the certificates, and to show that the respective stockholders were entitled to reimbursement of such expenditure at some convenient future period. Bailey v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co., 89 U. S. (22 Wall.) 604, 629, 22 L. Ed. 840.

DIVINE LAW.

"Divine laws," as distinguished from human laws, are those whose authorship is ascribed to God, and are of two kinds—natural laws and positive laws, or revealed laws. Borden v. State, 11 Ark. (6 Eng.) 519, 527, 44 Am. Dec. 217.

"Revealed" or "divine" laws are those laws which are revealed from God, and are to be found only in the Holy Scriptures, and on comparison are found to be really a part of the original law of nature, as they tend in all their consequences to man's felicity. Mayer v. Frobe, 22 S. E. 58, 61, 40 W. Va 246.

DIVINE SERVICE.

Where an agreement was made between two churches using the same building that its use was to be restricted to divine service, and, by a common understanding between both congregations, no other meetings were to be held in it, and at the time of the agreement no other meetings were held in the church except preaching services, the term "divine service" is to be restricted to that meaning in the agreement, and would not include a Sunday school. In re Gass' Appeal, 73 Pa. (23 P. F. Smith) 39, 46, 13 Am. Rep. 728.

Where a canon of the church provided that notice of the election of vestrymen shall be given during divine service on the Sunday previous to the election, "divine service" will be understood to mean the regular divine service commencing at 11 a. m., where the custom is to commence at that time, and not to include a service beginning at 9 a. m., no other or different time having been assigned or fixed for such services on that day. Dahv v. Palache, 9 Pac. 94, 97, 68 Cal. 248.

DIVISIBLE CONTRACT.

A "divisible contract" is one in its nature and purposes susceptible of division and apportionment, having two or more parts in respect to matters and things contemplated and embraced by it, not necessarily dependent upon each other, nor intended by the parties to be so. Horseman v. Horseman, 72 Pac. 698, 702, 43 Or. 83; Potter v. Potter, 72 Pac. 702, 704, 43 Or. 149.

DIVISION.

See "Political Division."

"Division" is the separation of an entire body into parts. Inhabitants of Starks v. Inhabitants of New Sharon, 39 Me. 368, 372.

The words "division" and "schism," as used in Rev. St. c. 14, § 3, which provides that, in case a division or schism shall take place in a religious society, the trustees shall permit each party to use the church and appurtenances for divine worship a part of the time, import no more than a separation of the society into two parts, without any change of faith or ulterior relations. McKinney v. Griggs, 68 Ky. (5 Bush) 401, 414, 96 Am. Dec. 360.

The term "division," as used in an act of Parliament directing that a moiety of the penalty prescribed therein should be paid to the treasurer of the county, riding, or division where the offense is committed, does not mean a division not known in the law, but capriciously adopted in particular counties. There are legal divisions which satisfy and directly apply to each of these words. "County" applies to every county in the kingdom except two, "riding" to Yorkshire, and "division" to Lincolnshire, where there are three divisions and three separate commissions of the peace, three quarter sessions, and three distinct rates. The word "division," as used in the act, does not mean one of these three divisions. Evans v. Stevens, 4 Term R. 459, 462.

Of inheritance.

A "division of inheritance" is the distribution of the property inherited among the heirs, giving to each the portion he is entitled to according to the will of the deceased or in the manner prescribed by law. Comp. Laws N. M. 1897, § 2027.

Of mankind.

Writers on ethnology and anthropology base their division of mankind upon differences in physical rather than in intellectual or moral character, so that difference in color, conformation of skull, structure and arrangement of hair, and the general contour of the face, are the marks which distinguish the various types. But, of all these marks, the color of the skin is considered the most important criterion for the distinction of race, and it lies at the foundation of the classification which scientists have adopted. Blumenbach, in 1781, divided mankind into five principal types—the Caucasian, or white; Mongolian, or yellow; Ethiopian, or black; American, or red; and Malay, or brown. Cuvier simplified this classification into Caucasian, Mongol, and Negro, or white, yellow, and black races. Other writers make a still larger number of distinct races. It is said that Prof. Huxley's division of mankind is the most satisfactory. He distinguishes four principal types, and he points out the marked physical characteristics of each. These types are the Australoid (chocolate brown), Negroid (brown black), Mongoloid (yellow), and Xanthochroic (fair whites). To these he adds a fifth variety, the Melanchroic (dark whites). The "fair whites" are the type of the prevalent inhabitants of Northern Europe, and the "dark whites" of Southern Europe. All these physical differences do not exist in the case of each individual, and "innumerable varieties of mankind run into one another by insensible degrees"; but taking the race or type as a whole, their peculiarities are sufficiently distinct to form the basis of well-recognized classification. Enc. Brit. tit. "Anthropology." So it was held that a native of Japan was not entitled to naturalization as being included in the term "white persons." In re Saito (U. S.) 62 Fed. 126, 127.

Of national guard.

The word "division," as used in the section relating to the national guard, in connection with the naval militia, shall have the same meaning and effect as "company" when used in connection with the infantry. Pol. Code Cal. 1903, § 1912.

Of a town.

"Division" means the separation of an entire body into parts, and does not include the idea of preservation of any previous organization, form, or shape; and, with relation to the division of any town, it does not mean that to be a "division" of a town there shall necessarily be produced two or more towns composed of the same territory which formed the original town. If one part of a town were incorporated into a plantation and the other part were left without it, there would be a "division." It would not be necessary, to constitute a "division," that the two or more parts should have any political organization, if their respective parts were otherwise designated. It is not incorrect to speak of a town as "divided," when it has been separated into two parts, because one of them was left without organization and the other was united to another town; and hence, where a portion of a town was set off therefrom and annexed to and made a part of another town, and the incorporation of the residue of the first town was repealed.

there was a "division" of the first town, which gave paupers who had a settlement in the portion of the first town so set off and annexed to another a settlement in the town to which it was annexed. Inhabitants of Livermore v. Inhabitants of Phillips, 35 Me. 184, 188.

The vacation of a town and attachment of all its territory to several other organized towns is not a "division" of the town, within the meaning of Rev. St. § 671. State v. Wood County Sup'rs, 21 N. W. 55, 56, 61 Wis. 278.

DIVISION FENCE.

"Division or partition fence," as used in Code 1873, § 1498, declaring that when land which has lain uninclosed is inclosed the owner shall pay for one-half of each division or partition fence between his lands and the adjoining lands, etc., means a fence used as a partition between farms, whether on the exact boundary line or not, the purpose of the act not being to fix boundaries, but to provide an obligation for payment for division fences. Card v. Dale, 25 N. W. 774, 67 Iowa, 552.

DIVISION WALL.

The term "party wall" is usually applied to such walls as are built partly on the land of another for the common benefit of both in supporting timbers used in construction of contiguous buildings, and a division wall may become a party wall by agreement, either actual or presumed; and although such wall may have been built exclusively upon the land of one, if it has been used and enjoyed in common by the owners of both houses for a period of 20 years, the law will presume, in the absence of evidence showing that such use and enjoyment were permissive, that the wall is a party wall. In such cases the law presumes an agreement between the adjacent owners that the wall shall be held and enjoyed as the common property of both. Barry v. Edlavitch, 35 Atl. 170, 171, 84 Md. 95, 33 L. R. A. 294.

DIVORCE.

The purpose and effect of a decree of divorce from the bond of matrimony by a court of competent jurisdiction are to change the existing status or domestic relation of husband and wife, and to free them both from the bond. The marriage tie, when thus severed as to one party, ceased to bind either. Atherton v. Atherton, 21 Sup. Ct. 544, 547, 181 U. S. 155, 45 L. Ed. 794.

A decree that the plaintiff be "divorced" from the defendant imports a dissolution, in the largest sense, of the marriage relation between the parties. It means a divorce from the bonds of matrimony, and not merely from bed and board. The term is not answered by a divorce in part or to a limited extent only, but calls for a complete severance of the tie by which the parties were united. Miller v. Miller, 33 Cal. 353, 355.

Divorce is a remedy provided for an innocent party, and hence, if both parties have a right to a divorce, neither has. Alexander v. Alexander, 140 Ind. 555, 559, 38 N. E. 855.

In America, a "divorce" is commonly taken to mean an absolute severing of the bonds of matrimony, and not merely a separation from bed and board. No ecclesiastical court ever took cognizance of such cases. Parliament alone in England could grant absolute divorces. In most of the states of the Union divorce is classed among suits at law, and tried by jury, and in others it is considered a proceeding in chancery. And generally it has not been assumed by the courts except upon statutory authority, or for causes arising prior to marriage when there was no statute. Cast v. Cast, 1 Utah, 112, 124, 125.

Decree of nullity.

A divorce is a vacation of the marriage contract for a sufficient cause, and is conclusive evidence that the marital rights have once existed. A decree of nullity of a marriage simply discloses that a valid marriage contract never existed, and differs from a divorce, which is the vacation of the marriage contract for sufficient cause. Town of Reading v. Town of Ludlow, 43 Vt. 628, 632, 633.

The term "divorce" cannot, strictly speaking, be applied to a decree declaring an attempted marriage, which was absolutely void, to be null and void, as the word "divorce" implies a dissolution of, and does by its terms dissolve, a valid existing contract. Rooney v. Rooney, 34 Atl. 682, 686, 54 N. J. Eq. 231.

While the term "divorce" is not properly applicable to a decree of nullity, yet such a decree is often called a "divorce." 1 Bish. Mar. & Div. (Ed. 1881) § 166. In 2 Bish. Mar. & Div. (Ed. 1891) it is said: "Not infrequently the judicial declaration of nullity is called a 'divorce.' It is properly so where the marriage it declares void is only voidable. For example, it is common and correct language to speak of impotency as a cause for divorce, and Blackstone writes that 'divorce a vinculo matrimonii must be for some canonical cause of impediment.' But the expression 'sentence' or 'decree of nullity' equally well indicates the legal avoidance of voidable marriage, and it seems more significant and less liable to be misunderstood than the other, and somewhat better in accord with modern usage." Henneger v. Lomas, 44 N. E. 462, 465, 145 Ind. 287, 32 L. R. A. 848.

As judicial act.

A divorce is not a legislative, but is a judicial, act, and hence Rev. St. U. S. § 85, providing that the legislative power of every territory shall extend to all original subjects of legislation not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States, does not authorize an act of Legislature granting a private divorce. In re Higbee, 5 Pac. 693, 694, 4 Utah, 19.

Our Legislature is clothed with the simple power to enact laws and do some other things expressly authorized by the Constitution. Beyond this the Legislature has no power at all. To grant a divorce is not to enact a law; an expression of the will of the lawmaking power that the marriage relation is dissolved is no law. It is a decree, an order, a judgment, and not a law. A law is a rule, something permanent, uniform, and universal. A divorce begins with the parties and ends with the parties. It is a single act, and begins and expires with the performance of a single function. Bingham v. Miller, 17 Ohio, 445, 448, 49 Am. Dec. 471.

As prospective in effect.

A divorce, under the statute, for a cause arising after the marriage, puts an end to the marital relation, but does not relate back to the act of marriage and render it null. It recognizes the marriage as valid, and recognizes that rights arise out of it. It is prospective only in its effect. Doyle v. Rolwing, 65 S. W. 315, 316, 165 Mo. 231, 55 L. R. A. 332, 88 Am. St. Rep. 416.

DIVORCE A MENSA ET THORO.

A "divorce a mensa et thoro" does not dissolve the marriage relations between the parties; it grants a mere separation for the time, leaving all the other marital rights and obligations still subsisting between the parties as husband and wife. The husband is still bound for the support and maintenance of the wife; and the ecclesiastical courts, in decreeing such separation, and as incident thereto, decree to the wife alimony, or an allowance out of the husband's estate for her support and maintenance during the separation. Such a decree of separation may be terminated by a reconciliation of the parties. They may, in their own mutual discretion, reunite at pleasure; indeed, it is the policy of the common law that they should do so; and to that end the door is ever left open, while the parties are held firmly by the dissoluble matrimonial tie, as an inducement from necessity to a reconciliation. Miller v. Clark, 23 Ind. 370, 372.

A "divorce a mensa et thoro" is a mere separation of a married woman from the bed and board of her husband by a decree of a competent court—a qualified divorce. The term is used by courts, in discussing the subject, as convertible with "separation" or "limited divorce." Rudolph v. Rudolph, 12 N. Y. Supp. 81, 82, 19 Civ. Proc. R. 424.

A "divorce a mensa et thoro" is a qualified or partial divorce, by which the parties, while separated and forbidden to cohabit, remain married. The term presupposes a pre-existing valid marriage, and such a divorce is founded on some cause subsequent to the marriage. Zule v. Zule, 1 N. J. Eq. (Saxt.) 96, 99.

DIVORCE A VINCOLO.

A "divorce a vinculo" is a final winding up of the relation existing between man and wife. It is an absolute breaking of all marital ties. The chain which has bound the parties together is broken. De Roche v. De Roche (N. D.) 94 N. W. 767, 770.

In England "divorces a vinculo" were granted only for causes sufficient in ecclesiastical law to avoid the marriage ab initio. Aiken v. Suttle, 72 Tenn. (4 Lea) 103, 110. The parties were left, so far as their estates dependent on or arising out of the marriage were concerned, as though no marriage had occurred. Doyle v. Rolwing, 65 S. W. 315, 316, 165 Mo. 231, 55 L. R. A. 332, 88 Am. St. Rep. 416.

DIVORCE CASE.

Alimony as part of divorce proceedings, see "Alimony."

An action for a dissolution of the bonds of matrimony existing between parties is a "divorce case," within Rev. St. art. 996, prescribing that the judgment of the courts of civil appeals shall be conclusive on the law and facts in all divorce cases, and that no writ of error shall be allowed thereto from the Supreme Court, though it involves rights of property. The determination of the rights of property held in the name of either or both husband and wife is incidental to the dissolution of the bonds of matrimony existing between them. Kellett v. Kellett, 59 S. W. 809, 810, 94 Tex. 206.

"Divorce proceedings" are in the nature of session proceedings, and not subject to the ordinary rules of pleading and practice. Usually there are no pleadings except the libel, which is not required to conform to the common-law rules in regard to declarations. Hemenway v. Hemenway, 27 Atl. 609, 65 Vt. 623.

As an action or criminal proceeding.

See "Suit"; "Action"; "Criminal Proceeding"; "Civil Action—Case—Suit—Etc."

Nullity suit distinguished.

A "divorce suit" is a suit for the purpose of dissolving the marriage which the parties thereto had legal capacity to contract. The term cannot be accurately employed to designate a bill to annul a void marriage. Pyott v. Pyott, 61 N. E. 88, 91, 191 Ill. 280.

DIXIE LAND.

The term "Dixie Land" means "the slave or rebellious states," and evidence that a vessel was to make a voyage to "Dixie Land" is confirmatory of evidence that a voyage to states in rebellion and under blockade was intended. United States v. The William Arthur (U. S.) 28 Fed. Cas. 624, 626.

DO.

See, also, "Done."

A proviso for re-entry if the lessee should do, or cause to be done, anything in violation of his covenants, did not include an omission to repair. Abdy v. Stevens, 3 Barn. & Adol. 299, 303.

A notice that a claimant intends to claim, and "does claim, a lien" for building material, simply gives notice of a present claim, which is quite distinct from a notice that the claimant has begun to enforce the claim. Goff v. Hosmer, 37 Atl. 533, 534, 20 R. I. 91.

DO GRANT.

The words "do grant" in a deed indicate the vesting of a present fee-simple estate, the words being in the present tense, and importing, in grammar as well as daily language, present actual transfer. Lauck v. Logan, 31 S. E. 986, 988, 45 W. Va. 251.

The words "doth hereby grant," as used in Act April 14, 1872, providing that the state doth hereby grant certain lands under tide water to a certain city, import a grant in præsenti, and confer an immediate estate. Easton & A. R. Co. v. Central R. Co., 19 Atl. 722, 725, 52 N. J. Law (23 Vroom) 267 (citing Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. v. Smith, 76 U. S. [9 Wall.] 95, 19 L. Ed. 599; Schulenberg v. Harriman, 88 U. S. [21 Wall.] 44, 62, 22 L. Ed. 551; Leavenworth, L. & G. R. Co. v. United States, 92 U. S. 733, 741, 23 L. Ed. 634; Glasgow v. Hortic, 66 U. S. [1 Black] 595, 17 L. Ed. 110).

DO WHAT HE COULD.

Where an attorney was employed "to do what he could" to obtain a pardon for one confined in prison, it meant that the attorney should take such legal and proper steps as the law allows an attorney to perform, and it could not be construed to mean, or give rise to any assumption, that it was intended to employ the attorney to do any illegal act. Bremsen v. Engler, 49 N. Y. Super. Ct. (17 Jones & S.) 172, 176.

DO WITH.

A will giving all of testator's property to his wife during her life, and to "do with" as she sees proper before her death, only confers power to deal with the property in such manner as she might choose consistently with her life estate therein, and, perhaps, without liability for waste committed. These words used in connection with a conveyance of a leasehold estate would never be understood as conferring a power to sell property so as to pass a greater estate. Whatever power of disposal the words confer is limited by the estate with which they are connected. Brant v. Virginia Coal & Iron Co., 93 U. S. 326, 327, 23 L. Ed. 927.

DOCK.

See "Adjustable Dock"; "Dry Dock"; "Graving Dock."

Floating dock as building, see "Building."

A "dock" is a place for vessels, whether excavated from the land or surrounded by wharves. Bingham v. Doane, 9 Ohio (9 Ham.) 165, 167.

"Dock" is defined by philologists, according to the American use of the term, to be the space between two wharves. City of Boston v. Lecraw, 58 U. S. (17 How.) 426, 434, 15 L. Ed. 118.

DOCKAGE.

"Dockage is the pecuniary compensation for the use of a dock while the vessel is undergoing repairs. It is in the nature of rent, and the owner of a dry dock has the right to demand from those who seek its use whatever he considers a fair compensation, uncontrolled by the custom of other docks in other places." Ives v. The Buckeye State (U. S.) 13 Fed. Cas. 184, 185.

In Pol. Code, §§ 24, 25, the term "dockage" is used to designate the charge against vessels for the privilege of mooring to the wharves or in the slips. Such charge is not contrary to an act charging wharfage, which is a charge against merchandise for the use of wharves. People v. Roberts, 28 Pac. 680, 691, 92 Cal. 659.

DOCK BERTH.

It cannot be said as a matter of law that "having a dock berth" means anything other than having a place for loading and unloading at a dock. Decker v. Jacques (N. Y.) 1 E. D. Smith, 80, 84.

DOCK PRIVILEGES.

A contract by a wharfinger to furnish dock privileges for the unloading of a cargo of iron from barges, and for reloading and removing the cargo by trucks from the wharf, includes the wharfage charges for giving the vessel a berth alongside the wharf, as well as the charges for space on the dock occupied by the cargo, and controls any custom to the contrary. The Brooklyn (U. S.) 46 Fed. 132, 133.

DOCKET.

See "Bar Docket"; "Judgment Docket."

A "docket" is defined by Bouvier to be a formal record of judicial proceedings, and, as a secondary meaning, the same authority says "docket" is also said to be a brief writing on a small piece of paper or parchment containing the substance of a longer writing." Harrison v. Southern Porcelain Mfg. Co., 10 S. C. (10 Rich.) 278, 297.

A "docket" is a brief writing or statement of a judgment, made from the record or roll generally kept, in books alphabetically arranged, with the clerk of the court or the county clerk. A transcript of a justice's judgment may be filed with the county clerk and the judgment docketed. The statute giving preference to all judgments in the settlement of the estate of a decedent, provided the judgments are "docketed," requires that they be docketed in the lifetime of the deceased in order to obtain precedence over other debts, and it is not required that the judgment should have been rendered by a court of record. Stevenson v. Weissner (N. Y.) 1 Bradf. Sur. 342, 344.

The "docket," mentioned in a provision of the Code of Civil Procedure providing for docketing judgments is a book which the clerk keeps in his office, with each page divided into columns and headed as follows: "judgment debtors; judgment creditors; judgment; time of entry; where entered in judgment book; appeals—when taken; judgment of appellate court; satisfaction of judgment; when entered." Rev. St. Utah 1898, § 3199.

When the word "docket" is used in the title relating to estates of decedents, the probate docket is meant. Rev. St. Tex. 1895, art. 1872.

As file.

Under Sup. Ct. Rule 52 (27 S. E. xl), providing that a petition for a rehearing shall be filed within 20 days after the commencement of the next succeeding term, and that the justice to whom it is submitted shall order its docketing in cases wherein it is granted; and rule 53 (27 S. E. xli), requiring the petition to be sent to the clerk, but providing that it shall not be docketed until the justice order it—it was contended that the words "filing" and "docketing" were synonymous. It was held that the petition is filed when it is first received by the clerk, and docketed when the clerk enters it upon the records at the order of the justice who grants the rehearing. Bird v. Gilliam, 81 S. E. 267, 268, 123 N. C. 63.

DOCKET BOOK.

The docket book is a record prescribed by the statute for the express purpose, among other things, of receiving the entry of the judgment. It is a public record, because by Code Civ. Proc. § 3141, the justice is required to keep it open during the hours when a sheriff's office must be kept open for search and examination by any person. Beuerlein v. Hodges, 10 N. Y. Supp. 505, 506, 57 Hun, 586.

DOCKET FEE.

The term "docket fee" would seem to describe a fee for docketing something, but as the term is used in a statute providing that if any party shall include in his verified memorandum of costs any item to which he is not entitled, and his adversary shall prevail with a motion to retax, there shall be taxed as a part of the cost of such motion a docket fee of $25. It is not used in this sense; but as a docket fee is one that is charged of course, as, for instance, of docketing a cause or a judgment, the term will be construed in that sense as taxable of course. First National Bank v. Neill, 34 Pac. 180, 182, 13 Mont. 377.

Attorneys are allowed a lump sum for all their fees in a case, except alone the deposition fee, which, again, is a lump sum for each deposition, irrespective of the work done on it. It is called a "docket fee," and the use of the word indicates that it is not allowed for the work of going through "a final hearing," but for all the services in a case. Goodyear v. Sawyer (U. S.) 17 Fed. 2, 7.

DOCTOR.

See "Itinerant Doctor."

The phrase "person practicing medicine," and the words "doctor" and "physician," in an act making it criminal to practice medicine without a certificate, but providing that the act shall not apply to any doctors or physicians now practicing medicine in Alabama who are graduates of a respectable medical college, or to any person who has practiced medicine in the state for the last 10 years, refer to one of the same class of persons, and are used interchangeably. Bouvier defines "physician" to be a person who has received the degree of doctor of medicine from an incorporated institution; one lawfully engaged in the practice of medicine. The word in its popular sense means one who professes or practices medicine for the healing art; a doctor. Harrison v. State, 15 South. 563, 564, 102 Ala. 170 (citing Worcester's Dict.).

The legal significance of the word "physician" or "doctor," when used in a contract, must be held to mean any person who makes it his regular business to practice physic. Corsi v. Maretzek (N. Y.) 4 E. D. Smith, 1, 7.

In a prosecution of an osteopath for practicing medicine without a license from the State Board of Health, it was contended that the fact that he hung out a sign and advertised himself as "doctor" indicated that he was practicing medicine; but it was held that, as a special verdict found that he had a diploma from a college of osteopathy bestowing that title upon him, such conclusions do not follow, and that, besides, there are many kinds of doctors besides doctors of medicine. State v. MacKnight, 42 S. E. 580, 582, 131 N. C. 717, 59 L. R. A. 187.

DOCTRINE.

See "American Doctrine."

DOCTRINAL INTERPRETATION.

In Spanish jurisprudence the "doctrinal interpretation of laws" is the opinions given by juriconsults and other persons versed in the law. The authentic interpretation, however, is that given by the legislator himself, which is superior to the customary interpretation given by judges. This latter, however, has a certain force and authority when two or more decisions made by a superior tribunal are in conformity with each other. Houston v. Robertson's Adm'r, 2 Tex. 1, 26 (citing Diccionario de Legislacion, p. 316).

DOCUMENT.

See "Ancient Documents"; "Public Documents."

A document is "an instrument upon which is recorded, by letters, figures, or marks, matters which may evidentially be used. In this sense the term applies to writings, to words printed, lithographed, or photographed, to seals, plates, or stones on which inscriptions are cut or engraved, to photographs and pictures, to maps and plans. So far as concerns admissibility, it makes no difference what is the thing on which the words or signs offered may be recorded. They may be on stones, gems, or on wood, as well as on paper or parchment." Johnson Steel Street-Rail Co. v. North Branch Steel Co. (U. S.) 48 Fed. 191, 194 (quoting 1 Whart. Ev. § 614); Arnold v. Pawtuxet Valley Water Co., 26 Atl. 55, 56, 18 R. I. 189, 19 L. R. A. 602.

A "document" is any matter expressed or described upon any substance by means of letters, figures, or marks, or by more than one of these means, intended to be used, or which may be used, for the purpose of recording that matter. Arnold v. Pawtuxet Valley Water Co., 26 Atl. 55, 56, 18 R. I. 189, 19 L. R. A. 602 (quoting Stephens, Ev.).

The word "document" is defined in the Century Dictionary as, in the law of evidence, anything bearing a legible or significant inscription or legend; anything that may be read as communicating an idea; including, thus, a tombstone, seal, coin, sign-board, etc., as well as paper writings; and it is said in this case that a terminal tree on which certain marks and symbols have been placed, which tell the true line of a lot of land, but which marks have a well-understood meaning by surveyors, may be deemed a "document" within the meaning of section 803, Civ. Code, authorizing the examination of documents, but such question was not decided. Hayden v. Van Cortlandt, 32 N. Y. Supp. 507, 509, 84 Hun, 150.

"Document," as used in rule 72 of the equity rules, which allows all affidavits, dispositions, and documents which have been previously made, read, or used in the court on any proceeding in any case or matter to be used before the master, means some writing like a deed, a will, a letter, or an account rendered or stated, which is evidence, since it is authenticated independently of the consent of the parties. Hazard v. Durant, 12 R. I. 99, 103.

"Document," as used in Code, § 1105, authorizing a new trial when the jury has received any evidence, paper, document, or book not allowed by the court to the prejudice of the substantial rights of the defendant, means a document not in evidence, since it would be included in the term "evidence," as used in the statute, if it had been introduced in evidence. Doctor Jack v. Washington Territory, 3 Pac. 832, 836, 2 Wash. T. 101.

"Document," as used in the bankruptcy act, shall include any book, deed, or instrument of writing. U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 8419.

Indorsement on note.

An indorsement on a promissory note is not an "instrument, document, or paper" which needs to be stamped under the statutes of the United States; nor is a waiver in writing, by an indorser, of demand of payment and notice of dishonor of a document, to be stamped. Pugh v. McCormick, 81 U. S. (14 Wall.) 361, 20 L. Ed. 789.

Memorandum book.

Memorandum books containing entries of one's experience and observation at different times, and being valuable to him for reference, are not "documents," within an exception of a bill of lading providing that, if the shipper shall fail to give notice of the character and value of the documents, the owner of the ship shall not be liable therefor. The St. Cuthbert (U. S.) 97 Fed. 340, 342.

Record book of corporation.

The term "document," as used in Pub. St. c. 214, § 45, which provides for the production in court, or for the inspection by one of the parties, of any document in the possession or control of the opposite party, would include the record book of a corporation. Arnold v. Pawtuxet Valley Water Co., 26 Atl. 55, 56, 18 R. I. 189, 19 L. R. A. 602.

The word "document," in general laws providing for the production of a document in the possession of the adverse party, doubtless includes the stock ledger or transfer book of a corporation. Clark v. Rhode Island Locomotive Works, 53 Atl. 47, 48, 24 R. I. 307.

Template.

A template is not a "document," so as to authorize its production by a subpoena duces tecum. Johnson Steel Street-Rail Co. v. North Branch Steel Co. (U. S.) 48 Fed. 191, 193.

DOCUMENTARY EVIDENCE.

Legal evidence is not confined to the human voice or oral testimony, but includes every tangible object capable of making a truthful statement, such evidence being roughly classified as "documentary evidence." In oral evidence the witness is the man who speaks; in documentary evidence the witness is the thing that speaks. In either case the witness must be competent—that is, must be deemed competent to make a truthful statement—and in either case the competency of the witness must be proved before the evidence is admitted, the difference being that in oral evidence the competency is proved by a legal presumption, and in documentary evidence the competency must be proved by actual testimony; and the further difference that in oral evidence the credit of the witness is tested by his own cross-examination, while in documentary evidence the credit of the witness is tested by the cross-examination of those who must be called to prove its competency. Curtis v. Bradley, 81 Atl. 591, 594, 65 Conn. 99, 28 L. R. A. 143, 48 Am. St. Rep. 177.

DOG.

The word "dog," as used in the chapter relating to dogs, shall be held and construed to mean all animals of the canine species, both male and female. Rev. St. Mo. 1899, § 6377.

As beast or beast of burden.

See "Beast"; "Beast of Burden."

As a domestic animal.

In the case of State v. Harriman, 75 Me. 562, 46 Am. Rep. 423, it was held that dogs were not recognized in law as belonging to the class denominated "domestic animals," and, consequently, that a demurrer to an indictment for killing a dog, founded upon a statute making criminal the killing or wounding of domestic animals, ought to have been sustained. In a dissenting opinion by Appleton, C. J., in that case, he eulogized the dog in the following language: "He is a domestic animal. From the time of the Pyramids to the present day, from the frozen pole to the torrid zone, wherever man has been, there has been his dog. Cuvier has asserted that the dog was, perhaps, necessary for the establishment of civil society, and that a little reflection will convince us that barbarous nations owe much of their civilization above the brute to the possession of the dog. He is the friend and companion of his master, accompanying him in his walks; his servant, aiding him in his hunting; the playmate of his children; an inmate of his house, protecting it against all assailants." And later on the Chief Justice quoted approvingly the following poetic tribute to dogs:

They are honest creatures,
And ne'er betray their masters, never fawn
On any they love not.

—On the other hand, in Wilson v. Wilmington & M. R. Co. (S. C.) 10 Rich. Law, 52, Munro, J., alluded to the dog as an animal whose nature is carnivorous, and who is prompted by instinct and appetite to roam at large in the forest in the pursuit of game, or upon a sheep-killing expedition; and finally stigmatized him as a "yelping cur," whose presence upon a railroad track should not arrest in its progress a train of cars freighted with products or passengers. Patton v. State, 19 S. E. 734, 93 Ga. 111, 24 L. R. A. 732.

A dog is a "domestic animal," within a law authorizing the imposition of a tax on domestic animals. Wilcox v. State, 28 S. E. 981, 101 Ga. 563, 39 L. R. A. 709. See, also, Hurley v. State, 17 S. W. 455, 457, 30 Tex. App. 333, 28 Am. St. Rep. 916.

DOGGER.

A "dogger" is a man employed in a sawmill, who stands opposite the log as it is being sawed up, and kicks off with his foot, and onto the rollers, slabs from the logs as they are cut. Rucks v. Minden Lumber Co., 33 South. 926, 927, 109 La. 933.

DOING BUSINESS.

See "Place of Doing Business."

See, also, "Carry on Business"; "Transacting Business."

Doing a cold-storage business, see "Cold-Storage Business."

Engage in business, see "Engage."

To "do business" is to carry on any particular occupation or employment for a livelihood or gain, as agriculture, trade, mechanic arts, or profession. George R. Barse Live Stock Co. v. Range Valley Cattle Co., 50 Pac. 630, 632, 16 Utah, 59.

Laws 1880, c. 542, imposes a tax on corporations organized under the laws of other states and "doing business in this state." Held, that the words "doing business in this state" should be construed to mean the doing of any substantial part of the business for which the corporation was organized within the state of New York; and hence, where a foreign silver mining corporation had an office in New York, where its president, secretary, and treasurer were located, and the directors held their annual meetings there, its dividends were declared and paid there, and its product was sent to New York for sale, and the proceeds were received at its New York offices, some of which were deposited in New York banks and some loaned in the city of New York, some used for the purposes of the company in that city, and the balance transferred out of the state, there was a very substantial portion of the company's "business done" in New York within the statute, so as to subject it to taxation therein. People v. Horn Silver Min. Co., 11 N. E. 155, 158, 105 N. Y. 76.

The expression "doing business," as used in Laws Tenn. 1877, c. 31, and Laws 1891, cc. 97, 122, regulating foreign corporations "doing business" in the state, is to be interpreted with regard to something more than the mere linguistic signification of the words used to the ordinary ear, and it has acquired in legal terminology a much narrower meaning than that usually given to it. A corporation is to be considered as "doing business" in the state only where it becomes in a sense domesticated therein, subject to be sued in the courts of the state, and responsible to its citizens, as are domestic corporations. Caesar v. Capell (U. S.) 83 Fed. 403, 422.

One who acted for a foreign corporation in the purchase of certain wire while visiting the city of St. Louis, where the seller resided, was visited by the seller relative to a controversy that had arisen from the sale of the wire, and during negotiations the one who had acted for the purchaser asked the seller to give him a quotation on a certain number of tons of wire, but no quotation was given him and no purchase made. Held, that the purchaser of the wire was not on such state of facts "doing business" within the meaning of such phrase in the statute. St. Louis Wire Mill Co. v. Consolidated Barb Wire Co. (U. S.) 32 Fed. 802, 803.

"Doing a business of $25,000 per year," within the meaning of section 9 of the general revenue act of June 10, 1881, fixing a license on dealers of dressed meats doing a business of $25,000 or more per annum, means the dealers whose annual gross sales amount to the sum stated. Johnson v. Armour, 12 South. 842, 843, 31 Fla. 413.

A foreign corporation is not "doing business" within the estate, within Laws 1892, p. 1805, c. 687, § 15, requiring it in such instances to obtain a certificate from the Secretary of State, by making a contract within the state, no sales being made or other business done there. Commercial Wood & Cement Co. v. Northampton Portland Cement Co., 84 N. Y. Supp. 38, 39, 41 Misc. Rep. 242.

Accepting premiums and paying losses.

A statute imposing a tax on insurance companies "doing business" in this state does not require such an insurance company to be writing insurance nor to be doing business in this state, but it is sufficient if the company is still accepting yearly premiums on outstanding policies, and is still paying losses which may accrue thereon, though it has discontinued writing policies in the state. Smyth v. International Life Assur. Co. (N. Y.) 35 How. Prac. 126, 129; Price v. St. Louis Mut. Life Ins. Co., 3 Mo. App. 262, 268.

Under Acts 1897, c. 2, § 7, providing that foreign insurance companies "doing business" in that state shall pay a privilege tax, the receiving of renewal premiums, on policies already in force, by mail directly from policy holders, under provisions in the policies that the premiums were payable in New York, is not included. State v. Connecticut Mut. Life Ins. Co., 61 S. W. 75, 77, 106 Tenn. 282.

Under a city ordinance imposing a license tax on insurance companies incorporated in another or foreign state, and doing business in such state by an agent, it is held that insurance companies taking arrears through insurance agents or insurance brokers are not "doing business" within the state, within the meaning of the ordinance, so as to be liable for the tax. City of New Orleans v. Aetna Fire Ins. Co., 33 La. Ann. 10-12.

The words "doing business," as used in Rev. St. 1899, c. 89, art. 3, providing for annual statements by corporations doing business under the act which related to assessment insurance companies, refers to issuing policies, and not to paying them. A man "does business" when he contracts obligations, and he "ceases to do business" when he discharges them. Knights Templars' & Masons' Life Indemnity Co. v. Jarman, 23 Sup. Ct. 108, 111, 187 U. S. 197, 47 L. Ed. 139.

Acquiring land by foreign contract.

A contract, made out of the state, by which title to land in the state is acquired, is not "doing business" within the state, within the laws relating to foreign corporations. Goldsberry v. Carter, 41 S. E. 858, 859, 100 Va. 438.

As any act in its regular business.

"Doing business," as used in Const. art. 14, § 4, prohibiting foreign corporations from "doing business" in the state without having at least one known place of business, means the doing of some of the works, or the exercise of some of the functions, for which the corporation was created. Beard v. Union & American Pub. Co., 71 Ala. 60, 62.

Act Pa. 1868, §§ 7, 8, providing that every railroad company doing business in the state shall be liable to be taxed, etc., means transacting any business in the state, without regard to the amount of business done or the length of road on which it is done, so that where a railroad 450 miles long had 13 miles of its road located in the state where it was incorporated, and 42 miles only in the state of Pennsylvania, where it was not incorporated, it was nevertheless "doing business" within the latter state within the meaning of the act. Erie Ry. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 88 U. S. (21 Wall.) 492, 497, 22 L. Ed. 595.

Rev. St. c. 32, § 26, provides that foreign corporations doing business in the state shall have the same powers and be subject to the same liabilities as domestic corporations. Held, that the phrase "doing business" did not embrace a case where the president of a foreign corporation, while temporarily sojourning in the state on his own business, made a casual offer to receive a proposition relating to the business of his company. Galveston City R. Co. v. Hook, 40 Ill. App. 547, 556.

Appointing agents.

A person who is engaged by a foreign corporation in appointing agents to do its business is not himself "doing business" within the state, within an act providing that such an agent shall, before entering on his business, file evidence of authority with the clerk of the counties in which it is proposed to do business. D. S. Morgan & Co. v. White, 101 Ind. 413.

Bidding for state supplies.

A foreign corporation offering to bid for state supplies is "doing business" within the state, within a statute forbidding the same without compliance with its requirements. Office Specialty Mfg. Co. v. Fenton Metallic Mfg. Co., 1 Pa. Dist. R. 576.

Bringing or maintaining action.

The institution and prosecution of suits is not "doing business" within the meaning of a statute prescribing the conditions on which foreign corporations may do business in the state. St. Louis, A. & T. Ry. Co. v. Fire Ass'n of Philadelphia, 18 S. W. 43, 46, 55 Ark. 163; Charter Oak Life Ins. Co. v. Sawyer, 44 Wis. 387; Christian v. American Freehold Land & Mortgage Co., 7 South. 427, 89 Ala. 198; Cook v. Rome Brick Co., 12 South. 918, 919, 98 Ala. 409; George A. Barse Live Stock Co. v. Range Valley Cattle Co., 50 Pac. 630, 632, 16 Utah, 59.

The act of maintaining an action is not "doing business." It is rather an act for the purpose of enforcing rights springing from just business transactions. Utley v. Clark-Gardner Lode Min. Co., 4 Colo. 369, 373.

A foreign corporation which does no business in Illinois, except to bring suit there to enforce a call made on its stock in the country of its organization, is not "doing business" in that state, the term "doing business" having reference to the business for which the corporation was organized, and not to the form of its by-laws, with reference to its relations to its own members, or a resort to the courts of this state to recover a contract liability. Mandel v. Swan Land & Cattle Co., 40 N. E. 462, 465, 154 Ill. 177, 27 L. R. A. 313, 45 Am. St. Rep. 124.

Failure of a foreign corporation to comply with Comp St. div. 5, § 442, providing that all foreign corporations, before doing any business within the territory, shall file with the Secretary thereof, and the recorder of the county wherein they intended to transact business, a copy of the charter and a statement, does not preclude it from suing to recover taxes paid under protest and alleged to have been illegal, the right to sue not constituting "doing business." Powder River Cattle Co. v. Custer County Com'rs, 22 Pac. 383, 385, 9 Mont. 145.

Consigning goods to factors.

A mere consignment of goods by a foreign corporation to the factors in the state is not "doing business in the state," within Laws 1892, c. 687, § 15, requiring every foreign corporation to obtain a certificate of authority before it can sue on any contract made in the state. Bertha Zinc & Mineral Co. v. Clute, 27 N. Y. Supp. 342, 346, 7 Misc. Rep. 123.

A foreign corporation that consigns its goods to a commission merchant in the state, who sells them for the corporation, and not for himself, the corporation not parting with the possession, is "doing business" within the state. In re Nonantum Worsted Co., 15 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 125.

Continuance implied.

Plaintiff wrote to defendant as follows: "We are 'doing business' with B. & Co., and require a guaranty, and they refer us to you;" and defendant replied: "I hereby engage to guaranty the sum of two hundred pounds for iron received for B. & Co." Held, that the words "doing business" meant doing and continuing to do business—that is, continuing to supply goods—and the guaranty was a continuing one. Colbourn v. Dawson, 10 C. B. 765, 774.

Dealing in reference to foreign property.

"Doing business in the state," within the meaning of a statute forbidding a foreign corporation from doing business in the state without complying with certain statutory provisions, does not include the acts of a foreign corporation in Tennessee, dealing with citizens of other states, in reference to property not situated in Tennessee. Hart

v. Livermore Foundry & Machine Co., 17 South. 769, 775, 72 Miss. 809.

Disposing of devised land.

"Doing business in the state," within the meaning of Rev. St. 1891, c. 32, § 26, which declares that foreign corporations doing business in the state shall be subject to all the liabilities, restrictions, and duties that are or may be imposed on corporations of like character organized under the general laws of the state, applies to the acts of a foreign corporation in receiving a devise of land in Illinois with power to sell and lease the same, and in asserting title to such land, making a contract for its sale, and bringing a suit to enforce such contract. Pennsylvania Co. for Insurance on Lives and Granting Annuities v. Bauerle, 33 N. E. 166, 170, 143 Ill. 459.

As doing present business.

In Const. art. 14, § 4, providing that no foreign corporation shall do any business in the state without one known place of business and an authorized agent therein, and that such corporation may be sued in any county where it does business, the phrase "does business" is equivalent in meaning to, and expressive of the same thought as, the words "doing business," and refers exclusively to the present time, not authorizing a suit against a corporation because it has in some time past transacted business in the county where the suit is brought, if it has ceased to do so at the time of bringing the action. Sullivan v. Sullivan Timber Co., 15 South. 941, 943, 103 Ala. 371, 25 L. R. A. 543.

Entering into partnership.

A foreign corporation, by becoming a special partner in and contributing to the capital of a limited partnership in New York, which is engaged in importing, and has the sole sale in the United States of, the manufactures of the corporation made in the foreign country, is "doing business" in the state within Laws 1880, c. 542, declaring it in such case taxable on the amount of its capital stock employed within the state, which is the amount of its contribution to the capital of the partnership. People v. Roberts, 46 N. E. 161, 152 N. Y. 59, 36 L. R. A. 756.

Filing order given outside state.

A foreign corporation which ships goods into the state on an order given it out of the state is not "doing business" within the state, within Laws 1892, c. 687, § 15, forbidding foreign corporations to do business within the state without a certificate. Novelty Mfg. Co. v. Connell, 34 N. Y. Supp. 717, 718, 88 Hun. 254.

"Doing business in the state," within the meaning of a statute requiring a foreign corporation to file a copy of its articles of incorporation with the Secretary of State before doing business in the state, does not apply to the act of a foreign corporation in selling goods in another state, to be transferred and delivered to a person doing business in Texas, since the transaction is an act of interstate commerce, as the statute, if applicable to the case, would be in conflict with the commerce clause of the federal Constitution. Lyons-Thomas Hardware Co. v. Reeding Hardware Co. (Tex.) 21 S. W. 300.

Filling unsolicited order.

The law of 1889 requiring foreign corporations to file their articles of incorporation and obtain a permit before "doing business" in the state does not apply to a corporation doing business in another state which ships goods on an unsolicited order to a resident of the state, and such corporation may maintain an action to recover for such goods. H. Zuberblier Co. v. Harris (Tex.) 35 S. W. 403.

As going into operation.

"Doing business," as used in Act June 7, 1879 (P. L. p. 112), enacting that no corporation doing business in the state shall go into operation without first making certain reports, is used synonymously with "going into operation." Commonwealth v. Standard Oil Co., 101 Pa. 119, 132.

Issuing policy on foreign contract.

"Doing business," within the meaning of a statute requiring agents of foreign corporations to file a certain certificate before doing business in the state, was held not to apply to a transaction in which an agent of an Illinois insurance company obtained an application for insurance on certain property in Indiana, and submitted a note and sum of money in payment of the premium to the company at the home office in Illinois, where they were examined and accepted by the proper officer. Lamb v. Bowser (U. S.) 14 Fed. Cas. 980, 981.

"Doing business" in a state, within the meaning of the statutes fixing certain regulations as to the right of foreign insurance companies doing business in a state, was intended to describe the conditions under which such companies could effect insurance through agencies established in the state, and was not intended to restrain or control the business of such corporations transacting business outside the state; and therefore a contract of insurance made out of the state on property situated therein is valid, though the insurance company has not complied with the statute. Columbia Fire Ins. Co. v. Kinyon, 37 N. J. Law (8 Vroom) 33, 34.

Keeping office in state.

A foreign corporation leasing an office in the state, in which samples for its agents were kept, incidental to the business of taking orders and making sales in the state, having an average bank balance of $4,000 in a bank in the state, was not "doing business" in the state within Laws 1880, c. 542, imposing a franchise tax on foreign corporations so engaged. People v. Roberts, 50 N. Y. Supp. 355, 27 App. Div. 455.

A nonresident who maintains an office in New York, and keeps there for sale goods manufactured for him in the state of his residence, is not taxable on the amount of such goods under Laws 1855, c. 37, providing that all persons "doing business in the state" and nonresidents thereof shall be taxed on their business as though they were residents, no other business being done except to sell the goods and remit the proceeds to the state in which they were manufactured. People v. Barker, 39 N. Y. Supp. 151, 152, 5 App. Div. 246.

The phrase "doing business," found in Laws 1855, p. 470, relative to foreign corporations doing business in the state, does not include a foreign railroad corporation having the road and traffic without the state, but having an office therein, which sells tickets over its lines. Doty v. Michigan Cent. R. Co. (N. Y.) 8 Abb. Prac. 427, 428.

Loaning money.

"Doing business in the state," within the meaning of Const. art. 236, in reference to foreign corporations doing business within the state, does not include the act of a foreign corporation loaning money to a resident of Louisiana through brokers domiciled in another state. Scottish American Mortg. Co. v. Ogden, 21 South. 116, 118, 49 La. Ann. 8; American Freehold Land Mortg. Co. v. Pierce, 21 South. 972, 49 La. Ann. 390.

Under Acts 1891, requiring foreign corporations to register their charters as a condition of doing business within the state, a building and loan association, resident of a foreign state, not having agents or local boards within the state, which made loans to a resident directly from and payable at its home office, is not "doing business in the state" within the statute. Neal v. New Orleans Loan, Building & Savings Ass'n, 46 S. W. 755, 100 Tenn. 607.

A foreign corporation, having no agent or place of business within the state, which loaned money on applications sent to it by loan brokers who were agents of the borrowers, was not doing a business of loaning money in the state. Norton v. Union Bank & Trust Co. (Tenn.) 46 S. W. 544.

A foreign corporation is not "doing business" in a state, where it makes an agreement for a loan in another state, and the mortgage securities on land in the state are delivered and the money paid in such other state. Scruggs v. Scottish Mortg. Co., 16 S. W. 563, 54 Ark. 568.

"Doing business in the state," within the meaning of Const. art. 14, § 4, which provides that no foreign corporation shall do any business in this state without having at least one known place of business or an authorized agent or agents therein, is shown by the single act of making a loan in Alabama, and taking notes and mortgages to secure it on land owned by a foreign corporation. State v. Bristol Sav. Bank, 18 South. 533, 534, 108 Ala. 3, 54 Am. St. Rep. 141.

"Doing business in the state," within the meaning of the constitutional and statutory provision requiring foreign corporations doing business in the state to have a known place of business and an authorized agent in the state, includes the loan of money in the state secured by notes and mortgage. Ginn v. New England Mortg. Sec. Co., 8 South. 388, 92 Ala. 135.

Receiving payment on stock loans.

The receiving by a foreign building and loan association of payment on stock loans made before the enactment of Rev. St. 1897, § 4464 et seq. (Horner's Rev. St. 1897, § 3420 et seq.; Acts 1893, p. 274), regulating such business, is "doing business" within the prohibition of such act against doing business without compliance with its terms. Equitable Loan & Investment Ass'n v. Peed (Ind.) 52 N. E. 201, 202.

Settling accounts.

A settlement of accounts with a foreign corporation for goods sold in its place of business in New Jersey, even if made in Pennsylvania, is not "doing business" in Pennsylvania. New Jersey Steel Tube Co. v. Riehl, 9 Pa. Super. Ct. 220, 225.

Single act or transaction.

The doing of a single act of business in another state does not constitute a "doing of business" within the meaning of foreign corporation laws. Cooper Mfg. Co. v. Ferguson, 5 Sup. Ct. 739, 113 U. S. 727, 28 L. Ed. 1137; Gilchrist v. Helena, H. S. & S. R. Co. (U. S.) 47 Fed. 593, 594; Leasure v. Union Mut. Life Ins. Co., 91 Pa. 491, 493; Blakeslee Mfg. Co. v. Hilton, 18 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 553, 556; Commonwealth v. Standard Oil Co., 101 Pa. 119, 148; National Knitting Co. v. Bronner, 45 N. Y. Supp. 714, 715, 20 Misc. Rep. 125.

A contract between citizens of one state and a corporation of another state for the erection of a single plant is not a "doing business" in the state where the plant is to be erected, within the statute requiring foreign corporations to register before doing business therein. Davis & Rankin Bldg. Co. v. Caigle (Tenn.) 53 S. W. 240.

The taking of a single mortgage by a foreign corporation to secure a past-due debt, with no intention of transacting other business of the kind in the state, is not "doing business" within the prohibition of the Constitution against foreign corporations doing business in the state except in compliance with the provisions therein contained. Florsheim Bros. Dry Goods Co. v. Lester, 29 S. W. 34, 35, 60 Ark. 120, 27 L. R. A. 505, 46 Am. St. Rep. 162.

"Doing business" means a transaction of business during some continuous period, neither a single nor several transactions being conclusive so as to show a doing of business. There must be a doing of some of the work, or an exercise of some of the functions, for which the corporation was created. Beard v. Union & American Pub. Co., 71 Ala. 60. Where a manufacturing corporation made shipments of its goods into a certain county, subject to approval, and, if it happened that the goods were rejected, a broker was notified to sell them for the corporation, his authority being always limited to that single transaction, such operations did not constitute a "doing of business" within the statute. International Cotton Seed Oil Co. v. Wheelock, 27 South. 517, 518, 124 Ala. 367.

"Doing business," as used in Pennsylvania laws imposing a tax on foreign corporations doing business in the state, means the employment by the corporation of some of their capital in the state, or, at least, the establishing of a place of business therein. The mere fact that a foreign corporation entered into a contract with some of their stockholders who resided in Pennsylvania to buy certain articles would not constitute a "doing business" within the meaning of the act. Kilgore v. Smith, 15 Atl. 698, 699, 122 Pa. 48.

Gen. St. § 260, which prohibits foreign corporations from "doing business" within the state until they have filed a certificate with the Secretary of State, etc., is not satisfied by proof of a single purchase of machinery in the state, by a foreign corporation, to be used in the state of its domicile. Colorado Iron-Works v. Sierra Grande Min. Co., 25 Pac. 325, 326, 15 Colo. 499, 22 Am. St. Rep. 433.

In Const. art. 14, § 4, providing that no foreign corporation shall do any business in the state without having at least one known place of business and an authorized agent therein, "do any business" is a more comprehensive phrase than "carrying on" or "engaging in" business generally, which involves the idea of a continuance or repetition of like acts. The doing of a single act of business, if it be in the exercise of a corporate function, is as much prohibited as the doing of a hundred of such acts, and is just as much opposed to the policy of the Constitution." Farrior v. New England Mortgage Security Co., 7 South. 200, 88 Ala. 275.

Soliciting newspaper subscriptions.

Const. art. 14, § 4, prohibits foreign corporations from doing business in the state without having at least one known place of business and an authorized agent or agents therein. Held, that the term "doing business," as used in such section, means a doing of some of the works or an exercise of some of the functions for which a corporation was created, and that soliciting or receiving subscribers for a newspaper published in another state by a corporation did not constitute a "doing business" within the state, as the term is so defined. Beard v. Union & American Pub. Co., 71 Ala. 60, 62.

Soliciting stock subscriptions.

"Doing business," within the meaning of Act June 17, 1852, requiring agents of foreign corporations to file a power of attorney, etc., in the county where they propose doing business, has no application to the soliciting of subscriptions to the capital stock of a foreign corporation. Payson v. Withers (U. S.) 19 Fed. Cas. 29, 30.

Supplying means to another.

For one person to supply the means to another to do business with or on is not the "doing of" that business by the former. United States v. American Bell Tel. Co. (U. S.) 29 Fed. 17, 18.

Taking orders or making sales by agents.

Taking orders or making sales by sample by agents coming into the state from another for that purpose is not "doing business" within the state within the meaning of the foreign corporation laws. Blakeslee Mfg. Co. v. Hilton, 5 Pa. Super. Ct. 184, 191; Murphy Varnish Co. v. Connell, 32 N. Y. Supp. 492, 493, 10 Misc. Rep. 553; Crocker v. Muller, 83 N. Y. Supp. 189, 190, 40 Misc. Rep. 685; Vaughn Mach. Co. v. Lighthouse, 71 N. Y. Supp. 799, 801, 64 App. Div. 138; Waller v. Rothfield, 73 N. Y. Supp. 141, 142, 36 Misc. Rep. 177; Jones v. Keeler, 81 N. Y. Supp. 648, 649, 40 Misc. Rep. 221; Ware v. Hamilton Brown Shoe Co., 9 South. 136, 137, 92 Ala. 145; Coit v. Sutton, 60 N. W. 690, 691, 102 Mich. 324, 25 L. R. A. 819; M. I. Wilcox Cordage & Supply Co. v. Mosher, 72 N. W. 117, 114 Mich. 64; Pierce Steam Heating Co. v. A. Slegel Gas Fixture Co., 60 Mo. App. 148, 155; Mershon & Co. v. Pottsville Lumber Co., 40 Atl. 1019, 1020, 187 Pa. 12, 67 Am.

St. Rep. 560; Toledo Commercial Co. v. Glen Mfg. Co., 45 N. E. 197, 198, 55 Ohio St. 217; Davis & Rankin Bldg. & Mfg. Co. v. Dix (U. S.), 64 Fed. 406, 412, 413; Boardman v. S. S. McClure Co. (U. S.), 123 Fed. 614.

The procuring in New York of orders for goods by the traveling agent of a foreign corporation, which orders are to be transmitted to the home office of the corporation for approval, after which the goods are to be shipped from such office to the buyer in New York, does not constitute "doing business" in this state within Laws 1892, c. 687, requiring foreign corporations to obtain a certificate of authority to do business in New York. Tallapoosa Lumber Co. v. Holbert, 39 N. Y. Supp. 432, 434, 5 App. Div. 559.

A foreign manufacturing corporation which merely places its products in the hands of local merchants to be sold on commission is engaged in interstate commerce, and hence may sue for a wrongful conversion of such products without having filed its articles with the Secretary of State, as required of foreign corporations doing business within the state. Allen v. Tyson-Jones Buggy Co., 40 S. W. 393-395, 91 Tex. 22.

"Doing business," as employed in Acts Tenn. 1887, c. 226, p. 386, relative to foreign corporations doing business in the state, means any transaction with persons or any transaction concerning any property situated in the state, through any agency whatever acting for it within the state. Romaine v. Union Ins. Co. (U. S.) 55 Fed. 751, 754.

DOINGS.

In Rev. St. § 1156, as amended by Laws 1870, c. 172, providing that a corporation may commence business as soon as the articles are filed in the office of the recorder of deeds, and their doings shall be valid if the publication in a newspaper is made, and the copy filed in the office of the Secretary of State, within three months from such filing in the recorder's office, "doings" relates, not to the acts of organization, but to other subsequent acts. First Nat. Bank v. Davies, 43 Iowa, 424, 429.

DOLLAR.

See "Gold Dollars."
Dollar mark, see "Signs."

Where a seaman shipped in New Brunswick on board an American vessel for a specified voyage at an agreed rate of twenty-five dollars per month, such voyage to terminate in the United States, the words "twenty-five dollars per month" should not be construed to mean that the seaman was entitled to an amount in the currency of the United States equal to the value of the contract price in this country if paid in the currency of New Brunswick, but to entitle him only to the amount named in the contract in United States money. Trecartin v. The Rochambeau (U. S.) 24 Fed. Cas. 164, 165.

Where, in stating the amount in a note, the word "dollars" only is used, the court will intend current money of New Jersey to be meant. Beardsley v. Southmayd, 14 N. J. Law (2 J. S. Green) 534, 543.

"Dollar," as used in an indictment charging defendant with having passed a counterfeit dollar, does not import a coin coined by the mint of the United States, the Mexican dollar having been legalized by St. 1834, c. 71. Commonwealth v. Stearns, 51 Mass. (10 Metc.) 256, 257.

The word "dollars" imparts to the common understanding the meaning of a thing of value, and, when the charge is that defendant stole "sixty dollars" in United States currency, it means by common understanding that that amount of money in coin, bank notes, or notes issued by the government of the United States was stolen by him. Leonard v. State, 115 Ala. 80, 82, 22 South. 564.

Bank notes.

"Money" is a generic term, and covers everything used by common consent as a representation of property, and passing currently from hand to hand as money, whether it be coin or paper. Bank paper is money when passed and received as such. The word "dollars" does not of necessity mean coin, for in common parlance there are paper dollars as well as silver dollars, and the word in that sense applies as well to the one as to the other. United States bank paper is payable in dollars, was lent and received as so many dollars, and an indictment charging it as "dollars" is supported by the proof that it was United States bank paper for that amount. Graham v. State, 24 Tenn. (5 Humph.) 40, 41.

In Act Dec. 22, 1840, providing that the salary of the president of a certain bank should be seven hundred dollars, and the cashier's one thousand eight hundred dollars, "dollars" legally means gold or silver, and for services rendered as such officers of the bank the officers acquired the right to demand and receive in payment gold or silver, and could not lawfully be compelled to accept the depreciated paper of the banks of the state. State Bank v. Crease, 6 Ark. (1 Eng.) 292, 295.

"Dollars," as used in a decree requiring an executor to account for a certain sum in dollars, means the constitutional currency of the country, and will not be held to apply to depreciated issue of worthless banks.

Bailey v. Dilworth, 18 Miss. (10 Smedes & M.) 404, 410, 48 Am. Dec. 760.

In an indictment charging defendant with usuriously receiving and reserving four dollars for the loan and forbearance of twenty dollars, etc., the word "dollars" does not include United States bank notes; hence proof of the receipt and reservation of bank notes would not sustain the indictment. McAuly v. State, 15 Tenn. (7 Yerg.) 526, 528.

The word "dollars" has a definite signification fixed by law, and it is laid down that when words have a known legal meaning, such, for example, as measures of quantity fixed by statute, parol evidence that the parties intended to use them in a sense different from their legal meaning, though it were still the customary and popular meaning, is not admissible. A contract made in Richmond, before the war, for the payment of so many "dollars," would not have been deemed payable in bank notes, though bank notes were then the common and practically the exclusive currency, and a note made within the Confederate States must be deemed payable in specie, when that was the lawful money of the Confederate States at the time the note became payable. Omohundro's Ex'r v. Crump (Va.) 18 Grat. 703, 706.

Bullion.

A note promising payment in "dollars in gold and silver" is, according to any fair interpretation or the probable understanding of the parties, a note for the direct payment of money, and cannot imply an undertaking to pay bullion dollars in gold and silver, or old silver, etc. Hart v. Flynn's Ex'r, 38 Ky. (8 Dana) 190, 191.

Confederate money.

Where a contract made in a Confederate state during the Civil War was payable in "dollars," it was presumed in law to mean lawful money of the United States (Miller v. Lacy, 33 Tex. 351, 352; Roane v. Green, 24 Ark. 210, 214; Wilcoxon v. Reynolds, 46 Ala. 529, 532; Hansbrough v. Utz, 75 Va. 959, 962); but it could be shown by parol that the parties intended that it was to be discharged in Confederate money (Riddle v. Hill's Adm'r, 51 Ala. 224, 225; Thorington v. Smith, 75 U. S. [8 Wall.] 1, 12, 13, 19 L. Ed. 361; Confederate Note Case, 86 U. S. [19 Wall.] 548, 557, 22 L. Ed. 196; Carmichael v. White, 58 Tenn. [11 Heisk.] 262, 267).

At common law, in an obligation to pay "dollars," this word would be interpreted to mean gold dollars if the contract was made in this country, but if made in a foreign country it would mean a dollar of that country, and parol evidence would be admitted to show where the contract was made, and the value of the dollar of the country where the contract was made as compared with our gold dollar. If the contract was made in the Confederate States, or where the military authorities of the Confederate government exercised control and Confederate notes constituted the currency, this fact might be shown, and the word "dollar," unexplained in the contract, would mean a Confederate note of one dollar. Bierne v. Brown's Adm'r, 10 W. Va. 748, 758.

Where a sale is made for "dollars," Confederate treasury notes are not within the term. Hill v. Erwin, 44 Ala. 661, 669.

The term "dollars," in a promissory note executed in New Orleans March 26, 1862, was construed, after the close of the Civil War, to mean dollars in the lawful money of the United States, and not Confederate dollars. Cook v. Lillo, 103 U. S. 792, 793, 26 L. Ed. 460.

"Dollars," as used in a promissory note executed in Georgia in 1859 and payable in 1860, in which the maker promises to pay a certain number of dollars, means dollars of the lawful money of the United States, and as it was not only executed, but came to maturity, before the civil strife began, no evidence will be permitted to give it a different signification. Stroughton v. Hill (U. S.) 23 Fed. Cas. 179, 180.

In the contract for the sale of land in South Carolina during the War of the Rebellion, where it was shown that the price was $81.75 per acre, when the real value of the land in gold at that time would have been about $26.70, the word "dollars" as so used should not be construed in its ordinary limited sense to mean dollars of the United States coinage, but was intended to represent Confederate currency, which was the basis of the contract. Chalmers v. Jones, 23 S. C. 463, 466.

Where land in Tennessee was sold in 1863, and a large part of the price had been paid in Confederate money, the word "dollars," as used in a note for a part of such price, should be construed to import Confederate money, and the holder after the war should not recover the face value of the note in Federal currency. Alderson v. Clear, 64 Tenn. (7 Heisk.) 667.

As coin of certain weight.

A contract to pay a certain number of "dollars" in gold or silver coin is an agreement to deliver a certain weight of standard gold, to be ascertained by a count of coins, each of which is certified to contain a definite proportion of that weight. Bronson v. Rodes, 74 U. S. (7 Wall.) 229, 250, 19 L. Ed. 141.

Taking the definition from the statute book, "dollar" is a silver coin weighing $412\frac{1}{2}$ grains, or a gold coin weighing $25\frac{1}{8}$ grains, of nine-tenths pure to one-tenth alloy of each metal. Borle v. Trott (Pa.) 5 Phila. 366, 404.

The government note payable in "dollars" intends coined dollars of the United States; a certain quantity in weight and fineness of gold or silver, authenticated as such by the stamp of the government. Bank of New York v. New York County Sup'rs, 74 U. S. (7 Wall.) 26, 30, 19 L. Ed. 60.

The term "dollar" has a known legal meaning, as much so as any other word or form of expression designating or having reference to a standard of measurement prescribed and established by law. It is a silver coin of a fixed weight and fineness, issued and made current by the authority of Congress, in the exercise of its constitutional power to that end. By the same authority other gold and silver coins are issued and made current, each as a legal equivalent of an ascertained number of dollars or fractions of a dollar. Undoubtedly the word "dollar" may be used in a contract in a sense other than this, its statute definition, and effect will be given to it accordingly if the intention to use it in such modified sense is so evidenced that the law can take cognizance of it. Austin v. Kinsman (S. C.) 13 Rich. Eq. 259, 262.

As coined dollar.

When from the judgment record it appears that the complaint was upon a contract which by law was payable in coin, the term "dollars," without the prefix of "coined," "gold," or "silver," in the subsequent parts of the record, means coined dollars. Ransford v. Marvin (N. Y.) 8 Abb. Prac. N. S. 432, 436.

As descriptive of value.

The term "dollar" is both the name of a coin and an expression of value. It may be that the phrase used is intelligible in common parlance, but, in an indictment charging the conversion of "nineteen thousand dollars" in money and in bank notes, without some description of their number or denomination, is insufficient. State v. Stimson, 24 N. J. Law (4 Zab.) 9, 27.

The term "dollar" is an expression of value as well as the name of a coin, and hence the word "dollar" is uncertain as a description, since it may be used to denote a number of cents or dimes, as well as a dollar proper, but is certain as an expression of value. State v. Barr, 38 Atl. 817, 61 N. J. Law, 181.

An information for robbery, describing the property as "twenty-five dollars in money," does not show that the property taken was of any value: "Twenty-five dollars in money" may, it is true, mean gold or silver coin of the United States or treasury notes, or any other denomination known and used and which circulates as money, or it may mean only some paper such as state bank bills or Confederate money or bills purporting to be of the value of $25. State v. Segermond, 19 Pac. 370, 372, 40 Kan. 107, 10 Am. St. Rep. 169.

In an indictment alleging a corrupt offer to give two dollars for the vote of a certain person, the word "dollars" will be understood to mean a specific sum of money, or money the value of which is fixed by the law of the United States, and sufficient without a further allegation, though "two dollars" was a value. State v. Downs, 47 N. E. 670, 671, 148 Ind. 324.

"Dollars" and "cents" have a well-recognized meaning as commonly used. The common definition is the unity of money by which values of commodities are measured. It is thus apparent that a defendant must have understood that he was charged with having in his possession, custody, and control money of the amount and value specified by the allegation in an indictment charging him with having in his possession and control a certain number of "dollars" and "cents." People v. Lammerts, 58 N. E. 22, 23, 164 N. Y. 137.

An indictment charging that the defendant stole "sixty dollars of the current gold coin" of the United States is equivalent to saying "sixty pieces of gold coin, called sixty dollars," there being in our money a piece of gold coin called a "dollar." McKane v. State, 11 Ind. 195.

As legal tender.

"Dollars," in a note payable in dollars, means legal money. Hightower v. Maull, 50 Ala. 495, 496.

A note payable in "dollars" can only be discharged by a payment or tender of legal tender funds. Lang v. Waters' Adm'r, 47 Ala. 624, 635.

The term "dollars," in a judgment for so many dollars, is to be understood as meaning dollars in legal money. Ex parte Norton, 44 Ala. 177, 189.

"Dollars," in a check, meant dollars in lawful money of the United States, and could not be explained by verbal agreement, custom, or any mercantile or other usage, to mean otherwise. Howes v. Austin, 35 Ill. 396, 398.

When a contract calls for the payment of a certain number of "dollars," without designating any particular kind of money, the presumption is that legal tender dollars are meant; but this presumption may be rebutted by showing that some other kind was intended. Taylor v. Bland, 60 Tex. 29, 30.

3 Wds. & P.—11

A contract for the payment of a certain sum of money in "silver or gold dollars" has no greater effect than if it had been to pay in the "lawful money of the country," and an offer of anything made legal tender money is a compliance with the contract. A paper dollar having been made equal to a gold dollar, it must be accepted as such in satisfaction of any contract for the payment of money, and no form or force of words can be used by contracting parties to give to a gold dollar a legal value as money above a paper dollar. A dollar is one hundred cents, no more, no less, whether it is silver, gold, or paper; and, when Congress declares that a paper dollar shall be current and pass for and represent and be of the value of one hundred cents, for all purposes of traffic and paying debts it becomes the equivalent of one hundred cents in any other substance or form. Wilson v. Morgan, 27 N. Y. Super Ct. (4 Rob.) 58, 68.

"Dollars," as used in a will containing a direction to invest twenty thousand dollars in some safe investment for the daughter of the testator, means the legal currency of the United States, and it does not mean dollars invested in bonds or stocks, either at the market or par value, or at the original cost to the testator. Halsted v. Meeker's Ex'rs, 18 N. J. Eq. (3 C. E. Green) 136, 139.

When it is provided that a payment shall be made in dollars, the meaning is manifest. The necessities of social and commercial intercourse, as well as the rules of evidence, require that ordinary words should be understood according to their common and ordinary acceptance; consequently, when an order or bill of exchange or any writing provides that payment shall be made in "dollars," it means lawful currency of the United States of America. Hinnemann v. Rosenbank, 39 N. Y. 98, 104.

In construing a contract made in one of the rebellious states in 1864, requiring the payment of a certain sum in dollars and cents, it was said on appeal that the trial court erred in refusing to give an instruction that the legal meaning of the terms "dollars" and "cents" is specie—that is, gold or silver—or whatever thing or article or paper the laws of the United States declared to be a legal tender, and that the word dollars in the note mean specie or legal tender notes of the United States. Miller v. Lacy, 33 Tex. 351, 353.

In the construction of statutes the word "money" or "dollars" shall be construed to mean lawful money of the United States. Rev. Code Del. 1893, c. 5, § 1, subd. 15.

An indictment charging the theft of "silver dollars in coin" will be presumed to mean United States silver dollars. Kirk v. State, 32 S. W. 1045, 85 Tex. Cr. R. 224.

As specie currency.

A promise to pay a specific sum in "dollars," or to pay so many dollars, is a contract to pay a particular kind of currency. It is a contract to pay a specie currency. Hilb v. Peyton (Va.) 22 Gratt. 550, 561.

As unit of value.

"Dollar" is the money unit of the United States, of the value of one hundred cents. State v. Downs, 47 N. E. 670, 671, 148 Ind. 324; United States v. Fuller, 20 Pac. 175, 177, 4 N. M. 358.

Evidently the word "dollar," as employed in the federal Constitution, means the money recognized and established in the express power vested in Congress to coin money and regulate the value thereof and of foreign coin, the framers of the Constitution having borrowed and adopted the word as used by the Continental Congress. In the ordinance of the 6th of July, 1785, and the 8th of August, 1786, it was enacted that the money unit of the United States should be $1, and that the money of account should be dollars and fractions of dollars as subsequently established in the ordinance establishing a mint. Per Clifford, J., dissenting in Legal Tender Cases, 79 U. S. (12 Wall.) 457, 623, 20 L. Ed. 287.

DOLLS.—DOLS.

"Dols." is in common use to express dollars, and its signification is well understood; and it is no objection to a verdict that the jury assessed the judgment at a fine of "ten dols." against each defendant. Short v. State (Tex.) 29 S. W. 1073.

"Dolls." is an abbreviation for "dollars," and, when used at the top of columns of figures in an assessment roll, is sufficient information that the figures appearing on the roll under the same were employed to indicate that they meant so many dollars. Link v. City of Litchfield, 31 N. E. 123, 125, 126, 141 Ill. 469; Salisbury v. Shirley, 5 Pac. 104, 106, 66 Cal. 223.

DOMAIN.

See "National Domain"; "Public Domain."

Domain is "the ownership of land; immediate or absolute ownership; paramount or ultimate ownership; an estate or patrimony which one has in his own right; land of which one is absolute owner." People v. Shearer, 30 Cal. 645, 658 (quoting Burrill, Law Dict.).

DOVE-SHAPED.

By the claim of reissued patent No. 10,418, for improvements in ship's pumps, to a bucket which is "dome-shaped," is meant a bucket having the form of an inverted cup or half globe. Russell v. Hyde (U. S.) 39 Fed. 614, 615.

DOMESTIC.

Of or pertaining to one's house or home, or one's household or family; relating to home life; as domestic concerns, life, duties, cares, happiness, worship, servants. Webster.

DOMESTIC ANIMALS.Dog.

"Domestic animals," as used in Civ. Code, § 5883, authorizing the General Assembly to "impose a tax upon such domestic animals as from their nature and habits are destructive of other property," includes dogs, a dog being so classified by the fundamental law of the state. Wilcox v. State, 28 S. E. 981, 101 Ga. 563, 39 L. R. A. 709.

"Domestic animals," as used in Rev. St. c. 127, § 1, imposing a penalty for the killing or wounding of domestic animals, means animals that in their domestic state furnish some support to the family or add to the wealth of the community, and does not include dogs. State v. Harriman, 75 Me. 562, 564, 46 Am. Rep. 423.

"Domesticated animals," within the meaning of Pen. Code, art. 733, which provides that the term "personal property" shall include all domesticated animals, when of some specific value, includes dogs, and therefore a dog may be the subject of theft, under statutes defining theft as the fraudulent taking of corporeal personal property. Hurley v. State, 17 S. W. 455, 457, 30 Tex. App. 333, 28 Am. St. Rep. 916. See, also, State v. Sumner, 2 Ind. 377, 378.

The word "domestic," as employed in a statute for the incorporation of associations for the improvement of breeds of domestic animals, means "belonging to the house," and hence includes a dog. People v. Campbell (N. Y.) 4 Parker, Cr. R. 386, 393.

Hog.

See "Beast."

Horse or mule.

Judicial notice will be taken that the term "domestic animal" includes a mule, and therefore cruelly beating a mule is within the statute prohibiting the cruel beating of any domestic animal. State v. Gould, 26 W. Va. 258, 264.

"Domestic animals," as used in a statute authorizing payment of damages for injuries to domestic animals, includes horses. Osborn v. Selectmen of Lenox, 84 Mass. (2 Allen) 207, 209.

DOMESTIC BUSINESS.

See "Ordinary Domestic Business."

DOMESTIC COMMERCE.

"Domestic commerce" is commerce which is entirely within one state. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Railroad Commission of Tennessee (U. S.) 19 Fed. 679, 701.

DOMESTIC CORPORATION.

A "domestic corporation" is a corporation created by or under the laws of the state, or located in the state and created by or under the laws of the United States, or by or pursuant to the laws in force in the colony of New York before the 19th day of April in the year 1775. Code Civ. Proc. N. Y. 1899, § 3343, subd. 18. See, also, Plimpton v. Bigelow (N. Y.) 12 Abb. N. C. 202, 221; First Nat. Bank v. Doying (N. Y.) 13 Daly, 509, 510; In re Cushing's Estate, 40 Misc. Rep. 505, 507, 82 N. Y. Supp. 795, 796; Farmers' & Mechanics' Nat. Bank v. Rogers (N. Y.) 1 N. Y. Supp. 757, 758.

The term "domestic corporation" includes not only corporations originally organized under the laws of the state, but also a corporation formed by the consolidation of a domestic and foreign corporation. In re St. Paul & N. P. Ry. Co., 30 N. W. 432, 433, 36 Minn. 85.

In the chapter relating to insurance, "domestic" designates those companies incorporated or formed in the commonwealth. Rev. Laws Mass. 1902, p. 1120, c. 118, § 1. See, also, Ky. St. 1903, § 751; Civ. Code Ala. 1896, § 2575; Shannon's Code Tenn. 1896, § 3274; Rev. St. Me. 1883, p. 459, c. 49, § 86.

The word "domestic," as used in the title relating to insurance, telegraph, telephone, electric light, express companies, religious societies, and limited partnerships, when applied to a corporation, company, or copartnership, shall mean organized under the laws of this state, and the word "foreign," when so applied, shall mean not organized under the laws of this state. V. S. 1894, 4164.

Municipal corporation.

The municipal corporations of this state are not "domestic corporations" thereof, within the meaning of that term as used in section 1778 of the Code of Civil Procedure, providing that "in an action against a foreign or domestic corporation to recover damages for the non-payment of a promissory note, or other evidence of debt, for the absolute payment of money upon demand, or at a particular time, * * * unless the defendant serves with a copy of his answer or demurrer, a copy of an order of a judge directing that the issues presented by the pleadings be tried, the plaintiff may take judgment as in case of default." Moran v. Long Island City (N. Y.) 38 Hun, 122, 123.

DOMESTIC COURTS.

The term "domestic courts," within the meaning of statutes in reference to the proof by attested copy of domestic judgments, includes the judgments of the federal or district courts within the state. "So far as these courts derive their existence and jurisdiction from the Constitution and laws of the United States, they may be considered 'foreign' in a limited sense; but in the exercise of their jurisdiction in the administration of justice, they may properly be considered as 'domestic' courts." Dickinson v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co., 7 W. Va. 390, 417.

DOMESTIC DISTILLED SPIRITS.

"Domestic distilled spirits," as used in a statute relating to the inspection of liquors, meant those manufactured within the state. Commonwealth v. Giltinan, 64 Pa. (14 P. F. Smith) 100, 103.

DOMESTIC FIXTURES.

"Domestic fixtures" are all such articles as a tenant attaches to a dwelling house in order to render his occupation more comfortable or convenient, and may be separated from it without doing substantial injury, such as furnaces, stoves, cupboards, and shelves, bells, bell pulls, gas fixtures, etc.; or things merely ornamental, as painted wainscots, pier and chimney glasses, although attached to the walls with screws, marble chimney pieces, grates, beds nailed to the walls, window blinds and curtains. All these articles, whether useful or ornamental, are in a manner necessary to the tenant's domestic comfort; and, being easily severed from the house, are capable of being equally useful to him in any other house he may occupy, and therefore he may remove them. But things which he attaches in a more permanent manner, in order to complete it, such as hearthstones, doors and windows, closets, presses, locks and keys, he cannot take away, because such things are peculiarly adapted to the house in which they are fixed, and, if taken away, are injurious to the freehold. All substantial additions made to the house also become a part of the freehold, and are immovable, such as conservatories, greenhouses, hot-houses, pig sties, stables, wash houses, and other outhouses. Neither can the tenant remove shrubbery or flowers planted by him in the garden. Wright v. Du Bignon, 40 S. E. 747, 750, 114 Ga. 765, 57 L. R. A. 669 (citing Taylor, Landl. & Ten.).

DOMESTIC JUDGMENT.

The judgment of a state court will be considered by the federal court sitting within the territorial limits of the state in which the same is rendered as a "domestic judgment." Owens v. Gotzian (U. S.) 18 Fed. Cas. 927, 928.

A judgment of the Circuit Court of the United States rendered in the Southern District of California is to be treated as a "domestic judgment" in Connecticut, and stands, in respect to its proof, and also to its essential nature, in any court of Connecticut, as if it had been rendered by another court of this state. Barber v. International Co., 51 Atl. 857, 858, 74 Conn. 652, 92 Am. St. Rep. 246.

DOMESTIC MANUFACTURES.

"Domestic manufactures," as used by a state in its legislative acts, means, as a general thing, those within its jurisdiction, that being the first sense of the expression. Commonwealth v. Giltinan, 64 Pa. (14 P. F. Smith) 100, 103.

DOMESTIC MESSAGE.

Where the initial and terminal points are both in the same state, and the telegram is transmitted over the wires of the same company, and concerns only citizens of that state, the message is a "domestic" message, and its character in that respect is not altered by the circumstance that the line passes in part over territory of another state, nor is it affected by the fact that the company has established a railroad office in such other state. Western Union Tel. Co. v. Reynolds, 41 S. E. 856, 857, 100 Va. 459, 93 Am. St. Rep. 971.

DOMESTIC NAVIGATION.

Ships are engaged in "foreign navigation" when passing to or from a foreign country, and in "domestic navigation" when passing from place to place within the United States. Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 4166; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 3470; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 387.

DOMESTIC PURPOSES.

"Domestic purposes," as used in an ordinance fixing water rates for domestic purposes, include all uses of water which contribute to the health, comfort, and convenience of the family in the enjoyment of their dwelling as a home. Crosby v. City Council of Montgomery, 18 South. 723, 726, 108 Ala. 498.

The phrase "domestic purposes," as contained in the chapter relating to water rights and irrigation, shall be construed to include water for the household, and a sufficient amount for the use of domestic animals kept with and for the use of the household. Civ. Code Idaho 1901, § 2591.

The term "domestic purposes," as used in section 43, art. 2, c. 939, Comp. St. 1901, has reference to the use of water for domestic purposes, permitted to the riparian proprietor by common law, which ordinarily involves but little interference with the water of a stream, or its flow, and does not contemplate diversion of large quantities of water in canals or pipe lines. Crawford v. Hathaway County (Neb.) 93 N. W. 781, 797, 60 L. R. A. 889.

DOMESTIC RATES.

The words "domestic rates," appearing in the provision of a contract between a waterworks company and the city, are used to signify rates allowed to be charged where water is furnished for domestic purposes. Birmingham Waterworks Co. v. Truss, 33 South. 657, 135 Ala. 530.

DOMESTIC REMEDY.

Quinine is not a "domestic remedy" within an act regulating the practice of pharmacy, and providing that it should not interfere with the sale of the usual domestic remedies by retail dealers. Cook v. People, 17 N. E. 849, 125 Ill. 278.

DOMESTIC SERVANTS—DOMESTICS.

"Domestics" are menial servants. Ex parte Meason (Pa.) 5 Bin. 167, 182.

A person hired for an hour to carry wood from the street to the back yard, and passing through a house in such labor, is not a "domestic servant," so as to be relieved on that account from the increased penalty imposed on stealing from a house. Williams v. State, 41 Tex. 649, 650.

The term "domestic servant," as used in that provision of the Code which enacts that an entry into a house for the purpose of committing a theft, unless the same is effected by actual breaking, is not burglary when the same is done by a domestic servant or other inhabitant of the house, means a servant who lives in the house, and does not extend to a servant whose employment is out of doors and not in the house, or to a lodger or visitor. Wakefield v. State, 41 Tex. 556, 558.

The words "domestic servant" in Act Cong. Feb. 26, 1885, c. 164, 23 Stat. 332, and the amendments thereto of February 23, 1887, c. 220, 24 Stat. 415 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1290], prohibiting the immigration of aliens, under contract of labor, into this country, save domestic servants, do not include one whose labor will be devoted in part to the production of merchandise which competes with the products of others whose entire attention is given to manufacturing such products, as where part of the labor of the servant would be in the fitting of surplus dairy products for the market. In re Cummings (U. S.) 32 Fed. 75, 76.

The phrase "personal or domestic servant," as used in Act Cong. Feb. 26, 1885, c. 164, 23 Stat. 332 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1290], prohibiting the immigration of aliens under contract for labor, and providing that the provisions of the act shall not apply to persons employed strictly as personal or domestic servants, embraces an under coachman, whose duties are partly to assist in keeping stables, horses, and carriages in good order, but principally to drive the horses when his employer or any of his family go out in carriages, or to accompany the younger members of the family when they go out on horseback, and who boards with his employer's coachman, and who sleeps in a room over the coachhouse. In re Howard (U. S.) 63 Fed. 263, 264.

Boarder.

"Domestics," as defined by Bouvier in his Law Dictionary, are those who reside in the house with the master they serve. The term does not extend to workmen and laborers employed out of doors. By Webster a "domestic" is "a servant or hired laborer residing with the family," and hence a boarder in a boarding house is not a domestic. Ullman v. State, 1 Tex. App. 220, 221, 28 Am. Rep. 405.

Butcher.

Within the meaning of the Texas statute which makes the act of taking property from his employer by a domestic servant a less offense than the same taking by another, a "domestic servant" is one who is employed as a house servant or outdoor worker, and who has general access to the premises. A butcher who was hired for one day to butcher and cut up beef is not a "domestic servant" within the meaning of the statute above referred to. Richardson v. State, 43 Tex. 456, 457.

Farm hand.

A "domestic servant" means a servant who resides in the house with the master he serves, but does not include a servant whose employment is outside, and not in the house. Thus, a farm hand who sleeps and eats outside of the master's house, though he performs chores inside the house when directed, is not a "domestic servant" within the legal meaning of the term. Waterhouse v. State, 2 S. W. 889, 21 Tex. App. 663.

Gardener.

In a will directing testator's executor to pay each of his domestic servants who should be with him or in his service at the time of his decease such sums of money as should be equivalent to two years of the annual amount of their respective wages, "domestic servant" cannot be construed to include a servant who has charge of the garden at the mansion, but who lives in a cottage in the garden, and has an annual sum from his employer in addition to his yearly wages. Vaughan v. Booth, 13 Eng. Law & Eq. 351, 354.

Hotel servant.

Though servants or "domestics" have been declared to be those who receive wages and stay in the house of a person paying and employing them, such as valets, footmen, cooks, etc., the term would not include persons in such line of employment in a public hotel or tavern. Cook v. Dodge, 6 La. Ann. 276, 277.

Laborer distinguished.

See "Laborer."

DOMESTIC SHIP.

A ship in a port of the state to which it belongs is called a "domestic ship." Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 963; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 4167; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 3471; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 388.

DOMESTIC USE.

The expression "domestic use," as used in 18 & 19 Vict. c. 29, requiring a water company to furnish to occupiers of houses who should demand it a supply of water for domestic use, would include the use of water for a horse, and for washing a carriage of an occupier, who was assessed on his house and premises, including a coach house, stable, and yard. Busby v. Chesterfield Waterworks & Gaslight Co., El., Bl. & El. 176, 182.

"Domestic uses," as used in Const. art. 16, § 6, giving a preference to those using water for domestic uses, means such uses as the riparian owner has at common law to take water for himself, his family, or his stock, and the like, but does not authorize a ditch company to divert water from a public stream for domestic purposes by means of a large canal, in violation of prior vested rights of others to the water for other purposes. Montrose Canal Co. v. Loutsenhizer Ditch Co., 48 Pac. 532, 534, 23 Colo. 233.

DOMESTIC WINE.

The term "domestic wine" shall mean wine made from berries, grapes, and other fruits grown in the state. Pol. Code Ga. 1895, § 1523; Pen. Code Ga. 1895, § 449.

DOMESTICATED ANIMALS.

See "Domestic Animal."

DOMICILE.

See "Commercial Domicile"; "De Facto Domicile"; "Elected Domicile"; "Natural Domicile."

"Domicile" is that place where a person has fixed his habitation, without any present intention of removing therefrom. Two things must concur to constitute a domicile: First, residence; second, the intention of making the place of residence the home of the party. There must be both the fact and intent. Appeal of Carey, 75 Pa. (25 P. F. Smith) 201, 205; Fry's Election Case, 71 Pa. (21 P. F. Smith) 302, 309, 10 Am. Rep. 698; Neff's Lessee v. Neff (Pa.) 1 Bin. 350, 351; Hayes v. Tennant, 31 W. Va. 790, 792, 8 S. E. 596, 597, 13 Am. St. Rep. 896). It is one's permanent, not pretended, home. It must be actual, not intended. It must be bona fide; not a residence taken merely for the purpose of obtaining a divorce, and to be given up afterwards. Commonwealth v. Ainsworth, 20 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 123, 125; State v. Casinova's Adm'rs, 1 Tex. 401, 407; Ayer v. Weeks, 18

Atl. 1108, 1109, 65 N. H. 248, 6 L. R. A. 716, 23 Am. St. Rep. 37. "Domicile" has also been defined as: "A residence at a particular place, accompanied with positive presumptive proof of continuing there for an unlimited time." Desebats v. Berquier (Pa.) 1 Bin. 336; State ex rel. Beckett v. Collector of Bordentown, 32 N. J. Law (3 Vroom) 192, 194; State v. Smith, 64 Mo. App. 313, 319. A place where a person has his home or principal home, or where he has his family and principal place of business; that residence from which there is no present intention of moving, or to which there is an intention to return. In re Zerega's Will, 20 N. Y. Supp. 417, 418 (quoting Cent. Dict.). The place where a person lives and has his home. Mitchell v. United States, 88 U. S. (21 Wall.) 350, 352, 22 L. Dec. 597. The place where a man carries on his established business or professional occupation, and has a home and permanent residence. Pearce v. State, 33 Tenn. (1 Sneed) 63, 66, 60 Am. Dec. 135. The place where one permanently resides. Tiller v. Abernathy, 37 Mo. 196. The place where a man establishes his abode, makes the seat of his property, and exercises his civil and political rights. Chase v. Miller, 41 Pa. (5 Wright) 403, 420. The place where one has established and resides with his wife, children, and family, and the greater part of his movable property. Holliman's Heirs v. Peebles, 1 Tex. 673, 687. The actual or constructive presence of a person in a given place, coupled with the intention to remain there permanently. Yale v. West Middle School Dist., 22 Atl. 295, 296, 59 Conn. 489, 13 L. R. A. 161; In re Town of Hector, 24 N. Y. Supp. 475, 481. "Where one has his true, fixed, permanent home and principal establishment, and to which, whenever he is absent, he has the intention of returning." In re Dimock, 32 N. Y. Supp. 927, 929, 11 Misc. Rep. 610 (quoting Story, Conf. Law [Ed. 1846] c. 3, p. 31); Hart v. Lindsey, 17 N. H. 235, 244, 43 Am. Dec. 597; Gilman v. Gilman, 52 Me. 165, 174, 83 Am. Dec. 502; State v. De Cassino's Adm'rs, 1 Tex. 101, 107.

The civil law defines "domicile" to be the place where the domestic hearth has been established, from which the resident does not depart except for a temporary purpose and animo revertendi. Morgan v. Nunes, 54 Miss. 308, 310.

A man's "domicile" is his house, where he establishes his household, and surrounds himself with the apparatus and comforts of life. Sanderson v. Ralston, 20 La. Ann. 312, 314.

A person's home is that place or country in which he in fact resides with the intention of residence, or in which, having so resided, he continues actually to reside, though no longer retaining the intention of residence, or with regard to which, having so resided there, he retains the intention of residence, though he in fact no longer resides there. Dacey, Dom. p. 44. Thus a resident of New York had his domicile there though he had spent a large portion of his life in Europe and died there, he always declaring himself a citizen of New York. Cruger v. Phelps, 47 N. Y. Supp. 61, 68, 21 Misc. Rep. 252.

The "domicile" or residence of a person of full age, and laboring under no disability, is the place or county where the family of such person shall permanently reside. Daniel v. Sullivan, 46 Ga. 277, 278.

The "domicile" of a man is not merely the place in which he lives, but the place in which he is required to perform the obligations due him from the government in which he lives and from which he receives protection. Town of North Yarmouth v. Town of West Gardiner, 58 Me. 207, 211, 4 Am. Rep. 279.

The "domicile" of a married man is the place of his family's habitual dwelling, although he may be conducting business elsewhere. It is not to be denied that domicile may exist independent of "habitation," using that term as denoting actually abiding within a place; but contemplated habitation or rehabilitation is also an element in the legal idea of "domicile" when actual habitation does not exist. The dwelling in one place, which is thus consistent with continued domicile in another, is, under certain circumstances, equal to commercial domicile, the residence "negotiorum ratione" of the civil law. Chaine v. Willson (N. Y.) 16 How. Prac. 552, 558.

A man may acquire a "domicile" if he be personally present in a place and elect that as his home, even if he never design to remain there always, but design at the end of some short time to remove and acquire another. In the case of Sanders v. Getchell, 76 Me. 158, 49 Am. Rep. 606, it was held that bodily residence in a place, coupled with an intention to make such a place a home, would establish a "domicile" or residence. Brittenham v. Robinson, 48 N. E. 616, 617, 18 Ind. App. 502.

A person's "domicile" depends on the place where he actually resides, not on the place where his moral or legal duties call him to reside. Scranton Poor District v. Directors of Poor of Danville and Mahoning, 106 Pa. 448, 451 (citing Inhabitants of Hallo- well v. Inhabitants of Saco, 5 Me. [5 Greenl.] 144).

A man may have a "domicile" in a country to which he is an alien, and where he has no political relations, and of which he is not an inhabitant. Harvard College v. Gore, 22 Mass. (5 Pick.) 370, 372.

Though a merchant having a fixed residence and carrying on business at the place of his birth acquires a foreign commercial character by occasional visits to a foreign country, he acquires no "domicile" therein. The Nereide, 13 U. S. (9 Cranch) 388, 3 L. Ed. 769.

One who is residing in a place with the purpose of remaining there for an indefinite period of time, and without returning and keeping up any animus revertendi, or intention to return, to the former home which he has abandoned, will have his "domicile" in the place of his actual residence. Where the question is one of national domicile, this statement may not be correct, for such a condition of facts might not manifest an intention of expatriation. Inhabitants of Wilbraham v. Inhabitants of Ludlow, 99 Mass. 587, 592 (citing Sleeper v. Paige, 81 Mass. [15 Gray] 349; Whitney v. Inhabitants of Sherborn, 94 Mass. [12 Allen] 111).

"Domicile" is acquired by residence and the animus manendi—the intent to remain—and does not involve the idea that a change of domicile may not thereafter be made; but this in no wise affects the pre-existing legal status of the individual as to his domicile while it continues. Newton v. Mahoning County Com'rs, 100 U. S. 548, 562, 25 L. Ed. 710.

While no exact and full definition to cover all cases can be given of the word "domicile," it was said in Lyman v. Fiske, 34 Mass. (17 Pick.) 231, 234, 28 Am. Dec. 293, that: "In general terms, one may be designated as an 'inhabitant' of that place which constitutes the principal seat of his residence, of his business, pursuits, connections, attachments, political and municipal relations. It is manifest, therefore, that it embraces the fact of residence at a place with the intent to regard it and make it his home." Phillips v. City of Boston, 67 N. E. 250, 251, 183 Mass. 314. See, also, Thorndike v. City of Boston, 42 Mass. (1 Metc.) 242, 245, where it was said that "no exact definition can be given of 'domicile'; it depends upon no one fact or combination of circumstances, but from the whole taken together, which must be determined in each particular case. It is a maxim that every man must have a domicile somewhere, and also that he can have but one. It follows that his existing domicile continues until he acquires another, and, vice versa, by acquiring a new domicile he relinquishes his former one. Very slight circumstances must often decide the question. It depends upon the preponderance of the evidence in favor of two or more places, and it may often occur that the evidence of facts tending to establish the domicile in one place would be entirely conclusive were it not for the existence of facts and circumstances of a still more conclusive and decisive character which fixes it beyond question in another. So, on the contrary, very slight circumstances may fix one's domicile, if not controlled by more conclusive facts fixing it in another place."

"The word 'domicile,' in the French law, according to Mr. Duponzeau, the learned translator of the French Commercial Code, has a general and a particular technical meaning. In the former sense it means the party's usual place of residence, but in the language of legal practice it signifies a specific place of abode, declared, assumed, or pointed out by the instrument or contract." Woodworth v. Bank of America (N. Y.) 19 Johns. 391, 417, 10 Am. Dec. 239.

"The term 'domicile' seems to possess quite as much elasticity as 'residence,' for though there can be but one principal domicile for cases of testacy or intestacy, yet there may be two or more domiciles for different purposes, such as a domicile of allegiance, a political, matrimonial, commercial, or forensic domicile." Isham v. Gibbins (N. Y.) 1 Bradf. Sur. 69, 83.

Every human being has a "fixed domicile." Originally, it is the place where his parents lived at the time of his birth, which continues until he has acquired another; for although there are supposed exceptional cases, as gypsies, vagrants, or those wandering vagabonds or outcasts who do not know where or when they were born, it is not so in fact, for the place of birth, when known, is the "domicile." In re Bye (N. Y.) 2 Daly, 525, 528.

As affected by absence.

Change of domicile, see "Change."

"Domicile" is the place where one permanently resides, and a person's "domicile" is the place in which he last resided until he forms a new one by an intention to reside elsewhere. The mere leaving of a place with the intention not to return will not take from that place its character of "domicile" until the person leaving forms the intention of residing elsewhere permanently. Rockingham v. Springfield, 9 Atl. 241, 243, 59 Vt. 521.

A person does not lose his domicile in one state by removing to another to reside temporarily, and with the intention of returning to his former residence at a definite future time. The place where a person lives is to be taken to be his domicile, unless facts are adduced to establish the contrary. Collins v. City of Ashland (U. S.) 112 Fed. 176, 177.

Actual residence is not indispensable to retain a domicile after it is once acquired, but is retained by the mere intention not to change it and adopt another. Hayes v. Hayes, 74 Ill. 312, 316; Hart v. Lindsey, 17 N. H. 235, 244, 43 Am. Dec. 597.

Two things must concur to establish "domicile"—the fact of residence, and the intention of remaining. These two must exist, or must have existed, in combination. There must have been an actual residence. The character of residence is of no importance, and, if domicile has once existed, mere temporary absence will not destroy it, however long continued. Munro v. Munro, 7 Clark & F. 842, 877 (quoted in White v. Tennant, 31 W. Va. 790-792, 8 S. E. 596, 597, 13 Am. St. Rep. 896).

There can never be in the eye of the law more than one domicile of citizenship, and that continues, in the case of a citizen, until he himself renounces it absolutely and takes up another in its stead, and such a domicile is not lost by absence in or out of the state. Warren v. Board of Registration, 40 N. W. 553, 72 Mich. 398, 2 L. R. A. 203.

"Domicile," as the word implies, is a man's house, his home; and it may continue to be such for years without being actually inhabited by him. It is a place where he may reside in fact, or for many purposes may be deemed to reside. A person may have two domiciles at once; as, for example, if a foreigner coming to this country should establish two houses, one in New York and the other in New Orleans, and pass one-half of the year in each, he would for most purposes have two domiciles. Holmes v. Oregon & C. Ry. Co. (U. S.) 5 Fed. 523, 527.

Home distinguished.

"Home" and "domicile" may and generally do mean the same thing, but a home may be relinquished and abandoned while the domicile of the party, upon which many civil rights and duties depend, may, in legal contemplation, remain. Thus the "home," within the meaning of a statute providing that a pauper shall be deemed to have a settlement in the town where he dwells and has his home, may be lost by his leaving the town where he has his home without intending to return, though he fails to establish a home in any other place, and this is so without regard whether he loses his "domicile" or not. Inhabitants of Exeter v. In- habitants of Brighton, 15 Me. (3 Shep.) 58, 60. See, also, King v. King, 56 S. W. 534, 538, 155 Me. 406.

Judge Grier, in White v. Brown (U. S.) 29 Fed. Cas. 982, says it may be correctly said that no one word is more nearly synonymous with the word "domicile" than the word "home." In re Zerega's Will, 20 N. Y. Supp. 417, 418.

"Home" is not synonymous with "domicile," but has a more restricted meaning. Inhabitants of Jefferson v. Inhabitants of Washington, 19 Me. (1 App.) 293; Dean v. Cammon, 16 S. E. 444, 446, 37 W. Va. 123.

As house, precinct, ward, county, or state.

To constitute a "residence," there must be an actual home in the sense of having no other home, whether he intends to reside there permanently, or for a definite or indefinite length of time. Residence, therefore, is a question depending upon fact and intention, and, if so, it may be applicable to a particular spot, or to a whole country. A person who wanders from country to country, with no intention of remaining fixedly anywhere, acquires no new residence. On the other hand, one who confines his wanderings to a particular country or locality, but declines to fix himself upon some particular spot, can very properly be said to be a "resident" of that country or locality. "Home," "domicile," or "residence" may therefore include a spot or a wide area. Each of these words may be applied either to a house, a precinct, a ward, a county, or a state. Langhammer v. Munter, 31 Atl. 300, 301, 80 Md. 518, 27 L. R. A. 330.

Intention as governing.

"Domicile" includes residence with an intention to remain, but no length of residence without intention of remaining constitutes "domicile." Andrews v. Mundy, 14 S. E. 414, 417, 36 W. Va. 22; Munroe v. Williams, 16 S. E. 533, 535, 37 S. C. 81, 19 L. R. A. 665.

It has been said that every person has in law a "domicile," or home, and that the original domicile can only be lost by the acquisition of another. It is acquired by act and intention. The intention gives character and effect to the act, as where a new abode is taken up with the intention to abandon the old one. Morgan v. Munes, 54 Miss. 308, 310.

"The 'domicile' is the habitation fixed in any place with an intention of always staying there, while simple 'residence' is much more temporary in its character. No length of residence without the intention of remaining constitutes 'domicile.'" A person's domicile may be one place, while his residence for the time being may be another. City of New York v. Genet (N. Y.) 4 Hun, 487, 489; Bartlett v. City of New York, 7 N. Y. Super. Ct. (5 Sandf.) 44, 47.

The true basis and foundation of domicile is the intention, the quo animo, of the residence of a person. The apparent or avowed intention of constant residence, not the manner of it, constitutes a "domicile." Bradley v. Lowry (S. C.) Speers, Eq. 25; Hairston v. Hairston, 27 Miss. (5 Cushm.) 704, 711, 61 Am. Dec. 500.

The "domicile" of a man is his home or place of abode. Where a person lives is prima facie his domicile, but there must be an intention of retaining such place as a domicile. Mere intention alone is not sufficient to create a domicile. Venable v. Paulding, 19 Minn. 488, 493 (Gil. 422, 425).

"The right of domicile is acquired by a residence, even of a few days, if it appears that the intention of removing to the place of residence was to make a permanent settlement, or for an indefinite time." The Venus, 12 U. S. (8 Cranch) 253, 279.

The term "domicile" has been defined in different language by courts and law-writers. A terse definition is as follows: "'Domicile' is a place where the person has fixed his habitation, without any present intention of removing therefrom." This definition, while it has met with the approval of some courts, is in our judgment too narrow, unless the intention to remove be limited to the time of fixing the residence. The mere fact of an intention to remove from the place where one is domiciled cannot, we think, operate against the bona fides of residence. The existence of a mere purpose to go elsewhere to live is not sufficient to defeat the legal residence in the place where a person is actually domiciled. Graham v. Graham, 81 N. W. 44, 45, 9 N. D. 88.

To acquire a domicile, there must be a residence in a place, and an intention to make that place one's home. Viles v. City of Waltham, 32 N. E. 901, 902, 157 Mass. 542, 34 Am. St. Rep. 311.

Domicile is a question of intention, and it does not conclusively follow that the place where a person votes, and where, for business reasons, he rents a house in which he lives for 16 months prior to his death, is his legal domicile, if there is sufficient evidence to show that he never intended to abandon his original place of domicile. In re Mintzer's Estate, 13 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 465, 467.

A minor, whose parents reside at the domicile of his birth, in general retains that domicile. If, on coming of age, he go elsewhere to reside, without an intention of removing thence to another fixed place, the place to which he thus goes becomes his domicile. Hart v. Lindsey, 17 N. H. 235, 244, 43 Am. Dec. 597.

Reside synonymous.

"Residing on the lands," as used in the Indian treaty of 1819, art. 8, granting to each and every head of an Indian family residing on the lands that which now or may be hereafter surrendered to the United States, etc., should be construed to mean a residence of a permanent, and not of a temporary nature for a special purpose. In other words, it is the being domiciled on the ceded lands, or having his domicile there. Morgan v. Fowler, 10 Tenn. (2 Yerg.) 450, 455.

Ordinarily the word "resides" may be construed as having a residence in a place and to be there settled as a home, and in our laws relating to taxation, voting, and settlement of paupers it has the same meaning as "domicile." Phillips v. City of Boston, 67 N. E. 250, 251, 183 Mass. 314; Houghton v. Ault (N. Y.) 16 How. Prac. 77, 85, 86.

"Resides at his home," as used in a statement that where the family is broken up, by separation or the death of some of the members, the right of homestead continues in the former head of the family, "provided that he still resides at his old home," is to be taken in its legal and not literal sense, not requiring an actual occupancy, but only such occupancy as a homesteader may successfully show in answer to a charge of homestead abandonment. Thus, although not in the actual occupancy, yet if his absence therefrom is only temporary, for business or pleasure, necessity or convenience, it is still an occupancy. Euper v. Alkire, 37 Ark. 283; Flask v. Tindall, 39 Ark. 571; Marr v. Lewis, 31 Ark. 203, 25 Am. Rep. 553; Brown v. Watson, 41 Ark. 309; Gray v. Patterson, 46 S. W. 730, 731, 65 Ark. 373, 67 Am. St. Rep. 937.

In the several provincial statutes of 1692, 1701, and 1767, in reference to settlements for the purpose of the poor laws, the terms "coming to sojourn or dwell," "being an inhabitant," "residing and continuing one's residence," and "coming to reside and dwell," are frequently and variously used, and we think they are used indiscriminately to mean the same thing, namely, to designate the place of a person's domicile. This is defined in Const. c. 1, § 1, for another purpose, to be "the place where one dwelleth or hath his home." Inhabitants of Abington v. Inhabitants of North Bridgewater, 40 Mass. (23 Pick.) 170, 176.

"Resided," as used in Priv. St., uniting the old town of Woodridge and the new town of Bethany, and providing that all persons belonging to the old town and those absent therefrom should be deemed and taken to be inhabitants of such one of such towns as they last "resided" in, means domicile only, in contradistinction to such a residence as would by general law be necessary to confer a settlement. Town of Waterbury v. Town of Bethany, 18 Conn. 424, 429.

Residence distinguished.

"Domicile," in its popular sense, means one's fixed and settled abode or actual home, as distinguished from 'residence for a temporary purpose,' whether it be for health or pleasure, or some particular business." Shaeffer v. Gilbert, 20 Atl. 434, 435, 73 Md. 66; Town of Salem v. Town of Lyme, 29 Conn. 74, 79; Town of Fairfield v. Town of Easton, 49 Atl. 200, 201, 73 Conn. 735; Welkemp v. Loehr, 53 N. Y. Super. Ct. (21 Jones & S.) 79, 82; Bradley v. Lowry (S. C.) Speers, Eq. 1, 5, 39 Am. Dec. 142. A person who lives in town during the winter merely for the purpose of giving his children an education, and has his fixed permanent home in the county, cannot be said to be "domiciled" in the town, within the meaning of a law requiring a person to be domiciled in a place in order that his children may go to school there without paying tuition. Gardner v. Board of Education, 38 N. W. 433, 435, 5 Dak. 259.

The legal definition of the cognate terms "residence" and "domicile" vary with the circumstances of the case, and the mental constitution of judges and authors. "Residence" generally imports a personal presence, whereas, one may have a "domicile" in a place from which he is absent most of the time. But "residence" implies more than a temporary sojourn in a place. The Chinese Tax Cases (U. S.) 14 Fed. 338, 344.

"Residence," in the popular meaning of that word, is not synonymous with "inhabitaney" or "domicile." Thayer v. City of Boston, 124 Mass. 132, 147, 26 Am. Rep. 650; Briggs v. Inhabitants of Rochester, 82 Mass. (16 Gray) 337, 340.

The word "residence" has technically a more restricted meaning than "domicile." Chariton County v. Moberly, 59 Mo. 238, 242.

"Domicile" and "residence" are not convertible terms; domicile may be in one place, and the residence, for the time being, in another. Alston v. Newcomer, 42 Miss. 186, 192; Briggs v. Inhabitants of Rochester, 82 Mass. (16 Gray) 337, 340; Frost v. Brisbin (N. Y.) 19 Wend. 11, 12, 32 Am. Dec. 423; Hart v. Kip, 26 N. Y. Supp. 522, 524, 74 Hun. 412; Brown v. Crane, 13 South. 855, 69 Miss. 678; Stickney v. Chapman, 42 S. E. 68, 69, 115 Ga. 759; Keller v. Carr, 42 N. W. 292, 293, 40 Minn. 428; Guier v. O'Daniel (Pa.) 1 Bin. 349, 350, note, 1 Am. Lead. Cas. 733; Love v. Cherry, 24 Iowa, 204; Cohen v. Daniels, 25 Iowa, 88, 91; Pacific Mut. Life Ins.

Co. v. Tompkins (U. S.) 101 Fed. 539, 543, 41 C. C. A. 488; Collins v. City of Ashland (U. S.) 112 Fed. 175, 177; State v. Cunningham, 55 Atl. 654, 75 Vt. 332.

"Residence" and "domicile" may in some cases have the same meaning, but frequently they have other and inconsistent meanings, and import entirely different ideas. A "resident" of a place is one whose place of abode is there, and who has no present intention of removing therefrom. A married woman by operation of law may have a "domicile" in a place where she has never been, but it could not with any correctness of speech be said she was a "resident" of that place. A woman whose husband is a resident of one school district cannot be considered as a resident of another merely because of her former residence there, and her temporary presence in her father's family in the latter district. Dorsey v. Brigham, 52 N. E. 303, 307, 177 Ill. 250, 42 L. R. A. 809, 69 Am. St. Rep. 228.

There is a difference between "domicile" and "residence." "Residence" is used to indicate the place of abode, whether permanent or temporary. "Domicile" denotes a fixed permanent residence to which, when absent, one has the intention of returning. "Domicile" is composed of two elements, residence and intention, and both of these must concur. "Residence," without the requisite intention to remain, will not suffice to give one a domicile, nor will an intention to change one's domicile, unaccompanied by actual removal, constitute a "domicile." State v. Allen, 35 S. E. 990, 992, 48 W. Va. 154, 50 L. R. A. 284, 86 Am. St. Rep. 29.

"Residence" and "domicile" do not have the same meaning. The first is used to indicate the place of dwelling, whether permanent or temporary; the second to denote a fixed permanent residence to which, when absent, one has the intention of returning. The distinction is the same as is sometimes made between "actual residence" and "legal residence" or "inhabitaney." The actual residence is not always the legal residence or inhabitaney of a man. A foreign minister actually resides and is personally present at the port to which he is accredited, but his legal residence or inhabitaney and domicile are in his own country. Fitzgerald v. Arel, 16 N. W. 712, 713, 63 Iowa, 104, 50 Am. Rep. 733.

"Residence" is defined to be a place of abode; a dwelling; a habitation; the act of abiding or dwelling in a place for some continuance of time. "Residence" is often used to express different meanings according to the subject-matter, and is not synonymous with "domicile" or "legal residence," which means more than "residence." Cincinnati, H. & D. R. Co. v. Ives, 3 N. Y. Supp. 895.

"Domicile" has a more extensive signification than the term "residence." In addition to a residence, it embraces within its meaning the intention of making that residence the home of the party. Foster v. Hall, 23 Tenn. (4 Humph.) 346, 348; Long v. Ryan (Va.) 30 Grat. 718, 719.

"Domicile" is residence combined with intention. It has been accompanied with positive or presumptive proof of an intention to remain there for an unlimited time. A man can have but one domicile for one and the same purpose at any one time, though he may have numerous places of residence. His place of residence most generally is his place of domicile, but it obviously is not by any means necessarily so, for no length of residence without the intention of remaining will constitute domicile. Stout v. Leonard, 37 N. J. Law (8 Vroom) 492, 495.

A domicile is something more than a temporary residence, however long such stay may continue. The permanence which is to make it a residence does not depend solely upon past duration, but on the probability of a future continuance, growing out of the object of the sojourn in such place. The length of time necessary to establish a domicile cannot be determined by any fixed rule, but the nature of the business in which the party intends to be engaged may be looked at to determine the uncertainty or probability of the duration. Burrill v. Jewett, 25 N. Y. Super. Ct. (2 Rob.) 701, 702.

"Domicile" has a broader meaning than "residence"; it includes residence, but actual residence is not indispensable to retain a domicile after it is once acquired; it is retained by the mere intention not to change it. Krone v. Cooper, 43 Ark. 547, 549.

"Residence" is not synonymous with "domicile," for a man may have more than one place of residence, but he can have but one domicile. Savage v. Scott, 45 Iowa, 130, 133; Pacific Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Tompkins (U. S.) 101 Fed. 539, 543; Corel v. Chicago, R. I. & P. Ry. Co. (U. S.) 123 Fed. 452, 454; State v. Cunningham, 55 Atl. 654, 75 Vt. 332; Witbeck v. Marshall-Wells Hardware Co., 88 Ill. App. 101, 110.

"Domicile" and "residence," though often used as synonymous, have in law two distinct meanings. The essential distinction between "residence" and "domicile" is this: the first involves the intent to leave when the purpose for which he has taken up his abode ceases; the other has no such intent—the abiding is animo manendi. One may seek a place for the purpose of pleasure, business, or health; if his intent be to remain, it becomes his domicile; if his intent be to leave as soon as his purpose is accomplished, it is his residence. Perhaps the most satisfactory definition is that one is a resident of a place from which his departure is indefinite as to time and definite as to purpose, and for this purpose he has made the place his temporary home. Brisenden v. Chamberlain (U. S.) 53 Fed. 307, 311.

The difference between a "residence" and a "domicile" may not be capable of easy definition, but every one can see at least this distinction: A person domiciled in one state may, for temporary reasons, such as health, reside for one or more years in some other place deemed more favorable. He does not, by so doing, forfeit his domicile in the first state, or in any proper sense become a non-resident of it, unless some intention manifested by some act of abandoning his residence in the first state is shown. Walker's Estate v. Walker, 1 Mo. App. 404, 413; McFarlane v. Cornelius, 73 Pac. 325, 329, 43 Or. 513.

"Domicile" is the habitation fixed in any place with an intention of always staying there. No length of residence without the intent of remaining constitutes "domicile," while "residence" means the actual dwelling place for some continuance of time. Bartlett v. City of New York, 7 N. Y. Super. Ct. (5 Sandf.) 44, 47 (citing In re Thompson [N. Y.] 1 Wend. 43, 45, and Webster).

"Domicile," as used in a statute providing that a writ of attachment may issue when the defendant is about to remove out of the state with intent to change his domicile, denotes an opposite condition, with reference to habitation, to the words "not a resident," but not differing in degree. One who is not a resident of the state is one who has a domicile elsewhere. One who has a domicile in the state cannot be a nonresident while temporarily absent from the state. "Domicile" is ordinarily a word of broader meaning than "residence." Chariton County v. Moberly, 59 Mo. 238, 242.

A distinction has been recognized in Tennessee between "residence" and "nonresidence," within the meaning of the attachment laws, and "domicile" or "citizenship." Southern Ry. Co. v. McDonald (Tenn.) 59 S. W. 370, 373.

There is a wide difference between "domicile" and mere "residence." Of course, they may be and usually are at the same place, and it is quite obvious that they may be at different places. A domicile is but the established, fixed, permanent, and may therefore be said to be the ordinary, dwelling place or place of residence of a party, as distinguished from his temporary and transient, though actual, place of residence. One is his legal residence as distinguished from his temporary place of abode, and one is his home as distinguished from the place or places to which business or pleasure may temporarily call him. When a statute speaks of a residence which, if continued six years, will establish the settlement of a person, it must mean a permanent fixed residence, and not one which is temporary merely, since otherwise an absence from it of ever so short duration, and for an object wholly transient in its nature, would effectually interrupt it by the commencement of a residence in another place, it being wholly incompatible that two residences under such a statute should exist in the same person at the same time. Town of Salem v. Town of Lyme, 29 Conn. 74, 79.

There is a difference between a "residence" and a "domicile," which, however, may not be capable of easy definition; that is, it may be difficult to define both terms in such manner as to escape criticism. But every one can see at least this distinction: a person "domiciled" in one place may, for the sake of his health, "reside" one or more years in some place, the climate of which is supposed to be more favorable to his constitution. McFarlane v. Cornelius, 73 Pac. 325, 329, 43 Or. 513.

"Residence" and "domicile" are not treated as synonymous under the attachment laws of New York or Pennsylvania; so it is held that a person starting to leave the state, with the avowed intention of moving away, but not having actually passed the borders of the state, is still resident within the state, though intending to leave it, and is not subject to foreign attachment. Eberly v. Rowland (Pa.) 1 Pears. 312, 313.

In determining the question of residence for the purpose of an attachment, the distinction must always be kept in mind between it and domicile. The fact that a defendant never acquired a residence in another place, and had all the time during absence an intention to return and resume housekeeping with his family in this city, would be sufficient to constitute a "domicile" within this state. But the word "residence," as used in section 636 of the Code, means the abode or place where one actually lives, and not one's legal domicile. In other words, a reading of this section will show that it was intended to supply a method for the collection of debts by appropriating property of the debtor to be found within the state when proceedings against the debtor personally are impossible or liable to be made ineffectual, and thus it allows the use of the process in rem when process in personam could not be served. Rosenzweig v. Wood, 63 N. Y. Supp. 447, 449, 30 Misc. Rep. 297.

"Residence" and "domicile" are not synonymous terms as used in attachment laws, though the distinction is not always accurately drawn. It is the actual and not the legal residence which is meant in attachment statutes. "Domicile" includes residence with an intention to remain, while no length of residence without intention of remaining constitutes domicile. In Keller v. Carr, 40 Minn. 428, 42 N. W. 292, it was ruled that a debtor may remain or reside out of the state so long and under such circumstances as to be a "nonresident" within the meaning of the statute relating to attachments, although, by reason of his intention to remain, his political domicile continues to be in the state; but a mere casual or temporary absence of a debtor from a state on business or pleasure will not render him a nonresident, even though he may not have a house of usual abode here at which a summons might be served against him. "Residence" was defined as an act, "domicile" as an act coupled with an intent. It was said that a man may have residence in one state or county and his domicile in another, and he may be a nonresident of the state of his domicile in the sense that his place of actual residence is not there. Stickney v. Chapman, 42 S. E. 68, 69, 115 Ga. 759.

In the contemplation of the attachment law there is or may be a marked distinction between "domicile" and "residence." The domicile of a citizen may be in one state and his residence in another; they generally, however, are at the same place. Morgan v. Nunes, 54 Miss. 308, 310.

In determining the question of residence for the purpose of an attachment, the distinction must always be kept in mind between it and domicile. The fact that a defendant never acquired a residence in another place, and had all the time during absence an intention to return, would be sufficient to constitute a domicile within this state. But the word "residence," as used in section 636 of the Code, means the abode or place where one actually lives, and not one's legal domicile. In other words, a reading of this section will show that it was intended to supply a method for the collection of debts by appropriating property of the debtor to be found within the state when proceedings against the debtor personally are impossible or liable to be made ineffectual, and thus it allows the use of the process in rem when process in personam could not be served. Rosenzweig v. Wood, 63 N. Y. Supp. 447, 449, 30 Misc. Rep. 297.

The writers upon the law of nations distinguish between a temporary residence in a foreign country for a special purpose, and a residence accompanied with an intention to make it a permanent place of abode. The latter is styled by Vattel "domicile," which he defines to be "a habitation fixed in any place with an intention of always staying there." A "domicile," in the sense in which the term is used by him, requires not only actual residence in a foreign country, but an intention of always staying there. Actual residence without this intention amounts to no more than simple "habitation." The Venus, 12 U. S. (8 Cranch) 253, 278, 290, 3 L. Ed. 562.

The word "domicile," in the statute requiring every inhabitant of the state to be sued in the county of his domicile, is used in the sense of "residence," but there may be a difference between a man's residence and his domicile. He may have his domicile in one place and still may have a residence in another, for, although a man for most purposes can be said to have but one domicile, he may have several residences. Brown v. Boulden, 18 Tex. 431, 433.

There is a marked distinction between "domicile" and "residence." The term "residence" simply indicates the place of abode, whether permanent or temporary; "domicile" denotes a fixed permanent residence to which, when absent, one has the intention of returning. A party may have different residences, but he can have but one domicile at the same time. Corel v. Chicago, R. I. & P. Ry. Co. (U. S.) 123 Fed. 452, 454.

The term "domicile," as used in the bankruptcy act, is a broader term than the term "residence," so that where it appears that the person was born and raised in a state, and lived and voted there, and paid taxes there, and that he has never voted in any other state, and is now a traveling salesman for a tobacco house in such state, he will be held to have his domicile there. In re Grimes (U. S.) 94 Fed. 800, 801.

Residence synonymous.

The terms "residence" and "domicile" have been held to be synonymous. De Mell v. De Mell, 120 N. Y. 485, 491, 24 N. E. 996, 17 Am. St. Rep. 652; People v. Platt, 117 N. Y. 159, 167, 22 N. E. 937; In re Cleveland's Will, 59 N. Y. Supp. 985, 987, 28 Misc. Rep. 369; Crawford v. Wilson (N. Y.) 4 Barb. 504, 520; Ryall v. Kennedy, 40 N. Y. Super. Ct. St. 1852, § 301, provides that any person who shall have his residence in the city of Boston on the 1st day of January shall, on the 1st day of May following, be taxed in that city, notwithstanding he may have removed therefrom before the 1st day of May. Held, that the words "any person who shall have his residence in Boston" meant only those whose domicile was in Boston on the 1st day of January, and does not include a person who habitually resides for 7 months of the year in his own house in another town where he has for 20 years been taxed for his personal property, and voted and exercised the rights of citizenship, although he spends 5 months of each year, including the winter months, in a house owned by him in Boston. Lee v. City of Boston, 68 Mass. (2 Gray) 484, 490.

A man's residence is the place of his domicile: If he is a single man, the place where he keeps his effects and to which he is accustomed to resort as his home; if a married man, the place where he keeps and supports his family. Occasional absence or employment at other places has been uniformly held not to suspend or interrupt his residence at the place of his usual domicile, so long as this remain visible and notorious. Town of Bristol v. Town of Rutland, 10 Vt. 574, 576.

"Residence," within the statute of limitation (Rev. St. 1846, c. 140, § 9), providing that the time of a party's residence without the state shall not be counted, etc., means the domicile or living without the state, as where a person goes to a place intending to remain and establish there his domicile or permanent residence, and does so remain. Conrad v. Nall, 24 Mich. 275, 277.

"The word 'residence' is in itself susceptible of different meanings. It may mean residence of a temporary or transient character, or it may mean one's fixed and settled home in the sense of having no other home or place of residence. Its meaning depends on the object and purpose with which it is used, and the subject-matter to which it refers. When used in a constitutional provision, as a qualification for the exercise of the right of suffrage, courts of high authority have held it synonymous with 'domicile.'" Shaeffer v. Gilbert, 20 Atl. 434, 435, 73 Md. 66.

"Residence," when used in statutes, is generally construed to mean "domicile." This is especially true with regard to the subjects of voting, eligibility to office, taxation, jurisdiction in divorce, probate administration, etc. The terms "legal residence" or "habitaney" and "domicile" mean the same thing, and by "legal residence" is meant the place of a man's fixed habitation, where his political rights, such as the elective franchise, are to be exercised. People v. Platt, 3 N. Y. Supp. 367, 369, 50 Hun. 454.

"In Wood v. Roeder, 45 Neb. 311, 63 N. W. 853, it was decided that the word 'residence' is synonymous with the term 'domicile,' and the domicile of a person is the place where he has a fixed and permanent home, and to which, when absent, he has the intention of returning; and to effect a change of domicile there must not only be a change of residence, but an intention to permanently abandon the former home. The mere residing at a different place, although evidence of a change, is, however long continued, per se insufficient." State v. School District of City of Superior, 75 N. W. 855, 856, 55 Neb. 317.

"Residence," within the meaning of Const. art. 7, § 1, which requires a voter to reside in the state six months immediately preceding an election to be entitled to vote, means an actual settlement within the state adopted as a fixed habitation. "It is synonymous with 'home' or 'domicile,' and requires not only a personal presence for the requisite time, but a concurrence therewith of an intent to make the place of habitaney the true home; and one who has made a home or domicile in some other state or territory where his family resides cannot, by a sojourn in the state, however long, after abandoning such former domicile, acquire a 'residence' in the constitutional sense." Sharp v. McIntire, 46 Pac. 115, 116, 23 Colo. 99.

"Residence," within the meaning of Const. art. 6, § 1, declaring that every male person born in the United States or naturalized, who is 21 years old or upward, and who has resided in the state 12 months preceding the election, and 90 days in the county in which he offers to vote, may be deemed an elector, is essentially synonymous with "domicile," denoting a permanent, as distinct from a temporary, dwelling place. There may be a residence for a specific purpose, as at summer or winter resorts, or to acquire an education, or some art or skill, in which the animus revertendi accompanies the whole period of absence, and this is consistent with the retention of the original and permanent home, with all its incident privileges and rights. "Domicile" is a legal word, and differs in one respect, and perhaps in others, in that it is never lost until a new one is acquired, while a person may cease to "reside" in one place and have no fixed habitation elsewhere. Hannon v. Grizard, 89 N. C. 115, 120.

"Residence," as contemplated by the framers of our Constitution, for political or voting purposes means a place of fixed present domicile. An unmarried steamship clerk, employed as such for over three years, who resides on a steamer, and has no other place of residence during that time, acquires no voting domicile at the steamer's home port. Howard v. Skinner, 40 Atl. 379, 380, 87 Md. 556, 40 L. R. A. 753.

For the purpose of voting, of admission to public schools, and administration of estates, there is no substantial difference between the words "residence" and "domicile," though they are not always synonymous. For business purposes, and perhaps for purpose of taxation, a man may have more than one residence, but he can have but one domicile. Grant v. Jones, 39 Ohio St. 506, 515.

The word "domicile," when used in connection with subjects of domestic policy, as taxation, settlement, voting, and the attachment law, implies the same as "residence"; that is, the home or habitation fixed in any place, without a present intention of removing therefrom. Therefore a change of place for a temporary purpose, with an intention of returning, is not a change of domicile. Stratton v. Brigham, 35 Tenn. (2 Sneed) 420, 422.

In a technical and circumscribed meaning of the terms "domicile" and "residence," there may be some distinction; but in reference to administration of estates, where it appeared that a person was resident of one state for two years prior to her death, there will be held to be no distinction between "residence" and "domicile." State v. Superior Court of King County, 39 Pac. 818, 819, 11 Wash. 111.

The word "residence," as used in the statute conferring jurisdiction in divorce, does not mean a mere temporary abiding place, much less a place selected by the party for the purpose of securing a divorce. In Hinds v. Hinds, 1 Iowa, 36, Justice Wright says that "residence" means a legal residence; not an actual residing alone, but such a residence as that, when a man leaves it temporarily or on business, he has an intention of returning to it, and which, when he has returned, becomes and is, de facto and de jure, his domicile, his residence. Whitcomb v. Whitcomb, 46 Iowa, 437, 443.

"Residence out of the state," in order to take a case out of the statute of limitations, must be something more than a mere place of abode; it must be the domicile of the party, which can only be in one place; and it must have the incidents which may vary under different circumstances, but which determine the place of his home which the debtor had adopted with an intention of remaining, and to which, when he is absent, he intends to return. Campbell v. White, 22 Mich. 178, 193.

The word "residence," as used in the New York Code relating to provisional remedies, means legal residence, and "legal residence" means the place of a man's fixed habitation, where his political rights are to be exercised, and where he is liable to taxation. Houghton v. Ault (N. Y.) 16 How. Prac. 77, 80.

Under Revision, p. 315, § 1, giving the court of chancery jurisdiction of divorce proceedings for desertion, where the complainant or defendant shall have been a resident of the state for the term of three years at the time of filing the bill or complaint, etc., the "residence" required means fixed domicile, or permanent home, and that shall have been continuous. Evidence that the complainant had been at a hotel in the state, sometimes two weeks at a time, and that he came there several times during the year, does not constitute "residence" within the statutory meaning of the word. McShane v. McShane, 45 N. J. Eq. (18 Stew.) 341, 342, 19 Atl. 465.

"Residence" and "domicile" are not absolutely synonymous terms, but the residence of a man who has a family which he maintains, and which has an established home, is prima facie with that family; or, wherever he locates that family in anything like a fixed residence, it is presumptively his chosen place of residence. Wherever he may go, for business or pleasure, he resides at home, and home is where the family dwells. Keith v. Stetter, 25 Kan. 100, 103.

The statutory terms "resident" or "residence," as used in the divorce statutes, contemplate an actual residence, with substantially the same attributes as are intended when the term "domicile" is used. They do not mean the place where the defendant in fact resides for the time being; they mean a residence of a permanent and fixed character—a domicile. The terms "resident" and "residence" in these statutes are equivalent in meaning to that of "citizen" and "domicile." Hamill v. Talbott, 81 Mo. App. 210, 215.

The terms "residence" and "domicile" have been held to be synonymous. To effect a change of domicile for the purpose of succession, there must be not only a change of residence, but an intention to abandon the former domicile and acquire another as the sole domicile. Residence alone has no effect per se, except as a ground from which to infer intention. Length of residence will not alone effect the change, intention alone will not do it, but the two must be concurrent. In re Cleveland's Will, 59 N. Y. Supp. 985, 987, 28 Misc. Rep. 369.

The term "domicile," used in reference to the pauper laws on the gaining of settlements by paupers, should be construed as strictly synonymous with the terms "residence," "dwelling place," or "home," though in its ordinary sense it has not the same restricted meaning as those terms have in the statutes relating to settlements. Inhabitants of Warren v. Inhabitants of Thomaston, 43 Me. 406, 418, 69 Am. Dec. 69.

"Domicile" is synonymous with "residence" as the latter is used in statutes with regard to the subjects of voting, eligibility to office, taxation, etc. A change of municipal domicile is a question of act and intention. On the one hand, mere absence from the former place of abode does not destroy domicile there, nor does presence at the place for a temporary purpose fix domicile there. The terms "legal residence," "habitation," and "domicile" mean the same thing, and by "legal residence" is meant the place of a man's fixed habitation, where his political rights, such as the elective franchise, are exercised. People v. Pratt, 3 N. Y. Supp. 367, 369, 50 Hun, 454.

In a technical and circumscribed meaning of the terms "domicile" and "residence," there may be some distinction; but in reference to administrations of estates, where it appeared that a person was resident of one state for two years prior to her death, there will be held to be no distinction between "residence" and "domicile." State v. Superior Court of King County, 39 Pac. 818, 819, 11 Wash. 111.

"Domicile" is that place where a man has his true, fixed, and permanent home and principal establishment, and to which, whenever he is absent, he has the intention of returning. Citing Stratton v. Brigham, 34 Tenn. (2 Sneed) 420, 421, where it is said there is no doubt a distinction between "residence" and "domicile." Domicile is the habitation fixed in any place, with an intention of always staying there. In this sense, he who stops even for a long time in a place for the management of his affairs has only a habitation there, but no domicile. Thus, the envoy of a foreign prince has not his domicile at the court where he resides. This is national domicile in the sense of the public law by which the national character of the person and the right of succession to movable property are determined. But when used in connection with subjects of domestic policy, as taxation, settlement, voting, and the attachment law, the word "domicile" has a more confined and restricted meaning, and implies the same as "residence"; that is, the home or habitation fixed in any place, without a present intention of removing therefrom. Hascall v. Hafford, 65 S. W. 423, 424, 107 Tenn. 355, 89 Am. St. Rep. 952.

The term "residence," as used in Laws 1883, c. 358, § 54, which requires that the persons appointed as commissioners of quarantine should be citizens who shall reside in the metropolitan police district, is equivalent to the word "domicile." People v. Platt, 3 N. Y. Supp. 367, 371, 50 Hun, 454.

A man's "domicile" is prima facie the place of his residence, but this may be rebutted by showing that such residence is either constrained or transitory. Graveley v. Graveley, 25 S. C. 1, 17, 60 Am. Rep. 478.

Resident distinguished.

A "resident" is a person coming into a place with intention to establish his domicile or permanent residence, and who in consequence actually remains there. Time is not so essential as the intent, executed by making or beginning an actual establishment, though it be abandoned in a longer or shorter period. Citing Stratton v. Brigham, 34 Tenn. (2 Sneed) 420, 421, where it is said there is no doubt a distinction between "residence" and "domicile." Domicile is the habitation fixed in any place with an intention of always staying there. In this sense, he who stops even for a long time in a place for the management of his affairs has only a habitation there, but no domicile. Thus, the envoy of a foreign prince has not his domicile at the court where he resides. This is national domicile in the sense of the public law by which the national character of the person and the right of succession to movable property are determined. But when used in connection with subjects of domestic policy, as taxation, settlement, voting, and the attachment law, the word "domicile" has a more confined and restricted meaning, and implies the same as "residence"; that is, the home or habitation fixed in any place without a present intention of removing therefrom. Hascall v. Hafford, 65 S. W. 423, 424, 107 Tenn. 355, 89 Am. St. Rep. 952.

The word "resident," as used in Rev. St. 1889, § 7999, making it the duty of the enumerator to go about the school district and get from the parents or guardians the names of each and every child of school age therein residing, is not synonymous with the word "domicile," but includes only those who are absolutely within the district, so as to entitle them to be counted and enumerated. State v. Smith, 64 Mo. App. 313, 319.

The fact that a person's family may continue to reside within the state, and that his home or domicile may be there, is not enough to make such person a resident of the state, so as to prevent judgment issuing against him as a nonresident debtor, for a person may have his home or domicile in the state, and be at the same time a resident of another. The domicile is the habitation fixed in any place with an intention of always staying there, while simple residence is much more temporary in its character. The question is, where is the person's actual residence, not his domicile? No length of residence, unless accompanied with a design of remaining beyond the limits of the state, constitutes non-residence. When a person left the state with that intention, he became a nonresident within the meaning of the attachment laws. City of New York v. Genet (N. Y.) 4 Hun, 487, 489.

The words "inhabitant" and "resident," in a divorce statute relative to the residency and inhabitancy of the plaintiff, do not naturally or necessarily imply that the party, in order to be a resident or inhabitant, must have any established domicile in the state. A person may reside in and be a resident of a place or state for years without acquiring a domicile. Wallace v. Wallace, 50 Atl. 788, 792, 62 N. J. Eq. 509.

Of unemancipated minor.

The domicile of an unemancipated minor is, if his father be living, the domicile of the latter. In re Cannon's Estate, 15 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 312, 314.

DOMICILE BY OPERATION OF LAW.

"Domicile" is correctly defined as being either one of origin, of choice, or by operation of law. Every person must be assigned to one of these. So that the place of residence of the father of a legitimate child, or, if illegitimate, of its mother, at its birth, is its domicile of origin. As an infant is incapable of changing its domicile by choice, it follows that wherever may be the domicile of its father, if it is legitimate, or otherwise of its mother, controls. But where the child has neither legal father nor living mother, and where neither is shown to have maintained a domicile at any place, then it must follow that the child's domicile must be fixed by operation of law. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Kimbrough (Ky.) 74 S. W. 229.

DOMICILE OF CORPORATION.

The word "domicile," as used in Rev. St. art. 4378, providing that the public office of a railroad corporation shall be considered the domicile of such corporation, is manifestly intended to be understood in its general and popular sense. In this sense it denotes "residence," and should be treated as synonymous with such word. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Edmisson (Tex.) 52 S. W. 635, 636.

3 Wds. & P.—12

"Domicile," at least for any given purpose, is single by its essence. A corporation does not differ from a natural person in this respect. If any person, natural or artificial, as a result of choice, or on technical grounds of birth or creation, has a domicile in one place, it cannot have elsewhere, because what the law means by "domicile" is the one technically pre-eminent headquarters, which as a result, either of fact or of fiction, every person is compelled to have in order that by aid of it certain rights and duties which have been attached to it by the law may be determined. It is settled that a corporation has its domicile in the jurisdiction of the state which created it, and, as a consequence, that it has not a domicile anywhere else. Bergner & Engel Brew. Co. v. Dreyfus, 51 N. E. 531, 532, 172 Mass. 154, 70 Am. St. Rep. 251.

The "domicile" of a corporation has been defined to be where the governing power of the corporation is exercised; where those meet in council who have a right to control its affairs and prescribe what policies of the corporation shall be pursued, and not where the labor is performed in executing the requirements of the corporation in transacting its business. Thus, where the by-laws of a corporation providing that the semiannual meetings of its stockholders shall be held in T., and that its offices shall be at T. or any other city as the board of directors may establish, the domicile of the corporation was at T. Grundy County v. Tennessee Coal, Iron & R. Co., 29 S. W. 116, 119, 94 Tenn. (10 Pickle) 295.

DOMICILE OF ORIGIN.

The "domicile of origin" is the domicile of a person's birth, used to distinguish the domicile of a person's birth from a domicile of choice, which he may acquire by selection after he becomes an independent person. Price v. Price, 27 Atl. 291, 293, 156 Pa. 617.

Where a person has either no fixed place of residence, or has two homes and the scale is almost evenly balanced between them, the legal presumption, as to his domicile, is in favor of what is called the "domicile of origin," by which is meant not the place where he may chance to have been born, but the home of his parents. Prettyman v. Conaway, 32 Atl. 15, 17, 9 Houst. 221.

The "domicile of origin"—by which is meant the place of birth and immediate connections; the place in which, according to the Roman law, a man is born, or ought to be born—subsists during minority, and until the person has legally the will to change it by arriving of age. It is a domicile fixed by law, what the law calls a "necessary domicile," and, independently of the parties' will, attends him through his minority. The Supreme Court of Pennsylvania (School Directors of Borough of Westchester v. James [Pa.] 2 Watts & S. 571, 37 Am. Dec. 525) states this matter with legal precision, as well as with force and beauty of sentiment: "No infant who has a parent, sui juris, can in the nature of things have a separate domicile. This springs from the status of marriage, which gives rise to the institution of families; the foundation of all domestic happiness and virtue which is to be found in the world. The education and bringing up of children makes it indispensable that they be brought up in the bosom and as a part of their parent's family, without which the father could not perform the duties he owes them, or receive from them the service that belongs to him. The parent's domicile, therefore, is consequently and unavoidably the domicile of the child." White v. Brown (U. S.) 29 Fed. Cas. 983, 992.

DOMICILE OF SUCCESSION.

The "domicile of succession," as distinguished from a commercial, political, or forensic domicile, is the actual residence of a man within some particular jurisdiction, of such character as shall, in accordance with well-established principles of the public law, give direction to the succession to his personal estates. Smith v. Croom, 7 Fla. 81, 82.

DOMICILIATION.

In Spain "domiciliation" is in most respects equivalent to naturalization. It may be done by being born in the kingdom, by being converted to the Holy Catholic faith there, by establishing a domicile, obtaining the right of residence in some settlement, marrying a native woman, and domiciliating himself in the kingdom, by attaching himself to the soil, and by purchasing and acquiring real property and possession. Yates v. Iams, 10 Tex. 168, 169.

DOMINANT ESTATE OR TENEMENT.

A dominant estate is the one enjoying the easement and to which it is attached. Walker v. Clifford, 29 South. 588, 591, 128 Ala. 67, 86 Am. St. Rep. 74.

A dominant estate is an estate dependent of necessity for enjoyment, on some use, in the nature of an easement, in another estate. Dillman v. Hoffman, 38 Wis. 559, 572.

The term "dominant estate" in the law of easements applies to the estate to the owner of which, by reason of such ownership, attaches the right of an easement in other property known as the "servient estate." Stevens v. Dennett, 51 N. H. 324, 330.

When one part of an estate is dependent of necessity for enjoyment on some use in the nature of an easement in another part, the former is the dominant, and the latter the servient, estate. Galloway v. Bone-steel, 26 N. W. 262, 65 Wis. 79, 56 Am. Rep. 616; Benedict v. Barling, 48 N. W. 670, 671, 79 Wis. 551.

The land to which an easement is attached is called the "dominant tenement." Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 803; Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 1252; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 3353; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 269; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 4054.

DOMINIO.

A term used in the Spanish law, which does not necessarily imply ownership, but may mean simply the dominio alto, which is the right of eminent domain, which belongs to every sovereign state over private property, or the dominio directo, or the dominio utile. Hart v. Burnett, 15 Cal. 530, 556.

DOMINION.

"Dominion" is defined to be the rights in a thing from which arise the power of disposition and the right of claiming it. Baker v. Westcott, 11 S. W. 157, 159, 73 Tex. 129.

Dominion, when full, is defined to be the right in a corporeal thing from which arises the power of disposition and of claiming it from others. All dominion has two causes, proximate and remote. Remote is the title which vests a right to the thing, and gives cause of action against the vendor, who has not delivered the thing sold; and proximate is the obtaining possession by delivery of the thing sold, which, without anything else, being preceded by the title, vests the right in the thing, which is the dominion. The consequence is that the right to the thing gives a personal action, and the right in the thing gives the right against any possessor. It serves, then, for a general rule that the title never gives a right in the thing, or, what is the same, the dominion, unless delivery be joined with it. Consequently neither is title sufficient without delivery, nor delivery without title. Coles v. Perry, 7 Tex. 109, 136 (citing 1 White's Recop. 342-345).

DOMUS.

The word "domus" or "house," in a devise of such property, has been said not to be sufficient to pass the garden and curtilage surrounding the house, when the words "cum pertinentiis" are not used in the devise in connection with such words. Bennet v. Bit- tle (Pa.) 4 Rawle, 338, 342 (citing 2 Ch. Cas. 27; Kielway, 27).

DOMUS MANSIONALIS.

"Domus mansionalis," or mansion house, was said in 1 Hale's P. C. 558, 559, not only to include the dwelling houses, but also the outhouses that are parcel thereof, as barns, cow houses, dairy houses, etc.; but if the barn, etc., be no parcel of the messuage, or if it be far remote from the dwelling house, and not so near as to be reasonably esteemed parcel thereof, then the breaking of it is not burglary, for it is not domus mansionalis, nor any part thereof. State v. Brooks, 4 Conn. 446, 448.

The words "domus mansionalis" mean in law the mansion house or outset and inset houses, parcel of a mansion house. State v. Sutcliffe (S. C.) 4 Strob. 372, 376.

DONATE—DONATION.

Donation is defined by Bouvier to be the act by which the owner of a thing voluntarily transfers the title and possession of the same, without any consideration. Georgia Penitentiary Co. v. Nelms, 65 Ga. 499, 504, 38 Am. Rep. 793; Indiana N. & S. Ry. Co. v. City of Attica, 56 Ind. 476, 486; Roche v. Roanoke Classical Seminary, 56 Ind. 198, 202.

Webster defines a donation to be "that which is given or bestowed; that which is transferred to another gratuitously, or without a valuable consideration; a gift; a grant." Indiana N. & S. Ry. Co. v. City of Attica, 56 Ind. 476, 486.

A constitutional requirement that any legislative act making a donation or gratuity must be passed by a two-thirds majority of each house does not include an act giving the labor of convicts to a corporation free of charge, on its giving satisfactory obligations to feed, clothe, and provide for the same. Georgia Penitentiary Co. v. Nelms, 65 Ga. 499, 504, 38 Am. Rep. 793.

To discharge an obligation which rests upon full value received is not a donation or gift. Erskine v. Steele County (U. S.) 87 Fed. 630, 635.

As agreement to pay.

The electors of a town meeting resolved to donate $1,000 to the plaintiffs for the use of a bridge "over Rock river at a specified point in the town, providing defendants would, by a day named, erect a substantial bridge for the public at that point." Held that, though the word "donate" usually imports a gift, yet, in connection with the words following it in such resolution, it expressed an agreement to pay the plaintiffs a consideration for constructing a bridge for the public use. Goodhue v. Town of Beloit, 21 Wis. 636, 642.

As appropriate.

"Donated," as used in Code 1851, tit. 14, c. 65, whereby the State University was established and land granted by Congress was "donated to said University," meant simply "appropriated." Weary v. State University, 42 Iowa, 335, 338.

As gift to public cause or charity.

The word "donation" is more aptly used to describe that which is given to a public cause or charity than to indicate a bounty to an individual. Eberhardt v. Perolin, 48 N. J. Eq. 592, 602, 23 Atl. 501, 505.

The word "donate" means to give generally for a specific object, to bestow freely, to grant, and in an act of Congress aiding railroads amounts to a grant. State v. Sioux City & P. R. Co., 7 Neb. 357, 373.

As a grant.

A statute authorizing a city to make a donation to a railroad means an absolute gift or grant, without any condition or consideration. Indiana N. & S. Ry. Co. v. City of Attica, 56 Ind. 476, 486; Wilkinson v. City of Peru, 61 Ind. 1, 9.

A donation is a gift in gratuity, and not a grant of land founded on a consideration, and where the government, pursuant to Jay's treaty of 1794, granted title to persons who were entitled to the lands as British subjects prior to the treaty of 1783, such grant was not a donation. Forsyth v. Reynolds, 15 How. (U. S.) 358, 365.

Stock subscription distinguished.

A clear distinction between subscriptions to the capital stock of a railroad company or private corporation and donations or loans of credit to such a corporation is apparent from the reading of the constitutional provision providing that no city, town, township, or other municipality shall ever become a subscriber to the capital stock of any railroad or private corporation, or make donation to or loan its credit in aid of such corporation, but that the adoption of the article shall not be construed as affecting the right of such municipalities to make such subscriptions where the same have been authorized under existing laws by a vote of the people of such municipalities prior to such adoption. It is apparent that donations or loans of credit to such corporation are prohibited under all circumstances, but that a subscription may be made, if authorized prior to the adoption of the Constitution. Town of Concord v. Portsmouth Sav. Bank, 92 U. S. 625, 629, 23 L. Ed. 628.

DONATIO CAUSA MORTIS.

See "Gift Causa Mortis."

DONATIO INTER VIVOS.

See "Gift Inter Vivos."

DONATIO MODALIS.

The term "donatio modalis" is used to designate anything given to a person with the view that he first do something that shall benefit himself alone. Fisk v. Flores, 43 Tex. 340, 343 (citing 2 Colquhoun, Roman Civil Law, 109).

DONATIO RELATA.

A donatio relata is a donatio inter vivos which is given with reference to some service done. Fisk v. Flores, 43 Tex. 340, 343 (citing 2 Colquhoun, Roman Civil Law, 109).

DONATIO REMUNERATORIA.

A "donatio remuneratoria" is a donatio inter vivos given by way of reward for service done. Fisk v. Flores, 43 Tex. 340, 343 (quoting 2 Colquhoun, Roman Civil Law, 109).

DONATIO SUB MODO.

See "Donatio Modalis."

DONATION (In Civil Law).

A "donation" is defined by the civil law as a contract whereby a person gratuitously disposes himself of something by transferring it to another, to be his property who accepts it. It is a contract or agreement, and must be accepted by the donee; otherwise, it would be a mere offer. It must also be gratuitous, because otherwise it would be a sale or exchange. Fisk v. Flores, 43 Tex. 340, 343 (citing 3 Browne's Roman Law, 119).

Under the Spanish and Mexican law a more comprehensive meaning was attached to the term "donation" than the one usually given to it in our jurisprudence, as conditions were sometimes annexed which would be regarded at common law as changing the character of the transaction from one of gift to one of purchase. Under all systems donations are of three classes—pure, remuneratory, and conditional. They are pure when made without condition; in the exercise of a spirit of liberality, as charities. They are remuneratory when required by no legal obligation, but are made from a regard for services rendered. Such are pensions. Such was the character of the grants of land made in many instances to officers of the Revolution. They are conditional when accompanied with provisions intended to secure the purposes for which they are made. These provisions may often impose the discharge of burdensome and expensive duties, without changing the character of the transactions. Grants of land for institutions of benevolence or instruction, or for hospitals, schools, asylums, and the like, are generally of this class. Conditions annexed to such grants, that the institutions shall be established, only operate as a requirement that the lands shall be appropriated to the purposes for which they are granted. The performance of the conditions does not constitute a consideration in the nature of a price, thereby converting the transactions into sales. This is so obviously true as to require no argument for its support. Noe v. Card, 14 Cal. 576, 610 (citing Scott v. Ward, 13 Cal. 458).

In France it is the unanimous sentiment (with the one dissent of Laurent) that what is done or given in satisfaction of a moral obligation is not a donation. Succession of Miller v. Manhattan Life Ins. Co., 34 South. 723, 725, 110 La. 652.

DONE.

In holding that a provision in a contract that a boat was to be ready when corn was done was too indefinite to permit of a construction by either the court or the jury. The court say that the word "done" has no specific meaning, except in cookery. Bread is said to be done, and meat done, when they are sufficiently cooked for uses of food; but when is corn done? "Done" is not a word of art or trade, and requires no expert to tell us its meaning. Silverthorn v. Fowle, 49 N. C. 362, 363.

"Done," as used in Code Iowa, § 2134, which provides that, where a subcontractor on a railroad claims a lien for labor, he shall have 60 days from the last day of the month in which such labor was done within which to file his claim therefor, means "performed." It is sometimes used in the sense of "completed," but not in this case. Sandval v. Ford, 8 N. W. 324, 325, 55 Iowa, 461.

Code Ala. §§ 3223, 3226, providing that actions against the sureties of executors for any misfeasance or malfeasance of the executor must be brought within six years from the act "done" or omitted by the executor, was construed not to mean the time of the doing of the act by the executor which creates the liability, but the time that such liability is judicially ascertained. Alexander v. Bryan, 4 Sup. Ct. 107, 110, 110 U. S. 414, 28 L. Ed. 195.

Done by agents, engines, or cars.

Act July 1, 1874, as amended by Act July 1, 1879, providing that when a railroad company does not erect the fences required of it in the manner required, or when such fences are not kept in good repair, such railroad company shall be liable for all damages done by agents, engines, or cars of such railroad to cattle, horses, or other stock, must be construed to mean that the injury to the stock must be caused by actual collision; that is, it must have been done by the agents, engines, or cars of the railroad. The words "damages done by agents, engines, or cars" involve the idea of actual collision, and do not cover a case of consequential damages; and hence a railroad company is not liable for an injury done to a horse frightened either by the approaching train, or the sound of the bell or whistle, or all of them combined, which in its flight was injured, either by jumping a cattle guard, or by coming in contact with a wire fence, or both; there being no actual collision or contact with the engine or cars of the train, or negligence or willful misconduct on the part of defendant's servants in charge of the train. Schertz v. Indianapolis, B. & W. R. Co., 107 Ill. 577, 579.

DONEE.

A "donee" is one who takes without valuable consideration. Worthy v. Caddell, 76 N. C. 82, 83.

One to whom is given a naked power is known in law as a "donee" and not a "trustee." The latter word implies an investiture of the legal title. A power to convey may be given without the investiture of title in the donee. Dulin v. Moore, 70 S. W. 742, 743, 96 Tex. 135.

Under a trust deed authorizing a board of managers of a charitable fund, on the death of the settlor, to direct its expenditure by trustees, or to cause the fund to be transferred to a corporation organized for like charitable purposes, the board have merely a power of appointment, and are not donees, within St. 1891, c. 425, § 1, imposing a tax to take effect on death of donor, and excepting gifts to charitable institutions therefrom. Balch v. Shaw, 54 N. E. 490, 174 Mass. 144.

DOOR.

A "door" is defined to be a movable barrier of wood, metal, stone, or other material, consisting sometimes of one piece, but generally of several pieces together, and commonly placed on hinges, for closing a passage into a building, room, or other inclosure; and it was held that an injury to a casing was not an injury to the door. State v. McBeth, 31 Pac. 145, 40 Kan. 584 (citing 2 Cent. Dict. p. 733).

DORMANT.

Bouvier defines "dormant" as sleeping, silent, not known, or not acting. Elmira Iron & Steel Rolling Mill Co. v. Harris, 26 N. E. 541, 543, 124 N. Y. 280.

DORMANT JUDGMENT.

A judgment not satisfied or barred by lapse of time, but temporarily inoperative so far as the right to issue execution is concerned, is usually called a "dormant judgment." Draper v. Nixon, 8 South. 489, 93 Ala. 436.

DORMANT PARTNER.

A "dormant partner" is defined as one who is unknown as such to those doing business with the firm. Shamburg v. Ruggles, 83 Pa. 148, 150; Rowland v. Estes, 42 Atl. 528, 529, 190 Pa. 111.

A dormant or secret partner is one whose connection with the firm is really and professedly concealed from the world. Civ. Code Ga. 1895, § 2628.

A dormant partner is one who takes no part in the business and whose connection with the business is unknown. Both secrecy and inactivity are implied by the terms. National Bank of Salem v. Thomas, 47 N. Y. 15, 19; Elmira Iron & Steel Rolling Mill Co. v. Harris, 26 N. E. 541, 543, 124 N. Y. 280; Bouker Contracting Co. v. Scribner, 65 N. Y. Supp. 444, 445, 52 App. Div. 505. But in order to be such it is not essential that a person should wholly abstain from any active participation in the business of the firm, or be universally unknown as bearing a connection with it. North v. Bloss, 30 N. Y. 374, 380.

A "dormant partner" is one whose name and transactions are unknown to the world, at least to such an extent that he cannot be regarded as an ostensible partner. It is a question of fact for the jury to determine, though the style of the partnership indicated to the world that more than one might be members of the copartnership. While evidence of general reputation may not be admissible to prove a partnership, still it may be competent on the issue as to whether a member of a firm is a dormant partner. Metcalf v. Officer (U. S.) 2 Fed. 640-642.

In Pooley v. Driver, 5 Ch. Div. 458, it is said "a dormant partner means a person who does not take an active part in the conduct of the business, and who may be, and even is, prohibited from taking such active part. Therefore, when the inquiry is whether a man is a dormant partner, it does not aid that inquiry by saying that there are provisions preventing his taking an active part in the conduct of the business, or a further provision which makes it optional for him to take an active part in the business or not. It only shows that he is not an active partner. Johnson v. Rothschilds, 41 S. W. 996, 998, 63 Ark. 518. The term does not include a partner who is not to give any services to the business, except to consult with the other partners and use his influence to obtain business for the firm. National Bank v. Thomas, 47 N. Y. 15, 19; Bouker Contracting Co. v. Scribner, 65 N. Y. Supp. 444, 445, 52 App. Div. 505; Elmira Iron & Steel Rolling Mill Co. v. Harris, 26 N. E. 541, 543, 124 N. Y. 280.

"In order to make a partner a dormant partner, it is essential that he be unknown, or not generally known." Rowland v. Estes, 42 Atl. 528, 529, 190 Pa. 111.

"A 'dormant partner,' in the legal acceptance of the term, is one who participates in the profits of the trade, but conceals his name. A partner is considered dormant whose name is not mentioned in the firm, nor embraced under general terms as the name of one of the firm. 3 Kent, Comm. 31. A dormant partner differs from an actual, ostensible partner in that, his name being suppressed and concealed from the firm, his interest is consequently not apparent." Speake v. Prewitt, 6 Tex. 252, 258 (quoting 3 Tom. Law Dict. 71).

Every partner is construed dormant unless his name is mentioned in the firm, or embraced under general terms, as the name of one of the firm and company. Gow, in his Treatise on Partnership (pages 12, 13), says: "A dormant partner is likewise a participant in the profits of the trade; but, his name being suppressed and being concealed from the firm, his interest is consequently not apparent." Mitchell v. Dall (Md.) 2 Har. & G. 159, 171.

A dormant partner is one whose name is not mentioned in the title of the firm, nor embraced in some general term, as "Company," "Sons," "Brothers," etc., and whose connection as partner is professedly concealed from the world, whether actually so or not. Jones v. Fegely (Pa.) 4 Phila. 1.

DORMITORY.

A dormitory is a room or rooms or a building used to sleep in; sleeping quarters; a lodging house. It does not include a dining hall. Hillsdale College v. Rideout, 46 N. W. 373, 375, 82 Mich. 94.

DOS.

Lord Coke says: "Dos. The very name doth import freedom; for the law doth give her therewith many freedoms." Deitz v. Beard (Pa.) 2 Watts, 170, 172.

DOTAGE.

Dotage is that feebleness of the mental faculties which proceeds from old age. It is a diminution in degree of that intellectual power which was once possessed. It is the slow approach of death; that irrevocable cessation, without hurt or disease, of all the functions which once belonged to the living animal. The external functions gradually cease; the senses waste away by degrees, and the mind is imperceptibly visited by decay. The inert and dull senses transmit the passing occurrences so imperfectly to the sensorium that they leave none but a transitory impression there. Hence long-past transactions are often remembered with much more exactness than those which have taken place recently. In the second childhood, as in the first, all the present makes but a faint and fleeting impression on the mind; hence the judgment in both cases is weak and the conduct unsteady and frivolous. Owing's Case (Md.) 1 Bland, 370, 389, 17 Am. Dec. 311.

DOTAL PROPERTY.

Dotal property is that which the wife brings to the husband to assist him in bearing the expenses of the marriage establishment. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 2335; Fleitas v. Richardson, 13 Sup. Ct. 495, 496, 147 U. S. 550, 37 L. Ed. 276.

NOTE.

"Dote," as used in the Spanish law, is that which the wife gives the husband on account of marriage, and is a sort of donation, made with a view to his maintenance and to the support of the marriage. Cutter v. Waddingham, 22 Mo. 206, 254.

"Dote," as used in the Spanish law, means dowry when applied to the patrimony of the wife; but, when applied to towns, it means a gift or endowment. Hart v. Burnett, 15 Cal. 530, 566.

To "dote" is to be delirious, silly, or insane. Gates v. Meredith, 7 Ind. 440, 441.

DOUBLE.

Laws 1869, p. 180, § 10, prohibiting the bank chartered by such act from investing its funds in bonds or mortgages, excepting on real estate worth at least "double the sum invested above all incumbrances," means "double the investment and double the incumbrances." The word "above" signifies excess, and the word "double" signifies the excess. Williams v. McDonald, 7 Atl. 866, 868, 42 N. J. Eq. (15 Stew.) 392.

DOUBLE ADULTERY.

Double adultery is adultery committed by persons both of whom are married. Hunter v. United States (Wis.) 1 Pin. 91, 92, 39 Am. Dec. 277.

DOUBLE BALLOT.

"Double ballot," as the term is used in Gen. St. § 238, declaring that no double ballot for the same office shall be counted, meant a case where more than one ballot for the same office was found in any envelope deposited, both of which ballots should be for the same person, in which case they should be considered a double ballot, and one only be counted. State v. Walsh, 25 Atl. 1, 3, 62 Conn. 260, 17 L. R. A. 364.

DOUBLE BENEFIT.

A railroad relief association provided for the relief of insured employes, and declared that no person should be entitled to benefits therefrom until the person legally entitled to recover damages on account of the accident shall release the railroad company in order that double benefits might not be recovered. Held, that the word "double benefits," as there used, was not limited to a cause where the same person was both the beneficiary of the relief association and the person legally entitled to recover, but that it meant that no recovery could be had by any person against a relief association when the person legally entitled to damages made a claim against the road. Fuller v. Baltimore & O. E. R. Ass'n, 10 Atl. 237, 239, 67 Md. 433.

DOUBLE COSTS.

Where a statute authorizes double costs, they are to be calculated thus: First, the common costs, and then half the common costs. Van Aulen v. Decker, 2 N. J. Law (2 Penning.) 108, 111; Gilbert v. Kennedy, 22 Mich. 5, 19.

Double costs are the costs taxed and then multiplied by two. This is not admitted to be the English method of computation, which is to add to single costs one-half of their amount (2 Tidd, Pr. 982); but this mode of calculation has never been followed in this state. Moran v. City of Huson, 34 N. J. Law (5 Vroom) 530, 531.

Where double or treble costs are allowed, the additional costs so allowed do not go to the officers or jurors, but to the party, to compensate him for the injustice and undue vexation which he has been put to. Van Aulen v. Decker, 2 N. J. Law (2 Penning.) 108, 111.

DOUBLE DAMAGES.

Where a statute gives double or treble damages to the party injured, the jury should find the single damages, and the court in its judgment should assess the double or treble damages, and the general verdict in such a case will be deemed for single damages, unless the contrary appears. Cross v. United States (U. S.) 6 Fed. Cas. 892, 893.

Gantt's Dig. § 1376, made it a misdemeanor for any person to be a party to any sale intended to injure or defraud creditors, and providing that on conviction persons guilty of the offense should be fined in any sum not less than $500. Section 1378 declared that any person violating the previous section, in addition to the fine, should pay to any person injured or defrauded "double damages sustained by him," to be recovered in a proper action. Held, that the term "double damages sustained by him" meant double the amount which the law, as applicable to the circumstances, would consider he had sustained. The Legislature intended to give an independent civil action, which did not exist at common law, since there the persons defrauded could not have sustained any damage. Daniel v. Vaccaro, 41 Ark. 316, 329.

DOUBLE DEADWOODS.

A car with double deadwoods has a horizontal timber at the end, with projecting blocks bolted to each end of the timber, and the drawbar for coupling extends but little beyond the faces of these blocks. In coupling, the blocks come together and receive the blow of the cars. The coupling pin is dropped between the blocks from above. Distinguished from the cars with double deadwoods is that known as the single deadwood, which dispenses with the projecting blocks, and leaves the drawbar to receive the concussion when the cars are coupled. Michigan Central R. Co. v. Smithson, 7 N. W. 791, 45 Mich. 212.

DOUBLE HOUSE.

A double house is two under one roof, each complete in itself, with closed partition between, and with independent means of ingress in front and rear. Webb v. Carney (N. J.) 32 Atl. 705.

DOUBLE INSURANCE.

A double insurance is where the same man is to receive two sums, instead of one, or the same sum twice over, for the same loss, by reason of his having made two insurances upon the same ship or goods. Thurston v. Koch, 4 U. S. (4 Dall.) 348, 350, 1 L. Ed. 862. But two insurances on the same ship, not for the same entire risk, do not constitute double insurance. Thus a policy "at and from Bayonne to the first port the ship might make in the United States" is not identical with another policy on the same ship "from Bayonne to New York." The first policy covers the time the vessel is at Bayonne, and terminates at the first port the ship might make in the United States whether it be New York or some other port. Hence the two policies do not constitute double insurance. Columbian Ins. Co. v. Lynch (N. Y.) 11 Johns. 233, 238, 239.

A double insurance is where one insures the same thing twice against the same perils. Where, however, the perils undertaken by the owners of a ship are not the same which the defendants assume, there is no double insurance. The risk taken, in order to constitute double insurance by the different insurers, must be identical. Perkins v. New England Marine Ins. Co., 12 Mass. 214, 218.

In order to constitute double insurance, so as to vitiate a policy of insurance, both policies must be upon the same insurable interest. Ætna Fire Ins. Co. v. Tyler (N. Y.) 16 Wend. 385, 30 Am. Dec. 90. Consequently, where it appeared that insurance was taken upon a joint interest in property, further insurance on the interest or title of one of the joint owners did not vitiate the policy, under a clause providing that, if any other insurance shall be "made upon the said property" without the company's consent, the policy should be void. Pitney v. Glens Falls Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 61 Barb. 335, 342.

Double insurance may be defined to be additional and valid insurance, prior or subsequent, on the same subject, risk, and interest effected by the same insured or for his benefit, and with his knowledge and consent; but owners of different interests in the same property may respectively insure their interests without risk of violating a provision in a policy on the property prohibiting other insurance. Home Ins. Co. v. Gwathmey, 1 S. E. 209, 213, 82 Va. 923.

"A double insurance is where the same person has insurance made on the full value of his interest in different policies. Whether made in his own name or the name of others is immaterial, so that he is to have the benefit of both policies." Wells v. Philadelphia Ins. Co. (Pa.) 9 Serg. & R. 103, 107.

Double insurance, which makes a proper case for contribution between the several insurers, is where the property insured and the interest insured is identical. Royster v. Roanoke, N. & B. Steamboat Co. (U. S.) 26 Fed. 492, 494.

A double insurance exists when the same person is insured by several insurers separately in respect to the same subject and interest. Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 2641; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 4531; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 1877; Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 3520; Lowell Mfg. Co. v. Safeguard Fire Ins. Co., 88 N. Y. 591, 597; American Ins. Co. v. Griswold (N. Y.) 14 Wend. 399, 400; Westchester Fire Ins. Co. v. Foster, 90 Ill. 121, 124; Lebanon Mut. Ins. Co. v. Kepler, 106 Pa. 28, 45; Clarke v. Western Assur. Co., 23 Atl.

248, 249, 146 Pa. 561, 15 L. R. A. 127, 28 Am. St. Rep. 821; Clarke v. Western Assur. Co., 146 Pa. 561, 569, 570, 23 Atl. 248, 249, 15 L. R. A. 127, 28 Am. St. Rep. 821. Like the new phrase, "concurrent insurance," it was formerly held that, to be double insurance, the policies had to be upon precisely the same property. Gough v. Davis, 52 N. Y. Supp. 947, 948, 24 Misc. Rep. 245. If there be double insurance by successive policies or simultaneously, in which priority of insurance is not provided for, all are insurers and liable pro rata. Sloat v. Royal Ins. Co., 49 Pa. 14, 18, 88 Am. Dec. 477. All the policies are considered as making out one policy, and therefore any one insurer, who pays more than his proportion, may claim a contribution from others who are liable. Fire policies usually contain express and exact provisions upon this subject. Clarke v. Western Assur. Co., 23 Atl. 248, 249, 146 Pa. 561, 15 L. R. A. 127, 28 Am. St. Rep. 821 (citing Arnold, Ins.); Meigs v. Insurance Co. of North America, 54 Atl. 1053, 1054, 205 Pa. 378. Thus a policy on lumber of every description, including lath, shingles, and pickets, does not include the same subjects as one on lumber, lath, and pickets, and therefore the two policies do not constitute a double insurance. West Branch Lumberman's Exchange v. American Cent. Ins. Co., 38 Atl. 1081, 1083, 183 Pa. 366.

DOUBLE PLEA.

A double plea is one which consists of several distinct and independent matters alleged to the same point and requiring different answers. Gould, Pl. p. 420. But this rule is not violated by introducing several matters into a plea, if they be constituent parts of the same entire defense. 1 Chit. Pl. p. 512; Handy v. Waldrom, 18 R. I. 567, 29 Atl. 143, 49 Am. St. Rep. 794. In assumption against a town treasurer, a plea that the town had reached its debt limit when it contracted the debt in suit, and that there was no money in defendant's hands then, nor at any time since, with which the debt could have been paid, is not bad for duplicity, since the first allegation alone does not state a complete defense. McAleer v. Angell, 36 Atl. 588, 19 R. I. 688.

DOUBLE TAXATION.

See "Duplicate Taxation."

"Double taxation," within the policy of the law which prohibits double taxation, means the taxing of the same piece of property twice to the same person, or taxing the same piece of property once to one person and again to another; but the imposing of a tax on the shares of a corporation in the hands of its stockholders, and also on the property of a corporation, will not constitute such double taxation. Cook v. City of Burlington, 13 N. W. 113, 114, 59 Iowa, 251, 44 Am. Rep. 679. See, also, Cheshire County Tel. Co. v. State, 63 N. H. 167, 169. But see Smith v. Burley, 9 N. H. 423, 427, where it is said that a taxation of the shares of a corporation at their appraised value would in fact be a "double taxation" of the property, once to the corporation itself and again to the corporators, which would be unjust, oppressive, and unconstitutional.

The fact that mortgages held by savings banks represent deposits, and depositors are taxed, does not render the result produced by the taxation of the mortgages as real estate a double taxation within the meaning of the Constitution. Common Council of City of Detroit v. Assessors of City of Detroit, 91 Mich. 78, 116, 51 N. W. 787, 16 L. R. A. 59.

DOUBLE TRIPPING.

The term "double tripping" has been used in the towing trade on the Ohio and Mississippi rivers to designate the practice of tow boats in splitting up their tow and taking a portion up the river for a distance and then returning for the remainder. Pittsburgh Ins. Co. v. Dravo (Pa.) 2 Wkly. Notes Cas. 194, 195.

DOUBLE USE.

In regard to patents, "double use" is the application of a principle which had been discovered and applied before. In such cases, although there may be in the new application some degree of novelty, and something may have been discovered or found out that was not known before, yet, unless the new occasion on which the principle is applied leads to some kind of new manufacture or to some new result, it will be but a double use. In re Blandy (U. S.) 3 Fed. Cas. 671, 673.

A patent which is but the application of the old process to a new use is denominated in the patent law a "double use." De Lamar v. De Lamar Min. Co. (U. S.) 110 Fed. 538, 542.

DOUBLE WILL.

The term "double will" has been used to designate an instrument by which two persons join in disposing of their separate property to the survivor. Evans v. Smith, 28 Ga. 98, 73 Am. Dec. 751.

DOUBT.

See "Rational Doubt"; "Reasonable Doubt."

Webster defines "doubt" to mean uncertainty; uncertainty of mind. Rowe v. Barber, 8 South. 865, 866, 93 Ala. 422.

Doubt implies a want of settled conviction or opinion on a proposition considered. It is that state of mind in which we hesitate as to two contradictory conclusions. Smith v. Missouri Pac. Ry. Co., 44 S. W. 718, 719, 143 Mo. 33.

A doubt implies a condition or state of the mind where the judgment is not at rest, and is not decidedly on one side or the other of a question. West Jersey Traction Co. v. Camden Horse R. Co., 29 Atl. 333, 346, 52 N. J. Eq. (7 Dick.) 452.

Timidity distinguished.

It is a doubt, as the word is used in the expression "reasonable doubt necessary to conviction," where the mind hesitates because it is not convinced; not where a convinced mind hesitates, because of fear of consequences, in declaring its conclusion. The latter is not doubt. It is timidity. McCabe v. Commonwealth (Pa.) 8 Atl. 45, 47.

DOUBTFUL CLAIM.

The expression "doubtful claim," as used in the phrase that "the compromise of a doubtful claim will support a promise to pay," means that the claim must have some probable foundation, but must be really doubtful. A mere pretended claim is not sufficient. Morey v. Town of Newfane (N. Y.) 8 Barb. 645, 654.

Code 1882, § 2537, authorizing administrators, executors, and guardians to compromise all contested or "doubtful claims" against the estates or wards that they represent, means demands of doubtful validity or which are disputed. The two terms, "contested" and "doubtful," are not precisely synonymous, so as to make the use of both an idle repetition. Claims whose justice and legality may be questioned are matters here referred to. Maynard v. Cleveland, 76 Ga. 52, 70.

DOUBTFUL CREDIT.

The term "doubtful credit" is very comprehensive, and, when used without words of limitation or qualification, is understood to mean reputation or standing in the community, as distinguished from the estimate of particular individuals. Merchants' Bank v. Bank of Commerce, 24 Md. 12, 54.

DOUBTFUL TITLE.

A "doubtful title" is defined to be one which conveys no property to the purchaser of the estate. Heller v. Cohen, 36 N. Y. Supp. 668, 671, 15 Misc. Rep. 378.

In equity a marketable title is one in which there is no doubt involved, either as to matter of law or fact. Every title is doubtful which invites or exposes the party holding it to litigation. If there be color of outstanding title which may prove substantial though there is not enough in evidence to enable the chancellor to say so, a purchaser will not be held to take it and encounter the hazard of litigation. Herman v. Somers, 27 Atl. 1050, 1051, 158 Pa. 424, 38 Am. St. Rep. 851.

DOVE.

It is held in all authorities that doves are ferre naturæ, and as such are not the subject of larceny, except in the custody of the owner. Commonwealth v. Chace, 26 Mass. (9 Pick.) 15, 19 Am. Dec. 348.

Doves are animals ferre naturæ, except when in the care and custody of the owner, when confined in the dovecot or pigeon house, and when in the nest not able to fly. When not in such care, they are not, in contemplation of law, the property of any one, and are not the subject of larceny. Ruckman v. Outwater, 28 N. J. Law (4 Dutch.) 581, 585.

DOVER'S POWDERS.

Dover's powders "is a well-known preparation containing opium as one of its ingredients." But such fact does not make a representation in an application for insurance that applicant had never used opium false, where he had used Dover's Powders. Higbee v. Guardian Mut. Life Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 66 Barb. 462, 472.

DOWEL PIN.

Webster's Dictionary defines a "dowel pin" as a pin of wood or metal used for joining two pieces, as of wood, stones, etc., by inserting part of its length in one piece, the rest of it entering a corresponding hole in the other. In Knight Mech. Dict. (1876) p. 735, a "dowel" is defined as a pin used to connect adjacent pieces, penetrating a part of its length into each piece at right angles to the plane of junction. Perry v. Revere Rubber Co. (U. S.) 103 Fed. 314, 43 C. C. A. 248.

DOWER.

See "Inchoate Right of Dower"; "Widow's Dower"; "Right of Dower"; "Assignment of Dower"; "Suit for Dower"; "Tenant in Dower."

It is difficult to trace the true origin of dower, but all writers admit it to be of great antiquity. It is probable that it first grew out of the customs of the northern nations, who subdued the Roman Empire, and that its introduction into the jurisprudence of England was borrowed from the usages of the Germans and Danes. Like every other species of property, dower underwent a great many changes. It was, however, finally established and confirmed by the law of Magna Charta; and from that time to the present the term "dower" has had a legal and technical meaning, which in England it still retains. Dower at the common law exists where a man, seised of an estate of inheritance, dies in the lifetime of his wife, in which case she is entitled to be endowed during her natural life of one third part of all his lands and tenements whereof he was seised at any time during the coverture, and which any issue she might have had could by possibility have inherited. 2 Bl. Comm. 129; 4 Kent, Comm. 35. The reason of this allowance is said to be for the maintenance of the wife and the support and education of her younger children. To constitute a tenancy in dower, three things are necessary: (1) Marriage; (2) seisin of the husband; and (3) his death. A seisin in law, as well as in deed, entitled the wife to dower, upon the principle that she had no power to reduce her husband's lands into actual possession. The right of dower attached upon all marriages not absolutely void and existing at the death of the husband. The seisin of the husband for the mere transitory instant, where the estate passes in and out of him at the same time, or where he was a mere naked trustee, without any beneficial interest in the inheritance, will not entitle the wife to dower. Hill's Adm'r's v. Mitchell, 5 Ark. (5 Pike) 608, 610. See, also, Lamar v. Scott (S. C.) 3 Strobl. 562, 563; Beebe v. Lyle, 40 N. W. 944, 946, 73 Mich. 114; Seager v. McCabe, 52 N. W. 299, 302, 92 Mich. 186, 16 L. R. A. 247; Eberle v. Fisher, 13 Pa. (1 Harris) 526, 527; Butler v. Fitzgerald, 61 N. W. 640, 43 Neb. 192, 27 L. R. A. 252, 47 Am. St. Rep. 741; Sanders v. Wallace, 24 South. 354, 356, 118 Ala. 418; Adams v. Storey, 26 N. E. 582, 583, 135 Ill. 448, 11 L. R. A. 790, 25 Am. St. Rep. 392; Sutherland v. Sutherland, 69 Ill. 481, 485; Wait v. Wait (N. Y.) 4 Barb. 192, 202; Johnson v. Vandyke (U. S.) 13 Fed. Cas. 888, 894.

The word "dower" is unambiguous. It has a fixed, definite, and legal meaning; and it is determined by statute to apply to and extend to all the lands, tenements, and hereditaments whereof the husband, or any other to his use, was seised of an estate of inheritance at any time during the intermarriage, to which the wife shall not have relinquished her right of dower by deed, except in cases provided for by the statute. Chapin v. Hill, 1 R. I. 446, 452.

Common-law dower is defined to be that portion of lands which a wife has for the term of her life of the lands of her husband after his death. But in South Carolina statutes have been passed authorizing in certain cases a sum of money to be assessed in lieu of the widow's dower. Commissioners are to be appointed for the purpose of admeasuring dower, and the law requires that they shall mete out to the widow and put her in full and peaceable possession of one third part of all the lands of her deceased husband, and, where this cannot be done without manifest disadvantage, then the commissioners shall assess a sum of money to be paid to the widow in lieu of her dower. Jeffries v. Allen, 33 S. C. 268, 270, 271, 11 S. E. 764.

A wife's right of dower is an emanation from the ownership of her husband, and subject to all its qualifications, though not to his alienations or incumbrances, during the coverture, without her consent declared as prescribed by law. Wilson v. Davisson (Va.) 2 Rob. 384, 405.

Dower is a title, inchoate and not consummate until the death of the husband; but it is an interest which attaches on the land as soon as there is a concurrence of marriage and seisin. Youngs v. Carter (N. Y.) 50 How. Prac. 410, 411 (citing 4 Kent, Comm. p. 51).

Dower is a right which, inchoate during coverture, becomes absolutely vested in the wife as an estate upon the death of her husband, and is as much beyond his control or power of disposition as her own inheritance. It not being his to give, every devise which he makes of his land upon which the right of dower attaches is presumed to be given subject to the legal estate, unless the contrary appears on the face of the will in express words or by the strongest kind of implication. Cunningham v. Shannon (S. C.) 4 Rich. Eq. 135, 140.

The right to dower is an interest which the law casts on the wife, and may be compared to a life estate vested in one person, to take effect only in case he survives another. The right to enjoy the estate is but a possibility. He may, and he may not, survive. If he does survive, the right becomes perfect. A right to dower is an interest contingent during the life of the husband, but rendered absolute by his death. "Dower," says Kent, "is a title inchoate, and not consummate until the death of the husband; but it is an interest which attaches on the lands as soon as there is the concurrence of marriage and seisin." The right to dower in personal property is an inchoate interest, contingent during the life of the husband, but rendered absolute by his death. The right is of a double contingency, viz.: He may, before death, will or give it away, and she may not survive him. Smith v. Hines, 10 Fla. 258, 283.

The words "right of dower," in a will wherein the testator states that he is informed that by the laws of the state concerning the wife's right of dower she is entitled to the possession of one-third of his personal estate and a life interest to the extent of one-third of his real estate, held used as descriptive of the widow's right, both under the statutes of dower and distribution, and not in their strict technical sense. They meant what the law gives a widow in case of intestacy, and when her rights are controlled and measured by nothing but the law. Woodford's Ex'rs v. Woodford, 44 N. J. Eq. (17 Stew.) 79, 80, 14 Atl. 273, 274.

An estate in dower is a continuation of the estate of the husband, and upon his death the right thereto becomes consummate. Young v. Tarbell, 37 Me. 509, 513.

The word "dower," in its ordinary acceptance, since its first introduction into this country, has been used synonymously with the word "third," so that by dower out of all lands of which the husband is seised, or is in coverture, is meant one-third of such land. Dower in the equity of redemption means dower in the land subject to incumbrances pursuant to dower; that is, one-third for life of what remains of the land after satisfying the incumbrances. Hoy v. Varner, 42 S. E. 690, 693, 100 Va. 600.

The term "dower" is one very well understood by laymen, and therefore a return, assigning certain real estate to the widow as and for her dower, is a sufficiently correct description. Skolfield v. Skolfield, 34 Atl. 27, 28, 88 Me. 258.

Under the act relative to dower (Rev. Laws, p. 397) the widow is entitled to dower of all lands, etc., whereof any person was seised of an estate of inheritance at any time during coverture to the use of the husband, if in equity the husband was the real owner of the land and had the right at any time to have a conveyance to himself of the legal title and estate in possession. Yeo v. Mercereau, 18 N. J. Law (3 Har.) 387, 395.

Under section 24, c. 62, Gen. St. 1878, allowing dower to a wife divorced on the ground of the adultery of her husband as if he were dead, the term "dower" must be held to extend to and include the present statutory provisions for the wife in lieu of dower in lands of a deceased husband. Holmes v. Holmes, 54 Minn. 352, 354, 355, 56 N. W. 46.

The word "dower," as used in Rev. St. c. 109, § 46, relating to wills, should be construed to include a saving to the widows of persons dying intestate of one-third of the personal estate, forever, after payment of debts. Sess. Laws, p. 168, § 6. Rawson v. Rawson, 52 Ill. 62, 68.

The term "dower" is sometimes applied to the estate of the husband given by law, and Judge Scott, in Hastings v. Meyers' Adm'r, 21 Mo. 519, seems to use it in this sense; but it properly refers to the interest of the widow as such in his lands. The allowance to the widow of household furniture, provisions, etc., is not part of the dower proper, though it pertains to its nature in being absolutely without regard to the claims of creditors, and also without regard to the husband's right of disposition by will. Bryant v. McCune, 49 Mo. 546, 547.

The word "dower," as used in a will whereby the testator left all his property, real and personal, in the possession of his wife during her widowhood, for the purpose of raising and educating the children, and providing that, if the wife married again before the children were all of age, she should have her dower under the law, and the balance to remain in common stock to the children, each drawing an equal proportion as he or she should come of age, does not mean dower in the legal sense, as the interest of the widow in the real estate of her deceased husband before the manifest intent of the testator in case his widow married again was that she should have such portion of his real and personal estate as the law entitled her to have if the testator had died intestate, and the word "dower" should be so construed. Paine v. Gupton, 30 Tenn. (11 Humph.) 402, 403.

Where a will provides that a devise to testator's widow shall be in lieu of all statutory allowances, strictly speaking, dower is not included. Dower is something more than an allowance. It is an estate in real property which vests in the widow immediately on the death of her husband; and, where the relationship of husband and wife exists, it cannot be taken from her without her consent. In other words, it is an estate of which she cannot be deprived, except by due course of law. Both the widow's quarantine and the exemption specified in Code Civ. Proc. § 2713, are provisions which inure to the benefit of the widow, whether her husband dies testate or not, unless, where he dies testate, some provision is made to bar that which the law has created expressly for her benefit, and she has elected to accept the same in lieu of the statutory provisions. In re Mersereau, 77 N. Y. Supp. 329, 332, 38 Misc. Rep. 208.

A will devising real estate gave to the testator's widow a right to one-fifth of all the grain and money rent that might be produced on the land devised during her natural life, unless she choose to renounce the will. The devisee, after the death of the testator, sold the land subject to the dower right, and gave a bond conditioned to satisfy said dower right, so that the grantee should have entire possession thereof, without any hindrance. The widow elected to take under the will, and thereafter an action was brought on the bond. Held, that the words "dower" or "dower right," as used in the bond, meant the "interest of the widow, which was charged on the land by the will." Heorath v. Hogan, 41 Ill. App. 472, 475.

Laws 1895, p. 169, entitled "An act to amend chapter 55, Rev. St. 1889, entitled 'Dower,' by adding a new section thereto," provided that, when the wife shall die without any child or other descendant, her widow shall be entitled to one-half of her estate absolutely, subject to the payment of her debts. It was contended that this provision was void, as not being within the term "dower." It was held that the word "dower," as thus used, will be construed in the light of the general meaning of that term—that is, that with which one is gifted or endowed—and, as so construed, the subject of the act was embraced in the title. O'Brien v. Ash, 69 S. W. 8, 13, 169 Mo. 283.

Though tenancies in dower were abolished in Indiana in 1852, lawyers and courts continue to speak of the provision established for the wife in lieu thereof as a dower; and, indeed, Webster's Dictionary defines dower as the provision for a widow on her husband's death. For these reasons the use of the word "dower" in a will cannot be held to prove that the testator did not understand that the law had been changed, and that the will in other portions thereof was drawn up in view of the law before the change. Durbin v. Redman, 40 N. E. 133, 134, 140 Ind. 694.

Gen. St. c. 62, § 24, allowing dower to a wife divorced on the ground of the adultery of her husband as if he were dead, should be construed to extend to and include the statutory provisions for the wife in lieu of dower in the lands of her deceased husband; the interest created by such statutes being inchoate on the marriage and seisin, becoming absolute at his death, and her estate extending to the homestead and one-third of other lands of which the husband was seised during coverture, and which could not be divested without her consent. Holmes v. Holmes, 56 N. W. 46, 54 Minn. 352.

Curtsey distinguished.

There is a radical difference between a right of dower and an estate by the curtesy. The latter takes effect as a freehold estate immediately on the death of the wife. On the other hand dower is not in any sense an estate until assigned. This is the common-law rule; the widow not being vested with the title or possession. She has no legal seisin or right of entry until dower is assigned. Malone v. Conn, 23 S. W. 677, 678, 95 Ky. 93.

Distribution of estate distinguished.

See "Distribution."

Dowry distinguished.

The words "dower," "dowry," and "dowry" are regarded by lexicographers as etymologically different forms of the same word. Dowry has become obsolete, and dower and dowry have in modern times acquired, both in law and in popular uses, distinct significations. Johnson v. Goss, 132 Mass. 274, 275.

Dower is not equivalent to dowry. The former is a provision for a widow at her husband's death, but the latter is a bride's portion on her marriage. Wendler v. Lambeth, 63 S. W. 684, 686, 163 Mo. 428.

Homestead distinguished.

Dower and homestead rights are different in character. Dower is a life estate, that after assignment may be sold and conveyed as other estates. The homestead is not such a right as can be used in any manner other than as provided by the Constitution. The grant of a homestead was intended to be in addition to the right of dower. Horton v. Hilliard, 24 S. W. 242, 243, 58 Ark. 298.

Legacy distinguished.

Dower is a provision made by law for the support of the widow. A legacy is a provision made by affection for the better support of the wife. Brown v. Caldwell (S. C.) Speers, Eq. 322, 327.

As an estate in land.

Dower unassigned is a mere right of action, and nothing more. Rayner v. Lee, 20 Mich. 384, 386.

Dower before assignment is purely an equitable right, which confers no specific estate or interest in the land that can be sold or assigned. Turnipseed v. Fitzpatrick, 75 Ala. 297, 303 (citing Barber v. Williams, 74 Ala. 331).

An estate of dower is a freehold estate; but a right of dower in a married woman, before it has become consummated by the death of her husband, is a mere intangible, inchoate, contingent expectancy, and not only is not an interest in the land, but does not even rise to the dignity of a vested right. Goodkind v. Bartlett, 26 N. E. 387, 136 Ill. 18.

The right of dower in a married woman is a mere intangible, inchoate, and contingent expectancy, and even in a widow, until it is assigned, it is no estate in the land; but it is a right resting in action only, and cannot be aliened. Blain v. Harrison, 11 Ill. (1 Peck) 384, 385; McNeer v. McNeer, 32 N. E. 681, 683, 142 Ill. 388, 19 L. R. A. 256.

The estate in dower is everywhere treated of as an estate in lands, tenements, and hereditaments. Lamar v. Scott (S. C.) 3 Strob. 562, 563.

Until there is an actual admeasurement of the dower, it is a mere potential interest, amounting to nothing more than a chose in action, and is not subject to seizure and sale by execution at law. The wife has no interest or estate in the lands, and her deed operates, not as a grant, but as an estoppel. Traders' Ins. Co. v. Newman, 22 N. E. 428, 430, 120 Ind. 554.

While it is true that the wife's inchoate right of dower is a mere intangible expectancy, and is not, strictly speaking, an estate in land, and does not even rise to the dignity of a vested estate, it is a valuable right, which the law will protect as possessing elements of property. Morgan v. Wickliffe (Ky.) 70 S. W. 680, 681 (citing Helm v. Board [Ky.] 70 S. W. 679; Petty v. Petty, 43 Ky. [4 B. Mon.] 215, 39 Am. Dec. 501).

Dower is a title inchoate, and not consummate until the death of the husband; but it is an interest which attaches on the land as soon as there is a concurrence of marriage and seisin. 4 Kent, Comm. 50. It has been compared to a life estate, vested in one person, to take effect only in case he survives another. Madigan v. Walsh, 22 Wis. 501, 504.

Dower is not an estate in land, vested or otherwise. It is a right without value, unless by some modern methods a possibility may be valued. A possibility or contingency is not an estate. It may be affirmed generally, where a right is given by law, until that right becomes vested in some way in property, the law may be changed or repealed, and the right taken away. Dower does not become a vested right in the wife until the death of her husband. A possibility of dower is no vested right in the estate of dower, or anything the law recognizes as property. Richards v. Bellingham Bay Land Co. (U. S.) 54 Fed. 209, 211, 4 C. C. A. 290.

"The right of dower is not an undivided one-third of the entirety, but is a one-third in severalty; nor is it one-third in quantity of the lands of which the husband died seised, but the widow is entitled to the use of such parts as will yield one-third of the entire income of the whole. The right, until assignment, is inchoate, and cannot be set up by any one in ejectment against an heir entitled to the fee." King v. Merritt, 34 N. W. 689, 699, 67 Mich. 194.

As an incumbrance.

See "Incumbrance (On Title)."

As inheritance.

Blackstone, following Littleton and the old writers on the common law, classes an "estate in dower" with estates of freehold not of inheritance. Lamar v. Scott (S. C.) 3 Strob. 562, 563.

Comp. Laws, § 646, providing that, when a divorce shall be granted by reason of the fault or aggression of the husband, the wife shall be entitled to certain property and alimony, etc., and that, if the wife survive her husband, she shall also be entitled to her right of dower in the real estate of her husband, not allowed her as alimony, of which he was seised at the time during coverture, and to which she had not relinquished her right of dower, should not be construed to mean inheritance; for it will be presumed that, if the Legislature had intended "inheritance," it would have said so. Crane v. Fipps, 29 Kan. 585, 588.

The interest of a widow of an intestate in the lands of her deceased husband after the sale of the lands in partition remains the same as before the sale, to wit, that of a tenant for life. Kunselman v. Stine, 38 Atl. 414, 41 Wkly. Notes Cas. 82, 83, 183 Pa. 1.

As a lien.

A widow's dower is an estate and interest during her life, and not merely a lien. In re Emig's Estate, 40 Atl. 522, 186 Pa. 409; Diefenderfer v. Eschleman (Pa.) 6 Atl. 568, 570, 18 Wkly. Notes Cas. 315, 317, 113 Pa. 305.

The statutory dower of a widow is not treated as a lien on land; but it is an interest in it. It is an estate given by the intestate laws. Enyard v. Enyard, 42 Atl. 526, 527, 190 Pa. 114, 70 Am. St. Rep. 623.

Dower is a freehold estate growing out of marriage, seisin, and death of the husband. The right of dower after marriage is absolute, and fixes a lien on all lands of which the husband was seised of an estate of inheritance. No subsequent act of his, without the wife's consent, can divest her of it. It takes by way of lien created by and at the time of marriage, and, when once fixed, is paramount to the claim of creditors and purchasers. Tate v. Jay, 31 Ark. 576, 579.

As arising by operation of law.

Dower is an estate which arises solely by operation of law, and not by force of any contract, express or implied, between the parties. It is the silent effect of the relation entered into by them, not in itself incidentally to the marriage relation, or as implied by the marriage contract, but merely as that contract calls into operation the positive institution of the municipal law. Martin's Heirs v. Martin, 22 Ala. 86, 105.

"Dower is not the result of the marriage contract, but is a provision which the law makes, founded on public policy, for the benefit of the wife as an incident to the marriage relation, and contingent on the seisin and death of the husband before the right of dower becomes fixed and consummate by his death. It is, therefore, subject to legislative control, and may be modified or taken away." Morrison v. Rice, 29 N. W. 168, 169, 35 Minn. 436.

"To entitle to dower there must be a marriage. So the death and seisin of lands by the husband are always necessary to establish a right to this estate. But they are not embraced by, nor are they the subjects of, a marriage contract. The estate is by law made an incident of the marriage relation. It stands, like an estate by the curtesy, on the foundation of positive law." Moore v. City of New York, 8 N. Y. (4 Seld.) 110, 113, 59 Am. Dec. 473.

Dower is not the result of contract, but a positive institution of the state, founded on reasons of public policy. Moore v. City of New York, 8 N. Y. (4 Seld.) 110, 113, 59 Am. Dec. 473.

Dower is the provision the law makes for a widow out of the lands of her husband. It is not the result of contract, but a positive institution of the state, founded on reasons of policy. Moore v. New York, 8 N. Y. (4 Seld.) 110, 59 Am. Dec. 473. It is a life estate granted by operation of law in favor of the wife on decease of her husband, by which she is endowed for life of a third of the land of which he was seised of an estate of inheritance at any time during coverture. Jourdan v. Haran, 3 N. Y. Supp. 541, 542.

Dower at common law was a right institutional in character arising in law, and not out of the pact or consent of the parties. It springs from marriage and seisin, and at once fastens on the land by a right paramount to that of any person claiming on the husband by a subsequent act. 2 Co. Litt. 32. It follows, therefore, that neither the alienation of the husband, nor any act suffered or done by him, such as bankruptcy, will confer a title on the alienee or assignee. It will defeat dower if the right of the dowress becomes consummated by survivorship. The right of the dowress is derivative from the title of the husband, and is an offshoot from it; and therefore, if the husband loses the land by title paramount, the inchoate interest of the wife falls with it. Pickett v. Buckner, 45 Miss. 226, 239.

As applying to personality.

The word "dower," both technically and in popular acceptance, has reference to real estate exclusively. Dow v. Dow, 36 Me. 211, 216.

The term "dower" at common law applies only to real estate, and, in the absence of statute extending the term, it cannot now be given a more liberal construction, so as to mean an interest in all the property and estate, both real and personal, of which the husband died seised. Perkins v. Little, 1 Me. (1 Greenl.) 148, 150; Dow v. Dow, 36 Me. 211, 216; Brackett v. Leighton, 7 Me. (7 Greenl.) 383, 384; Stearns v. Perrin, 90 N. W. 297, 298, 130 Mich. 456; In re Davis' Estate, 36 Iowa, 24, 30. It is so used in the Revised Statutes of Missouri, providing that, if any woman be divorced from her husband for his fault or misconduct, she shall not thereby lose her dower, and hence such person is not entitled to the personal estate of the husband. Weindel v. Weindel, 29 S. W. 715, 126 Mo. 640.

A contract providing that a legacy given the wife was accepted by her as her full dower in her husband's estate should not be construed to include real estate only, but includes all estate, both real and personal. Ditson v. Ditson, 52 N. W. 203, 205, 85 Iowa, 276.

An antenuptial contract, in which the wife agreed to surrender her right to dower or homestead in or to any property which should belong to the estate of her husband, should be construed as meaning her interest in his real estate only, and not in his personal property. Pitkin v. Peet, 54 N. W. 215, 216, 87 Iowa, 268.

In Florida by statute the term "dower" includes the widow's interest, not only in the realty, but also in the personalty, of her deceased husband. Woodberry v. Matherson, 19 Fla. 778, 781.

A deed conveying the grantor's right, title, and interest of dower in said estate would convey the grantor's statutory dower interest in the personal property, as well as the real property. McFarland v. Blaze's Adm'r, 24 Mo. 156, 157.

A will providing that testator's wife should have her lawful right of dower out of his estate should not be construed in its strict legal sense, as meaning the estate which the wife takes by operation of law in the lands of which her husband was seised, but as used inartificially, meaning one-third of the husband's entire estate, both real and personal. Adamson v. Ayres, 5 N. J. Eq. (1 Halst. Ch.) 349, 352.

The word "dower," as used in Rev. St. § 2435, declaring that the widow's dower cannot be affected by any will of her husband, if she objects thereto and relinquishes the rights conferred upon her by the will, is applicable only to real property, and does not apply to personal property; hence, a widow cannot claim as distributee of the estate of her husband, when he has fully disposed of the same by his will. In re Davis' Estate, 36 Iowa, 24, 30.

Where one devised to his wife dower in all his estate according to the laws of the state, the term "dower" should be taken in its legal acceptation, and limited exclusively to realty. Brackett v. Leighton, 7 Me. (7 Greenl.) 383, 384.

Reversion included.

A deed conveying certain land, except the widow's dower, meant the widow's right to the use of a third of the real estate described during her life, and did not include the reversion thereof. Starr v. Brewer, 3 Atl. 479, 483, 58 Vt. 24.

DOWER EX ASSENSU PATRIS.

This form of dower must have the same quality of certainty as dowment ad ostium ecclesiæ. It must be of "parcels of his father's lands or tenements with the assent of the father, who afterwards assigns the quantity and parcels, and after the death of the son the wife enters into the same parcels." Grogan v. Garrison, 27 Ohio St. 50, 61.

DOWER INTEREST.

A dower interest is a continuance of the estate of the husband, and is held of him by appointment of law. Hence, also, certain proceedings may be necessary to extend and fix the extent of the interest. When that is done the interest must rest first, by relation or otherwise, on the death of the husband. Farnsworth v. Cole, 42 Wis. 403, 405.

DOWMENT AD OSTIUM ECCLESIAE.

"Dowment ad ostium ecclesiæ is where a man of full age, seised in fee simple, who shall be married to a woman, and when he cometh to the church door to be married, then, after their affiance and troth plighted between them, he endoweth the woman of his whole land, or the half, or other lesser part thereof, and then openly doth declare the quantity and certainty of the land which she shall have for her dower. Here be two things that the law doth delight in, viz., to have this and the like openly done, * * * and to have certainty, which is the mother of quiet." Grogan v. Garrison, 27 Ohio St. 50, 61 (citing Co. Litt. tit. "Dower," § 39).

DOWN.

See "Payment Down."

A land grant, describing one boundary of land from a certain point on a river bank "down the river" to another point, means down the river according to its windings and turnings. The stream thus forms the boundary of the granted land. Brown v. Huger, 62 U. S. (21 How.) 305, 320, 16 L. Ed. 125; Slade v. Etheridge, 35 N. C. 353, 355, 57 Am. Dec. 557.

In McCulloch's Lessee v. Aten, 2 Ohio (2 Ham.) 307, in construing a deed describing the boundaries of the land conveyed as commencing at a tree on the bank of a stream, thence down the creek with the several meanders thereof, the courts say that the fact that the marked corner called for stands four rods from the water does not create any ambiguity in the term "down the creek with the several meanders thereof." They import the water's edge at low water, which is a decided natural boundary, and must control a call for corner trees on the bank. French v. Bankhead (Va.) 11 Grat. 136, 155.

A contract for the sale of all standing timber on designated land, suitable for sawing, and down to 12 inches in diameter at the smallest end of the log, further provided that the purchasers should take the timber clean as they go, including all fit for sawing, and down to 12 inches in diameter at the smallest end of the log. Held, that the phrase "down to 12 inches in diameter at the smallest end of the log" was not a reservation of the timber below 12 inches in diameter, but that it simply defined the duty of the purchasers, making it obligatory on them to cut all timber above the designated size, but leaving the suitability for sawing of the smaller trees to be determined as they were reached by the purchasers in the process of cutting the timber. Dexter v. Lathrop, 20 Atl. 545, 547, 136 Pa. 565.

As middle of channel.

The words "to," "by," "along," "with," "in," "up," or "down" a creek, river, slough, strait, or bay, mean the middle of the main channel thereof, unless otherwise expressed. Pol. Code Cal. 1903, § 3906; Pol. Code Mont. 1895, § 4106.

The words "up" or "down" a creek or river mean the middle of the main channel thereof. Rev. St. Ariz. 1901, par. 930.

DOWN-CAST.

The term "down-cast" is used to designate the compartment of the air shaft of a coal mine which is used to carry pure air into the mine. Coal Run Coal Co. v. Jones, 19 Ill. App. (19 Bradw.) 365, 366.

DOWRY.

By dowry is meant the effects which the wife brings to the husband to support the expenses of marriage. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 2337. The income from it belongs to the husband, and is intended to help him to support the charges of the marriage, such as the maintenance of the husband and wife, their children, etc. Buard v. De Russey (La.) 6 Rob. 111. "Whatever in the marriage contract is declared to belong to the wife, or to be given to her on account of the marriage, by other persons than the husband, is a part of the dowry, unless there is a stipulation to the contrary; but a donation or gift by the future husband to the wife forms no part of it." Gates v. Legendre (La.) 10 Rob. 74, 78.

"Dowry" is that which the wife gives the husband on account of marriage, and is a sort of donation made with a view to his maintenance and the support of the marriage. Cutter v. Waddingham, 22 Mo. 208, 254.

As dower.

"Dowry" is not identical in meaning with "dower," the former being a provision for a widow on her husband's death, while the latter is a bride's portion on her marriage. The term "dowry," though limited in its strict legal significance to the meaning above given, is popularly used in other senses; as, for instance, where a testator devised land to his nephew, with the exception that if testator's sister living in Germany came to this country she should have a dowry therein, the court said in construing the same: "If we ascribe to 'dowry' its technical meaning, it would be utterly senseless in the connection in which it is used. If we give it a popular meaning as a portion or provision, it can well mean a use for life of the real estate designated, and such we feel sure was the testator's intention, and that must govern, in order that his words may avail something rather than nothing. Wendler v. Lambeth, 63 S. W. 684, 686, 163 Mo. 428, 438.

DOZEN.

Under certain conditions, parol evidence is admissible to show that a dozen of a certain article means thirteen by virtue of a custom to that effect. Coquard v. Bank of Kansas City, 12 Mo. App. 261, 265.

DR.

When a statement of account is made out, using the term "Dr." without more, it simply indicates that the person owes the various items, but does not indicate a matured indebtedness. Jaqua v. Shewalter, 37 N. E. 1072, 10 Ind. App. 234.

DRAFF.

"Draff" means waste matter, sweepings, refuse, lees, dregs. This word is entirely distinct in its meaning from "draught" or "draft." Marriott v. Brune, 50 U. S. (9 How.) 619, 633, 13 L. Ed. 282 (cited and approved in Seeburger v. Wright & Lawther Oil & Lead Mfg. Co., 15 Sup. Ct. 583, 584, 157 U. S. 183, 39 L. Ed. 665).

DRAFT.

A draft is an arbitrary deduction or allowance to merchant for loss of weight in handling, differences in scales, etc., so as to insure good weight to him. This is the meaning of the word in Rev. St. § 2898 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1919], which provides that in all cases the real care shall be allowed, but in no case shall there be any allowance for "draft," and as so used the word is not a misspelling for "draff." Marriott v. Brune, 50 U. S. (9 How.) 619, 633, 13 L. Ed. 282 (cited and approved in Seeberger v. Wright & Lawther Oil & Lead Mfg. Co., 15 Sup. Ct. 583, 584, 157 U. S. 183, 39 L. Ed. 665). It is a small allowance in weightable goods, made to the importer as if to compensate for any loss that may occur from the handling of the scales in the weight, so that when weighed the second time the article will hold out good weight. Tare is allowed for the outside or covering of the article imported, whether it be box, barrel, bag, bale, mat, etc. Napier v. Barney (U. S.) 17 Fed. Cas. 1149.

DRAFT (In Commercial Law).

See "Master's Draft."

A draft is for the payment of money drawn by one person on another. Prehm v. State, 36 N. W. 295, 297, 22 Neb. 673. The word is nomen generalissimum, and includes all orders for the payment of money drawn by one person against another. Wildes v. Savage (U. S.) 29 Fed. Cas. 1226, 1229.

An instrument in common parlance is known as a "draft" whenever the drawer requests the payment of money to the holder of the order, or draws on the payee in any terms, and has special reference to inland bills. Cole v. Dalton (N. Y.) 6 Daly, 484, 485.

The term "draft" does not include a paper styled a "draft" on its face, but which merely contains a statement that the person signing it will receive it for a hundred dollars in part payment for any organ which the holder may purchase from him. Prehm v. State, 36 N. W. 295, 297, 22 Neb. 673.

A by-law of a bank, providing that drafts may be made personally or by the order in writing of the depositor, or by letters of attorney duly authenticated, does not mean the instruments in writing commonly known as such—that is, bills of exchange or orders for money—but the acts or fact of drawing money by the depositor from the funds of the bank. Allen v. Williamsburg Sav. Bank, 69 N. Y. 314, 317.

"Drafts," as used in a letter stating that the writer guaranteed to pay at maturity any drafts that the person to whom the letter was written might draw on a certain person, does not imply negotiation of those instruments to third persons. "Drafts," as used in the collection of debts, are not usually negotiable. The office of a draft is to collect for the drawer from the drawee, residing in another place, money to which the former may be entitled, either on account or balance due or advanced on consignments, and though they may sometimes be used for raising money. That is not the necessary or ordinary purpose for which they are employed. Evansville Nat. Bank v. Kaufmann, 93 N. Y. 273, 282, 45 Am. Rep. 204.

A commission merchant in Minneapolis agreed to sell apples to be shipped from Medina, N. Y., and to advance to the shipper a dollar and a quarter per barrel. The shipper went to plaintiff bank, and requested it to advance him a dollar and a quarter per barrel on his drafts on the commission merchant against consignments, which it agreed to do if the commission merchant would wire or write that he would accept the drafts. Thereafter the commission merchant wired the bank as follows: "Will honor draft against apples, dollar quarter barrel, have been taking care of everything promptly;" and at the same time he wired the shipper, "Will advance dollar quarter on apples." He also afterward wrote the shipper requesting him to make his draft at five days' sight instead of at sight, as it was taking a large amount of money to carry on the business, adding, "but if your bank objects to the five days, and it is not customary with you, it is all right." Thirty-three drafts in all were discounted by the plaintiff bank in Medina, of which the defendant commission merchant accepted and paid twenty, but refused to pay the remaining thirteen, though he received and sold the apples, the bills of lading for which were attached to the remaining thirteen drafts. Held, that the word "draft" in the singular, in the consignee's telegram that he would honor shipper's draft against apples, could not be construed, as contended by the consignee, to only obligate him to pay one draft, since the language of the telegram was to be taken in connection with the subject-matter and the position of the parties, and that the word was to be construed in its plural as importing an obligation to accept a succession of drafts on successive consignments. Union Bank of Medina v. Shea, 58 N. W. 985, 986, 57 Minn. 180.

As bill or note.

See "Bill"; "Note."

Bill of exchange or check synonymous.

The word "draft," as used in Laws 1891, c. 43, § 16, relates to forgery, is a general term, and includes checks. State v. Warner, 55 Pac. 342, 343, 60 Kan. 94.

The term "draft" is commonly employed as a synonym for the words "bill of exchange" or "check," and was so used where a company saw fit to indorse on a voucher a statement to the effect that when approved, dated, and signed it should become a draft on the company, and such voucher will be treated as an accepted bill, and not a non-negotiable chose in action. Cudahy Packing Co. v. Sioux Nat. Bank (U. S.) 75 Fed. 473, 477, 21 C. C. A. 428.

A draft is an open letter of request from, and an order by, one person on another to pay a sum of money therein mentioned to a third person, on demand or at a future time therein specified. A "draft" at the present day is the common term for all bills of exchange. The words "draft" and "bill of exchange" are used indiscriminately. Edwards says: "The bill of exchange, popularly termed a 'draft,' is in the form of an open letter directing to whom it is addressed to pay the sum of money therein specified to a third person named in the instrument, on account of the writer or person by whom it is drawn. It must be payable in money." Hinnemann v. Rosenback, 39 N. Y. 98, 100.

"A 'check' or 'draft' on a banker is defined to be a written order or request addressed to persons carrying on the business of bankers, drawn on them by a party having money in their hands, requesting to pay on presentment, to a person therein named or to bearer, a specified sum of money. Chit. Bills, 322. It is said in Cruger v. Armstrong (N. Y.) 3 Johns. Cas. 5, 7, 2 Am. Dec. 126, a check, although generally received as cash when given in payment, is in form and reality a bill of exchange. It possesses all the requisites of the bill, and has been treated as such. Lord Kenyon said in the case of Bohem v. Sterling, 7 Term R. 423, 430, that at the trial of that case he thought there was a distinction between a banker's check and a bill of exchange, but on further consideration he did not think that distinction well founded." Douglass v. Wilkeson (N. Y.) 6 Wend. 637, 643.

City warrant.

A city warrant is a "draft," within a statute making it forgery to falsely make, alter, or counterfeit any draft. State v. Brett, 40 Pac. 873, 16 Mont. 360.

As equitable assignment.

See "Equitable Assignment."

Negotiability imported.

The word "draft" does not necessarily or even usually import negotiability. Baer v. English, 11 S. E. 453, 454, 84 Ga. 403, 20 Am. St. Rep. 372.

As personal property.

See "Personal Property."

DRAIN.

See "Public Drain"; "Servitude of Drain."

To drain land is to rid it of its superfluous moisture. This is generally done by deepening, straightening, or embanking the natural water courses which run through it, and by supplementing them, when necessary, by artificial ditches and canals. But it is not within the art of the drainer to promote drainage by building reservoirs for the storage of debris from mining and other operations, unless the word is to be wrenched from its geological or ordinary signification and meaning, and changed so as to mean water at any mining or other locality where debris may have accumulated. People v. Parks, 58 Cal. 624, 639.

To drain sugar is to separate molasses contained in all sugars, cooked or boiled, in open kettles, from the sugar itself, through small holes or apertures made through the bottom of a hoghead large enough for liquid to run through, but not large enough to pass sugar or solid matter. The molasses runs into a reservoir usually of cemented brick, over which the hogheads containing sugar are placed on beams or rafters laid on the brick walls of the reservoir at a short distance from each other. Meyer v. Queen Ins. Co., 6 South. 899, 900, 41 La. Ann. 1000.

Ditch synonymous.

The word "ditch," as used in the drainage act, shall be held to include a drain or water course. Horner's Rev. St. Ind. 1901. § 4316; Cobbey's Ann. St. Neb. 1903, § 5501; Rev. St. Mo. 1899, § 8278; Briar v. Job's Creek Drainage Dist. Com'rs, 185 Ill. 257, 260, 56 N. E. 1042, 1044.

Wherever the word "drain" occurs in the article relating to ditches and drains for agricultural purposes only, it shall be construed to mean open ditch. Rev. St. Mo. 1899, § 6972.

The word "drain" has no technical or exact meaning. It may mean a hollow space in the ground, natural or artificial, where water is collected or passes off, and is synonymous with "ditch." Goldthwait v. Inhabitants of East Bridgewater, 71 Mass. (5 Gray) 61, 64.

In common parlance, the words "drain" and "ditch" are used interchangeably, but, technically speaking, each has its own appropriate meaning when used in certain connections. The word "ditch" is mostly used to designate a trench on the surface of the ground, and the word "drain" is commonly used in connection with a sewer, sink, or other undersurface drain. Outside of this we can find no distinctive difference. To constitute either, there must be a well-defined channel for the drainage of water. Byrne v. Keokuk & W. Ry. Co., 47 Mo. App. 383, 389.

Sewers.

See, also, "Sewer."

"Drain," as used in Act July 1, 1895, authorizing the construction of drains, should be construed as broad enough to include sewers. City of Charleston v. Johnston, 48 N. E. 985, 986, 170 Ill. 336.

DRAINAGE.

See "Local Drainage"; "Work of Drainage"; "Right of Drainage."

Drainage is a system of drains and other operations, by which water is removed from towns, railway beds, and other works. People v. Parks, 58 Cal. 624, 648 (citing Goldthwait v. Inhabitants of East Bridgewater, 71 Mass. [5 Gray] 61, 63).

Statutes concerning the drainage of land ordinarily contemplate the removal of water therefrom by means of an artificial channel or trench. Royse v. Evansville & T. H. R. Co., 67 N. E. 446, 447, 160 Ind. 592 (citing City of Valparaiso v. Parker, 148 Ind. 379, 47 N. E. 330).

As public use.

See "Public Use."

As sewerage.

Sewage distinguished, see "Sewage."

The word "drainage," as used in Rev. St. 1894, § 3598, providing that whenever the council shall find it necessary for the successful drainage of any city to construct any drain, they shall cause and serve, etc., includes sewerage, in view of section 3603, providing that the drainage act shall be liberally construed to permit the drainage of cities, the reclamation of wet lands, and the improvement of the public health. City of Valparaiso v. Parker, 47 N. E. 330, 331, 148 Ind. 379.

When the term "drainage" is used as appurtenant to lands, the most obvious suggestion is a drainage of water. So it is held that an agreement giving a right of drainage into and through a drain gives no right to turn sewerage into the drain. Wetmore v. Fiske, 5 Atl. 375, 378, 15 R. L. 354.

As surface drainage.

In reference to an action for obstructing or preventing the natural drainage of a lot, the word "drainage" imports surface drainage, unless accompanied by averment telling what kind. McCray v. Town of Fairmount, 33 S. E. 245, 246, 46 W. Va. 442.

As watershed.

The word "drainage" has been defined to mean that district of country that drains into a river or stream, as the drainage of the valley of the river Thames. The word has the same legal significance as the term "watershed." Maxwell Land Grant Co. v. Dawson, 34 Pac. 191, 193, 7 N. M. 133.

An allegation that a sewer carried not only ordinary sewage, but also "waters from the drainage area of the brook," meant the waters which, if collected naturally, would form the brook, and includes the rainwater which instead of soaking into the ground, and forming reservoirs to supply the springs feeding the brook, runs off immediately and rapidly, because of the building of paved streets and sidewalks and dwellings. State Board of Health v. City of Jersey City, 35 Atl. 835, 836, 55 N. J. Eq. 116.

DRAINAGE DISTRICT.

A drainage district created under the levee act of the state of Illinois of May 29, 1879, is a corporation strictly in invitum. It is to be classified in this respect with counties, towns, school districts, road districts, and other quasi involuntary corporations, as distinguished from municipal corporations or private corporations. It is a subdivision merely of the general powers of the state for the purposes of civil and governmental administration. Rood v. Claypool Drainage & Levee Dist. (U. S.) 120 Fed. 207, 211, 56 C. C. A. 527.

DRAM.

In common parlance a "dram" is something that has alcohol in it—something that can intoxicate; so that proof of the sale of a dram is sufficient to sustain a conviction without proof of the ingredients, whether whisky or otherwise. Lacy v. State, 32 Tex. 227, 228.

DRAMA.

A "drama" is defined by the best lexicographers to be either a tragedy, comedy, play, or a theatrical entertainment. Commonwealth v. Fox (Pa.) 10 Phila. 204, 205.

A drama "is a story represented by action. The representation is as if the real persons were introduced and employed in the action itself. It is ordinarily designed to be spoken, but it may be represented in pantomime, when the actors use gesticulation, sometimes in the form of the ballet, but do not speak; or in opera, where music takes the place of poetry and of ordinary speech." Bell v. Mahn, 15 Atl. 523, 121 Pa. 225, 1 L. R. A. 364, 6 Am. St. Rep. 786.

Though the term "theater" has an extended signification, and comprehends a variety of performances, yet it is conceived that all that it does legitimately comprehend partakes more or less of the character of drama. The term "drama" means a poem or composition representing a picture of human life, and accommodated to action. It may be conceded that its signification is broad enough to cover any representation in which a story is told, a moral conveyed, or a passion portrayed, whether by words and actions combined, or by mere actions alone. The dramatic performances which are recognized as belonging to a theater are those adapted to the stage, with the appropriate scenery for their representation. Jacko v. State, 22 Ala. 73, 74.

DRAMATIC COMPOSITION.

A dramatic composition is a work in which the narrative is not related, but is repeated by a dialogue and action. Daly v. Palmer (U. S.) 6 Fed. Cas. 1132, 1135 (cited and approved, Carte v. Duff [U. S.] 25 Fed. 183).

A dramatic composition is a work in prose or poetry, in which stories are told or characters represented, both by conversation and action. Some are poems cast in a dramatic form, capable of representation upon the scene rather than adapted to it, and whose most valuable characteristic is there purely literary merit. Others of but slight literary pretense, and affording but little satisfaction in the perusal, are found agreeable in the representation from the spirited development of the story which is told in action; the vivacity and interest of the events displayed. Tompkins v. Halleck, 133 Mass. 32, 35, 43 Am. Rep. 480.

Music.

A "dramatic composition," within the meaning of the copyright laws, is a work in which the narrative is not related, but is represented by dialogue and action. "Music designed to be interpreted by instruments alone as a symphony can hardly be considered a dramatic work, within the meaning of the law." Carte v. Duff (U. S.) 25 Fed. 183, 187.

A song which relates to the burning of a ship at sea and the escape of those on board, describes their feelings in vehement language, and sometimes expresses them in the supposed words of the suffering parties, though sung only by one person sitting at a piano, giving effect to the verses by his delivery, but not assisted by scenery or appropriate dress, is dramatic. Russell v. Smith, 12 Adol. & E. 217, 236.

Play without words.

Under Act Aug. 18, 1856, conferring on the author or proprietor of a copyrighted

"dramatic composition" the sole right to print and establish it, and act or represent it on any stage, a written play, consisting of directions for its presentation by one without the use of spoken language by the characters, is included in the term "dramatic composition." A dramatic composition is a work in which the narrative is not related, but is represented by dialogue and action. Daly v. Palmer (U. S.) 6 Fed. Cas. 1132, 1135.

Spectacular exhibition.

A spectacular piece, in which the dialogue is very scant and meaningless, a sort of verbal machinery tacked on to a succession of ballet and tableaux, the principal part and attraction of the spectacle appearing to be the exhibition of women in novel dress, or in no dress, and in attractive attitudes or action, the closing scene being called Paradise, a sort of Mohammedan paradise, with imitation grottos and unmaidenly hours, is not a "dramatic composition." To call such a spectacle a dramatic composition is an abuse of language, and an insult to the genius of the English drama. Martinetti v. McGuire (U. S.) 16 Fed. Cas. 920, 922.

Stage dance.

"Dramatic composition," as used in the copyright act, means a composition which tells some story. It may be but the narrative or representation of a single transaction; but it must repeat or mimic some action, speech, emotion, passion, or character, real or imaginary, and hence does not include a stage dance, the explanation or description of which shows that the end sought for and accomplished was solely the devising of a series of graceful movements, combined with an attractive arrangement of drapery, lights, and shadows, telling no story, portraying no character, depicting no emotion. The mere mechanical movements by which effects are produced on the stage cannot be called dramatic composition, since they convey no idea of narrative; and therefore a performance in which no other idea than that of a comely woman, illustrating the poetry of motion in a singularly graceful fashion, is not dramatic, and hence not within the copyright act. Fuller v. Bemis (U. S.) 50 Fed. 926, 929.

DRAMATIC ENTERTAINMENT.

See "Place of Dramatic Entertainment."

DRAMSHOP.

A dramshop is a saloon or bar where spirituous or intoxicating liquors are sold. Brockway v. State, 36 Ark. 629, 636; Snow v. State, 9 S. W. 306, 50 Ark. 557.

A "dramshop," within the meaning of the liquor laws, is a place where spirituous, vinous, or malt liquors are retailed in less quantity than a gallon. Hewitt v. People, 57 N. E. 1077, 1078, 186 Ill. 338; Commonwealth v. Marzynski, 21 N. E. 228, 229, 149 Mass. 68; Feldman v. City of Morrison, 1 Ill. App. (1 Bradw.) 460; Rank v. People, 80 Ill. App. 40, 41; Strauss v. City of Galesburg, 67 N. E. 836, 838, 203 Ill. 234.

Where premises were leased to be occupied as a studio and salesroom, and for no other purpose, a sublease to a person occupying the premises as a dramshop was a breach of the contract, the court saying that "while we often hear dramshops spoken of as saloons, and see them so mentioned in city ordinances, and signs upon them often read 'Sample Room,' 'Family Resort,' and other designations, yet no one has ever, we believe, yet endeavored to attract custom by calling a dramshop a studio or a salesroom." Bryden v. Northrup, 58 Ill. App. 233, 235.

In Rev. St. art. 43, § 2, entitled "Dramshops," providing that whoever, not having a license to keep a dramshop, shall by himself, etc., sell liquors, shall be fined, etc., and defining a "dramshop" as a place where spirituous, vinous, or malt liquors are retailed in less quantity than one gallon, the term is not limited to a place where liquors are sold as an entire business and devoted to drinking, as a saloon or tippling house, but includes as well drug stores and other places where liquor is sold. Wright v. People, 101 Ill. 126, 129.

As used in a statute providing for the continuing in force of all ordinances of a municipality, the whole or any part of which is annexed to another city, incorporated town, or village, whereby the licensing of dramshops is prohibited or regulated therein, "dramshops" is generic, and means the liquor traffic generally. People v. Harrison, 61 N. E. 99, 101, 191 Ill. 257.

DRAMSHOP KEEPER.

A "dramshop keeper" is a person permitted by law, being licensed according to the provisions of the chapter relating thereto, to sell intoxicating liquors in any quantity, either at retail or in the original package, not exceeding ten gallons. Rev. St. Mo. 1899, § 2990.

A "dramshop keeper" is defined by the liquor law of 1845 to be a person permitted by law, being licensed according to the provisions of the act, to sell intoxicating liquors in any quantity less than a quart. State v. Slate, 24 Mo. 530, 531; State v. Owen, 15 Mo. 506, 507.

DRAUGHT.

Rev. St. U. S. § 2898 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1919], prohibits the allowance of "draught" in assessing customs duties. It was contended that such section prohibited the collector from making any allowance or deduction from any article subject to specific duty by reason of impurities contained therein; but the court said: "I am of the opinion that the words 'draught' and 'draft,' used in these acts of Congress, do not apply to or mean the impurities contained in an imported article, but mean the arbitrary allowance for loss of weight in handling, or shrinkage, or variations in scales or devices for weighing, and have no reference to such deductions as should be made to ascertain the exact, or as nearly as possible the exact, amount of the article imported on which the tax is imposed." Wright & Lawther Lead Co. v. Seeberger (U. S.) 44 Fed. 258, 259; Seeberger v. Wright & Lawther Oil & Lead Mfg. Co., 15 Sup. Ct. 583, 584, 157 U. S. 183, 39 L. Ed. 665 (citing and approving definition in Marriott v. Brune, 50 U. S. [9 How.] 619, 633, 13 L. Ed. 232).

DRAW.

To "draw" has several well-understood meanings, but as applied to a writing but one, and that, according to Webster, is "to write in due form; to prepare a draft of, as to draw a memorial, a deed, or bill of exchange; to draw up; to compose in due form; to draft; to form in writing." This is the meaning generally given by the lexicographers. Winnebago County State Bank v. Hustel, 119 Iowa, 115, 93 N. W. 70 (quoting Webster, Dict., and citing Hawkins v. State, 28 Fla. 363, 367, 9 South. 652).

Rev. St. 1894, § 2808 (Rev. St. 1881, § 1984), making it a misdemeanor to draw a pistol upon another person, etc., means to so draw it that it may be used to his injury, as to point the muzzle of a gun or revolver at another; but it is not necessary that he intend to discharge or fire it off, or shoot the person, in order to constitute a violation of the statute, and hence any one who intentionally points the muzzle of a pistol at another is guilty of a violation of the statute. Siberry v. State (Ind.) 47 N. E. 458, 459.

As part of a bridge.

See, also, "Drawbridge."

A "draw," as the term is used in reference to bridge building, is defined by all dictionaries as the movable section of the bridge, whether raised up, as was the earlier practice, or moved to one side, as at present. Gildersleeve v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. (U. S.) 82 Fed. 763, 766.

"Draw," as used in Act Cong. July 2, 1864, providing that the Northern Pacific Railway shall be constructed in a substantial manner, with all necessary draws, culverts, bridges, etc., means that part of a bridge across a navigable stream which is so made that it may be drawn up or aside to enable the unobstructed passage of water craft. Hughes v. Northern Pac. R. Co. (U. S.) 18 Fed. 106, 114.

As depression in land.

The word "draw," as used in the Northwestern states, implies a depression which may run for many miles in length, in which there is not necessarily a running stream, but the waters from melting snows and rains which fall on the area on either side of the draw drain into it, and thence make their way, through other channels, to the broad rivers of the West. Lincoln & B. H. R. Co. v. Sutherland, 44 Neb. 526, 62 N. W. 859.

As write in due form.

One of the definitions of the word "draw" is to write in due form; to prepare a draft of, as to draw a memorial, a deed, or a bill of exchange. Hawkins v. State, 9 South. 652, 28 Fla. 363.

As applied to warrants.

Drawing a warrant is incident to the auditing of claims. The manner in which the state auditor gives or records his decision is by indorsing the decision on the claim, and if it is favorable he does what is denominated as "drawing a warrant." But drawing a warrant is not a part of the auditing, except as it is made so by statute. Drawing a warrant is not drawing money out of the treasury, nor does it entitle the holder to receive money out of the treasury unless all the requisites of the law concur with the act. Drawing a warrant is a part of the formal and convenient mode provided by statute for recording the auditor's decision, but the decision would be as effectual if the Legislature had provided some other mode of entering the decision. Brown v. Fleischner, 4 Or. 132, 149.

DRAW LOTS.

The phrase "to draw lots" is said by Webster to mean: "To determine an event by drawing one thing from a number whose marks are concealed from the drawer." Wilkinson v. Gill, 74 N. Y. 63, 65, 30 Am. Rep. 264; People v. Noelke, 1 N. Y. Cr. R. 252, 256.

DRAWBACK.

One of the definitions of "drawback" is that it is a device resorted to for enabling a commodity affected by taxes to be exported and sold in the foreign market on the same terms as if it had not been taxed at all. Downs v. United States, 113 Fed. 144, 148, 51 C. C. A. 100.

DRAWBRIDGE.

Whether a structure is or is not a bridge may sometimes be a question of fact, and where a statute requires trains to slow down to a certain speed before running on or crossing any "drawbridge" the restriction as to speed applies to the entire bridge, and the term "drawbridge" should be construed to mean the bridge proper; that is to say, that part of the structure which is directly over the river, and not including the tressels or approaches on either side of the river. Though the term "drawbridge" is often applied to the movable section of the bridge, it also means the whole bridge, of which the draw or movable section is a part. Savannah, F. & W. R. Co. v. Daniels, 17 S. E. 647, 648, 90 Ga. 608, 20 L. R. A. 416.

The word "draw," as used in Act Cong. July 2, 1864, incorporating the Northern Pacific Railway Company, and authorizing the company to locate, construct, and maintain a continuous railway from Lake Superior to Portland, Or., with all the powers, privileges, and immunities necessary to carry into effect the purpose of the act, the same to be constructed in a substantial and workmanlike manner, with all the necessary draws and bridges, means a contrivance by which a section of a bridge across a navigable water is turned upwards or at right angles to itself, and parallel with the direction of the stream, so as to admit of the passage of vessels through the open space that could not otherwise pass the point. Hughes v. Northern Pac. R. Co. (U. S.) 18 Fed. 106, 114.

"Drawbridge," as used in a contract for the construction of a drawbridge on which the cars of a railroad could cross, meant a bridge serviceable for that purpose, and capable of being used with like facility as similar bridges properly constructed. Florida R. R. v. Smith, 88 U. S. (21 Wall.) 255, 263, 22 L. Ed. 513.

DRAWERS.

The word "drawers" in the statute, providing that in actions on bills or notes the plaintiff shall be compelled to sue the drawers and indorsers living and resident in this state in a joint action, must have been designed to embrace all parties who had signed a note or bill as maker. Stevenson v. Walton, 10 Miss. (2 Smedes & M.) 262, 265.

Where a note signed by sureties recited that the drawers and indorsers waived all defenses on the ground of any extension of the time of payment, the word "drawers" did not apply to either payees or indorsers, but should be construed as designating the original promisor and sureties. Winnebago County State Bank v. Hustel, 93 N. W. 70, 119 Iowa, 115.

DRAWING.

Judicial notice will not be taken that the words "drawing," or "Kentucky drawing," designate a game of chance. State v. Bruner, 17 Mo. App. 274, 275.

"Drawing a prize," as the term is used in speaking of a lottery, is, according to common parlance, the ascertainment, by chance or otherwise, of who is entitled to a particular result or a particular thing, by means of some prearranged mode of ascertaining the result, and as soon as the number which entitled the ticket holder to the money or article is drawn upon the wheel or otherwise ascertained the prize is said to be drawn. People v. Kent, 6 Cal. 89, 90.

Under a statute requiring the commissioners of waterworks of a city, before entering into any contract, to cause plans and specifications, detailed drawings, and forms of bids to be made, where the commissioners cause plans to be prepared they are the judges of the sufficiency of such plans, and no other body can determine the question of sufficiency. A "drawing" is a representation of a plain surface, by means of lines and shades. Its synonyms are "delineation"; "picture." The term "synonymous" is applied to a word that has the same import or signification with another. Accordingly such words as are synonyms agree in expressing one principal idea. A diagram of a pump, showing a longitudinal section and cross-section from the intake pier, with elevations of mains and basins, is a scale drawing as well as a plan. Ampt v. Cincinnati, 8 Ohio Dec. 624, 628.

DRAWING SLATE.

Drawing or graphic slate is a soft kind of slate, containing carbon, which is used for pencils. Plastic Fireproof Construction Co. v. City & County of San Francisco (U. S.) 97 Fed. 620-623.

DRAWN.

Code, § 5004, provides that at least one day before any capital case set for trial the court shall cause not less than 25 or more than 50 names to be publicly drawn from the jury box. Section 5005 provides that the special jurors so drawn, together with a panel of petit jurors organized for the week at which the case is set for trial, shall constitute a venire, from which the jury to try the case shall be selected. It was held that the word "drawn" was employed in the sense of "selected," whether by drawing from the jury box or by summoning by the sheriff to supply a deficiency in the regular jurors for the week. Smith v. State, 34 South. 168, 170, 136 Ala. 1.

DRAWN IN ORDINARY FORM.

See "Ordinary Form."

DRAWN IN QUESTION.

Judiciary Act, § 25, providing that a final decree in the highest court of equity in a state where is "drawn in question" the validity of a statute of any state on the ground of its being repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, and the decision is in favor of its validity, may be examined and reversed in the Supreme Court, means that it must appear clearly from the whole record that a certain provision of the Constitution or act of Congress was relied on by the party who brings the writ of error, and that the right thus claimed by him was denied. It is not necessary that the question should appear on the record to have been raised and the decision made in direct and positive terms, ipsisimis verbis. Bridge Proprietors v. Hoboken Land & Improvement Co., 68 U. S. (1 Wall.) 116, 143, 17 L. Ed. 571 (citing Crowell v. Randell, 35 U. S. [10 Pet.] 368, 9 L. Ed. 458; Armstrong v. Athens County, 41 U. S. [16 Pet.] 281, 10 L. Ed. 965).

DRAWN STEEL.

The word "drawn," when used as an adjective in describing steel as drawn steel, distinguishes from steel which merely passes through rolls. As used in Tariff Act Oct. 1, 1890, par. 148, relating to the duties on flat steel wire, or sheet steel in strips, whether drawn through dies or rolls, etc., it is used as a verb, and in that use it was well known, with reference to ductile metals, in a sense other than its primary one, long before the art of drawing through dies existed. The verb "draw" is recognized by all lexicographers as sometimes meaning extending in either length or breadth by hammering or other forging. United States v. Wetherell (U. S.) 65 Fed. 987, 988, 13 C. C. A. 264.

DRAY.

As vehicle, see "Vehicle."

In an ordinance requiring "drays" to be licensed, but allowing any person hiring a dray for the purpose of hauling for themselves or others to use it without a license, the word "dray" is used in its common and popular sense, as contradistinguished from a wagon in its common and popular sense. City of Griffen v. Powell, 64 Ga. 625, 627.

A wagon drawn by four horses, and used in the transportation of property and for transferring goods of grocers and merchants, is not a dray. Snyder v. City of North Lawrence, 8 Kan. 82, 84.

"Drays and wheeled vehicles run for profit," as used in Knoxville city ordinance taxing "hacks, carriages, drays, and wheeled vehicles run for profit," includes a dray kept by a firm of merchants for hauling goods to the depot for nonresident customers, for which service drayage is charged. City of Knoxville v. Sanford, 81 Tenn. (13 Lea) 545, 546.

DRAYAGE.

"Drayage," as used in a toll rate prescribed by harbor commissioners, allowing a reduced rate on merchandise landed on wharfs and taken thence in lighters or other vessels or warehoused without drayage, meant loaded means of conveyance, whether in wagons, drays, or cars. Soule v. San Francisco Gaslight Co., 54 Cal. 241, 242.

DREDGE.

As vessel, see "Vessel."

An agreement to "dredge" a dock implies of its own force the deposits of the materials dredged in some proper place. Boynton v. Lynn Gaslight Co., 124 Mass. 197, 201.

DRESS.

See "New Dress."

DRESSED FURS.

"Dressed furs or skins," within Tariff Act 1890, par. 444, providing a special duty on "dressed furs or skins," means skins which have been cured, and of which the pelt has been leathered; furs which are dressed on the skin. United States v. Wotton (U. S.) 53 Fed. 344, 346, 3 C. C. A. 553.

DRESSING.

"Dressing" is the process by which the skin or pelt is treated in the way to be converted into leather, and be made soft and flexible. It means curing and leathering the pelt. United States v. Wotton (U. S.) 53 Fed. 344, 346, 3 C. C. A. 553.

DRESSING VICTUALS.

The sale of liquor is not the dressing of victuals, within Pa. Act Assem. April 22, 1794, § 1, prohibiting the doing or performing of any worldly employment or business on Sunday, works of necessity and charity alone excepted, provided always that nothing therein contained should be construed to prohibit a dressing of victuals in private families, bakehouses, lodging houses, and other houses of entertainment, for the use of sojourners, travelers, or strangers. To dress victuals is to prepare food fit for consumption, and hence the table or bench on which the meat or other things are dressed or prepared for use is sometimes called a "dresser," from the French "dressoir," and there is no figure of speech or any rule of construction, either in grammar or law, that can make the selling of liquor the dressing of victuals. Omit v. Commonwealth, 21 Pa. (9 Harris) 426, 428.

DRESSMAKER.

Where under a contract plaintiff obligates herself to take charge of the dress-making department of the defendant as manager and dressmaker, with power to employ and discharge the employees of the department, etc., the word "dressmaker," taken in connection with the entire context of the contract, cannot be construed as meaning that she was employed as a seamstress, but rather merely descriptive of the position or office which she was to fill, and imposed no obligation upon her to do the work of a seamstress; and hence where her discharge was for her refusal to work as seamstress she was entitled to recover under the contract. Marx v. Miller, 32 South. 765, 767, 134 Ala. 347.

DRIED FRUIT.

Leghorn citron, which is commercially classed among "dried fruits," is entitled to free entry, under the tariff act of 1883, as a dried fruit. Nordlinger v. United States (U. S.) 69 Fed. 92.

DRIFT.

"Drifting in a tunnel" means taking earth, gravel, or ore from ground made accessible by means of the tunnel, and is not synonymous with "running a tunnel," and so is not a part of the construction, alteration, or repair of any building or improvement on or in a mine, within Code Civ. Proc. Cal., providing for a lien on every such building or improvement done with the knowledge of the owner. Jurgenson v. Diller, 46 Pac. 610, 611, 114 Cal. 491, 55 Am. St. Rep. 83.

DRIFT STUFF.

"Drift stuff," in its common acceptance, does not signify goods which are the subject of salvage, but means matter floating at random without any known or discoverable ownership, which, if cast ashore, will probably never be reclaimed, but will, as a matter of course, accrue to the riparian owner. Watson v. Knowles, 13 R. I. 639, 641.

DRIFTWAY.

"Driftway" is defined by lexicographers to be a "common way for driving cattle." Smith v. Ladd, 41 Me. 314, 320.

DRINK.

See "By the Drink."

"Drinking wine," within the meaning of a representation in an application for a life policy that the applicant does not drink wine, must be interpreted to mean that he has not drunk the liquor habitually, and the fact that he occasionally drinks to excess does not show a misrepresentation. Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Simpson (Tex.) 28 S. W. 837-839.

Within the meaning of a statute providing that no person without a state license shall sell, offer, or expose for sale spirituous liquors, wine, porter, beer, "or any drink of like nature," includes, by reason of the use of the term in connection with the liquors specifically enumerated, all similar preparations, made by similar process of fermentation, of similar nature. State v. Oliver, 26 W. Va. 422-427, 53 Am. Rep. 79.

DRINKING SHOP.

Within a city ordinance providing for the licensing of barrooms in drinking shops, and prohibiting the sale of liquor without a license, a "drinking shop" is a place where liquors are sold, bartered, or delivered to be drunk on the premises. City of Portland v. Schmidt, 6 Pac. 221, 225, 13 Or. 17.

DRIP.

See "Servitude of Drip."

DRIVE.

The words "riding" and "driving" are of common use, and must be taken and construed according to their ordinary signification. In an ordinance requiring persons "riding or driving" to halt for pedestrians, the use of the words in the disjunctive form shows that it was intended to designate by each a different act. Webster defines the words "ride" and "drive" as follows: "Ride. (1) To be carried on a horse or other animal, or in any kind of vehicle or carriage. (2) To be carried or travel on horseback." "Drive. To go or pass in a carriage." It will be seen that "ride" in its broadest sense embraces "drive," but as used in the ordinance it was evidently not so intended. Citizens' Ry. Co. v. Ford, 93 Tex. 110, 113, 53 S. W. 575, 576, 46 L. R. A. 457.

"Drive" means to go or pass in a carriage. As used in an ordinance requiring any person riding or driving to check up or halt for pedestrians, if necessary, on approaching alley or street crossings, the phrase "any person driving" means one passing in a vehicle under his own control, and does not apply to street cars. Citizens' Ry. Co. v. Ford, 53 S. W. 575, 576, 93 Tex. 110, 46 L. R. A. 457.

"Driven into," as used in Rev. St. § 3845, providing for the assessing of any personal property brought or driven into the territory with a regular assessment in any year, refers only to live stock. Frontier Land & Cattle Co. v. Baldwin, 31 Pac. 403, 404, 3 Wyo. 764.

"Driven," as used in Sp. Laws 1875, c. 48, § 2, entitling a corporation to toll on all logs driven down a certain river, will be construed to include logs driven by the unaided action of the stream, as well as logs driven by artificial means. St. Louis Dalles Imp. Co. v. C. N. Nelson Lumber Co., 44 N. W. 1080, 1082, 43 Minn. 130.

Where a statute authorizes one to "drive" the logs by which his own may be obstructed or with which they are intermingled, the term has a well-understood meaning, and involves the exercise of the requisite care and effort to take the logs down the stream. Miller v. Chatterton, 46 Minn. 338, 340, 48 N. W. 1109, 1110.

"Take," "drive," and "sell," in their usual sense, denote innocent action, and hence, as used in a statement standing alone, that "he took and drove off my ducks and sold them," without any averment, do not import the commission of a crime, so as to render the words slanderous per se. Hinesley v. Sheets, 48 N. E. 802, 803, 18 Ind. App. 612, 63 Am. St. Rep. 356.

DRIVEN WELL.

A "driven well" is one made by driving an iron pipe into the ground to the required depth. Pickett v. Pacific Mut. Life Ins. Co., 144, Pa. 79, 90, 22 Atl. 871, 13 L. R. A. 661, 27 Am. St. Rep. 618.

A "driven well" consists of an air-tight tube sunk into the earth until a water-bearing stratum is reached, and then by means of a pump at the top of the tube a vacuum is created in the tube, thus causing the water to flow to the surface with greater rapidity than it would flow from purely natural causes. Andrews v. Carman (U. S.) 1 Fed. Cas. 868, 870.

A "driven" well is one constructed by driving or forcing an instrument into the ground until it is projected into the water, without removing the earth upward, as it is in boring. "The distinguishing characteristics of a driven well, as it differs from a dug well, is that when the pressure is relieved from the interior of the tube, which itself forms the body of the well, not only does the force of gravity act to supply it with water directly from the earth, but there being no intervening body of water between the wall of the well itself and the earth surrounding it on which the atmosphere can act directly and with greater effect to force it into the well (as it can and does in the open well), the water is supplied directly to it from the earth surrounding it in a direct inverse ratio to its distance from the well, and, the friction of the water through the earth being directly as the square of its velocity, as the distance from the well increases, the water moves very much slower than it does immediately next to the well itself; but the area of the source of supply being increased exactly in the ratio of the square of its distance from the well, and the friction being increased exactly as the square of its velocity, the one exactly counterbalancing the other, it follows that from natural laws the surface of the water of the earth surrounding the well is and must be maintained practically at a given level; whereas, in the open well supplied by gravity only, the water in the earth inclines from the natural surface of the stratum in the earth to the bottom of the well, the angle of that decline decreasing as the supply is taken from the well, and, unless pumping is stopped and time allowed for a resupply, a lowering of the water in the earth extends to a continually increasing distance, and a longer time is required to obtain the original quantity in the well, while the supply to the driven well is continuous and steady and practically inexhaustible, the supply in a given time being in proportion to the size of the pipe forming the well, having openings proportionate to its size, different wells varying in the supply according to the nature of the soil in which they are inserted, but remaining virtually constant at all times in the same soil. Water cannot be pumped from a driven well in any given stratum with greater ease than from an open well sunk in the same stratum. One peculiar characteristic of a driven well, as distinguished from the bored artesian well, is that the driven well is for use in soil where no rock is to be penetrated, and where the pressure of the atmosphere is free to act on the surface of the water in the earth surrounding it; while the artesian well is usually, if not always, bored into a rock stratum, and is supplied with water through fissures in the rock, instead of through the earth itself surrounding the entrance or opening to the well." Driven Well Cases, 7 Sup. Ct. R. 1073, 1079, 122 U. S. 40, 30 L. Ed. 1064.

DRIVER.

The word "driver," as used in the sections regulating the use of vehicles on the highways, shall be construed to include any person riding or propelling a bicycle or tricycle or directing a motor carriage. Gen. St. Conn. 1902, § 2033.

A person riding a bicycle is a "driver" of that vehicle within the meaning of a statute prohibiting the riding or driving of any horse or beast so as to endanger the life or limb of any passenger. Davis v. Petrinovich, 21 South. 344, 112 Ala. 654, 36 L. R. A. 615.

A conductor of a street railroad car is not a "driver" of a carriage within the statute making a master liable for the willful acts of his driver while driving such carriage. Isaacs v. Third Ave. Railroad Co., 47 N. Y. 122, 124, 7 Am. Rep. 418.

DROIT.

"Droit" is defined by Black's Law Dictionary as equivalent to the English word "right." Opel v. Shoup, 100 Iowa, 407, 420, 69 N. W. 560, 37 L. R. A. 583.

DROIT D'AUBAINE.

"Droit d'aubaine" is defined by Black as, in French law, a rule by which all the property of a deceased foreigner, whether movable or immovable, was confiscated to the use of the state, to the exclusion of his heirs, whether claiming ab intestato or under a will. Opel v. Shoup, 100 Iowa, 407, 420, 69 N. W. 560, 37 L. R. A. 583.

DROP.

Where an insurance company sent to its agent an expiration sheet containing a list of certain policies, opposite all of which except one was the word "renew," and opposite this one, which was for $2,000, was the word "drop," such word was at least ambiguous and equivocal, and the agent had a right to interpret the instrument by decreasing the insurance and renewing for half the amount. Winne v. Niagara Fire Ins. Co., 91 N. Y. 185, 192.

DROP FEED.

A "drop-feed" sewing machine means that particular form of feed in which the feeding instrument is applied from underneath the table (in distinction from being applied on the top of the table), and which recedes from underneath the bottom of the table after the feeding is done. Florence Sewing Mach. Co. v. Grover & Baker Sewing Mach. Co., 110 Mass. 70, 86, 14 Am. Rep. 579.

DROP IN TENSION.

"Drop in tension" means "loss of the propulsive force which measures initially the forward movement of the electrical energy, or so-called 'current,' as it leaves the generator and seizes upon and follows the conductor." This drop in tension is the necessary resultant of the obstructive operation of the molecules of the conductor to and upon the electrical energy or potential," as it is called, as it forces its way through the conducting matter. Edison Electric Light Co. v. Westinghouse (U. S.) 55 Fed. 490, 495.

DROPP WRIST.

An injury on the wrist known as the "dropp wrist" is the paralysis of the nerves which control the muscles on the back of the wrist. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Bodie (Tex.) 74 S. W. 100, 105.

DROUGHT.

A ship was chartered in Liverpool to carry a cargo of lumber from Ship Island. The charter party provided that in the computation of days allowed for delivering the cargo any time lost by reason of droughts, floods, storms, or any extraordinary occurrence beyond the control of the charterer, should be excluded. Held, that the word "droughts" could not include a drought prevailing at the time of the charter along the tributaries of a river, which prevented the charterers from obtaining the timber, especially as it was the custom of the port to prepare cargoes at another place, between which place and Ship Island no drought could affect a delivery. Sorensen v. Keyser (U. S.) 51 Fed. 30, 31, 2 C. C. A. 92.

DROVE.

A "drove" is defined by Webster to be a collection of cattle; a number of animals driven in a body. We speak of a "herd" of cattle, a "flock" of sheep, when a number is collected, but properly a "drove" is a herd or flock driven; and, as used in an ordinance forbidding the driving of any drove of horned cattle throughout the city, it forbids the driving at any time of cattle throughout the streets of a city, without any regard to the number in the drove. McConvill v. Jersey City, 39 N. J. Law (10 Vroom) 38, 43.

Under Act June 2, 1873, providing that it should not be lawful for any persons to herd any "drove of cattle" numbering more than twenty-five head on any land in the state, not his own, within one-half mile of the residence of any resident of the state, without the consent of the owner of the land, an information charging that the defendant willfully herded fifty cattle contrary to the statute is sufficient, the term "fifty cattle" being equivalent to "drove of cattle." Caldwell v. State, 2 Tex. App. 53, 54.

DROVER.

See "Stock Drover."

As used in the article relating to domestic animals, "drover" means every person having charge or control of any herd of neat cattle, horses, or mules, numbering 5 or more, or any flock of sheep numbering 25 or more, as owner, agent, or employé, while the same is being driven from one place to another not within the same range or neighborhood. Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 1544a.

DROVER'S PASS.

A "drover's pass" is a carriage for hire, for while the person was entitled to pass free, yet the passage was one of the mutual terms of an agreement for carrying his cattle. Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Tanner, 41 S. E. 721, 723, 100 Va. 379 (citing New York Cent. R. Co. v. Lockwood [U. S.] 17 Wall. 357, 21 L. Ed. 627).

"Drovers' passes" are passes given to drovers of stock who accompany the same; but such carriage is not gratuitous, and a person riding on such a pass is entitled to protection as a passenger, both while going and returning; and this rule is not altered by a recital in the contract that he is to be deemed an employé of the carrier while so traveling. Missouri Pac. Ry. Co. v. Ivy, 9 S. W. 346, 349, 71 Tex. 400, 1 L. R. A. 500, 10 Am. St. Rep. 758; St. Louis S. W. R. Co. v. Nelson (Tex.) 44 S. W. 179, 180.

DROWN.

The present participle "drowning" is a well-known word, indicating, when applied to a human being, a condition which demands prompt succor, otherwise the result will be death. The past participle "drowned" means, and for centuries has meant in common and legal parlance, a fixed condition, deprived of life by immersion in water; dead. No diligent inquiry of lexicographers is demanded; the use of the word "drowned" to convey the fact and the manner of death in an indictment is a use of it in its plain and ordinary signification, and, in the phrase "mortally choked, suffocated, and drowned," means "dead." United States v. Barber, 20 D. C. 79, 93.

DRUG.

See "Uncompounded Medicinal Drug."

Webster defines "drugs" to be substances used in the composition of medicines; and, again, as used in dyeing or any chemical operations. Collins v. Farmville Ins. & Banking Co., 79 N. C. 279, 281, 28 Am. Rep. 322.

A "drug or medicine" is a substance or commodity used as a remedy for diseases. The use contemplated must be a general or primary one, and in the construction of a statute forbidding the sale of goods on Sunday, but excluding drugs and medicine, the Legislature could not have intended to include tobacco. State v. Ohmer, 34 Mo. App. 115, 124.

The term "drug" shall include all medicines for internal or external use. Gen. St. N. J. 1895, p. 1175, § 75; Comp. Laws N. M. 1897, § 1256; Civ. Code S. C. 1902, § 1581; Code Miss. 1892, § 2095; Pen. Code Tex. 1895, art. 431.

The term "drug" shall include all medicines for internal or external use, antiseptics, disinfectants, and cosmetics. Rev. Laws Mass. 1902, p. 660, c. 75, § 17; Bates' Ann. St. Ohio 1904, §§ 4200-4205.

The term "drug" includes any medicinal substance, or any preparation authorized or known in the Pharmacopœia of the United States, or the National Formulary, or the American Homeopathic Pharmacopœia, or the American Homeopathic Dispensatory. P. & L. Dig. Laws Pa. 1897, vol. 3, col. 397, § 2.

"Drugs in a crude state," as used in Tariff Act Oct. 1, 1890, par. 560, includes elaterium in cakes, prepared from the juice of the fruit of echallium elaterium by evaporation and drying, and containing a medicinal drug known as "elaterin," which, however, is extracted from the cakes before it is used by the physician. United States v. Merck (U. S.) 66 Fed. 251, 252, 13 C. C. A. 452.

"Guarana" is a medicinal drug, consisting of a dried paste in the form of rolls, such being the crudest state in which it is ever imported, and which before being used as a medicine must be further prepared, and is free of duty under paragraph 548, Free List, § 2, c. 11, Tariff Act July 24, 1897, 30 Stat. 197 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1683], relieving from duty "drugs in a crude state." Cowl v. United States (U. S.) 124 Fed. 475, 476.

Benzine.

A "drug" is any animal or mineral substance in the composition of medicines; any stuff used in dyeing or chemical operations; any ingredient used in chemical preparations or employed in the arts. Benzine put up in bottles containing from two to six ounces each, to be sold for cleansing purposes, is included within the term "drugs" as used in a fire policy insuring drugs and chemicals. Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Flemming, 44 S. W. 464, 465, 65 Ark. 54, 39 L. R. A. 789, 67 Am. St. Rep. 900.

"Webster defines a 'drug' as including any mineral substance used in chemical operations, so that the court held that it could not say as a matter of law that benzine was not included in the term as used in an insurance policy." Carrigan v. Lycoming Fire Ins. Co., 53 Vt. 418, 426, 38 Am. Rep. 687.

Intoxicating Liquors.

"Drugs" are not within the meaning of an act of the Legislature prohibiting merchants from selling intoxicating liquors without a license. Anderson v. Commonwealth, 72 Ky. (9 Bush) 569, 571.

A "drug" is a compound, mostly of mineral, animal, or vegetable substance, made by apothecaries and others, and used as a medicine in the treatment of diseases, and commonly called "physic." Whisky cannot with propriety be included in the term "drug." That term carries along with it an idea inseparable from it, of something repulsive, nauseous, at which the gorge heaves. Whisky, on the contrary, is inviting and exhilarating. Whisky is sometimes taken medicinally, but never as a drug. Gault v. State, 34 Ga. 533, 535.

Under the express provisions of 81 Ohio Laws, p. 67, and 87 Ohio Laws, p. 248, providing against the adulteration of foods and drugs, the term "drugs" includes all medicines for internal or external use, antiseptics, disinfectants, cosmetics, and hence will be construed to include whisky. State v. Hutchinson, 46 N. E. 71, 72, 56 Ohio St. 82.

In a will of a wholesale and retail druggist giving and bequeathing his stock of medicines, drugs, paints, and furniture belonging to or contained in his store to certain persons, the terms "medicines" and "drugs" cannot be construed to include 50 barrels of whisky which were stored in a distillery bonded warehouse, though whisky may be sold by druggists in comparatively small quantities as medicine, and which a great many people so take. Kloch v. Burger, 58 Md. 575, 578.

Saltpetre.

"Drugs" are defined by Webster to be "substances used in the composition of medicines; substances used in dyeing or in chemical operations." Thus saltpetre is a drug, and may be kept as a drug under a policy insuring a stock of drugs and medicines with a proviso against the keeping of gunpowder, fireworks, saltpetre, etc. Collins v. Farmville Ins. & Banking Co., 79 N. C. 279, 281, 28 Am. Rep. 322.

Tobacco.

Tobacco is not a "drug" within the meaning of a Sunday statute permitting the selling of drugs and medicines on Sunday. State v. Ohmer, 34 Mo. App. 115, 125.

Tobacco in its manufactured form, or cigars, cigarettes, smoking tobacco, chewing tobacco, snuff, and the like, is not a "drug" or "medicine," within the meaning of a city ordinance excepting drugs and medicine from its operation. Penniston v. City of Newnan, 45 S. E. 65, 66, 117 Ga. 700.

Cigars are manufactured articles familiar to everybody. The materials of which they are composed are carefully prepared and put into form until they lose their original character as mere materials, and become articles of commerce, known by a new name and adapted to a particular use. Cigars sold by a tobacconist in the ordinary way are not "drugs" or "medicines," within the meaning of those words as used in St. 1887, c. 391, § 2, permitting the retail sale of drugs and medicines on Sunday. Commonwealth v. Marzyuski, 21 N. E. 228, 229, 149 Mass. 68.

DRUG STOCK.

A chattel mortgage describing the mortgaged property as a "drug stock" covers all articles ordinarily and usually kept therein at the place where the stock is situated, and it is a question for the jury to determine what such articles consisted of. Kern v. Wilson, 35 N. W. 594, 596, 73 Iowa, 490.

DRUGGIST.

A brief and clear definition of the term "druggist" by a standard lexicographer, Dr. Webster, is that it properly means one whose occupation is to buy and sell drugs without compounding or preparation. The term, therefore, has a much more limited and restricted meaning than the word "apothecary," and we find little difficulty in concluding that the term "druggist" may be applied in a technical sense to persons who buy and sell drugs. A man may be a "druggist" in the sense of being a purchaser and vendor of medicines, whether he have a license as a druggist or not, although he cannot legally deal in drugs (buying and selling) without a license. A retail merchant selling drugs and medicines is a "druggist" within a statute requiring a special license for the sale of such articles by a druggist. State v. Holmes, 28 La. Ann. 765, 767, 26 Am. Rep. 123.

The word "druggist" is not limited to one who actually compounds his medicine, but means one who compounds or sells drugs at retail; and hence one retailing drugs was a "druggist," though he did not compound them himself, within a statute relating to the sale of liquors by druggists without a license, in quantities of less than a quart, in good faith for medical purposes. Hainline v. Commonwealth, 76 Ky. (13 Bush) 350, 352.

In this country the business of "pharmacist," "apothecary," or "druggist" is all one, and the same person who prepares and compounds medicines also sells them, so that in popular speech all three are used interchangeably, as practically synonymous. State v. Donaldson, 42 N. W. 781, 41 Minn. 74.

As a merchant.

See "Merchant."

Wholesale alcohol dealer.

In the popular acceptance of the word, a "druggist" means one who deals in medicines or in the materials which are used in the preparation of medicines, the term "medicines" as here used being taken in its largest signification. As used in St. 1869, c. 415, § 28, which provides that druggists may sell, for medicinal purposes only, pure alcohol to other druggists, etc., the word "druggists" does not include a commission merchant dealing principally in alcohol, merely because the article in which he deals is susceptible of use in the preparation of medicines or admits of medical use. Mills v. Perkins, 120 Mass. 41, 42.

DRUMMER.

See, also, "Commercial Traveler"; "Traveling Salesman."

As engaged in interstate commerce, see "Interstate Commerce."

"Drummers" are persons employed by merchants to work up business for their employers. Weller v. Penn. R. Co. (U. S.) 113 Fed. 502, 505.

A "drummer" is a person engaged in soliciting the sale of goods, for a seller located in another place, by the exhibiting of samples for the purpose of effecting such sales and taking orders for goods to be subsequently shipped by his employer. Robbins v. Shelby County Taxing Dist., 7 Sup. Ct. 592, 593, 120 U. S. 489, 30 L. Ed. 694; Robbins v. Taxing Dist., 81 Tenn. (13 Lea) 303, 305; Singleton v. Fritsch, 72 Tenn. (4 Lea) 93, 96; Ex parte Hanson (U. S.) 28 Fed. 127, 129; Thomas v. City of Hot Springs, 34 Ark. 553, 557, 36 Am. Rep. 24.

A "drummer" is a traveling salesman taking orders for goods and transmitting them to the house by which he is employed for approval or rejection. John Matthews Apparatus Co. v. Renz (Ky.) 61 S. W. 9, 10.

A "drummer" is a traveling agent, one acting as an intermediary between the importer or the wholesaler and the local trade. Titusville v. Brennan, 22 Atl. 893, 894, 143 Pa. 642, 14 L. R. A. 100, 24 Am. St. Rep. 580.

The term "drummer" has acquired a common acceptance, and is applied to commercial agents who are traveling for wholesale merchants and supplying the retail trade with goods, or, rather, taking orders for goods to be shipped to the retail merchants. Singleton v. Fritsch, 4 Lea (Tenn.) 96. More accurately, perhaps, a "drummer" is a traveling agent who sells or offers to sell by sample, by representation of his employer's goods, or by soliciting orders. Robbins v. Taxing Dist., 13 Lea (Tenn.) 303, 305.

See, also, City of Brookfield v. Kitchen, 63 S. W. 825, 826, 163 Mo. 546 (citing State v. Hoffman, 50 Mo. App. 585, and authorities there cited).

A "drummer" is one who solicits trade from retail dealers or others by sample, or one whose business is to canvass and take orders for future delivery of books or other commodities. Twining v. City of Elgin, 38 Ill. App. 356, 361.

Commission merchant.

"A 'drummer' is a traveling and soliciting salesman." As used in Acts 1885, c. 175, § 28, taxing drummers, it does not include a commission merchant conducting a regular and recognized business in a certain town. State v. Miller, 93 N. C. 511, 515, 53 Am. Rep. 469.

Hawker or peddler distinguished.

A "drummer" is one who solicits custom, being a commercial or business agent, and not to be confounded with a hawker or peddler. Thomas v. City of Hot Springs, 34 Ark. 553, 557, 36 Am. Rep. 24; Emmons v. City of Lewiston, 24 N. E. 58, 59, 132 Ill. 380, 8 L. R. A. 328, 22 Am. St. Rep. 540.

The term "drummers" is used to designate persons who solicit orders by exhibiting samples or by catalogue or in any other way, and not those who actually sell and deliver the goods at the time, as peddlers do. In re Wilson, 19 D. C. 341, 349.

A "drummer" is a mere solicitor of orders for others, and differs in no respect from clerks or salesmen except that he is ambulatory in his operations and does not usually carry or deliver the goods sold. He follows no independent business, makes no contracts for himself, and does not come ordinarily under any sort of personal obligation. By his engagement he binds his employers and not himself, and has no other interest in the result of the bargains made than any ordinary clerk would. A right to impose a privilege tax on the business, trade, or employment of all auctioneers, grocers, merchants, brokers, bankers, cotton factors, cotton sellers, retailers, peddlers, hotels, junk dealers, and others of like character, does not include a drummer, who is more nearly like merchants and peddlers than any of the others named, but yet is quite unlike either. Ex parte Taylor, 58 Miss. 478, 481, 38 Am. Rep. 336.

One selling personal property by sample, taking orders for future delivery, to be paid for only on such delivery, and who does not deliver the goods sold, is a "drummer," as contradistinguished from a "peddler." Emert v. Missouri, 156 U. S. 296, 15 Sup. Ct. 367, 39 L. Ed. 430; State v. Emert, 103 Mo. 241, 15 S. W. 81, 11 L. R. A. 219, 23 Am. St.

Rep. 874. A peddler is an itinerant vender of goods, who sells and delivers the identical goods carried with him. He who sells by sample, taking orders for goods for future delivery, to be paid for wholly or in part on subsequent delivery, is not a peddler. It has never been understood either by the profession or the people that one who is ordinarily styled a "drummer"—that is, one who sells to retail dealers or others by sample—is either a hawker or peddler. Potts v. State (Tex.) 74 S. W. 31, 33 (citing Emmons v. City of Lewistown, 132 Ill. 380, 24 N. E. 58, 8 L. R. A. 328, 22 Am. St. Rep. 540).

Merchant tailor.

The merchant tailor who takes measures and supplies the citizen with clothing has never been known or recognized as a "drummer," within the meaning of the act of 1877, repealing so much of the act of 1867-68 as taxes "drummers." Singleton v. Fritsch, 72 Tenn. (4 Lea) 93, 96.

DRUNK.

A person is "drunk," in a legal sense, when so far under the influence of liquor that his passions are visibly excited or his judgment impaired by the liquor. State v. Pierce, 21 N. W. 195, 197, 65 Iowa, 85.

There are degrees of intoxication or drunkenness. A man is said to be "dead drunk" when he is perfectly unconscious—powerless. He is said to be "stupidly drunk" when a kind of stupor comes over him. He is said to be "staggering drunk" when he staggers in walking. He is said to be "foolishly drunk" when he acts the fool. All these are cases of drunkenness, of different degrees of drunkenness. So it is a very common thing to say a man is "badly intoxicated," and again that he is "slightly intoxicated." There are degrees of drunkenness, and therefore many persons may say that a man was not intoxicated because he could walk straight; he could get in and out of a wagon. Whenever a man is under the influence of liquor so as not to be entirely himself, he is intoxicated; although he can walk straight. Although he may attend to his business, and may not give any outward and visible signs to the casual observer that he is drunk, yet if he is under the influence of liquor so as not to be himself, so as to be excited from it, and not to possess that clearness of intellect and control of himself that he otherwise would have, he is intoxicated. Elkin v. Buschner (Pa.) 16 Atl. 102, 104.

Under the law a man is intoxicated whenever he is so much under the influence of spirituous or intoxicating liquors that it so operates upon him, that it so affects his acts or conduct or movement, that the public or parties coming in contact with him could readily see and know that it was affecting him in that respect. A man to that extent under the influence of liquor that parties coming in contact with him or seeing him would readily know that he was under the influence of liquor by his conduct, or his words or his movements, would be sufficient to show that such party was intoxicated. The word "intoxicated" is synonymous with "drunk," and in a standard dictionary "drunk" is defined as under the influence of intoxicating liquor to such an extent as to have lost the normal control of one's bodily and mental faculties, and commonly to evince a disposition to violence, quarrelsomeness, and bestiality. In State v. Pierce, 65 Iowa, 85, 21 N. W. 195, it was held that one is "drunk" who is so far under the influence of intoxicating liquors that his passions are visibly excited or his judgment impaired. In Elkin v. Buschner (Pa.) 16 Atl. 102, it was held that whenever a man is under the influence of liquor so as not to be entirely at himself he is "intoxicated," though he can walk straight, though he may attend to his business, and though he may not give any outward and visible signs to the casual observer that he is drunk. Sapp v. State, 42 S. E. 410, 411, 116 Ga. 182.

DRUNKARD.

See "Common Drunkard"; "Habitual Drunkard."

As incompetent, see "Incompetent—Incompetency."

A "drunkard," as used in the chapter on habitual drunkenness, includes a person who uses alcoholic, spirituous, malt, fermented, or intoxicating liquors, morphia, laudanum, cocaine, opium, or other narcotics, to such a degree as to deprive him of a reasonable degree of self-control. Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 1802.

A "drunkard," as used in the chapter relating to inebriates, is deemed to include any person who has acquired the habit of using spirituous, malt, or fermented liquors, cocaine, or other narcotics, to such an extent or degree as to deprive him of reasonable self-control. Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 3167.

A "drunkard" is defined, in the statute in reference to the drink cure, as any person who has acquired the desire of using alcoholic or malt drinks, morphine, opium, cocaine, or other narcotic substances, for the purpose of producing intoxication to such a degree as to deprive him or her of reasonable self-control. In re House, 46 Pac. 117, 23 Colo. 87, 33 L. R. A. 832.

The term "drunkard" designates a person whose habits of drunkenness are continual and confirmed. It is synonymous with the term "habitual drunkard." Gour- lay v. Gourlay, 19 Atl. 142, 143, 16 R. I. 705; Commonwealth v. Whitney, 71 Mass. (5 Gray) 85, 86.

A "drunkard" is one with whom drunkenness has become a habit; one who habitually drinks to intoxication; a sot. People v. Radley, 86 N. W. 1029, 1030, 127 Mich. 627 (citing Apperson v. Burgett, 33 Ark. 328; Walton v. Walton, 34 Kan. 195, 8 Pac. 110; Mack v. Handy, 39 La. Ann. 491, 493, 2 South. 181, 183; State v. Savage, 89 Ala. 1, 8, 7 South. 7, 183, 7 L. R. A. 426).

A "drunkard" is not an incompetent, like an idiot or one insane. He is simply incompetent upon proof that at the time of the act in question his understanding was clouded or his reasoning dethroned by actual intoxication. Wright v. Fisher, 32 N. W. 605, 610, 65 Mich. 275, 8 Am. St. Rep. 886.

DRUNKENNESS.

See "Absolute Drunkenness"; "Confirmed Drunkenness"; "Continued Drunkenness"; "Gross Drunkenness"; "Habitual Drunkenness or Intoxication."

See, also, "Intoxicated—Intoxication."

Blackstone calls drunkenness "an artificial, voluntarily contracted madness, which, depriving men of their reason, puts them in a temporary frenzy, and which the law looks upon as an aggravation of the offense. The Roman law made allowance for the vice. The Greek law provided that he who committed a crime when drunk should receive a double punishment. The law of England, considering how very easy it is to counterfeit this excuse, and how weak an excuse it is, though real, will not suffer any man thus to privilege one crime by another." The common-law rule is adopted in Missouri in all its vigor, and there is no possible reason why the same principle would not hold in civil actions for torts quasi crimes. Mix v. McCoy, 22 Mo. App. 488, 491.

"Drunkenness," as it is commonly understood in the community, is the result of excessive drinking of intoxicating liquors. It is "inebriety," "inebriation," "intoxication," all words nearly synonymous, and all expressive of that state or condition which inevitably follows from taking into the body, by swallowing or drinking, excessive quantities of such liquors. Ring v. Ring, 38 S. E. 330, 332, 112 Ga. 854; Commonwealth v. Whitney, 11 Cush. (Mass.) 477, 479.

"Drunkenness" is that effect produced on the minds, passions, or body by intoxicants taken into the system, which so far changes the normal condition as to materially disturb and impair the capacity for health, rational action, or conduct; which causes abnormal results, or such as would not ensue in the absence of intoxicants; the changed effect produced by the immoderate use of intoxicants, as contrasted with the normal status and conduct. State v. Savage, 7 South. 183, 89 Ala. 1, 7 L. R. A. 426; State v. Robinson, 20 South. 30, 31, 111 Ala. 482.

"Drunkenness," as used in the chapter punishing drunkenness in office, is the immoderate use of any spirituous, vinous, or malt liquors to such an extent as to incapacitate an officer from the discharge of the duties of his office, either temporarily or permanently. Pen. Code Tex. 1895, art. 149.

A city charter empowering the council of such city to "prevent and restrain drunkenness" should be construed to include the prohibiting the sale or giving of intoxicating liquors to an habitual drunkard. Woods v. Town of Prineville, 23 Pac. 880, 881, 19 Or. 108.

"Drunkenness, improvidence, or want of understanding," within the meaning of Code Civ. Proc. § 2661, as amended by the Laws of 1893, providing that letters of administration shall not be granted to a person convicted of an infamous crime, nor to one who is judged incompetent by the surrogate to execute the duties of such trust by reason of drunkenness, improvidence, or want of understanding, does not include every species of drunkenness, improvidence, or want of understanding, but only applies when such defects or faults are of such a character as to amount to a lack of intelligence or habitual drunkenness. In re Manley's Estate, 34 N. Y. Supp. 258, 259, 12 Misc. Rep. 472.

Drunkenness is a wholly self-imposed disability, and in consequence is not to be regarded with that kindness and indulgence which we concede to blindness or deafness, or any other physical infirmity. Trespassers go at their peril. Much more is it just to hold that they make themselves drunk at their peril. Drunkenness will never excuse one for a failure to exercise the measure of care and prudence due from a sober man under the same circumstances. Beach, Contrib. Neg. § 492. Approving this rule, the court said, "The law exacts from one intoxicated the same care and precaution to avoid injury as it would from a sober person of ordinary prudence under like circumstances." Nash v. Southern R. Co., 33 South. 932, 136 Ala. 177, 86 Am. St. Rep. 19 (citing Johnson v. L. & N. R. Co., 104 Ala. 246, 16 South. 76, 53 Am. St. Rep. 39).

By "drunkenness not amounting to habitual drunkenness," as used in the chapter relating to the removal of county and district officers, in connection with county officers is meant the immoderate use of any spirituous, vinous, or malt liquors to such a degree as to incapacitate the officer, for the time being or permanently, from the discharge of the duties of his office. Rev. St. Tex. 1895, art. 3538.

As avoiding contract or will.

Drunkenness sufficient to be a defense to an action on a contract must be such as to incapacitate the party from the proper exercise of his judgment, and prevent him from understanding his contract, and render him for the time being non compos mentis. Wright v. Waller, 29 South. 57, 127 Ala. 557, 54 L. R. A. 440.

The "drunkenness" of one under a commission of drunkenness is not presumed to continually exist, so as to render him incompetent to make a will. Drunkenness always has its sober intervals, and always exposes itself; and it is impossible for a person who is too drunk to transact business correctly to feign sobriety so as to deceive any one of ordinary sagacity. Besides insanity, properly so called, a species of insanity, the mere effect of drunkenness and excitement from intoxicating liquors, has sometimes been set up for the purpose of defeating an alleged will. It has, however, been very justly observed that, whatever resemblance there may be in the conduct and actions of a man under such excitement and those of a man properly insane, their apparent similarity was subject to a very different condition. Where actual insanity has shown itself, either perfect recovery, or at least a lucid interval at the time, must be clearly proved to entitle an alleged testamentary paper to be pronounced for as a valid will. Either of these is highly difficult to prove, for the reason that insanity will often exist, though latent; so that a person may, in effect, be completely mad or insane on some subjects, and in some parts of his conduct apparently rational; but the effects of drunkenness only subsist while the cause—the excitement—visibly lasts. There can scarcely be such a thing as latent ebriety; so that a case of incapacity from mere drunkenness, and yet the man be capable, to all outward appearance, can hardly arise. Strictly speaking, a man is not of unsound mind simply because he is an habitual drunkard. His mind is unsound only while the fit of intoxication lasts. And that is all that is adjudged by an inquisition finding him to be an habitual drunkard. Lewis v. Jones (N. Y.) 50 Barb. 645, 667.

As crime.

See "Crime"; "Disorderly Conduct."

As insanity.

See "Insane—Insanity."

Intoxication from opiates included.

"Drunkenness," as used in St. 1889, c. 447, making gross and confirmed drunkenness caused by the voluntary and excessive use of opium or other drugs a ground for di-force, will be presumed to refer to the state of exhalation, and subsequent coma or other deplorable effects as detrimental to the marriage relation, caused by such drugs. Burt v. Burt, 46 N. E. 622, 623, 168 Mass. 204 (citing Dawson v. Dawson, 23 Mo. App. 169; Ring v. Ring, 38 S. E. 330, 332, 112 Ga. 854).

The use of morphine by means of hypodermic injections is not "drunkenness" within the meaning of Rev. St. c. 40, § 1, which makes habitual drunkenness a cause for divorce, though the effects of morphine thus administered are very similar and in many respects apparently identical with those produced by the excessive use of intoxicating liquors. The word "drunkenness" is used in the statute in its ordinary and popular sense. Youngs v. Youngs, 22 N. E. 806, 807, 130 Ill. 230, 6 L. R. A. 548, 17 Am. St. Rep. 313.

As affecting responsibility for crime.

The old and well-established maxim of the common law is that drunkenness does not mitigate a crime in any respect; on the contrary, that it rather aggravates it. Insanity is a full and complete defense to a criminal charge, yet drunkenness is a species of insanity, and is attended with a temporary loss of reason and self-control. But drunkenness is voluntary; it is brought about by the act of the party; while insanity is an infliction of Providence for which a party is not responsible. Drunkenness cannot be considered by a jury in determining whether a person committed the homicide, acting thereon willfully, deliberately, and premeditatedly, so as to constitute the crime committed murder in the first degree. State v. Cross, 27 Mo. 332, 334.

Drunkenness is not insanity, and is no excuse for crime, though it may be the result of long-continued and habitual drinking without any purpose to commit crime, and may have produced temporary insanity during the existence of which the criminal act was committed. Boswell v. Commonwealth (Va.) 20 Grat. 860, 872.

Drunkenness may be insanity, but it is voluntary. It is no excuse from the consequences of crime; why should it be against those of acts affecting property? Sound policy requires that it should not, unless brought about by the other party, or unless it was so total as to be palpable evidence of fraud in the person entering into a contract with the one so intoxicated. Burroughs v. Richman, 13 N. J. Law (1 J. S. Green) 223, 238, 23 Am. Dec. 717.

Drunkenness may be said to have two degrees; the one of these is mere intoxication, and the other effect of drunkenness is mental unsoundness brought on by excessive drinking, which remains after the intoxication has subsided. This latter mental unsoundness, if it exists to such extent that the accused loses the government of his reason, may be interposed as a palliation or excuse for crime. Beasley v. State, 50 Ala. 149, 152, 20 Am. Rep. 292.

"Drunkenness is a species of insanity that may be attended, when carried far enough, with loss of reason and control while under the direct effects of the intoxicant, but this effect is voluntary and brought about by the acts of the party, and thereby differs from ordinary insanity, which is the act of Providence, and the sufferer is not responsible." Evers v. State, 20 S. W. 744, 748, 31 Tex. Cr. R. 318, 18 L. R. A. 421, 37 Am. St. Rep. 811.

"Drunkenness cannot be relied on as establishing the insanity of a person which excuses him from accountability for crime. The habit of intoxication is highly immoral and vicious, tending to the destruction of the best interests of society—the severance of the dearest relations of life. He who takes an intoxicating draught voluntarily makes himself mad, and the law, by reason of such madness, will not excuse him from responsibility for crime committed under its influence." State v. Turner (Ohio) Wright 20, 30.

"Drunkenness" is the condition resulting from the immoderate use of intoxicating liquors. As a defense to crime it is only available when it can be shown that the defendant, prior to his intoxication, did not intend to commit the crime, and did not become intoxicated for that purpose, and at the time of committing the crime he was so intoxicated "as not to know what he was doing." State v. Garvey, 11 Minn. 154 (Gil. 95, 103).

Drunkenness is sometimes called "dementia affectata." It is that which deprives men of the use of reason, caused by immoderate use of intoxicating liquors. According to some civilians, a person so afflicted, if he committed homicide, should not be punished simply for the homicide, but he should also suffer for his drunkenness. By the laws of England such a person has no privilege by his voluntarily contracted madness, but has the same judgment as if he were in his right mind. There are exceptions to this rule, one of which is where intoxication is without fault on the part of the party intoxicated, as where it is caused by drugs administered by an unskillful physician, and the other where indulgence in habits of intemperance has produced permanent mental disease, which is called "fixed phrensy." State v. Hundley, 46 Mo. 414, 419 (citing Hale's P. C. 32).

DRY.

According to Webster's Dictionary, to "dry" is "to free from water, or from moisture of any kind, and by any means;" and according to the Century Dictionary, "to prepare and expose to the sun, or any heat, in order to free from moisture." Asphaltum from an asphalt lake, holding water mechanically, and so tenaciously that intense heat, with stirring, is necessary for drying, and which has accordingly been exposed in a vessel to heat from steam pipes, and from steam jets which stirred it, thereby expelling the water, and, incidentally and necessarily, some volatile oils also, is entitled to free entry as asphaltum, "dried." United States v. Trinidad Asphalt Co. (U. S.) 77 Fed. 609, 610.

DRY DOCK.

A "dry dock" is a structure contrived for the purpose of taking ships out of the water in order to repair them. It consists of a large oblong box with a flat bottom and perpendicular sides. When it is desired to dock a steamboat or other vessel, it is sunk by letting in water until the vessel to be docked can be floated into it. It is then raised by pumping the water out, leaving the docked vessel in a position to be inspected and repaired. Where it was furnished with engines which could only be used for pumping, and has no means of propulsion, either by wind, steam, or otherwise, and is not designed for navigation, and cannot be practically used therefor, it is not subject to salvage. Cope v. Vallette Dry Dock Co., 7 Sup. Ct. 336, 119 U. S. 625, 30 L. Ed. 501.

A dry or graving dock is a water-tight chamber fitted with timber or iron gates, which are shut against the tide after the vessel has entered for the purpose of being inspected or repaired. When admitted, she is placed on certain blocks in the center of the dock, and, as the tide recedes, the water is let out until it is level with low water. And, if it becomes necessary for examination or repair, the water below low tide is generally pumped out by steam, and the vessel must be continually shored up as the process of emptying is carried on, that she may be kept on an even keel and prevented from straining or careening. And, notwithstanding a vessel during inspection may rest high and dry on the bottom of the dock—and, indeed, ships and other water craft are frequently thus left alongside a wharf on the recession of the tide—yet when a vessel enters a dry or graving dock she floats in, and when she leaves it she floats out. The Vidal Sala (7 S.) 12 Fed. 207, 211.

DRY GOODS.

"Dry goods" are defined as textures and fabrics such as are sold by linen drapers, mercers, and others, in distinction from "groceries." Levy v. Friedlander, 24 La. Ann. 439, 441.

An insurance policy insuring the stock of a merchant keeping a store of "dry goods and groceries" covers all such goods and merchandise as are usually kept in such stores, and are called "dry goods and grocery stores," in the place where the insured did business. Germania Fire Ins. Co. v. Francis, 52 Miss. 457, 468, 24 Am. Rep. 674.

It is error to exclude evidence that the term "dry goods," used in a written contract, bears a meaning, according to the usage of the locality, under which notions, clothing, hats, and caps are excluded. Such evidence does not contradict the terms of the contract, but merely applies them to its subject-matter. Wood v. Allen, 111 Iowa, 97, 100, 82 N. W. 451.

DRY MORTGAGE.

A mortgage which creates a lien for the security of money, without any absolute personal liability beyond the value of the property, is sometimes called a "dry mortgage." Frowenfeld v. Hastings, 66 Pac. 178, 179, 134 Cal. 128.

DRY TRUST.

The term "dry trust" is used to designate a trust in which there is no benefit to the trustee. Bradford v. Robinson (Del.) 30 Atl. 670, 671, 7 Houst. 29.

A "dry trust," as defined by Perry in his work on Trusts (section 520), arises "when property is vested in one person in trust for another, and, the nature of the trust not being prescribed by the donor, is left to construction of law. In such case the cestui que trust is entitled to the actual possession and enjoyment of the property, and to dispose of it, or to call upon the trustee to execute such conveyance of the legal estate as he directs." In a case of dry trust the duty of the trustee is simple, and is to permit the cestui que trust to occupy and receive the rents and incomes of the estate, to execute such conveyances as the cestui que trust directs, and to protect the title, or allow his name to be used for that purpose. Cornwell v. Wulff, 50 S. W. 439, 443, 148 Mo. 542, 45 L. R. A. 53.

DRY WEIGHT.

The term "dry weight" as used in Tariff Act Oct. 1, 1890, par. 415, imposing a certain duty per ton "dry weight" on unbleached chemical wood pulp, does not refer to the absolute dry weight of the material immediately after desiccation in a kiln, but to the "air-dry weight" as understood in commerce. United States v. Perkins (U. S.) 66 Fed. 50, 51, 13 C. C. A. 324.

DUCK.

As animal, see "Animal."

DUCKING STOOL

A "ducking stool," etymologically, signifies a town bucket, and anciently meant a machine used in the siege of towns, but now signifies a stool used in ducking common scolds, and consisted of a beam or rafter on which a stool was placed, and which moved on a fulcrum, which extended to the center of a large pond, into which the stool could be dipped. James v. Commonwealth (Pa.) 12 Serg. & R. 220, 226.

The "ducking stool" was an instrument of punishment known to the ancient common law, by which a woman convicted of being a common scold was punished by being plunged into the water. Lord Coke says that in law "it signifieth a stool that falleth down into a pit of water, for the punishment of the party in it." United States v. Royall (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 907, 908.

DUE

See "Now Due."

"Due," as used in the description in a deed, requiring the line to be run due north, means "exactly," and adds nothing to the description. The point of a compass, if due north, is exactly north, and so is simply north. Wells v. Jackson Iron Mfg. Co., 47 N. H. 235, 260, 90 Am. Dec. 575.

In respect to surveys in Ohio, "west" or "due west," in one class of original surveys, means a line at a right angle to the true meridian, and in another class "west" or "due west" is west according to the bearings of the surveyor's compass at the time of the original survey. In giving interpretation to these words, a fixed, determinate judicial construction cannot be adopted, and their meaning must frequently depend upon, and be controlled by, extraneous facts. McKinney v. McKinney, 8 Ohio St. 423, 426.

DUE (In Commercial Law).

See "Absolutely Due"; "Justly Due and Owning"; "Legally Due"; "Become Due"; "Grow Due"; "Balance Due"; "Demands Due."

The word "due," according to the consensus of judicial opinion, has a double meaning: (1) That the debt or obligation to which it applied has by contract or operation of law become immediately payable; (2) a simple indebtedness, without reference to the time of payment, in which it is synonymous with "owing," and includes all debts, whether payable in present or in futuro. Ryan v. Douglas County, 66 N. W. 30, 32, 47 Neb. 9 (citing Allen v. Patterson, 7 N. Y. [3 Seld.] 476, 57 Am. Dec. 542; United States v. Bank of North Carolina, 31 U. S. [6 Pet.] 29, 8 L.

Ed. 308; Jasper Tp. v. Sheridan Tp., 47 Iowa. 183; Foster v. Singer, 69 Wis. 392, 34 N. W. 395, 2 Am. St. Rep. 745; Scudder v. Scudder, 10 N. J. Law [5 Halst.] 340; Hoyt v. Hoyt, 16 N. J. Law [1 Har.] 138; Looney v. Hughes, 26 N. Y. 514; Fowler v. Hoffman, 31 Mich. 215, 218. In this case it was held not to include money subsequently earned under a contract partly performed at the time of the assignment of the amount due under it).

The word "due," considered by itself, has many definitions. Bouvier defines it, in its first and broadest sense, as that which is just and proper, and, in another and less general sense, as "what ought to be paid; what may be demanded." Webster gives its definition, so far as applicable to the matter under consideration, in the following order: "Owed, as a debt; that ought to be paid or done to or for another; payable; owing and demandable; suitable." Elkins v. Wolfe, 44 Ill. App. 376, 380; Allen v. Patterson, 7 N. Y. (3 Seld.) 476, 479, 57 Am. Dec. 542; United States v. Bank of North Carolina, 31 U. S. (6 Pet.) 29, 35, 8 L. Ed. 308; Buehler v. Pierce, 67 N. E. 573, 175 N. Y. 264.

The word "due" has two meanings. The one indicates a debt ascertained and fixed, though payable in the future; and the other a debt where the money has become payable, so that a suit will lie on it presently. Under Comp. Laws, § 7326, providing that suits at law may be maintained against an insurance company for claims which may have accrued, if payments are withheld more than 60 days after such claims have become due, an action will lie on a policy of insurance, providing that the sum for which the company might be liable should be payable 60 days after due notice, at the expiration of 60 days after satisfactory proof of loss was received by the company. Putze v. Saginaw Valley Mut. Fire Ins. Co. (Mich.) 94 N. W. 191, 192.

"Freight due or to become due," as used in 53 Geo. III, c. 159, § 1, by which the owners of vessels are not to be charged with any loss arising from any act, though their fault, further than the value of the ship and the freight due or to become due for and during the voyage, means all the freight for that voyage, whether paid in advance or not; and, in calculating the value of the freight due or to become due, money actually paid in advance is to be included. Wilson v. Dickson, 2 Barn. & Ald. 2, 16.

As acknowledgment and promise to pay.

By virtue of a statute, the word "due," though not connected with or relating to a time clause, as on demand or on a day certain, imports both an acknowledgment of an existing indebtedness, and a promise to pay the same. The common as well as the statutory signification of the word "due," when not qualified by a time clause, is that the money or property in the duebill mentioned is due at the time of executing the instrument. Lee v. Balcom, 9 Colo. 216, 218, 11 Pac. 74, 76.

The word "due" has a variety of meanings, depending on the connection in which it is used. It has been defined generally to be that which is owed; that which custom, statute, or law requires to be paid. As used in a writing reciting "due F. a certain sum of money, with interest," it imports an obligation to pay; making the instrument an acknowledgment of present indebtedness. Feesser v. Feesser, 50 Atl. 406, 407, 93 Md. 716.

"Due on demand," as used in writing as follows, "Due A. B. one hundred dollars on demand," imports an express promise to pay on demand. Smith v. Allen (Conn.) 5 Day, 337, 340.

"Due," as used in an instruction in an action on promissory notes given for machinery that the notes were undisputed as to their execution and the "amount due," means due according to the terms of the notes, and not that the amount sued for was admitted to be due. Cottrell v. Gammon, 84 Ind. 243, 244.

Contingent claims or debts.

An assignment to pay and discharge all debts due by the assignor is not necessarily restricted to debts unreservedly and absolutely due at the time of the assignment, but may include claims in a certain measure contingent, as where the assignor was an indorser of a note, and his liability therefore legally conditioned on presentment, demand, and due notice of dishonor. Bank of Pennsylvania v. McCalmont (Pa.) 4 Rawle, 307, 313.

"Due," as used in 2 Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. § 6229, requiring every claim presented to the administrator to be supported by the affidavit of the claimant that the amount is justly due, was not used in the sense of "mature," but was intended to apply to all claims, whether due, to become due, or contingent. Barto v. Stewart, 59 Pac. 480, 482, 21 Wash. 605.

In Gen. St. c. 87, relating to debts justly due from an estate of a deceased person, "due" means debts already accrued, or such as will be absolutely payable in the future, and the liability for which does not rest on any contingency. Ames v. Ames, 128 Mass. 277, 279.

A statute authorizing the garnishment of debts due or to become due relates only to such as the garnishee owes absolutely, though payable in the future, and does not include in the language "to become due" a debt which may possibly become due on the performance of a contract by the defendant. Bishop v. Young, 17 Wis. 46, 52.

A salary payable to an employe at the end of each month is not liable to garnishment before the end of the month in which it is to be earned, as it is neither then due nor to become due. The liability or nonliability of the garnishee is fixed at the time of the service of the process, and depends upon whether at the time of the service the principal defendant's right to such property had become fixed. Edwards v. Roepke, 43 N. W. 554, 556, 74 Wis. 571.

An assignment for the payment of the assignor's indebtedness to the assignee, "due and to become due," should be construed to include an indebtedness arising on the payment by the assignee of a note on which he is then contingently liable as indorser; and if, in addition to the contingent liability, it appeared that the indorser had assumed to pay, or that the parties expected he would pay, when due, it might certainly with great propriety be treated as an existing indebtedness not yet due. Kellogg v. Barber (N. Y.) 14 Barb. 11, 13.

A contingent claim is a claim not due, within the purview of Code Civ. Proc. § 1498, providing that, where a claim against an estate is rejected, the holder must bring suit within three months after the date of its rejection, if it be then due, or within two months after it becomes due; otherwise the claim shall be forever barred. Morse v. Steele, 64 Pac. 690, 691, 132 Cal. 456.

Days of grace allowed.

Wagner's St. c. 216, § 15, providing that every promissory note for payment of money to the payee therein named, or order or bearer, and expressed to be for value received, shall be due and payable as therein expressed, cannot be construed as meaning that such notes fall due on the day mentioned on their face, but days of grace are allowable on such paper. Turk v. Stahl, 53 Mo. 437, 438.

As delinquent.

A recital in a tax deed that the tax was "due" does not show it to have been delinquent. Sherburne v. Rippe, 29 N. W. 322, 323, 35 Minn. 540; Gillilan v. Chatterton, 33 Minn. 335, 37 N. W. 583, 584.

Deposits.

"Debts due," within the meaning of Laws 1896, c. 908, § 3, taxing personal estate, which is defined to include all debts due, from solvent debtors, include money deposited in banks without the state on bills receivable, owing to a domestic corporation for goods sold to persons without the state, on sums due for goods sold and in transit to purchasers without the state, and for bonds of a foreign railroad kept without the state. People v. Feitner, 66 N. Y. Supp. 769, 772, 54 App. Div. 217.

Under a bequest of all debts due testator at the time of his death, money which had been paid into a banker, passes. Carr v. Carr, 1 Mer. 541.

Act June 16, 1836, § 35, providing for the issuance of an attachment of execution for a debt due, should be construed to include a sum deposited for a certain use, if not so used. It is a debt due to the depositor. Baliet v. Brown, 103 Pa. 546, 551.

Fines.

"Due," as used in an act providing that overdue coupons on state bonds shall be receivable for taxes and debts due and demands due the state, authorizes the discharge of fines imposed for violation of the law by such coupons. The words "debts" and "demands" are not uncertain and ambiguous, but have a certain, definite, and explicit meaning. The word "due" is defined by Webster to be that which is owed; that which custom, statute, or law requires to be paid—and by Worcester, that which any one has a right to demand, claim, or possess; that which can justly be required. A fine is something which the law requires to be paid, and that is the meaning of the word "due." A fine is a thing due or claimed to be due to the state—a liability which the state has a right to enforce and demand. Clarke v. Tyler (Va.) 80 Grat. 134, 139.

Future liabilities.

Where an assignment provided for the payment of all an assignor's indebtedness to the trustees, whether due or to grow due, the phrase quoted should be construed as providing only for existing liabilities, whether matured or to mature, and not as covering future transactions between the parties. Van Hook v. Walton, 28 Tex. 59, 75; Brainerd v. Dunning, 30 N. Y. 211, 214.

In a general assignment for the benefit of creditors, which, after making preferences for certain creditors, directed the assignee to pay and discharge in full, if the residue of the proceeds were sufficient, all the debts and liabilities now due or to grow due from the assignor, such phrase is synonymous with "liabilities," and refers only to debts then existing, including those payable in the future, and does not include a claim for rent accruing under a lease after the assignment. In re Havenor, 23 N. Y. Supp. 1092, 1093, 70 Hun, 56.

A will by which testator bequeathed to B. all his ships and money due to him at the time of his decease, did not include freight earned after his decease under a charter party executed before that event, but after the will. Stephenson v. Dowson, 3 Beav. 342.

Code, § 2975, requiring a garnishee to not pay any debt due or "thereafter to become due," should be construed as meaning a subsisting debt, and does not include any debt which may thereafter originate. A debt which has yet to originate cannot properly be said to be a debt which is to become due. Thomas v. Gibbons, 15 N. W. 593, 60 Iowa, 755.

Immatured liabilities.

"Debts due," as used in a charter of a banking association providing that the shares of its stock shall not be transferred until the stockholder shall have discharged all debts due by him to the association, include liabilities of the shareholder which have not matured, as well as matured liabilities. Leggett v. Bank of Sing Sing, 24 N. Y. 283, 286.

Act March 3, 1797, c. 75, providing that where any revenue or other officer or other person hereafter becoming indebted to the United States by bond or otherwise shall become insolvent, or where the estate of any deceased debtor in the hands of executors or administrators shall be insufficient to pay all the debts due from the deceased, the "debt due to the United States" shall be first satisfied, is not limited to a debt which is then actually payable to the United States, but includes a debt then arising to the United States, whether then payable, or payable only in futuro. United States v. Bank of North Carolina, 31 U. S. (6 Pet.) 29, 36, 8 L. Ed. 308.

Laws 1843, c. 218, § 3, as amended by Laws 1847, c. 419, relative to reports to be made by banks, requires that the report shall be made on the oath of the president or cashier, and must show, among other things, loans and discounts due from the directors of the bank. Held, that the word "due" was used in its larger sense, to signify and cover liabilities by the directors to the bank, whether matured or not. People v. Vail (N. Y.) 6 Abb. N. C. 206, 210; Id., 57 How. Prac. 81, 85.

The word "due" in N. J. Laws, requiring an affidavit that the debt for which a judgment by confession is taken is justly due and owing to the person to whom the judgment is confessed, signifies simple indebtedness, without reference to the time of payment, as debitum in presenti solvendum in futuro, though in some cases it may mean that the day of payment has passed. Scudder v. Scudder, 10 N. J. Law (5 Halst.) 340, 345; Hoyt v. Hoyt, 16 N. J. Law (1 Har.) 138, 143; Greene v. McCrane, 37 Atl. 318, 321, 55 N. J. Eq. 436.

On the separation and division of a township, it was agreed by the officers of the townships remaining and those cut off that the original township should draw all the funds due, and make a certain disposition thereof. A railroad tax for two years preceding the division of the township, through oversight, had not been assessed; but it was afterwards assessed for those years, and paid the same as if division had occurred prior thereto. It was contended in a suit to recover the same that the meaning of the word "due," as used in the agreement for the division of the funds due, meant only funds that were due when the time arrived at which payment could be enforced; but it was held that, while such was its ordinary meaning, the word was used in the agreement to include all assets in existence and claims not matured, as well as those matured at the time of the division. Jasper Tp. v. Sheridan Tp., 47 Iowa, 183, 185.

As indebted.

In an affidavit for attachment, a statement that defendant is indebted to plaintiff in a sum named is a sufficient affidavit that the sum named is due. Trowbridge v. Sickler, 42 Wis. 417.

As legally enforceable.

The word "due," in its ordinary sense, means that which is justly owed; that which law or justice requires to be paid or done. Griffith v. Speaks, 63 S. W. 465, 466, 111 Ky. 149.

"A debt is due when it is legally enforceable, and if, at the option of the creditor, it may be enforced within the statutory limit, then we think it may be said to be due within that limit. It is undoubtedly a correct assumption that deposits in a bank are not due until a demand and refusal have taken place, but nevertheless money thus deposited becomes due the moment such demand is made, and it consequently lies in the power of the depositor to perfect his right of action at any time he may see fit so to do." Barnes v. Arnold, 61 N. Y. Supp. 85, 90, 45 App. Div. 314.

A receipt for money, declaring that the sum named therein is due on demand, "does not import an obligation or promise which can be enforced without a demand, for it is expressly limited to the time when demanded. It is therefor only due when demanded." Smiley v. Fry, 3 N. E. 186, 100 N. Y. 262.

A will providing that the testator's executors should pay the balance due his old creditors, whose claims had been compromised, will not be held to mean the balance which was legally due them, but that the executors should pay them the balance which was justly due and which ought to be paid to them, though there was no legal obligation resting on the executors for the payment thereof. Appeal of Sinclair, 9 Atl. 637, 638, 116 Pa. 316.

Bankr. Act 1867, § 19, providing that all debts due and payable from the bankrupt at the time of the adjudication of bankruptcy may be provable against his estate, includes all debts, no matter how long standing. No debt can be considered due and payable which is barred by limitation, and a debt so barred cannot be proved in bankruptcy. A debt, to be barred by limitations, and hence not provable, must be one which is barred throughout the United States. In re Ray (U. S.) 20 Fed. Cas. 322, 324.

In a letter promising to pay every cent that is "due," due means owing, and, as applied to notes barred by limitations, is an insufficient admission to take them out of the statute. Stout v. Marshall, 75 Iowa, 498, 499, 39 N. W. 808.

License.

Taxes, debts, dues, and demands due the state, as used in Act March 30, 1871, providing that coupons on state bonds should be receivable for all taxes, debts, dues, and demands due the state, includes the "charges or assessments made by law as a condition precedent to obtaining license for pursuing a business or profession." Royall v. State of Virginia, 6 Sup. Ct. 510, 513, 116 U. S. 572, 29 L. Ed. 735.

As matured.

"Due," where used in a complaint alleging that a debt is due, indicates the maturity of the debt. Jaqua v. Shewalter, 87 N. E. 1072, 10 Ind. App. 234.

In a guaranty that a note payable at a future date is due, and that the maker has nothing to file against it, the word "due" has reference to the time when the note arrives at maturity. The word "due" sometimes means a present debt, though not payable then, but more generally it has reference to the time of payment, particularly as applied to notes, whether negotiable or not. Thus we speak of notes overdue, or that they will be paid when due. It is said money is due at the expiration of the credit given, or at the period promised. The contract, being not only that the note is due, but that the maker has nothing to file against it, must refer to the time when a suit could be instituted thereon, for until then it could not be ascertained or determined whether the maker had any claims to file against it or not. The meaning of the contract is that the note shall be paid when due, or that the present holder should be able to maintain a suit and recover judgment thereon at maturity without any defense on the part of the maker, and is equivalent to a warranty that it is due and collectible. Adams v. Clarke, 14 Vt. 9, 13.

The word "due" implies a debt matured, and therefore a breach in its nonpayment, as distinguished from the import of the word "indebted," since an indebtedness may exist without present liability to pay. Yocum v. Allen, 50 N. E. 909, 910, 58 Ohio St. 280.

If a debt is due, it can be truly said it has become due; and, if a demand is made while it is due, the demand is made after it became due. Nothing can be due which has not become due. Becoming is before being, and becoming must be finished in order for it to be succeeded by that which becomes. Take the example of becoming 21 years of age. Every person is either a minor or an adult. There is no intermediate stage. So every debt is becoming due or has become due. The moment of time which by expiring terminates immaturity renders the debt mature. There is no intervening moment. To demand payment of a debt in the first moment of its matured existence is to demand payment after it becomes due. Hence, "at maturity," "when due," and "after due," applied to a demand for payment, will each include a demand made on the day of maturity. Favors v. Johnson, 4 S. E. 925, 926, 79 Ga. 553.

Gen. St. tit. 18, c. 11, pt. 2, § 7, declaring that any creditor residing within the state who shall have a claim amounting to $100 against a nonresident debtor owning property within the state, may bring his petition to the court of probate of the district within which such property, or a part of it, is found, showing that said claim is justly due, etc., means a claim which has matured. Appeal of Sperry, 47 Conn. 87, 88.

As now payable.

"The word 'due,' without qualification, means owing and immediately payable." Gies v. Bechtner, 12 Minn. 279, 284 (Gil. 183, 185).

The word "due," as applied to rent, is convertible with "payable"; and rent, in legal parlance, is never considered to be due until it becomes actually payable. Prentiss v. Kingsley, 10 Pa. (10 Barr) 120, 123; Bank of Pennsylvania v. Wise (Pa.) 3 Watts, 394, 403.

Under a charter giving a lien on all cargoes and all subfreights for any amount "due under the charter," such words limit the extent of the lien given. They are used in their ordinary commercial sense, and mean sums which are due and payable at the time when any freights are due and collectible, and which might then be lawfully collected and applied to the sums then due in case of the charterers' default, as distinguished from future or contingent liabilities not then payable, and also such sums as become due under the provisions of the charter. Freights of the Kate (U. S.) 63 Fed. 707, 722.

Where one was arrested at the suit of a creditor, and A. agreed in writing that, in consideration that the creditor would discharge the debtor, he would pay the creditor, within 60 days, "all such sums of money as may now be due and owing," the word "due" meant that he undertook to pay only those debts which were then actually payable. Hawes v. Smith, 12 Me. (3 Fairf.) 429, 433.

"Due," as used in Rev. St. 1878, c. 81, § 6, subd. 3, which requires that a notice of sale and foreclosure should state the amount claimed to be due, means the amount already payable, and for which the mortgagee has at the date of notice a right to sell. It is not used in the sense of owing. Bowers v. Hechtman, 47 N. W. 792, 793, 45 Minn. 238.

The word "due" has a well-defined meaning when applied to indebtedness, which is that the day when payment ought to have been made has already arrived. An "indebtedness due on contracts" means an indebtedness arising on contracts which have accrued, and as used in the statute requiring an affidavit for attachment to state that the debt is due on contract, express or implied, "due" signifies that the day when payment ought to be made has arrived. Bowen v. Slocum, 17 Wis. 181, 183.

"Due," as used in a statute authorizing a garnishment of a debt due absolutely, has reference to a debt, or something in the nature of an obligation to discharge, resting on some one in favor of another, and means absolutely payable at the time. Cutter v. Perkins, 47 Me. 557, 560.

In a complaint in an action on accounts, alleging that "there is now due" plaintiff from the defendant a certain sum, the word "due" should be construed to express the fact that the debt had become payable, and not to express the mere state of indebtedment or as equivalent to "owed" or "owing." Allen v. Patterson, 7 N. Y. (3 Seld.) 476, 479, 57 Am. Dec. 542.

The words "debts due," in the charter of a corporation, providing that in case of dissolution the debts due from it as trustee shall have the preference, mean the debts then owing and payable to the specified creditors. They do not give a preference for interest on such debts accruing after the appointment of the receiver. People v. American Loan & Trust Co., 75 N. Y. Supp. 563, 567, 70 App. Div. 579.

"Due" as used in a statute requiring the affidavit to state that the sum sued for is due upon contract means an existing cause of action—a debt presently payable—and is not synonymous with the phrase "defendant is indebted." Cross v. McMaken, 17 Mich. 511, 515, 97 Am. Dec. 203.

Where by a deed a father assigns all debts "now due" to him to a trustee for his son, it is an assignment of all debts due and payable at the date of the deed, but not debts which, though contracted, had not become payable at such date. Collins' Adm'r v. Janey (Va.) 3 Leigh, 389, 391.

In an assignment of a policy of life insurance, providing that "in case of the death of the assignee before the policy becomes due," etc., "due" means nothing else than the ordinary understanding of the word "due" in its legal sense; and the policy, therefore, was not due, where the insured and the assignee were accidentally killed at the same time, at the death of the assignee, but 60 days later, when, according to the terms of the policy, it became payable. Northwestern Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Greiner, 74 N. W. 187, 188, 115 Mich. 639.

Debts due, which are liable to a writ of garnishment, are not such as are only payable then, and not in the future; and a check, though not due and payable, may be attached. A debt payable in the future is a debt due, in the sense of the law, though it was not payable until after the service of the writ. Fulweiler v. Hughes, 17 Pa. (5 Harris) 440, 447.

A will assigning all debts "now due" testator to a trustee for his son will be construed to mean debts then payable, and not debts payable at a future day. Collin's Adm'r v. Janey (Va.) 3 Leigh, 389, 391.

As owing.

An amount due, in the primary sense, means "owing." Sather Banking Co. v. Arthur R. Briggs Co., 72 Pac. 352, 355, 138 Cal. 724; United States v. Bank of North Carolina, 31 U. S. (6 Pet.) 29, 36, 8 L. Ed. 308.

The word "due," says Mr. Justice Ewing in Scudder v. Scudder, 10 N. J. Law (5 Halst.) 340, has more than one signification, or is used on different occasions to express distinct ideas. At times it signifies a simple indebtedness, without reference to the time of payment. At other times it shows that the day of payment or tender is passed. In United States v. Bank of North Carolina, 31 U. S. (6 Pet.) 29, 8 L. Ed. 308, Mr. Justice Story says that it is sometimes used to express a mere state of indebtedness, and then it is an equivalent to "owed" or "owing," and it is sometimes used to express the fact that the debt has become due. In Carr v. Thompson, 67 Mo. 472, it was held that the word "due" was improperly used for "owing." Jones v. Adams, 62 Pac. 16, 37 Or. 473, 50 L. R. A. 388, 82 Am. St. Rep. 766. See, also, In re B. H. Gladding Co. (U. S.) 120 Fed. 709, 710.

The meaning of the word "due" is "owe." It is so understood in common parlance. It is so used in official settlements and in settlements between individuals. Roberts v. Beatty (Pa.) 2 Pen. & W. 63, 67, 21 Am. Dec. 410.

An affidavit accompanying a claim against an estate, stating that the amount of the note claimed was justly due, was not false from the fact that the note was not yet matured, since "due" is used in the sense of "owing." Crocker-Woolworth Nat. Bank v. Carle, 65 Pac. 951, 952, 133 Cal. 409.

"Due," as used in a pleading alleging a certain indebtedness to be due, is equivalent to the word "owed" or "owing." Griffin v. Jackson, 13 N. Y. Supp. 321, 322, 59 Hun, 620.

An affidavit that a debt was justly due was a substantial compliance with the statute requiring the affidavit to show that the debt was justly and honestly due and owing. Reading v. Reading, 24 N. J. Law (4 Zab.) 358, 364; Mulford v. Stratton, 41 N. J. Law (12 Vroom) 466, 468.

"Due" is equivalent to "owing" or "owed," so that an allegation that a certain sum is wholly owing and unpaid is equivalent to an allegation that the same is due and unpaid. Tomlinson v. Ayres, 49 Pac. 717, 718, 117 Cal. 568.

In Gen. St. p. 397, § 2, authorizing an attachment of a debt due from any person to the plaintiff's debtor, "due" is not employed in the restricted sense of "payable," although it does import an existing obligation. Sand Blast File Sharpening Co. v. Parsons, 7 Atl. 716, 717, 54 Conn. 310.

"Due," as used in a mortgage conditioned that the mortgagors should keep the property insured to the full amount due, should be construed as synonymous with "owing" or "remaining unpaid." It means the whole sum secured, and not the amount that has become payable presently, or, in other words, the amount overdue. Fowler v. Hoffman, 31 Mich. 215, 218.

Rev. St. c. 90, § 9, providing that where, in a suit on a mortgage, it appears that nothing is due on the mortgage, the judgment shall be for the defendant, means that it must appear that nothing is due or will become due, and does not mean merely that nothing is payable. Mason v. Mason, 67 Me. 546, 548.

"Due," as used in a mortgage providing that from the moneys arising from a sale thereunder the mortgagee shall retain the principal and interest which shall then be due on the notes and charges, etc., and pay the balance to the mortgagee, is to be construed as meaning "owing," since the word is sometimes used in such sense, though it is usually employed in the sense of "payable," as to give it the latter construction would be inconsistent with the general purpose of the mortgage, to wit, security for the whole debt, principal and interest, and might in part defeat such purpose. Fowler v. Johnson, 3 N. W. 986, 989, 26 Minn. 338.

In Code Va. § 2486, providing that no person shall be entitled to a certain lien given by a preceding section unless he shall, within 90 days after the last item of his bill becomes due and payable, file a certain memorandum in the clerk's office, etc., "due" means "owing," rather than "payable." In re West Norfolk Lumber Co. (U. S.) 112 Fed. 759, 767.

"Due," as used in Laws 1891, Act No. 179, § 5, providing that a subcontractor who wishes to secure a lien must file an account of the demand due him, etc., is synonymous with "owing," and is not used in the sense of "presently payable." Smailey v. Ashland Brownstone Co., 72 N. W. 29, 30, 114 Mich. 104.

"Due" means "owed," and not payable eo instanti, but payable now or hereafter. Equitable Life Ins. Co. v. Board of Equalization of Des Moines, 74 Iowa, 178, 181, 37 N. W. 141, 142.

"Due," as used in a bank charter, where it provides that the bank shall not deal in articles of goods, wares, and merchandise, unless it be to secure a debt due the bank, means "payable to" or "owing to." Bates v. Bank of State, 2 Ala. 451, 452, 491.

In its ordinary meaning, when applied to indebtedness, "due" relates to the time when payment is enforceable; but the word has a broader meaning, and, as used in a receipt of certain notes, to be held as collateral to balance due on settlement, will not be held to have been used in a narrower meaning. D. M. Osborne & Co. v. Stringham, 57 N. W. 776, 777, 4 S. D. 593.

The term "due," as used in a phrase "debts due the United States," is said to be sometimes used to express a state of indebtedness, and that it is equivalent to "owe" or "owing," and seems to express the fact that the debt has become payable. In the clause of the act declaring that the priority of the United States shall attach where the estate of any decedent shall be insufficient to pay all the debts due from him, "due" is used as synonymous with "owing." Dunn v. Sublett, 14 Tex. 521, 528.

The term "due" is sometimes used to express the mere state of indebtedness, and then is an equivalent to "owed" or "owing," and it is sometimes used to express the fact that the debt has become payable. Thus, in the latter sense, a bill or note is often said to be due when the time for payment of it has arrived. In the former sense, a debt is often said to be due from a person when he is the party owing it, or primarily bound to pay, whether the time of payment has or has not arrived; and, under an act giving priority to debts due the United States, "due" is used in the sense of "owing." United States v. Bank of North Carolina, 31 U. S. (6 Pet.) 29, 36, 8 L. Ed. 308.

Rev. St. c. 86, § 55, providing that no trustee shall be charged by reason of any money, unless, at the time of the service of the writ on him, it is "due absolutely and not on any contingency," would include the past earnings of a party due in the future on the estimate and certificate of a third person. Ware v. Gowen, 65 Me. 534, 535.

Where the amount due upon a policy was settled by a resolution of the company, and the money declared to be payable in 60 days thereafter, the money became then due, and was payable in 60 days thereafter. Utica Ins. Co. v. American Mut. Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 16 Barb. 171, 176.

Pension money.

Rev. St. U. S. § 4747, providing that no sum of money due or to become due to any pensioner shall be liable to attachment, levy, or seizure, etc., does not include pension money after it has been received by the pensioner. Beecher v. Barber (N. Y.) 6 Dem. Sur. 129, 131. Nor money which has actually been received by the pensioner from the government, and by him placed in the hands of a third person for safe-keeping. Rozelle v. Rhodes, 9 Atl. 160, 161, 116 Pa. 129, 2 Am. St. Rep. 591.

Unascertained claims.

The words "sums due," in a statute providing that sums due for rent on leases under seal or otherwise may be recovered in an action of assumpsit, though it requires the sum to be certain, do not mean that the actual amount due must have been agreed upon. It is sufficient if the definite elements of which it is composed are agreed upon, or if a certain basis of computation is agreed upon. What remains will be merely a computation. Nor does the basis become indefinite or uncertain, in legal contemplation, because the parties may afterwards agree about the items which composed it. Rumford Falls Boom Co. v. Rumford Falls Paper Co., 51 Atl. 810, 812, 96 Me. 96.

A will requesting that, "if any debts due to me at my decease, I request my executors will collect and pay into the hands of my children," included a right of the testatrix to the residuary estate of her son, to which she was entitled, but the amount of which was uncertain at her death. Bainbridge v. Bainbridge, 9 Sim. 16, 17.

In a contract for the sale of land, reserving liens on the land for all sums of money due from the purchaser to the vendor, "due" should be construed in the sense of "owing," and can with as much propriety be applied to an unascertained sum as to one which was already ascertained and agreed on. Carr v. Thompson, 67 Mo. 472, 474.

In a voluntary assignment for the benefit of creditors, providing that, after the payment of expenses and the claims of certain preferred creditors, the assignee should pay in full all other indebtedness due and owing by the assignor, and that, after payment of lawful "debts due and owing" by him, the surplus should be returned, such phrase cannot be construed to include a claim by a lessor of premises for the difference between the rent contracted to be paid therefor by the assignor, and the amount for which the lessor was able to re-rent the premises after the assignment; the landlord, under the terms of the lease, having the right at the time to re-enter for the nonpayment of rent, thus rendering the claim for unpaid rent an uncertain and unliquidated amount, though the term "due and owing" in many instances includes money coming to the creditors, not yet payable. In re Willis, 18 N. Y. Supp. 412, 63 Hun, 634.

"Due" signifies, in its larger and general sense, that which is owed; that which one contracts to pay, do, or perform to another; that which is owing. In its larger sense, it covers liabilities matured and unmatured (People v. Vail, 6 Abb. N. C. 206, 210), and may import indebtedness, without reference to the day of payment, or that that day has passed, or be used not in the sense of "payable," but as importing an existing obligation. Scudder v. Scudder, 10 N. J. Law (5 Halst.) 340, 345; Sand Blast File Sharpening Co. v. Parsons, 54 Conn. 310, 313, 7 Atl. 716; Fowler v. Hoffman, 31 Mich. 215, 219. When used in an attachment statute, it signifies that the day when payment ought to be made has arrived. Bowen v. Slocum, 17 Wis. 181, 190. Much depends upon the context and evident purpose intended. United States v. Bank of North Carolina, 31 U. S. (6 Pet.) 29, 36, 8 L. Ed. 308. And as used in Laws Wis. 1893, c. 293, providing that insolvent and mutual insurance companies shall proceed to collect all claims due from policy holders, "claims due" import existing obligations or indebtedness, without reference to whether an assessment has been made and notified or not. Wyman v. Kimberly-Clark Co., 67 N. W. 932, 933, 93 Wis. 554.

As unpaid.

The word "due," has the meaning sometimes of merely "owing," whether matured or not. Sometimes it means "mature." We say a note is "due and unpaid." Why do we use both words, except to say that the note is both matured and unpaid? The use of the word "due" alone in an affidavit under Code 1899, c. 125, § 46, which fails to say, in the language of the statute, that a certain sum is due and unpaid, but states that it is due, only, is insufficient. If there is a difference between the words, "unpaid" is the more essential. Marstiller v. Ward, 43 S. E. 178, 181, 52 W. Va. 74.

In a contract for the sale of lots, and providing for interest upon the amount remaining due, the word "due" means the unpaid purchase price. Lawton v. Fonner, 80 N. W. 808, 809, 59 Neb. 214.

In a finding that a certain sum is due on a promissory note, "due" is equivalent to a finding that such sum is due and unpaid. Myers v. McDonald, 8 Pac. 809, 812, 68 Cal. 162.

"Due," as used in General Insurance Act, § 16 (Sess. Laws 1849, p. 448), providing that suits at law may be prosecuted for losses if payment is withheld more than two months after such losses shall have become due, means the time when the property was destroyed. The loss became due immediately on the happening of the fire. Allen v. Hudson River Mut. Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 19 Barb. 442, 444.

In its usual acceptance, "due" signifies not only that the time of payment has expired, but that the debt is unpaid. Manwell v. Manwell's Estate, 14 Vt. 14, 24.

DUE ADMINISTRATION.

Where the course pointed out by law for the administration of an estate is properly pursued, it constitutes due administration. In re Meagley's Estate, 56 N. Y. Supp. 503, 505, 39 App. Div. 83.

The due administration of an estate, for which an executor gives security, consists in paying its obligations, and handing over the balance to the persons entitled—the persons to whom the law awards it. Cunningham v. Souza (N. Y.) 1 Redf. Sur. 462, 464.

DUE ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE.

Code Cr. Proc. art. 661, directs that the court shall allow testimony at any time before the argument is concluded, if it appear that it is necessary to the due administration of justice. Held, that the term "due administration of justice," as there used, should be construed to mean that the evidence offered should be admissible and held to be necessary to the due administration of justice, if it was legitimate and important to the defendant, and the fact that it was not introduced in its regular order was not sufficient reason for rejection. Bostick v. State, 11 Tex. App. 126, 132.

DUE AND PAYABLE.

Accrue as synonymous, see "Accrue."

Swan, in his Pleadings and Precedents, p. 188, says that the allegation of "due and payable" is not only an allegation of title and interest in the subject of the action, but is also an allegation that the claim is a subsisting debt and unpaid. To the same effect are the decisions in New York. Hershfield v. Aiken, 3 Mont. 442, 448 (citing Keteltas v. Myers, 19 N. Y. 231).

DUE AND UNPAID.

If the obligation of a contract be to pay money, simply, at a certain time, and is independent of any other condition, the allegation that the defendant failed to pay it, and that such sum is due and unpaid, fully shows a right of action. Riley v. Walker, 34 N. E. 100, 102, 6 Ind. App. 622.

DUE APPRAISEMENT.

The term "due appraisal," in admiralty rule 54, does not require prior notice to the damaged creditors of an appraisal, but an ex parte appraisal is not void. Morrison v. District Court of United States for Southern District of New York, 13 Sup. Ct. 246, 249, 147 U. S. 14, 37 L. Ed. 60.

DUE AUTHORITY.

As used in an affidavit of defense filed to a scire facias sur mortgage, setting out that one acting as attorney in fact for, and with due and lawful authority from, the assignee of the mortgage, executed under seal an agreement not to sue the mortgagor, the term "due and lawful authority" implies an instrument under seal. May v. Forbes (Del.) 43 Atl. 839, 2 Pennewill, 194.

DUE CARE.

Due care is such care as a person of ordinary prudence would have exercised under the same circumstances. Ryan v. Town of Bristol, 27 Atl. 309, 312, 63 Conn. 26; Gahagan v. Boston & M. R. R., 50 Atl. 146, 147, 70 N. H. 441, 55 L. R. A. 426; Davis v. Boston & M. R. R. Co., 49 Atl. 108, 110, 70 N. H. 519; Asbury v. Charlotte Electric Railway & Power Co., 34 S. E. 654, 657, 125 N. C. 568; Spurrier v. Front St. Cable Ry. Co., 29 Pac. 346, 347, 3 Wash. 659; Overman Wheel Co. v. Griffin (U. S.) 67 Fed. 659, 661, 14 C. C. A. 609; City of Mendota v. Fay, 1 Ill. App. (1 Bradw.) 418, 421; Wallace v. Wilmington & N. R. Co. (Del.) 18 Atl. 818, 820, 8 Houst. 529; Hilton v. City of Boston, 51 N. E. 114, 115, 171 Mass. 478.

The words "due care" are not susceptible of exact definition, applicable to every possible case, for the reason that there is no absolute standard by which the conduct of individuals in each particular case can be brought, and to which it can be compared and tested. For want of a more perfect standard, the courts have set up that somewhat shadowy personage, "the man of ordinary prudence," by defining "due care" as such care as ought reasonably to be expected of an ordinarily prudent person in the same situation as the person whose conduct is in question. Paden v. Van Blarcom, 74 S. W. 124, 126, 100 Mo. App. 185.

"Due care" is a relative term, each case having its own requirements in that respect, or, in other words, each subject-matter under the control and management of a person having its own demands as to due care. Consequently, what was to be due care as to one matter would not be necessarily so as to another. It is therefore impossible for the law to establish any precise standard or legal definition of "due care," suited to every case, and which the trial judge should deliver to the jury as a matter of law, to be compared by them with the evidence, so as to reach a satisfactory conclusion on the question whether or not due care is absent or present in a special case. All that the law has determined, as a general law, and all that the judge, in charging upon the subject, need say, is that the presence of due care negatives negligence, and that the absence of such care constitutes negligence, or, rather, affirms its presence; the jury being left to determine for themselves what due care requires, which in most cases, and especially in all matters of common concern, they are supposed to know, having the standard in their own minds with which they can compare and consider the testimony. Joyner v. South Carolina Ry. Co., 26 S. C. 49, 51, 1 S. E. 52.

The words "due care," in referring to negligence, mean care commensurate to the danger to be encountered. Hence, if one knows of a danger, and yet voluntarily encounters it, when, on account of darkness or other hindering causes, he knows that he can not see and avoid it, he takes the risk upon himself. Trout v. City of Elkhart (Ind.) 39 N. E. 1048, 1049.

"Due care" is correlative. A condition that will charge one party with notice must charge the other equally, and there is no gradation of peril which requires a court to say that deliberately walking into a known danger without excuse cannot be regarded as contributory negligence. Nicholas v. Peck, 43 Atl. 1038, 1039, 21 R. I. 404.

"Due care" is a degree of care corresponding to the danger involved. The term is relative, and its application depends upon the situation of the party, and the degree of care and vigilance which the circumstances reasonably impose. Where the danger is great, a high degree of care is necessary, and a failure to observe it is a want of ordinary care. Ahern v. Oregon Telephone & Telegraph Co., 35 Pac. 549, 24 Or. 276, 22 L. R. A. 635.

"Due care," with reference to railroads, means, in the case of a railroad company, the timely employment of sufficient signals or warnings notifying the approach of trains to public places, such as highway crossings, etc., and, in the case of individuals, due circumspection or listening, or both, when practicable, to avoid collision. Knopf v. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. (Del.) 46 Atl. 747, 748, 2 Pennewill, 392.

What is due care and ordinary care must depend on the circumstances of each particular case. What would be due and ordinary care in driving a carriage along a public highway might not be so when crossing a railroad, or approaching or standing at a railroad station in close proximity to a locomotive engine and train of cars. Drake v. Mount, 33 N. J. Law (4 Vroom) 441, 444.

It cannot be said, as a matter of law, that a railroad company was exercising due care in running a train up a steep grade on a curved track, where one train could not be seen from the other without a greater interval between them. Louisville, N. A. & C. Ry. Co. v. Faylor, 126 Ind. 126, 131, 25 N. E. 869.

As ordinary and reasonable care.

"Due care," in the law of negligence, means ordinary care and reasonable care. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Yorty, 42 N. E. 64, 65, 158 Ill. 321.

The expressions "due care," "ordinary care," and "reasonable care" are convertible terms, and therefore it is not erroneous to substitute one for the other in instructions. Baltimore & O. S. W. Ry. Co. v. Faith, 51 N. E. 807, 808, 175 Ill. 58.

"Due care" is synonymous with "reasonable care," and what constitutes due care should vary according to the exigencies, which require vigilance and attention conforming in amount and degree to the particular circumstances under which they are exerted. Fletcher v. Boston & M. R. Co., 83 Mass. (1 Allen) 9, 15, 79 Am. Dec. 695.

"Due and proper care" simply means that degree of care which the law requires under a given state of circumstances, so that, in every case where the measure of diligence is ordinary care, the exercise of such ordinary care would, within the meaning of the law, be using due care in that particular case; and so it would be in a case where the law exacts a higher degree of diligence. The exercise of this higher degree of diligence would, within the meaning of the law, be using due care or diligence under the circumstances of that case. The substitution in an instruction of the words "due and proper care" for the words "ordinary care" is not erroneous. Schmidt v. Sinnott, 103 Ill. 160, 165.

By "due care" is meant reasonable care adapted to the circumstances of the case, and the failure of a person attempting to cross a railroad to make a reasonable use of his sense of sight and hearing to ascertain whether he is exposing himself to a collision is sufficient to show that he did not exercise due care. Butterfield v. Western R. Corp., 92 Mass. (10 Allen) 532, 87 Am. Dec. 678.

Violation of law.

The term "due care," as usually understood in cases where the gist of the action is negligence, implies not only that a party has not been negligent or careless, but that he has been guilty of no violation of law in relation to the subject-matter or transaction which constitutes the cause of action, and therefore the failure of an engineer to ring the bell or sound the whistle as required by law is competent to show the want of due care. Jones v. Inhabitants of Andover, 92 Mass. (10 Allen) 18, 20.

DUE CAUSE.

Where a power to remove an officer for due cause is given, the words "due cause" operate as a limitation on the power, and the authority to determine finally what constituted due cause cannot rest with the body to which the power is given, as it would defeat the limitation. State v. Common Council of City of Watertown, 9 Wis. 254, 261.

DUE COMPENSATION.

The phrase "due compensation," when used in reference to the payment for property taken for public purposes, means "paying the full value," and value is determined by what a thing can be sold for. Langdon v. City of New York, 13 N. Y. Supp. 864, 866, 59 Hun, 434.

"Due compensation" for lands taken by a railroad company and used for its railroad would be the payment of their value at the time of the railroad's entry thereon, with interest. Dows v. Congdon (N. Y.) 16 How. Prac. (N. Y.) 571, 575.

DUE COURSE.

See "Indorse in Due Course."

DUE COURSE OF ADMINISTRATION.

A direction in a judgment that a claim against an estate shall be paid in due course of administration means that it shall be paid as and pro rata with other claims of that class out of the assets administered. McCall v. Lee, 120 Ill. 261, 266, 11 N. E. 522; Darling v. McDonald, 101 Ill. 370, 377.

In Briggs v. Upton, 7 Ch. App. 376, a marriage settlement was in trust for the life of the wife, with power of appointment, and,

In default of such provision or appointment, then upon trust to pay or transfer the trust money unto the legal representatives of the said wife "in due course of administration." It was urged that these words "in due course of administration," indicated the executors as the legal representatives, but the Lord Chancellor said: "I do not think that to be the natural meaning of the words. The natural meaning of the words would be that the trustees were to pay it over to those who, in a due course of administration, beneficially represented him. That, of course, would bring in the statute with reference to the administration of intestate estates." Davies v. Davies, 11 Atl. 500, 502, 55 Conn. 319.

DUE COURSE OF BUSINESS.

The phrase "due course of business," as used in mercantile law, applied to the transfer of negotiable paper, is a formulary way of stating a legal conclusion on certain facts that in the given case may be shown to exist. These facts are that the transfer was made on a sufficient consideration between the parties, and is bona fide. Whether or not a note is received in the ordinary course of business depends on whether or not it is received under circumstances involving all these three facts. National Bank of Chelsea v. Isham, 48 Vt. 590, 592.

DUE COURSE OF LAW.

As synonymous with "due process of law," see "Due Process of Law."

By "due course of law" we are to understand those forms of arrest, trial, and punishment guaranteed by the Constitution or provided by the common law, or else such as the Legislature, in obedience to constitutional authority, have enacted to insure public peace and elevate public morals. In re Dorsey (Ala.) 7 Port. 293, 404.

"Due course of law," when applied to a prosecution of a demand in a court of law, means no more than a timely and regular proceeding to judgment and execution. Backus v. Shipherd (N. Y.) 11 Wend. 629, 635.

A guaranty that a note is collectible by due course of law means that the owner is bound to prosecute all the parties to the note with due legal diligence before he can resort to the person making the guaranty. Cumpston v. McNair (N. Y.) 1 Wend. 457, 460; Moakley v. Riggs (N. Y.) 19 Johns. 69, 72, 10 Am. Dec. 196; Thomas v. Woods (N. Y.) 4 Cow. 173, 182.

The phrase "due course of law," as used in a guaranty of payment of a note if not collected of the maker by due course of law, means an attempt to collect by an action proceeded to judgment and execution. Proof of failure to collect by such means establishes a prima facie case of an endeavor to collect by due course of law; and, if the failure to collect arose out of negligence or omission on the part of the holder, by reason of which a loss ensued, the burden of proving such loss is on the guarantor. Backus v. Shipherd (N. Y.) 11 Wend. 629, 635.

"Due course of law," as used in a guaranty to pay any balance that could not be collected on a certain bond after due course of law, meant any and every course of law necessary to reach the property of the obligor. The phrase "due course of law," when applied to the prosecution of a demand in a court of record, means no more than a timely and regular proceeding to judgment and execution. Dwight v. Williams (U. S.) 8 Fed. Cas. 187, 189 (citing Clark v. McFarland [N. Y.] 10 Wend. 634, 635, 17 Bac. Abr. 111; Rudy v. Wolf [Pa.] 16 Serg. & R. 79).

DUE COURSE OF TRADE.

Due course of trade is where the holder has given for the note his money, goods, or credit, or has on account of it incurred some loss or liability. Kimbrow v. Lytle, 18 Tenn. (10 Yerg.) 417, 423, 31 Am. Dec. 585; Nichol v. Bate, 18 Tenn. (10 Yerg.) 429; Bank of Charleston v. Johnston, 59 S. W. 131, 133, 105 Tenn. 521; First Nat. Bank v. Flath, 86 N. W. 867, 869, 10 N. D. 281; Merchants' Bank v. McClelland, 13 Pac. 723, 725, 9 Colo. 608.

"Due course of trade," as used with reference to the transfer of a negotiable instrument, means that the assignees or holders thereof received the same, having given property and taken an assignment of it before maturity. Gallihier v. Gallihier, 78 Tenn. (10 Lea) 23, 29.

Pre-existing debt.

A surrender of an antecedent debt as consideration for the purchase of a negotiable note is sufficient to constitute it in due course of trade. First Nat. Bank v. Flath, 86 N. W. 867, 869, 10 N. D. 281.

Where a note was taken in payment of a debt due, and is secured by the indorsement of a third person, the note was taken in "due course of trade." Nichol v. Bate, 18 Tenn. (10 Yerg.) 429, 433.

DUE DILIGENCE.

Due diligence is the diligence due from one as a reasonable and prudent man under the circumstances. Perry v. City of Cedar Falls, 54 N. W. 225, 87 Iowa, 315; Jones v. McGuirk, 51 Ill. 382, 387, 99 Am. Dec. 556; Nixon v. Weyhrich, 20 Ill. (10 Peck) 600, 606; Dillman v. Nadelhoffer, 160 Ill. 121, 126, 43 N.

El. 378; Hamline v. Reynolds, 22 Ill. (12 Peck.) 207, 210.

"Due diligence," in law, means doing everything reasonable, not everything possible. State v. Scott, 34 South. 479, 481, 110 La. 369.

What is "due diligence" or "reasonable care," which are practically synonymous, is nearly always, if not always, a manifest question of law and fact, difficult of definition, and still more so of determination; that depending on the relative facts in each case, and coming peculiarly within the province of the jury. Hendricks v. Western Union Tel. Co., 35 S. E. 543, 546, 126 N. C. 304, 78 Am. St. Rep. 658.

"To constitute due diligence does not require unusual efforts or expenditures, but only such constancy in the pursuit of the undertaking as is usual with those in like enterprises. Such assiduity as shows a bona fide intention to do or complete it within a reasonable time." Highland Ditch Co. v. Mumford, 5 Colo. 325, 336 (citing Ophir Silver Min. Co. v. Carpenter, 4 Nev. 534, 97 Am. Dec. 550).

In collecting debts.

Due diligence in an administrator or executor in the collection of debts due the estate does not require that he should act in anticipation or should foresee the fact that at the close of the War of the Rebellion there was to be a military order forbidding the collection of old debts contracted for the purchase of slaves. Keener v. Finger, 70 N. C. 35, 42.

In collecting notes.

"Due diligence," within the rule that the indorser of a promissory note payable on demand must use due diligence, means that he must make a demand of payment of the maker within a reasonable time, and, if there be nonpayment, give notice, as in other cases, to the indorser. Perry v. Green, 19 N. J. Law (4 Har.) 61, 62, 38 Am. Dec. 536 (citing Sice v. Cunningham [N. Y.] 1 Cow. 397, 411).

Where a note at the time of its assignment was overdue more than nine months, a suit commenced by the assignee within one week after the assignment was an exercise of due diligence, as it was not unreasonable that he should be allowed a few days to seek payment by other than compulsory means. Kelsey v. Ross (Ind.) 6 Blackf. 536, 538.

"Due diligence," as used in the bills and notes act (Rev. St. 1835, p. 105), declaring that, if the holder use due diligence in the institution and prosecution of a suit against the maker, he may maintain an action against the assignor for the amount due, is not synonymous with "reasonable time"; and hence a substitution of the words "reasonable time" in an instruction requiring the institution and prosecution of a suit against the maker within a reasonable time, for "with due diligence," was erroneous. Jacobs v. McDonald, 8 Mo. 565.

"Due diligence," within the rule that the holder of a note must use due diligence to collect it from the mortgagors, in order to bind a guarantor, has been passed upon many times; and the general tenor of the cases appears to be that a contract for due diligence requires that the suit be brought within a reasonable time after the maturity of the claim, and be duly prosecuted to judgment and execution, before an action can be sustained against the guarantor, unless it appears that such proceedings could have produced no beneficial results. The question whether the failure to prosecute an action on a note for four months after its maturity was an exercise of due diligence was held to be for the jury. Tissue v. Hanna, 27 Atl. 1104, 1105, 158 Pa. 384.

Whether one suing an indorser of a note has exercised due diligence to coerce payment is a question of law. The holder of a note obtained judgment against the maker, and a fieri facias was issued, which was returned nulla bona. The maker was committed to jail by virtue of a ca. sa., and there kept in confinement until, without notice to the maker, or his consent, and without giving a schedule of his estate or taking the oath of an insolvent debtor, he was liberated by the jailer. The maker did not sue the jailer to recover against him the whole amount of the debt, as he might have done under a statute. Held, that due diligence had not been exercised, and that the holder was not authorized to proceed against his indorser. Johnson v. Lewis, 31 Ky. (1 Dana) 182, 183.

"Due diligence," within the principle that the blank indorsement of a note implies that the same shall be collectible by due diligence, imports not only a demand, but an attempt to collect by legal process. Rhodes v. Seymour, 36 Conn. 1, 5.

Under a statute providing that the assignee of a note, having used due diligence, shall have an action against his immediate indorser, it is held that the phrase "due diligence" must be taken to mean prompt employment of the means which the law affords for the enforcement and collection of debts due and payable. Brown v. Nichols, Shepard & Co., 24 N. E. 339, 340, 123 Ind. 492.

In Sayles' Civ. St. art. 267, which provides that, in order to hold the assignor of a nonnegotiable note liable as surety for the payment thereof, the assignee must use due diligence to collect the same, the expression "due diligence" means the bringing suit at the first term after the maturity of the note, and, if not at the first term, then, with cause shown, at the second term. Burke v. Ward (Tex.) 32 S. W. 1047, 1048.

The legal signification of the term "due diligence," as applied to a guaranteed note or account, is well understood, and parties using the term will be held to have contracted with reference to this meaning. Clark v. Kellogg, 55 N. W. 667, 96 Mich. 171.

In digging oil well.

An oil lease providing that the lessee should commence drilling a test well within a certain time, and prosecute said drilling with due diligence to success or abandonment, required that the lessee should not leave the work from December to April, even if he had found oil or gas in paying quantities. It would certainly not be diligence to leave the well, and cease all operations on it, if it was a producing well, for three entire months; and if it had not, at the time the work ceased, proved to be a producing well, it would be still less diligent to abandon the work for so long a period, especially as the lease was to become null and void unless oil or gas was produced in paying quantities by June 27th following. Such an amount of inactivity could not be regarded as due diligence in carrying on the work. Kennedy v. Crawford, 21 Atl. 19, 20, 138 Pa. 561.

In making an attachment.

"Due diligence," as the term is used in reference to the diligence required of an officer in making an attachment, is such diligence as men ordinarily would exercise in their own business to protect their rights and interests. People v. Colerick, 84 N. W. 683, 687, 67 Mich. 362.

In making ship seaworthy.

The term "due diligence," as used in the Harter act, limiting the liability of ship-owners who shall exercise due diligence to make the vessel seaworthy, etc., is not satisfied by the mere appointing of competent persons to repair. Due diligence in repair and equipment must be exercised in fact. The Alvena (U. S.) 74 Fed. 252, 254. It requires a carefulness of inspection and repair proportionate to the danger. Sudden and heavy leaks when a few days out of port—a mere rolling in a calm—are inconsistent with due diligence to make the center-board seam tight, as they are inconsistent with seaworthiness; that is, reasonable fitness for the voyage. The Millie R. Bohannon (U. S.) 64 Fed. 883, 884. The owners are not relieved from responsibility by merely selecting agents of good reputation whether such agents exercised due care, or not, to make their vessel seaworthy. Nord-Deutscher Lloyd v. Insurance Co. of North America (U. S.) 110 Fed. 420, 427, 49 C. C. A. 1.

In notifying indorser of dishonor.

What constitutes due diligence as to presentment of notice of the dishonoring of a promissory note is a question of law, where the facts are disputed. Peabody Ins. Co. v. Wilson, 2 S. E. 888, 898, 29 W. Va. 528.

It is said that a written notice of dishonor of a note, properly addressed to the indorser, and put into the postoffice in due season, amounts to what is termed "due diligence," even if the letter should never be received. Washington Banking Co. v. King, 14 N. J. Law (2 J. S. Green) 45, 47.

In securing deposition.

Due diligence in securing the depositions of witnesses residing in another county implies that the party has used a means which the law provides. The issuance of a subpoena, merely, was not sufficient, when the witnesses resided in a different county. Baker v. Kellogg, 16 Tex. 117, 118.

In serving process.

A statute requiring a sheriff to make due diligence to effect the service of process on the designated parties does not require the utmost diligence to make such service, or intend that he shall do more than exercise due, appropriate, fit, and proper diligence; that is, ordinary diligence. Winner v. Hoyt, 32 N. W. 128, 133, 68 Wis. 278.

Within the requirement that, in an order for publication against a nonresident defendant, it must appear, among other things, to the court or judge granting the same, that the defendant cannot without due diligence be found within the state, the term "due diligence" means some attempt to find the party, which the court or judge shall be satisfied is reasonable under the circumstances. Birby v. Smith (N. Y.) 49 How Prac. 50, 53.

Under Code Proc. § 135, providing that in certain cases the court or judge may grant an order of service of summons by publication, when it appears to his satisfaction, by affidavit, that defendant is a nonresident, and that he cannot, after due diligence, be found within the state, what is a due degree of diligence depends upon the circumstances surrounding each case; and the averment in an affidavit that the defendant cannot be found in the state does not tend to prove the exercise of due diligence to find him. McCracken v. Flanagan, 28 N. E. 385, 387, 127 N. Y. 493, 24 Am. St. Rep. 481.

For personal safety.

A policy of insurance requiring that the insured shall use due diligence for his personal safety and protection, etc., means that the insured shall not voluntarily expose himself to unnecessary dangers. Freeman v. Travelers' Ins. Co., 12 N. E. 372, 375, 144 Mass. 572.

DUE EXAMINATION.

Under a statute authorizing the expulsion of a pupil from school upon due examination, a formal trial of the objectionable pupil is not required, nor any written charges, with notice to appear, that a hearing of witnesses may be had; but the officers are simply required to investigate the conduct of the pupil, and act according to their best judgment. State ex rel. Crain v. Hamilton, 42 Mo. App. 24, 31.

DUE EXECUTION.

The due execution of an instrument goes to the manner and form of its execution, according to the laws and customs of the country, by a person competent to execute it. Cox v. Northwestern Stage Co., 1 Idaho, 376, 379.

The acknowledgment of a husband and acknowledgment and privy examination of the wife to the due execution of the "foregoing deed" raise no presumption of the delivery of the deed, though it has been held that the execution of a deed includes delivery. Tarleton v. Griggs, 42 S. E. 591, 593, 131 N. C. 216.

DUE FORM.

Acknowledgment of deed.

"In due form of law" is equivalent to the expression "according to law." The legal intentment of both, in reference to an acknowledgment, is that the proper oath was administered by the proper officer. Aldis v. Burdick, 8 Vt. 21, 24.

A certificate that a wife acknowledged a deed to be her act and deed, in due form, is too vague and uncertain. The meaning of "due form" cannot be determined. Whether the words applied to her having signed, sealed, and delivered the deed, or to having done these things, and also that they were done with her free and voluntary assent, leaves uncertainty, doubt, and conjecture. Lucas v. Cobbs, 18 N. C. 228, 233.

Attestation of record.

The term "due form," in the act of Congress providing that the records and judicial proceedings of the courts of any state shall be proved or admitted in any courts within the United States by the attestation of the clerk, and the seal of the court annexed, if there be a seal, together with a certificate of the judge, chief justice, or presiding magistrate, as the case may be, that the said attestation is in due form, means the mode of attestation in use in the state from whence the record comes. The record must be attested according to that mode, and the certificate of the judge is made the evidence of that fact. Ducommun v. Hy-singer, 14 Ill. 249, 250; Haynes v. Cowen, 15 Kan. 637, 643.

Under an act providing that the records and judicial proceedings of the courts of any state shall be proved in any other court by attestation of the clerk, together with the certificate of the judge that the attestation is in due form, it is held that the term "due form" does not mean that the attestation of the clerk shall be according to the form used in the city where the record was offered in evidence, or to any other form generally observed, but according to the form prescribed for the court where the proceeding was had. McRae v. Stokes, 3 Ala. 401, 402, 37 Am. Dec. 698.

Certificate of mortgage sale.

"Due form," as used with reference to a sheriff's certificate of mortgage sale, means that the certificate contains a description of the property sold, the sum paid for it, and the time when the purchaser would be entitled to a deed. Goenen v. Schroeder, 18 Minn. 66, 77 (Gil. 51, 62).

Petition for removal.

Act Cong. March 2, 1867, providing that the removal of a cause from a state to a federal court by the filing of a petition in due form, with a bond, etc., means that the petition must contain averments, where the petitioner is the plaintiff, in harmony with the original petition. Middleton v. Middleton, 54 N. W. 143, 87 Iowa, 292.

DUE INQUIRY.

"Due and reasonable inquiry" by a prospective purchaser of land in the possession of a third party means an inquiry of the occupant with respect to every ground, source, and right of his possession. Anything short of this would clearly fall to be "due and reasonable inquiry." Actual possession of land is constructive notice of ownership or of an interest, and such notice is sufficient to put creditors and purchasers on inquiry. Bright v. Buckman (U. S.) 39 Fed. 243, 244.

DUE IN THE SAME RIGHT.

Under Rev. Code, p. 793, § 21, providing that mutual debts between two parties to an action, due in the same right, may be the subject of set-off, a partnership debt cannot be set off against an individual debt. Greer v. Arlington Mills Mfg. Co. (Del.) 43 Atl. 609, 613, 1 Pennewill, 581.

DUE NOTICE.

A plea by defendant, in an action against him for having abated a nuisance, stating that he had only abated it after giving due notice as required by statute, meant a notice of at least two hours; that being the statutory requirement. Dreher v. Yates, 43 N. J. Law (4 Vroom) 473, 478.

"Due notice" is a relative term, and must be applied to each case in the exercise of the discretion of the court in view of the particular circumstances. Every court of equity possesses the power to mold its rules in relation to time and manner of appearing and answering so as to prevent the rules from working an injustice; and, under ordinary circumstances, one day's notice of a motion for an injunction is too brief, though there may be no fixed limit as to time of such a notice. Lawrence v. Bowman (U. S.) 15 Fed. Cas. 21, 22.

Where an administrator is required by statute to give due notice of his appointment in such manner as the court may direct, and he is ordered to give notice by publication in a certain newspaper once a week for three weeks, a publication three times in one week and once the week following was insufficient, since "due notice" must mean "in the manner prescribed by law." Slattery v. Doyle, 61 N. E. 264, 180 Mass. 27.

The term "due notice," as used in a statute providing for alimony on due notice, means such notice as is prescribed for all motions in the general practice act. Wilde v. Wilde, 2 Nev. 306.

In laws relating to probate courts and proceedings, the words "due notice" denote public or personal notice, at the discretion of the judge. Rev. St. Me. 1883, p. 534, c. 63, § 38.

DUE PRESENTMENT.

"Due presentment" of a demand must be understood to mean "presented according to the custom of merchants," which necessarily implies an exception in favor of those unavoidable accidents which must prevent a party from doing it within regular time. Windham Bank v. Norton, 22 Conn. 213, 222, 56 Am. Dec. 397 (citing Story, Bills, § 258).

DUE PROCESS OF LAW.

The principle that no man shall be deprived of his liberty or property except by the "law of the land," or its synonym, "due process of law," is older than written constitutions—older even than Runnymede—and breathes so palpably of exact justice that it needs no formulation in the organic law. This principle is, however, in one form of expression or another, incorporated into the federal Constitution as well as those of the several states. Quimby v. Hazen, 54 Vt. 132, 139.

No definite definition—none but the most general—has been or can be given of "due process of law." The best courts can do is to say in each case as it arises whether a given act or proceeding in a particular matter is due process of law. What would be due process of law if done under the police power or taxing power might not be, and in many cases would not be, if not done under either of these powers. State v. Sponaugle, 32 S. E. 283, 284, 45 W. Va. 415, 43 L. R. A. 727. See, also, In re Fuller's Estate, 70 N. Y. Supp. 1050, 1051, 34 Misc. Rep. 750; Stuart v. Palmer, 74 N. Y. 183, 191, 30 Am. Rep. 289; Bardwell v. Collins, 46 N. W. 315, 317, 44 Minn. 97, 9 L. R. A. 152, 20 Am. St. Rep. 547; Gilmer v. Bird, 15 Fla. 410, 421; Ex parte Macdonald, 76 Ala. 603.

The term "due process of law" is often misapprehended or misapplied. Indeed, it seems impossible to give a definition which is at once perspicuous and satisfactory. Hodge v. Muscatine County, 96 N. W. 968, 971, 121 Iowa, 482.

There are many definitions of "due process of law," which, while differing in the language used, do not differ in their scope and meaning. Jones v. Yore, 43 S. W. 384, 385, 142 Mo. 38.

The term "law of the land" has been often construed, and somewhat variously defined. When first used in the Magna Charta of the Kings of England, they probably meant the established law of the kingdom, in opposition to the civil or Roman law, which was about being introduced into the land, to the exclusion of the former laws of the country. Kalloch v. Superior Court of City and County of San Francisco, 56 Cal. 229, 238; Janes v. Reynolds' Adm'rs, 2 Tex. 250, 251.

It is probably better to ascertain the intent and application of the phrase "due process of law" by the gradual process of judicial inclusion and exclusion, as the cases presented for decision shall require, and the reasoning on which such decisions may be founded. Davidson v. New Orleans, 96 U. S. 97, 104, 24 L. Ed. 616.

Due process of law is the mode of proceeding in the several courts prescribed by the lawmaking power. There is process by the common law and process by the statute law. If an act, or any portion of it, is otherwise constitutional, the violators of such act or portion may be deprived of their property under its provisions, and it will be by due process of law. People v. Quant (N. Y.) 12 How. Prac. 83, 89.

Law of the land synonymous.

The phrases "due process of law" and "law of the land," though verbally different, express the same thought and have the same meaning. Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 17 U. S. (4 Wheat.) 518, 519, 4 L. Ed. 629; Murray v. Hoboken Land & Improvement Co., 59 U. S. (18 How.) 272, 276, 15 L. Ed. 372; Davidson v. City of New Orleans, 96 U. S. 97, 101, 24 L. In some cases it has been claimed that the expression "due process of law" is synonymous with the other expression, "law of the land." In commenting upon this point, Mr. Justice Miller, in the case of Davidson v. New Orleans, 96 U. S. 97, 106, 24 L. Ed. 616, uses the following language: "The equivalent of the phrase 'due process of law,' according to Lord Coke, is found in the words 'law of the land,' in connection with the writ of habeas corpus, trial by jury, and other guaranties of the rights of the subject against the oppression of the crown. No one will claim that the meaning of this expression as used in the days of Lord Coke is the correct meaning to be attached to it at this time and in this country. Otherwise, to hold so would be to make any law, however arbitrary and violative of fundamental principles, which the Legislature might see fit to make, of a general nature, the law of the land. Such a construction of the Constitution would result in its total destruction, and confer upon the Legislature all the powers that the English Parliament ever had; and, instead of the citizen finding his life, liberty, and property protected by the Constitution, he would find himself at the mercy of the legislative department of the government. Nothing can be the law of the land, in the sense of the Constitution, however general it may be, and however it may affect the rights of all persons alike, which deprives a citizen of his life, liberty, or property without due process of law." Chauvin v. Valiton, 20 Pac. 658, 659, 664, 8 Mont. 451, 3 L. R. A. 194.

As security against arbitrary action.

In England the requirement of due process of law in cases where life, liberty, and property were affected was originally designed to secure the subject against the arbitrary action of the crown, and to place him under the protection of the law, and the words were held to be the equivalent of "law of the land." Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Humes, 6 Sup. Ct. 110, 112, 115 U. S. 512, 29 L. Ed. 463; State v. Loomis, 22 S. W. 350, 351, 115 Mo. 307, 21 L. R. A. 789.

Due process of law is secured if the laws operate on all alike, and do not subject an individual to an arbitrary exercise of the powers of government. Duncan v. Missouri, 152 U. S. 377, 382, 14 Sup. Ct. 571, 38 L. Ed. 485;

Due process is secured by laws operating on all alike, and not subjecting the individual to the arbitrary exercise of the powers of government, unrestrained by the established principles of private right and distributive justice. Cantini v. Tillman (U. S.) 54 Fed. 969, 975 (citing Caldwell v. Texas, 137 U. S. 692, 11 Sup. Ct. 224, 34 L. Ed. 816); Leeper v. Texas, 139 U. S. 462, 468, 11 Sup. Ct. 577, 579, 35 L. St. Rep. 41; State v. Staten, 46 Tenn. (6 Cold.) 233, 234; State v. Loomis, 22 S. W. 350, 351, 115 Mo. 307, 21 L. R. A. 789; Zeigler v. South & N. A. R. Co., 58 Ala. 594, 599; Weimer v. Bunbury, 30 Mich. 201, 214; Rockwell v. Nearing, 35 N. Y. 302, 306; State v. Hammer, 89 N. W. 1083, 1085, 116 Iowa, 284; State v. State Board of Medical Examiners, 26 N. W. 123, 124, 34 Minn. 387; Eames v. Savage, 77 Me. 212, 221, 52 Am. Rep. 751; Avant v. Flynn, 49 N. W. 15, 18, 2 S. D. 153; McFadden v. Longham, 58 Tex. 579, 585.

It is only such acts of arbitrary and absolute character against which the citizen was intended to be protected by the constitutional provision, and due process of law, therefore, must mean such rules of action in relation to the rights and duties of the citizen, and such forms and modes of legal proceedings of a general character, to ascertain and enforce duties, rights, and remedies, as the Legislature may deem fit, and which are not forbidden by the language or the spirit of other parts of the Constitution. Griffin v. Mixon, 38 Miss. 424, 458.

The definitions of "due process of law" are so various that it is unsatisfactory to attempt an accurate definition. It is sufficient to say that it was intended to protect property from confiscation by legislative enactments, and from seizure, forfeiture, and destruction without trial and conviction by the ordinary modes of judicial proceedings. Davis v. State, 68 Ala. 58, 62, 63, 44 Am. Rep. 128.

"It is not," says Mr. Cooley, "the partial character of the law, so much as its arbitrary and unusual nature, which condemns it as unknown to the law of the land." Knox v. State, 68 Tenn. (9 Baxt.) 202, 207.

In judging what is due process of law, respect must be had to the cause and object of the taking—whether under the taxing power, the power of eminent domain, or the power of assessment for local improvements, or none of these; and, if found to be suitable or admissible in a special case, it might be adjudged to be due process of law, but, if found to be arbitrary, oppressive and unjust, it may be declared to be not due process of law. Ft. Smith v. Dodson, 46 Ark. 296, 300, 55 Am. Rep. 589.

As based on fundamental and inherent principles of justice.

Due process of law implies at least a conformity with the natural and inherent principles of justice. Holden v. Hardy, 18 Sup. Ct. 383, 169 U. S. 366, 42 L. Ed. 780.

"Due process of law" refers to that law of the land in each state which derives its authority from the inherent and reserved power of the state, exerted within the limits of those fundamental principles of liberty and justice which lie at the base of all our civil and political institutions, and the greatest security for which resides in the right of the people to make their own laws and alter them at their pleasure. It follows that any legal proceeding enforced by public authority, whether sanctioned by age or custom, or newly devised in the discretion of the legislative power in furtherance of the general public good, which regards and preserves those principles of liberty and justice, must be held to be due process of law. Hurtado v. California, 110 U. S. 516, 534, 4 Sup. Ct. 111, 113, 292, 294, 28 L. Ed. 232; State v. Brett, 40 Pac. 873, 876, 16 Mont. 360.

There can be no liberty protected by government that is not regulated by such laws as will preserve the right of each citizen to pursue his own advancement and happiness in his own way, subject to the restraints necessary to secure the same rights to all others. The fundamental principle upon which liberty is based in free and enlightened government is equality under the law of the land. Braceville Coal Co. v. People, 35 N. E. 62, 63, 147 Ill. 66, 22 L. R. A. 340, 37 Am. St. Rep. 206.

Due process of law, as applied to the acts of the government in interfering with the title or enjoyment of a person's property, must be tested by those principles of civil liberty and constitutional protection which have become established in our system of laws, and not generally by the rules that pertain to the forms of procedure merely. Chambers v. Gilbert, 42 S. W. 630, 631, 17 Tex. Civ. App. 106.

In New Hampshire it would seem to have been understood that the provision of the Bill of Rights which prohibits all acts affecting life, liberty, or property, except by the law of the land, was not intended to limit the legislative power, but only to require that the proceedings should be according to the law for the time being; but the same limitation on the Legislature has been by our courts placed on the ground that the general grant of authority to make reasonable and wholesome laws confers no power to enact a law in violation of the fundamental maxims of justice and equity, and the interpretation given to the term "law of the land" in the Constitutions of other states, when applied as a limitation upon legislative authority, amounts, in substance, to the same thing, for, as interpreted there, the term "law of the land" is understood to embody, in legal meaning, the fundamental rules and maxims of justice which prevailed in the law of the time when the Constitutions were adopted. Either way—whether these elementary principles of justice and equity are supposed to be embraced in the term law of the land, or implied in the general nature of legislative authority—they equally limit the legislative power. Town of East Kingston v. Towle, 48 N. H. 57, 61, 97 Am. Dec. 575, 2 Am. Rep. 174.

As restriction on all branches of government.

"Due process of law," as used in Bill of Rights, § 9, declaring that no man shall be deprived of his property without due process of law, is synonymous with the phrase "except by the law of the land." This section has a place in perhaps all American Constitutions, being imported in them from Magna Charta, which was extracted from King John by the barons of England. The definitions of this clause are perhaps more diverse than those of any other in the Constitution. In one case the phrase is held to mean one thing. In another case another meaning is extracted. But when a court is resolved on pronouncing a law void, it serves a convenient purpose to refer the law to this section. Used originally to save the people, through the legislative branch, from the arbitrary conduct of the sovereign, exercised through his judges, its use is completely reversed, and we find that the people are to be saved under it from the unwarranted acts of the Legislature, through the judges. Hallenbeck v. Hahn, 2 Neb. 377, 403.

"Due process of law" and the "law of the land" are said to mean the same thing, and they are indifferently used in the Constitutions for the same purpose. They are said to refer to a pre-existing rule of conduct, and designed to exclude arbitrary power from every branch of the government. Atchison & N. R. Co. v. Baty, 6 Neb. 37, 42, 29 Am. Rep. 356.

Due process of law is not confined to judicial proceedings, but extends to every case which may deprive a citizen of life, liberty, or property, whether the process be judicial or administrative or executive in its nature. Stuart v. Palmer, 74 N. Y. 183, 190, 30 Am. Rep. 289; City of Buffalo v. Chadeayne, 7 N. Y. Supp. 501, 503; In re Fuller's Estate, 70 N. Y. Supp. 1050, 1051, 34 Misc. Rep. 750.

"Due process of law," in its constitutional meaning, includes administrative process of the customary sort, as well as judicial process. Musser v. Adair, 45 N. E. 903, 906, 55 Ohio St. 466; Weimer v. Bunbury, 30 Mich. 201, 214.

"Due process of law," or the "law of the land," which means the same thing, is not necessarily judicial proceedings. Private rights and the enjoyment of property may be interfered with by the legislative or executive as well as the judicial departments of government. State v. State Board of Medical Examiners, 26 N. W. 123, 124, 34 Minn. 387; Meffert v. State Board of Medical Registration and Examination, 72 Pac. 247, 251, 66 Kan. 710.

"Due process of law" is defined as the law of the land, designed to protect and preserve the rights of the citizen against arbitrary legislation, as well as against arbitrary executive or judicial action. State v. Ashbrook, 55 S. W. 627, 632, 154 Mo. 375, 48 L. R. A. 265, 77 Am. St. Rep. 765.

As prohibiting concurrent exercise of administrative, legislative, or judicial functions.

"Due process of law," in judicial proceedings, means a course of legal proceedings according to those rules and principles which have been established in our system of jurisprudence for the conduct and enforcement of private rights. In legislative proceedings it requires a conformity to the settled maxims of a free government, and an observance of constitutional restraints and requirements. In either case it means that there shall be an omission to exercise substantial powers appertaining to the other departments. Western Union Tel. Co. v. Myatt (U. S.) 98 Fed. 335, 354.

As common-law, statutes, and constitutional provisions.

The term "law of the land," as used in the Constitution, means the common law, which is unquestionably the sense in which it is understood in Magna Charta; but it also comprehends all acts of force at the time of making the Constitution. So any acts which then abridged any of the privileges secured by the Constitution may be considered as constitutional exceptions to the privileges themselves. Byrne's Adm'r's v. Stewart's Adm'r's (S. C.) 3 Desaus. 466, 478.

In Mayo v. Wilson, 1 N. H. 53, the court said that the phrase meant due process of law warranted by the Constitution, by the common law adopted by the Constitution, and not altered, or by statutes made in pursuance of the Constitution. Rowan v. State, 30 Wis. 129, 146, 11 Am. Rep. 559. Chief Justice O'Neill, in State v. Simons (S. C.) 2 Speers, 761, says there can be no hesitation in saying that the term means the common law and the statute law existing in the state at the adoption of our Constitution. Altogether they constitute the body of the law, prescribing the course of justice to which a freeman is to be considered amenable in all times to come. Stehmeyer v. Charleston City Council, 31 S. E. 322, 330, 53 S. C. 259; Mauldin v. Greenville City Council, 20 S. E. 842, 846, 42 S. C. 293, 27 L. R. A. 284, 46 Am. St. Rep. 723.

"Due course of law," as used in Const. art. 1, § 2, providing that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due course of law, which has the same general interpretation as the terms "law of the land" and "due process of law," does not mean the general body of law, common and statute, as it was at the time the Constitution took effect. For that would seem to deny to the Legislature the power to alter, change, or amend the law. It refers to certain fundamental rights, or that system of jurisprudence, of which ours is a derivative, has always recognized. If any of these are disregarded in the proceedings by which a person is condemned to the loss of life, liberty, or property, then the deprivation has not been by due course of law. Brown v. Levee Com'rs, 50 Miss. 468, 478.

As proceeding according to course of common law.

The meaning of the phrase "due process of law" is that no person shall be deprived either of life or of liberty or of property unless the matter shall be adjudged against him upon trial, and according to the course of the common law. People v. Sponsler, 46 N. W. 459, 462, 1 Dak. 289; Beebe v. United States, 11 N. W. 505, 507, 2 Dak. 292; Taylor v. Porter (N. Y.) 4 Hill, 140, 145, 40 Am. Dec. 274; per Johnson, J., Wynehamer v. People, 13 N. Y. (3 Kern.) 378, 446; People v. Toynbee (N. Y.) 20 Barb. 168, 198; Campbell v. Campbell, 63 Ill. 462, 464; Risser v. Hoyt, 18 N. W. 611, 621, 53 Mich. 185.

The phrase "law of the land" was taken, with some modifications, from a part of the twenty-ninth chapter of Magna Charta, which provided that no freeman should be taken or imprisoned, or be disseised of his freehold, etc., but by the lawful judgment of his peers, or by the law of the land. Its meaning seems to be that no member of the state shall be disfranchised or deprived of any of his rights or privileges unless the matter shall be adjudged against him on trial had according to the course of the common law. It must be ascertained judicially that he has forfeited his privileges, or that some one else has a superior title to the property he possesses, before either of them may be taken from him. It cannot be done by mere legislation. Lavin v. Emigrant Industrial Sav. Bank (U. S.) 1 Fed. 641, 660. See, also, Phillips v. Lewis, 3 Tenn. Cas. 231, 235; Ex parte Grace, 12 Iowa, 208, 214, 79 Am. Dec. 529; Campbell v. Campbell, 63 Ill. 462; Citizens' Horse Ry. Co. v. City of Belleville, 47 Ill. App. 388, 407; Hoke v. Henderson, 15 N. C. 1, 16, 25 Am. Dec. 677; State v. Cutshall, 15 S. E. 261, 263, 110 N. C. 538, 16 L. R. A. 130.

Due process of law requires that a party shall be properly brought into court, and that he shall have an opportunity, when there, to prove any fact which, according to the Constitution and the usages of common law, would be a protection to him or his property. Goldie v. Goldie, 79 N. Y. Supp. 268, 269, 77 App. Div. 12; People v. Essex County Sup'rs, 70 N. Y. 228, 234; Larson v. Dickey, 58 N. W. 167, 171, 39 Neb. 463, 42 Am. St. Rep. 595; Kalloch v. Superior Court of City and County of San Francisco, 56 Cal. 229, 239.

What is due process of law is usually a traditional or historical question, and it is held that a proceeding recognized as due process of law under the common law must be considered as due process of law within the meaning of the Constitution. C. N. Nelson Lumber Co. v. McKinnon, 63 N. W. 630, 631, 61 Minn. 219.

"Due process of law" does not necessarily mean a legal proceeding according to the course of the common law. Kansas City v. Duncan, 37 S. W. 513, 515, 135 Mo. 571; Happy v. Mosher, 48 N. Y. 313, 317; Gilchrist v. Schmidling, 12 Kan. 263, 272; City of Indianapolis v. Holt, 57 N. E. 966, 970, 155 Ind. 222; Bartlett v. Wilson, 59 Vt. 23, 8 Atl. 321, 331.

As exercise of governmental power according to settled maxims.

"Due process of law" is not capable of precise definition. That of Judge Cooley appears to have proved the most acceptable to the courts of this country, viz.: "'Due process of law,' in each particular case, means an exertion of the power of government as the settled maxims of the law permit and sanction, and under such safeguards for the protection of individual rights as these maxims prescribe for the class of cases to which the one in question belongs." Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. State, 47 Neb. 549, 66 N. W. 624, 628, 41 L. R. A. 481, 53 Am. St. Rep. 557; Cummings v. Hyatt, 74 N. W. 411, 414, 54 Neb. 35; Baltimore Belt R. Co. v. Baltzell, 23 Atl. 74, 75 Md. 94; State v. State Board of Medical Examiners, 26 N. W. 123, 124, 34 Minn. 387; Meffert v. State Board of Medical Registration and Ex-

As general public laws.

Webster gave a definition of the meaning of the words "law of the land" and "due process of law" in his argument in Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 17 U. S. (4 Wheat.) 518, 4 L. Ed. 629, which has received the sanction of the courts. He said: "By the 'law of the land' is clearly intended the general law, which hears before it condemns, which proceeds upon inquiry, and renders judgment only after trial. It means that every citizen shall hold his life, liberty, and property under the protection of the general rules which govern society." Brooks v. Tayntor, 40 N. Y. Supp. 445, 449, 17 Misc. Rep. 534; In re Fuller's Estate, 70 N. Y. Supp. 1050, 1051, 34 Misc. Rep. 750; Stuart v. Palmer, 74 N. Y. 183, 191, 30 Am. Rep. 289; Quimby v. Hazen, 54 Vt. 132, 139, 140; *State v. It means that one shall hold his life, liberty and property under the general rules which govern society. Cleveland, C., C. & St. L. Ry. Co. v. Backus, 133 Ind. 513, 531, 33 N. E. 421, 18 L. R. A. 729. It is not enough that the law may be general in its application. Knox v. State, 68 Tenn. (9 Baxt.) 202, 207.

The "law of the land," in the sense of the Constitution, means any law which embraces all persons who are or may come into like situation and circumstances. Davis v. State, 71 Tenn. When applied to special or class legislation it means, in addition, that "the classification must be natural and reasonable, not arbitrary and capricious." Sutton v. State, 96 Tenn. (12 Pickle) 696, 710, 36 S. W. 697, 33 L. R. A. 589; Knoxville & O. R. Co. v. Harris, 99 Tenn. 684, 705, 43 S. W. 115, 53 L. R. A. 921; Harbison v. Knoxville Iron Co., 53 S. An enactment which deprives one class of persons of the right to acquire and enjoy property, or to contract with relation thereto, in the same manner as others under like conditions and circumstances are permitted to acquire and enjoy property, or contract with relation to it, is not comprehended within the true meaning of the words "due process of law." Balley v. People, 60 N. E. 98, 99, 190 Ill. 28, 54 L. R. A. 838, 83 Am. St. Rep. 116.

Whether a statute is the "law of the land," within the meaning of that term as used in the Bill of Rights, depends upon two propositions: (1) That the Legislature had the power to pass it; (2) that it is a general and public law, equally binding upon every member of the community. Sheppard v. Johnson, 21 Tenn. (2 Humph.) 285.

The word "law," as used in the constitutional provisions relating to due process of law, is something more than mere will exerted as an act or power. It must not be under a special rule for a particular person or a particular case. Hurtado v. People of California, 4 Sup. Ct. 111, 121, 110 U. S. 516, 28 L. Ed. 232.

Due process of law is secured if the laws operate on all alike. Duncan v. State of Missouri, 152 U. S. 377, 382, 14 Sup. Ct. 570, 571, 38 L. Ed. 485; Florida Cent. & P. R. Co. v. Reynolds, 22 Sup. Ct. 176, 179, 183 U. S. 471, 46 L. Ed. 283; Connolly v. United Sewer Pipe Co., 22 Sup. Ct. 431, 439, 184 U. S. 540, 46 L. Ed. 679; Caldwell v. Texas, 11 Sup. Ct. 224, 226, 137 U. S. 692, 34 L. Ed. 816; Philbrook v. Newman (U. S.) 85 Fed. 139, 142; Cantini v. Tillman (U. S.) 54 Fed. 969, 975; Sears v. Cottrell, 5 Mich. 251, 252, 254.

"Due process of law" has never been held to mean more than the process which is due alike to all persons in the administration of the law to which they are subject. The requirements of due process of law forbid the arbitrary punishment of any man on account of race, color, religious or political opinions, or on suspicion, or without trial in the due course prescribed by law for all persons accused. In re McKee, 57 Pac. 23, 25, 19 Utah, 231.

The phrases "due process of law" and "law of the land," as used in Magna Charta did not mean merciful or just laws, but did mean equal and general laws, fixed and certain. Eames v. Savage, 77 Me. 212, 221, 52 Am. Rep. 751 (citing Broom's Com. Law, 228).

Due process of law is denied when any particular person of a class or of the community is singled out for the imposition of restraints or burdens not imposed upon or to be borne by all of the class or the community at large, unless the imposition or restraint be based upon existing conditions that differentiate the particular individuals of the class to be affected from the body of the community. State v. Ashbrook, 55 S. W. 627, 632, 154 Mo. 375, 48 L. R. A. 265, 77 Am. St. Rep. 765. See, also, State v. Loomis, 22 S. W. 350, 351, 115 Mo. 307, 21 L. R. A. 789.

In holding that special burdens are often necessary for the general benefit, for supplying water, preventing fires, lighting districts, cleaning streets, opening parks, and many other projects, and are not without due process of law, "due process of law" was held to mean affecting all alike who were of the same class or similarly situated. Oury v. Goodwin (Ariz.) 26 Pac. 376, 381.

As form or course of proceeding known to common law or created by statute.

The phrase "due process of law" has received very broad and liberal interpretations. Fundamental principles of judicial procedure, whether in civil or criminal cases, as they existed and were recognized in the courts of England and the American colonies prior to the adoption of the federal and state Constitutions, are intended to be preserved by this guaranty of due process of law, and, while the forms may be changed, essential guaranties cannot be taken away, even by attempted legislative enactments. State v. Height, 91 N. W. 935, 936, 117 Iowa, 650, 59 L. R. A. 437, 94 Am. St. Rep. 323.

"Due process of law" means such general legal forms and course of proceedings as were either known to the common law, or as were generally recognized in this country at the time of the adoption of the Constitution. Gibson v. Mason, 5 Nev. 283, 301. This language must be taken with the important limitation that the forms and solemnities required must be such as were essentially in existence at the time of forming the Constitution as a part of the ordinary means of administering justice. Risser v. Hoyt, 18 N. W. 611, 621, 53 Mich. 185.

Due process of law is the manner of proceeding which has always been recognized as constitutional in England and in this country in the particular class of cases to which the one in question belongs, the person subjected to it being afforded every reasonable opportunity to defend himself of which the nature of the case will admit. Light v. Canadian County Bank, 37 Pac. 1075, 1077, 2 Okl. 543.

Due process of law is the mode of proceeding in the civil courts prescribed by the lawmaking power, which is process by the common law and process by the statute law. People v. Quant (N. Y.) 12 How. Prac. 83, 89.

A perfectly satisfactory definition of "due process" may perhaps not be easily stated. Any legal proceeding enforced by public authority, whether sanctioned by age and custom, or newly devised in the discretion of the legislative power in furtherance of the general public good, which regards and preserves the principles of liberty and justice, must be held to be due process of law. The state is not tied down by any provision of the federal Constitution to the practice and procedure which existed at the common law. Brown v. New Jersey, 20 Sup. Ct. 77, 78, 175 U. S. 172, 44 L. Ed. 119.

It is evident that the term "due process of law," within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States, has a broader meaning than the process prescribed by act of the Legislature. Such a construction would render the constitutional guaranty mere nonsense, for it would then mean that no state should deprive a person of life, liberty, or property unless the state should choose to do so. The words, however, do not forbid a state to interfere with the rules and forms known to common law in judicial proceedings, not affecting the ultimate rights of the party, but are intended to guaranty the real and substantial right to life, liberty, and property, as the ultimate result, and probably to prohibit any arbitrary and oppressive proceeding by which the individual is deprived of either. In re Ziebold (U. S.) 23 Fed. 791, 794.

To the Legislature belongs the exclusive authority and power to prescribe the mode, means, and conditions on which proceedings affecting parties and property are to be commenced and carried on within its territory. Kansas City v. Duncan, 37 S. W. 513, 515, 135 Mo. 571.

The Legislature may regulate the mode of pleading and conducting a trial, but, under pretense of doing so, it cannot deprive parties of substantial rights. Wright v. Cradlebaugh, 3 Nev. 341, 349.

"Due process of law" means process according to the law of the land, which process in the states is regulated by the law of the states. Cox v. Gilmer (U. S.) 88 Fed. 343, 348, 349.

A law which is enacted by the Legislature in the exercise of its constitutional powers, and which affords a hearing before it condemns, and renders judgment after trial, is not in violation of the constitutional provision that no citizen shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property except by due course of the law of the land. Union Cent. Life Ins. Co. v. Chowning, 26 S. W. 982, 984, 86 Tex. 654, 24 L. R. A. 504; Id., 28 S. W. 117, 120, 8 Tex. Civ. App. 455.

As course of legal proceedings according to established rules and principles.

"Due process of law" means a course of legal proceedings according to the rules and principles which have been established in our system of jurisprudence for the protection and enforcement of private rights. Penoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714, 733, 24 L. Ed. 565; Kennard v. Louisiana, 92 U. S. 480, 481, 23 L. Ed. 478; Hurtado v. California, 110 U. S. 516, 536, 4 Sup. Ct. 111, 292, 28 L. Ed. 232; Scott v. McNeal, 154 U. S. 34, 14 Sup. Ct. 1108, 1109, 38 L. Ed. 896; Rees v. City of Watertown, 86 U. S. (19 Wall.) 107, 122, 22 L. Ed. 72; In re Ah Lee (U. S.) 5 Fed. 899, 906; Burton v. Platter (U. Due process of law cannot mean less than a prosecution or suit instituted and conducted according to the prescribed forms and solemnities for ascertaining guilt or determining the title to property. Taylor v. Porter (N. Y.) 4 Hill, 140, 146, 40 Am. Dec. 274; Embury v. Conner, 3 N. Y. (3 Comst.) 511, 517, 53 Am. Dec. 325; Burch v. Newbury, 10 N. Y. (6 Seld.) 374, 385; *People v. City of Brooklyn (N. By "due process of law" is meant that which follows the general rule established in our system of jurisprudence for the security of private rights, is appropriate to the case, and just to the parties to be affected. It must be pursued in the ordinary mode prescribed by the law. It must be adapted to the end to be attained, and, wherever it is necessary for the protection of the parties, it must give them an opportunity to be heard respecting the justice of the judgment sought. Hagar v. Reclamation Dist. No. 108, 4 Sup. Ct. 663, 667, 111 U. S. 701, 28 L. Ed. 569; Marchant v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 14 Sup. Ct. 894, 896, 153 U. S. 380, 38 L. Ed. 751; Alexander v. Gordon (U. S.) 101 Fed. 91, 96, 41 C. C. A. 228; Burton v. Platter (U. S.) 53 Fed. 901, 904, 4 C. C. A. 95; San Mateo County v. Southern Pac. R. Co. (U. S.) 13 Fed. 722, 752; State v. Hogan, 58 N. E. 572, 573, 63 Ohio St. 202, 52 L. R. A. 863, 81 Am. St. Rep. 626.

The legislation is not open to the charge of depriving one of his rights without due process of law if it be general in its operation upon the subjects to which it relates, and is enforceable in the usual modes established in the administration of government with respect to kindred matters; that is, by process or proceedings adapted to the case. Dent v. West Virginia, 9 Sup. Ct. 231, 129 U. S. 114, 32 L. Ed. 623 (cited in Bittenhaus v. Johnston, 66 N. W. 805, 807, 92 Wis. 588, 32 L. R. A. 380). See, also, Davis v. St. Louis County Com'rs, 67 N. W. 997, 998, 65 Minn. 310, 33 L. R. A. 432, 60 Am. St. Rep. 475.

It is the right of every person, before he can be deprived of his property, to have a trial according to law; to have the same character of trial given by the same established rules of evidence and procedure as are applied in other cases under similar conditions. San Jose Ranch Co. v. San Jose Land & Water Co., 58 Pac. 824, 825, 126 Cal. 322.

Due process of law consists in the observance of those safeguards which time and experience have shown are necessary to protect the citizen in the enjoyment of life, liberty, and property. A method of procedure based upon long-established usage is ordinarily due process of law. People v. Adirondack Ry. Co., 54 N. E. 689, 693, 160 N. Y. 225.

Due process of law does not require a plenary suit and trial by jury in all cases where personal or property rights are involved. It is in all cases that kind of procedure which is suitable and proper to the nature of the case, and sanctioned by the established customs and usages of the courts. Thus the removal of an officer for cause after investigation by the government by lawful administrative process is due process of law. Attorney General v. Jochim, 58 N. W. 611, 614, 99 Mich. 358, 23 L. R. A. 699, 41 Am. St. Rep. 606.

Due process of law ordinarily implies and includes a complaint, a defendant, a judge, regular allegations, opportunity to answer, and a trial according to some settled course of judicial proceeding. Huber v. Rely, 53 Pa. (3 P. F. Smith) 112, 117; Kallock v. Superior Court of City and County of San Francisco, 56 Cal. 229, 239.

As observance of matter of form.

The term "due process of law" relates primarily to the remedy or means of redress where property rights are invaded, rather than to matters of substantive law. Board of Directors of Alfalfa Irr. Dist. v. Collins, 64 N. W. 1086, 1090, 46 Neb. 411.

"Due course of law" means an observance of the form prescribed by law for a particular proceeding. Simms v. Slacum, 7 U. S. (3 Cranch) 300, 306, 2 L. Ed. 446; In re Hatch, 43 N. Y. Super. Ct. (11 Jones & S.) 89, 91.

It is undoubtedly the correct doctrine that when a person is on trial for his life or his liberty, and is denied any of his constitutional rights, he has been tried without due process of law; but "due process of law," in its legal sense, does not mean mere form. State v. Hammer, 89 N. W. 1083, 1085, 116 Iowa, 284.

As law in regular course of administration.

Chancellor Kent says: "The 'law of the land,' as used originally in Magna Charta, is understood to mean due process of law—that is, by indictment or presentment of good and lawful men; and this, says Lord Coke, is the true sense and exposition of those words. The better and larger definition of 'due process of law' is that it means law in its regular course of administration through courts of justice." Wynehamer v. People, 13 N. Y. (3 Kern.) 378, 395 (quoting 2 Kent, Comm. 13); People v. Tonybee (N. Y.) 12 How. Prac. 238, 253; Happy v. Mosher, 48 N. Y. 313, 317; People v. Leubischer, 54 N. Y. Supp. 869, 876, 34 App. Div. 577; People v. Sickles, 51 N. E. 288, 290, 156 N. Y. 541; Happy v. Mosher, 48 N. Y. 313; In re McDonald, 2 N. Y. Cr. R. 82, 94; Walker v. Sauvinet, 92 U. S. 90, 93, 23 L. Ed. 678; Leeper v. Texas, 139 U. S. 462, 468, 11 Sup. Ct. 577, 579, 35 L. Ed. 225; Caldwell v. Texas, 137 U. S. 692, 697, 11 Sup. Ct. 224, 34 L. Ed. 816; Smith v. Bivens (U. S.) 55 Fed. 352, 356; Cantini v. Tillman (U. S.) 54 Fed. 969, 975; Ex parte Ulrich (U. S.) 42 Fed. 587, 589; In re Ah Lee (U. S.) 5 Fed. 899, 905; Baker v. Kelley, 11 Minn. 480, 498 (Gil. 358, 375); Beaupre v. Hoerr, 13 Minn. 366, 368 (Gil. 339, 341); State v. Becht, 23 Minn. 411, 413; Elkenberry v. Edwards, 25 N. W. 832, 833, 67 Iowa, 619, 56 Am. Rep. 360; Ex parte Grace, 12 Iowa, 208, 214, 79 Am. Dec. 529; McGavock v. City of Omaha, 58 N. W. 543, 548, 40 Neb. 64; Kansas Pac. Ry. Co. v. Dunmeyer, 19 Kan. 539, 542; Kalloch v. Superior Court of City and County of San Francisco, 56 Cal. 229, 241; In re McKee, 57 Pac. 23, 25, 19 Utah, 231; Ex parte Macdonald, 76 Ala. 603, 606; Blair v. Ridgely, 41 Mo. 63, 119, 97 Am. Dec. 248; Clark v. Mitchell, 64 Mo. 564, 577; Jones v. Yore, 43 S. W. 384, 385, 142 Mo. 38; Kansas City v. Duncan, 37 S. W. 513, 515, 135 Mo. 571; Hulett v. Missouri, K. & T. Ry. Co., 46 S. W. 951, 952, 145 Mo. 35; Garnett v. Jennings (Ky.) 44 S. W. 382, 383; State v. Wilson, 28 S. E. 554, 557, 121 N. C. 425; Newland v. Marsh, 19 Ill. (9 Peck) 376, 382; Fetter v. Wilt, 48 Pa. (10 Wright) 457, 460; Bartlett v. Wilson, 8 Atl. 321, 323, 59 Vt. 23; Rison v. Farr, 24 Ark. 161, 175, 87 Am. Dec. 52. It ordinarily means a settled course of judicial proceeding, but also embraces any process not in conflict with any provision of the Constitution which is conformable to "the settled usages and modes of proceeding which existed in the common and statute law of England before the emigration of our ancestors, and which are shown not to have been unsuited to their civil and political condition, by having been acted on by them after the settlement of the country." State v. Starling, 15 Rich. Law, 120, 129.

Due process of law is the application of the law as it exists in the fair and regular course of administrative procedure. Slaughterhouse Cases, 83 U. S. (16 Wall.) 36, 127, 21 L. Ed. 394.

As legislative enactment.

The phrase "law of the land," as used in the Constitution, has a historical origin.

It was borrowed from Magna Charta, and has been repeatedly decided to mean the same as "due process of law." The phrases "due process of law" and "the law of the land" have never received a perfectly satisfactory definition. One or the other of them occurs in all or nearly all of the Constitutions of the several states and in the Constitution of the United States, and it is well settled that the provisions in which they occur were intended to operate as limitations on the legislative power of the several states and of the United States. It follows, if the provision is a limitation on the legislative power, that a legislative enactment is not necessarily the law of the land, even when it does not conflict with any other provision of the Constitution, and that a proceeding according to a legislative enactment is not necessarily due process of law. It is also settled that these provisions secure to every citizen, except in the matter of taxation, a judicial trial, before he can be deprived of life, liberty, or property. State v. Beswick, 13 R. I. 211, 218, 43 Am. Rep. 26.

"The law of the land," as used in the Constitution, has long had an interpretation which is well understood and practically adhered to. It does not mean an act of the Legislature. If such was the true construction, this branch of the government could at any time take away life, liberty, property, and privilege without a trial by jury. The words are substantially the same as those found in chapter 29 of Magna Charta, from which they have been borrowed and incorporated in the federal Constitution and most of the Constitutions of the individual states. Lord Coke, in commenting on this chapter, says: "No man shall be disseized, etc., unless it be by the lawful judgment; that is, a verdict of equals, or by the law of the land; that is (to speak once for all), by the due course and process of law." Coke, 2 Inst. 46. Blackstone says (1 Comm. 44): "And first, it [the law] is a rule—not a transient, sudden order from a superior to or concerning a particular person, but something permanent, uniform, and universal." Chancellor Kent says (Lecture 24, p. 9, vol. 2): "It may be received as a self-evident proposition, universally understood and acknowledged throughout this country, that no person can be taken or imprisoned, or disseized of his freehold or liberties or estate, or exiled, or condemned, or deprived of life, liberty, or property, unless 'by the law of the land or the judgment of his peers.' The words 'by the law of the land,' as used in Magna Charta in reference to this subject, are understood to mean 'due process of law'; that is, by indictment or presentment of good and lawful men." Judge Story, in 3 Comm. Const. § 1783, says: "The clause 'by law of the land,' in effect, affirms the right of trial according to the process and proceedings of the common law." Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 17

U. S. (4 Wheat.) 518, 4 L. Ed. 629. By the process and proceedings of the common law, the accused has the right to know the charge in the whole form and substance against him, to contest it, and, if not proved to the satisfaction of a jury, to demand an acquittal. Inhabitants of Saco v. Wentworth, 37 Me. 165, 171, 58 Am. Dec. 786. See, also, Westervelt v. Gregg, 12 N. Y. (2 Kern.) 202, 212, 62 Am. Dec. 160.

Everything that takes the form of an enactment is not to be deemed the law of the land, or due course or process of law. Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 17 U. S. (4 Wheat.) 518, 519, 4 L. Ed. 629; In re Opinion of the Justices, 33 Atl. 1076, 1078; 66 N. H. 629; State v. Loomis, 22 S. W. 350, 351, 115 Mo. 307, 21 L. R. A. 789. "Due process of law," as used in the constitutional provision which declares that a person shall not be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, is not merely the act of the Legislature. Baker v. Kelley, 11 Minn. 480, 486 (Gil. 358, 359, 375). If this were so, then decrees and forfeitures in all possible forms and amounts, confiscating the property of one person or class of persons, or a particular description of property, upon some view of public policy where it could not be said to be taken for a public use, would be the law of the land. Salt Creek Val. Turnpike Co. v. Parks, 35 N. E. 304, 307, 50 Ohio St. 568, 28 L. R. A. 769.

"Due process of law" does not mean a statute passed for the purpose of working a wrong. Trover v. People, 31 N. E. 395, 398, 141 Ill. 171, 16 L. R. A. 492; Taylor v. Porter (N. Y.) 4 Hill, 140, 145, 40 Am. Dec. 274; McFadden v. Longham, 58 Tex. 579, 585.

"Law of the land" means "due process of law." It does not mean merely an act of the Legislature, for that would abrogate all restriction on legislative power. Craig v. Kline, 65 Pa. (15 P. F. Smith) 399, 413, 3 Am. Rep. 636 (citing 2 Kent, Comm. 13). See, also, People v. Toynbee (N. Y.) 20 Barb. 168, 198; Hoke v. Henderson, 15 N. C. 1, 15, 25 Am. Dec. 677. Everything which may pass under the form of an enactment is not to be considered the law of the land. If this were so, acts of attainder, bills of pains and penalties, acts of confiscation, acts reversing judgments, and acts directly transferring one man's estate to another—legislative judgments, decrees, and forfeitures in all possible forms—would be the law of the land. Such a strange construction would render the constitutional provisions of the highest importance completely inoperative and void. Judges would sit to execute legislative judgments and decrees, not to declare the law or administer the justice of the country. Mathews v. St. Louis & S. F. Ry. Co., 24 S. W. 591, 598, 121 Mo. 298, 25 L. R. A. 161.

Mr. Justice Bronson, in Taylor v. Porter (N. Y.) 4 Hill, 140, 145, 40 Am. Dec. 274, said: "The words 'by the law of the land,' as used in the state Constitution, do not mean a statute passed for the purpose of working a wrong. That construction would render the restriction absolutely nugatory, and turn this part of the Constitution into nonsense. The people would be made to say to the two Houses: 'You shall be vested with the legislative power of the state, but no one shall be disfranchised or deprived of any of the rights or privileges of a citizen unless you pass a statute for that purpose. In other words, you shall not do the wrong unless you choose to do it.'" See, also, Phillips v. Lewis, 3 Tenn. Cas. 230, 231, 233, and Lavin v. Emigrant Industrial Sav. Bank (U. S.) 1 Fed. 641, 660.

The provision in the Constitution is a restraint on the legislative as well as on the executive and judicial powers of a government, and cannot be so construed as to leave Congress free to make any process due process by law by its mere will. Murray v. Hoboken Land & Improvement Co., 59 U. S. (18 How.) 272, 276, 15 L. Ed. 372.

Such an act as the Legislature may, in the uncontrolled exercise of its powers, think fit to pass, is in no sense the process of law designated by the Constitution. Westervelt v. Gregg, 12 N. Y. (2 Kern.) 202, 209, 62 Am. Dec. 160.

A state cannot make anything due process of law, within the meaning of the constitutional prohibition, which by its own legislation it chooses to declare such. To say by legislative enactment that the title to A's property should become vested in B. would, if effectual, deprive A. of his property without due process of law, within the meaning of the constitutional provision. Davidson v. City of New Orleans, 96 U. S. 97, 104, 24 L. Ed. 616.

"Due process of law" does not mean legislative enactment, but condemnation by judicial decree. The Legislature cannot usurp the right and the power of the courts to determine every question concerning life, liberty, or property. Davidson v. City of New York, 25 N. Y. Super. Ct. (2 Rob.) 230, 238.

To say that the "law of the land" or "due process of law" may mean the very act of the Legislature which deprives the citizen of his rights, privileges, or property leads to a simple absurdity. The Constitution would then mean that no person shall be deprived of his property or rights unless the Legislature shall pass a law to effectuate the wrong, and this would be throwing the restraint entirely away. The true interpretation of this constitutional phrase is that, where rights are acquired by the citizen under the existing law, there is no power in any branch of the government to take them away, but where they are held contrary to the existing law, or are forfeited by its violation, then they may be taken from him, not by an act of the Legislature, but in the due administration of the law itself, before the judicial tribunals of the state. Wynehamer v. People, 13 N. Y. (3 Kern.) 378, 394; Williams v. Village of Port Chester, 76 N. Y. Supp. 631, 635, 72 App. Div. 505; Clark v. Mitchell, 64 Mo. 564, 576; State v. Julow, 31 S. W. 781, 782, 129 Mo. 163, 29 L. R. A. 257, 50 Am. St. Rep. 443; Meyers v. Shields (U. S.) 61 Fed. 713, 717; Baker v. Kelley, 11 Minn. 480, 498 (Gil. 358, 375).

The cause or occasion of depriving the citizen of his supposed rights must be found in the law as it is, or at least it cannot be created by a legislative act which aims at their destruction. Where rights of property are deemed to exist, the Legislature cannot say they shall exist no longer; nor will it make any difference, although a process and a tribunal are appointed to secure sentence. If this is the law of the land, and due process of law, within the meaning of the Constitution, then the Legislature is omnipotent. It may under the same interpretation pass a law to take away liberty or life, without a pre-existing cause, and appoint judicial and executive agencies to execute this law. Property is placed by the Constitution in the same category with liberty and life. Wynehamer v. People, 13 N. Y. (3 Kern.) 378, 394; Clark v. Mitchell, 64 Mo. 564, 576; State v. Julow, 31 S. W. 781, 782, 129 Mo. 163, 29 L. R. A. 257, 50 Am. St. Rep. 443.

"To give the clause of the Constitution which guarantees that 'no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law,' therefore, any value, it must be understood to mean that no person shall be deprived by any form of legislation or governmental action of either life, liberty, or property, except as the consequence of some judicial proceeding, appropriately and legally conducted. It shows that a law which by its own inherent force extinguishes rights of property, or compels their extinction, without any legal process whatever, comes directly in conflict with the Constitution." Williams v. Village of Port Chester, 76 N. Y. Supp. 631, 635, 72 App. Div. 505 (quoting Wynehamer v. People, 13 N. Y. [3 Kern.] 378, 394).

"Law of the land" does not mean acts of assembly in regard to private rights, franchises, and interests, which are the subject of property and individual dominion, but refers to the law of the individual case, as established in a fair and open trial, or an opportunity given for one in court, and by due course and process of law. Hence it is held that an act of the Legislature whereby a man's property is swept away from him without a hearing, trial, or judgment, or the opportunity of making known his rights or producing his evidence, is not the law of the land. Brown v. Hummel, 6 Pa. (6 Barr) 86, 91, 47 Am. Dec. 431.

To entitle an act to recognition as the law of the land on the particular subject of which it treats, so as to be within Const. art. 1, § 8, which declares that no man shall be deprived of his life, liberty, or property but by the "law of the land," three things are indispensable, namely: (1) It must have been passed with due form and ceremony; (2) it must embrace equally all persons who are now, or may hereafter be, in like condition, and, if class legislation, it must, in addition, be natural and reasonable in its classification; (3) it must conform to all other requirements of the Constitution. State v. Schlitz Brewing Co., 59 S. W. 1033, 1040, 104 Tenn. 715, 78 Am. St. Rep. 941.

"Due course of law," within the meaning of Const. 1867, art. 11, § 8, continuing in force all ordinances relating to Baltimore City not inconsistent with that article until they were changed in due course of law, obviously means that the ordinances were to remain effective by virtue of the constitutional mandate, and the power that they conferred was to subsist, until repealed by the municipality, or until overriden or superseded by subsequent legislative enactment. Hooper v. New, 37 Atl. 424, 428, 85 Md. 565.

"It may be impossible, it certainly would be presumptuous, to attempt to frame a definition of 'due process of law' which shall embrace all, and only all, cases which a just mind will perceive to be included in it; but if an enactment of the Legislature which purports simply to strip a man of his right to protect his property be such process, then the provision is not of sufficient value to warrant its insertion in the organic law." Moore v. State, 43 N. J. Law (14 Vroom) 203, 208, 39 Am. Rep. 558.

As laws consistent with constitutional provisions.

"Due process of law," as used in Const. U. S. Amend. 5, providing that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, "means that law of the land which derives its authority from the legislative powers conferred on Congress by the Constitution of the United States, exercised within the limits therein prescribed, and interpreted according to the principles of the common law." As used in the fourteenth amendment, providing that no state shall deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, it refers "to that law of the land in each state which derives its authority from the inherent and reserve powers of the state, exerted within the limits of those fundamental principles of liberty and justice which lie at the base of all our civil and political institutions." In re Kemmler, 10 Sup. Ct. 930, 933, 136 U. S. 436, 34 L. Ed. 519.

Courts are authorized to interfere and declare a statute unconstitutional or not the law of the land, if it conflicts with the constitutional rights of the individuals, and does not relate to or is not an appropriate measure for the promotion of the comfort, safety, and welfare of society. Booth v. People, 57 N. E. 798, 799, 186 Ill. 43, 50 L. R. A. 762, 78 Am. St. Rep. 229.

"Due course of law" relates primarily to the protection of the individual against unlawful acts of executive or judicial officers, and is not by itself a limitation on the power of legislation. "Due course of law" was originally synonymous with "law of the land"; but the establishment of governments under written constitutions, without altering the meaning of the words, gave an effect to their operation which was not felt in England nor in Connecticut until 1818, when the written constitution placed limitations on the exercise of legislative powers. A law inconsistent with such limitation is not law. Hence an act warranted by a law inconsistent with such limitation is done without due course of law, and so in determining the validity of an act claimed to be obnoxious to this ancient guaranty we may have not only the original question, is the act clearly warranted by any law? but also the additional question, is the law authorizing the act itself inconsistent with the limitations contained in the fundamental law? But this difference is only apparent. Under a written constitution the substantial question is the same as it was before such constitution was known, is the act authorized by the law of the land? It is authorized if warranted by any specific law, unless such law is a mere color of law by reason of its inconsistency with the fundamental law. In re Clark, 31 Atl. 522, 526, 65 Conn. 17, 28 L. R. A. 242.

When first adopted in Magna Charta, the phrase "the law of the land" had reference to the common and statute law then existing in England; and when embodied in our Constitution it referred to the same common law as previously modified, and so far as suited to the wants and conditions of our people in a new country. At present "the law of the land" embraces the same body of laws as still further modified; those parts validly cut off being now excluded, and those validly added being now included. Every valid statute of the state now in existence, whenever enacted, is the present "law of the land" in respect to the subject-matter of that statute; and every existing enactment, passed with due form and ceremony, and not in conflict with some provision of the state or federal Constitution, is a valid statute. Harbison v. Knoxville Iron Co., 53 S. W. 955, 957, 103 Tenn. 421, 56 L. R. A. 316, 76 Am. St. Rep. 682 (citing Dent v. West Virginia, 129 U. S. 124, 9 Sup. Ct. 234, 32 L. Ed. 626).

As laws of each state.

Due process of law is process according to the law of the land. This process in the states is regulated by the law of the state. Walker v. Saurinet, 92 U. S. 90, 93, 23 L. Ed. 678 (cited in Bittenhaus v. Johnston, 66 N. W. 805, 807, 92 Wis. 588, 32 L. R. A. 380); State v. Moore (Del.) 46 Atl. 669, 675, 2 Pennewill, 299; In re Maxwell, 57 Pac. 412, 414, 19 Utah, 495.

The "law of the land" necessarily means the law of the state where the offense is committed and the trial takes place. The prohibition of the federal Constitution cannot mean that a state must observe the due process of the law of some other jurisdiction over which it has no control. In re McKee, 57 Pac. 23, 25, 27, 19 Utah, 231.

The phrase "due process of law" is found both in the fifth and fourteenth amendments of the Constitution of the United States. In the fifth amendment the provision is only a limitation of the power of general government. It has no application to the legislation of the several states. But in the fourteenth amendment the provision is extended in terms to the states. Gunn v. Union R. Co., 49 Atl. 999, 1004, 23 R. I. 289.

The power of a state to deal with crime within its borders is not limited by the fourteenth amendment, except that no state can deprive particular persons or classes of equal and impartial justice under the law. The question as to whether the statutes of the Legislature have been duly enacted in accordance with the requirements of the state Constitution is not a federal question; neither is the sufficiency of the indictment drawn under the state law, nor the degree of the offense charged, nor the admissibility of testimony, nor the alleged disqualification of a juror because he was not a freeholder. Consequently the Supreme Court of the United States cannot review such questions under an allegation that the decision of the state court in such respects deprived the defendant of his life and liberty without "due process of law." Leeper v. Texas, 139 U. S. 462, 468, 11 Sup. Ct. 577, 579, 35 L. Ed. 225.

Judicial proceeding implied.

"Due process of law" means ordinary judicial proceedings in court. Stewart v. Polk County Sup'rs, 30 Iowa, 9, 28, 1 Am. Rep. 238.

"Due process of law" means a course of legal proceedings which secures to every person a judicial trial before he can be deprived of life, liberty, or property. Peerce v. Kitzmiller, 19 W. Va. 564, 565; White v. Crump, 19 W. Va. 583, 595.

"Due process of law" is equivalent to "law of the land," and means being brought into court to answer according to law. It means that no person shall be deprived by any form of governmental action of either life, liberty, or property except as a consequence of some judicial proceeding properly and legally conducted. Lowry v. Rainwater, 70 Mo. 152, 156, 35 Am. Rep. 420. See, also, Jordan v. Hyatt (N. Y.) 3 Barb. 275, 281; Parsons v. Russell, 11 Mich. 113, 121, 83 Am. Dec. 728; Appeal of Ervine, 16 Pa. (4 Harris) 256, 263, 55 Am. Dec. 499.

The words "due process of law" do not necessarily imply a regular proceeding in a court of justice or after the manner of such courts. Davidson v. City of New Orleans, 96 U. S. 97, 101, 24 L. Ed. 616; Baltimore Belt R. Co. v. Baltzell, 23 Atl. 74, 75 Md. 94; In re Ross, 38 La. Ann. 523, 524; Eames v. Savage, 77 Me. 212, 221, 52 Am. Rep. 751. Private right and the enjoyment of property may be interfered with by legislative or executive as well as the judicial department of the government. Thus the power to grant and revoke licenses to practice medicine does not come within the scope of judicial power. State v. State Board of Medical Examiners, 26 N. W. 123, 124, 34 Minn. 387. Administrative process, which has been regarded as necessary to govern and sanction by long usage, is as much due process as any other. Welmer v. Bunbury, 30 Mich. 201, 210; Attorney General v. Jochim, 58 N. W. 611, 614, 99 Mich. 358, 23 L. R. A. 699, 41 Am. St. Rep. 606. Many illustrations may be given to cases where the law, either common or statute, justifies an act under particular circumstances which would be unlawful except under such circumstances. An abatement of nuisance by a private person, although attended with an interference with, or even the destruction of, the property of another; the levy of distress for rent, at common law and under statutes; the distress of goods for taxes; the taking up and disposing of estrays. Thus, also, a statute authorizing the chairman of the board of county commissioners to order the removal to the county of their legal settlement of poor persons who have applied for public support in another county, and are likely to become chargeable thereon for support, and who after warning to depart are unable or have refused to do so, is not invalid as being without due process of law. Lovell v. Seebach, 48 N. W. 23, 24, 45 Minn. 465, 11 L. R. A. 667.

The phrase "due process of law" does not necessarily mean a judicial process. "The nation from whom we inherit the phrase 'due process of law,'" said this court, speaking by Mr. Justice Miller, "has never relied on the courts of justice for the collection of her taxes, though she passed through a successful revolution in resistance of an unlawful taxation." McMillen v. Anderson, 95 U. S. 37, 41, 24 L. Ed. 335. The power to tax belongs exclusively to the legislative branch of the government, and the law provides for a mode of confirming or contesting the charge imposed, with such notice to the person as is appropriate to the nature of the case. The assessment cannot be said to deprive the owner of his property without due process of law. Palmer v. McMahon, 10 Sup. Ct. 324, 327, 133 U. S. 660, 33 L. Ed. 772.

Due process of law does not always require judicial hearing. It does in matters of purely judicial nature, but not in matters of taxation, or matters purely administrative. State v. Sponaugle, 32 S. E. 283, 284, 45 W. Va. 415, 43 L. R. A. 727.

The words "law of the land" do not imply the necessity of judicial action in every case in which the property of the citizens may be taken for the public use. On the contrary, a legislative act for that purpose, when clearly within the limits of legislative authority, is of itself law of the land. Pittsburgh, C., C. & St. L. Ry. Co. v. Backus, 33 N. E. 432, 438, 133 Ind. 625.

Due process of law does not necessarily imply a hearing by one whose property is taken or damaged for public use according to the established practice in courts of common law or equity, but is satisfied whenever an opportunity is offered to invoke the equal protection of the law by judicial proceedings appropriated for the purpose, and adequate to secure the end and object sought to be obtained. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. State, 66 N. W. 624, 628, 47 Neb. 549, 41 L. R. A. 481, 53 Am. St. Rep. 557.

The term "due process of law" includes all the steps essential to deprive a person of life, liberty, or property. It includes all the forms and acts essential to its application and to give effect to it. The means that may be employed to accomplish the purpose of the law is the process. In other words, process is the mode by which the purpose of the law may be effected, and this mode, as to similar subjects under similar circumstances, must be the same to all persons. Judicial action is usually required to determine property rights against its owner, but in some cases administrative or executive action is sufficient. Jenkins v. Ballantyne, 30 Pac. 760, 8 Utah, 245, 16 L. R. A. 689.

In Gilchrist v. Schmidling, 12 Kan. 263, 271, it is said that it is settled beyond all controversy that "due process of law" for transferring property from one person to another, before any injury has been suffered by the owner of the property, does not necessarily mean a judicial proceeding or a judicial determination. The distraining of cattle damage feasant, the taking up of estrays, the sale of property, real or personal, for taxes, the exercise of the power of eminent domain, or the exercise of any police power by police officers, is as much due process of law as any judicial determination can be. Nor does "due process of law" mean a judicial proceeding according to the course of the common law; nor must there be a personal notice to the party whose property is in question. See, also, Davidson v. New Orleans, 96 U. S. 97, 102, 24 L. Ed. 616; In re Ebenhack, 17 Kan. 618, 620; Weimer v. Bunbury, 30 Mich. 201, 210; In re Petrie, 40 Pac. 118, 120, 1 Kan. App. 184.

Jury trial implied.

It has been repeatedly declared that the phrase "due process of law," within the provision of the Constitution restraining the depriving of a person of his liberty without due process of law, does not of itself require a trial by jury in states where the usage and statutes are otherwise. Montana v. St. Louis Mining & Milling Co., 152 U. S. 160, 171, 14 Sup. Ct. 506, 38 L. Ed. 398; Hurtado v. California, 110 U. S. 516, 4 Sup. Ct. 111, 292, 28 L. Ed. 232; Walker v. Sauvinet, 92 U. S. 90, 93, 23 L. Ed. 678; In re Dowdell, 47 N. E. 1033, 1034, 169 Mass. 387, 61 Am. St. Rep. 290; Garnett v. Jennings, 44 S. W. 382, 383, 19 Ky. Law Rep. 1712; State v. Wilson, 28 S. E. 554, 557, 121 N. C. 425; Attorney General v. Jochim, 58 N. W. 611, 614, 99 Mich. 358, 23 L. R. A. 699, 41 Am. St. Rep. 606; Cummins v. Cummins (Del.) 31 Atl. 816, 819, 1 Marv. 423; McInerney v. City of Denver, 29 Pac. 516, 519, 17 Colo. 302; Fant v. Buchanan (Miss.) 17 South. 371.

"Due process of law" always proceeds upon inquiry, and renders judgment only after trial. It applies to all cases where property is sought to be taken or interfered with. These principles underlie the whole system of taxation. Hennessey v. Volkening, 22 N. Y. Supp. 528, 529, 30 Abb. N. C. 100.

"Whatever may be the meaning of the terms 'law of the land,' or 'due course of the law of the land,' they have never been held to enjoin in all cases a trial by jury as a requisite indispensable to the validity of the judgment." Janes v. Reynolds' Adm'rs, 2 Tex. 250, 251.

"Due process of law" does not necessarily mean a trial by jury. It simply means a day in court, according to the practice provided for such cases, involving, of course, notice, and an opportunity to be heard before judgment is pronounced. Delaney v. Police Court of Kansas City, 67 S. W. 589, 591, 167 Mo. 687.

"Due process of law" carries with it the right of trial by jury, when trial by jury has been the usual course of administration in the particular class of cases, through courts of justice to which the one in question belongs. Light v. Canadian County Bank, 37 Pac. 1075, 1077, 2 Okl. 543.

The guaranty of due process of law does not require that a trial shall be before a jury. Its effect is not to give the right of trial by jury in cases in which it did not exist when the Constitution was adopted, but only to perpetuate such rights in all cases in which it was a part of the usual course of administration of justice through the courts at all such times. Rider-Wallis Co. v. Fogo, 78 N. W. 767, 769, 102 Wis. 536.

Trial by jury is not in all cases an essential element of "due process of law." It is only in cases in which it had been theretofore used that the Constitution makes it a necessary element in such due process, and hence it follows that cases within the jurisdiction of the equity courts, though they often involve the title and final disposition of property, are notwithstanding "due process of law within" the meaning of the Constitution. Hence, also, those proceedings affecting the possession of personal property in actions at law which existed prior to the adoption of the Constitution, and the subsequent proceedings which have taken their place, as, for instance, creditors' bills and proceedings to reach property of judgment creditors in supplementary proceedings, are not supposed to be obnoxious to the Constitution, though no jury trial is provided. In re Curry's Estate (N. Y.) 25 Hun, 321, 323.

A proceeding in equity should undoubtedly be classed as "due process of law," and a right of trial by jury is not essential. McLane v. Leicht, 29 N. W. 327, 330, 69 Iowa, 401; Gibson v. Mason, 5 Nev. 283, 301.

A trial before a court or referee in which witnesses may be examined, and in which the rights of the parties are as fully protected as in any other proceedings in chancery, is "due process of law." Eikenburg v. Edwards, 25 N. W. 832, 833, 67 Iowa, 619, 56 Am. Rep. 360.

The common-law principle in relation to trials of jurors not having been adopted in Massachusetts, but another mode, that of trial by the court, believed to be quite as effectual to secure impartial juries, having been provided by legislative authority, it became the law of the land of that commonwealth under the Constitution. State v. Knight, 43 Me. 11, 122, 125.

Within the principle that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property except by due course of law, by the phrase "due course of law" is meant a proceeding which the adversary parties have a right to be confronted by the witnesses against them, and to have the issues between them tried by a jury in a due and orderly manner as provided by law. Nettles v. Somervell, 25 S. W. 658, 660, 6 Tex. Civ. App. 627.

As the remedy of the landlord by distress was in existence at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, the statutes regulating the exercise of that right are not in violation of either the federal or state Constitution because of not requiring a jury trial. Garnett v. Jennings (Ky.) 44 S. W. 382, 383.

"It is a mistaken idea that due process of law requires a plenary suit and a trial by jury in all cases where property or personal rights are in dispute. The important right of personal liberty is generally determined by a single judge on a writ of habeas corpus, using affidavits or depositions for proofs where facts are to be established. Assessments for damages and benefits occasioned by public improvements are generally made by commissioners in a summary way. Conflicting claims of creditors amounting to thousands of dollars are often settled by the courts on affidavits or depositions alone, and the courts of chancery, bankruptcy, probate, and admiralty administer immense field of jurisdiction without trial by jury. In all cases that kind of procedure is "due process of law" which is suitable and proper to the nature of the case and sanctioned by the established usages of the courts. Ex parte Wall, 2 Sup. Ct. 569, 589, 107 U. S. 265, 27 L. Ed. 552.

Same—In criminal cases and informations in insanity.

"Due process of law," within the meaning of the Constitution, is that which affords to every citizen the equal protection of the laws, and, in case of accusation of crime, the right of trial by jury before one of the state's duly constituted tribunals having jurisdiction of the crime, under a procedure which the state prescribes. In re Buchanan, 40 N. E. 883, 885, 146 N. Y. 264.

"Due process of law" is quite uniformly held to give to all persons on trial upon criminal charges the right of jury trial, but it has perhaps been as uniformly decided that trial by jury was not included in "due process of law" as applicable to violation of municipal by-laws, proper, which relate to acts and omissions that are not embraced in the general municipal legislation of the state and punishable by fine. Among these are municipal regulations concerning markets, streets, waterworks, parks, and various other matters regarding which local conditions and interests demand different regulations than are called for in rural communities. In re Cox, 89 N. W. 440, 129 Mich. 635. See, also, McInerney v. City of Denver, 29 Pac. 516, 519, 17 Colo. 302.

What is "due process of law" has not been clearly defined, but the practice of summary commitments has prevailed ever since the Revised Statutes were adopted, and long before the adoption of the Constitution containing the provisions in regard to due process of law; and so a procedure in the case of a witness has been recognized for a sufficient length of time to bring it within the category of "due process of law." In re McAdam, 7 N. Y. Supp. 454, 456, 54 Hun, 637.

"Due process of law," in establishing the insanity of a person, has long been declared to be by inquiry through a jury. In re Bryant (D. C.) 3 Mackey, 489, 493.

Same—In condemnation and taxation proceedings.

The owner of property to be condemned for public use has no constitutional right to have his compensation assessed by a jury. State v. Heppenheimer, 23 Atl. 664, 665, 54 N. J. Law (25 Vroom) 268; Long Island Water-Supply Co. v. City of Brooklyn, 17 Sup. Ct. 718, 722, 166 U. S. 685, 41 L. Ed. 1165.

It is not to be claimed that trial by jury is necessarily implied in the phrase "due course of law" or "due process of law." Within the meaning of the Constitution there may be due course of law in the general system of procedure for the levy and collection of taxes, and under the Constitution of 1802 the value of the private property taken for public uses could be assessed by commissioners under due process of law. Salt Creek Val. Turnpike Co. v. Parks, 35 N. E. 304, 307, 50 Ohio St. 568, 28 L. R. A. 769.

The assessment or nonassessment of damages for the construction of drains by trustees of a town cannot be regarded as "due process of law," unless the right of appeal exists to a tribunal where such an assessment can be made by a constitutional jury. Fleming v. Hull, 35 N. W. 673, 675, 73 Iowa, 598.

Taxes were not, either in England or in this country, collected by the intervention of a jury, nor was it even recognized by the citizens to demand such course of procedure. On the contrary, it was almost the universal practice to collect them when delinquent by some summary process, such as the seizure of the property of the individual and exposing it for sale. The citizen not being entitled to claim a jury in such a case prior to the adoption of the Constitution, a mode of collecting taxes without the intervention of a jury, adopted thereafter, is "due process of law." Gibson v. Mason, 5 Nev. 283, 301.

It is now universally conceded that this prohibitory clause in the Constitution does not apply to summary proceedings of states to collect the revenue essential to their existence, operating equally on all citizens. Bagley v. Castile, 42 Ark. 77, 84.

Competent tribunal required.

The term "due process of law," when applied to judicial proceedings, requires, to give such proceedings validity, that there must be a tribunal competent by its constitution—that is, by the law of its creation—to pass upon the subject-matter of the suit. Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714, 733, 24 L. Ed. 565; Caldwell v. Armour (Del.) 43 Atl. 517, 519, 1 Pennewill. 545; In re Ah Lee (U. S.) 5 Fed. 899, 906; Kemper-Thomas Paper Co. v. Shyer, 67 S. W. 856, 859, 108 Tenn. 444, 58 L. R. A. 173.

The term "in due course of law" means by authority of law, by competent legal authority; an act done in due form by a competent legal tribunal. Simms v. Slacum, 7 U. S. (3 Cranch) 300, 306, 2 L. Ed. 446.

It is essential to due process of law that there shall not only be notice of the time and place for the hearing, but, what is more important, that there shall be a tribunal clothed with power, by methods and rules prescribed by law, to hear and determine a question involved. Charles v. City of Marion (U. S.) 98 Fed. 166; Moss v. Whitzel (U. S.) 108 Fed. 579, 582.

"Due process of law" means lawful judicial proceedings in a court of competent jurisdiction. In re Curry (N. Y.) 1 Civ. Proc. R. 319, 326, 25 Hun. 321, 323.

The term "law of the land," within the rule that no person shall be deprived of his property except by the law of the land, means by the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction, in which he is a party and afforded an opportunity to defend his rights. Bailey v. City of Raleigh, 41 S. E. 281, 130 N. C. 209, 58 L. R. A. 178.

"Due process of law," as used in a statute making it the duty of the Attorney General of the state to enforce the provisions of the act by due process of law is equivalent to the phrase "in any court of competent jurisdiction" appearing in other statutes, and if it does not otherwise indicate any particular tribunal. Its meaning here is wholly different from the meaning of the same phrase as used in the federal Constitution and in several of the state constitutions, where it has the same significance as have the words "by the law of the land" appearing in the Tennessee Constitution and Magna Charta. State v. Schlitz Brewing Co., 59 S. W. 1033, 1040, 104 Tenn. 715, 78 Am. St. Rep. 941.

Under the Constitution, the property and rights of every man are put in judicial protection, so that he cannot be deprived of them except by the law of the land, and by the "law of the land" something very different from the act of officers without jurisdiction, in conjunction with a legislative confirmation, is meant. Maxwell v. Goetschins, 40 N. J. Law (11 Vroom) 383, 391, 29 Am. Rep. 242.

The manner in which the hearing required by the term "due process of law" shall be had is largely in the power of the Legislature, the only limit to it being that a special tribunal cannot be created to adjudicate upon a particular case, but it must be heard either by the ordinary courts of justice, or by a tribunal generally created to hear cases of that nature. In re City of New York, 47 N. Y. Supp. 965, 966, 22 App. Div. 124. The hearing must be before the court or other tribunal lawfully constituted and organized and clothed with authority to act and decide the questions involved in the proceeding. Brooks v. Tayntor, 40 N. Y. Supp. 445, 449, 17 Misc. Rep. 534. Thus Gen. Laws, c. 79, §§ 18-20, declare that, on complaint to the appellate division of the Supreme Court of neglect to care for a pauper by a town to which he is chargeable, such court shall appoint a commission, which, after a hearing, shall report; and, whenever it appears by such report that the pauper is not suitably cared for, the court or justice shall order suitable accommodations to be provided at the expense of the town. Held that, since such act did not vest the commission with judicial powers or provide for a judicial trial at which witnesses under oath might be summoned and a judgment entered, a hearing by it was not due process of law, and hence such proceedings were void. Church v. Town of South Kingstown, 48 Atl. 3, 4, 22 R. I. 381, 53 L. R. A. 739.

"The phrase 'general law of the land,' within the rule that the writ of prohibition lies to prohibit the court, judge, or other tribunal from proceeding contrary to the general law of the land, means nothing more than passing upon personal or property rights without a hearing. It embraces cases where a petition, pleading, or objection is duly served or filed in accordance with the settled law of practice, as court, judge, or other tribunal having jurisdiction, and whose duty it is to hear and determine the matter, is proceeding to a determination without a hearing. That, I take it, would be an excess of jurisdiction, and I do not understand that the phrase 'contrary to the general law of the land,' as thus used by the courts, means anything more than an excess of jurisdiction. People v. Fitzgerald, 76 N. Y. Supp. 865, 868, 73 App. Div. 339.

As notice and opportunity to be heard.

"Due process of law" implies that whenever, in a judicial proceeding, a judgment is rendered by a court of justice affecting the liberty or condemning the property of another person, he is entitled to have reasonable notice of such procedure, trial, or contest. Mead v. Larkin, 66 Ala. 87, 88; Jones v.

Yore, 43 S. W. 384, 385, 142 Mo. 38; Scudder v. Jones, 32 N. E. 221, 223, 134 Ind. 547.

The essential elements of "due process of law" are notice and opportunity to defend. Simon v. Craft, 182 U. S. 427, 21 Sup. Ct. 836, 45 L. Ed. 1165; Ex parte Stricker (U. S.) 109 Fed. 145, 150; In re Dolph, 28 Pac. 470, 471, 17 Colo. 35. "Due process of law" requires notice and hearing before judgment. Irwin v. Pierro, 47 N. W. 154, 44 Minn. 490; Davis v. St. Louis County Com'rs, 67 N. W. 997, 998, 65 Minn. 310, 33 L. R. A. 432, 60 Am. St. Rep. 475; Jones v. Yore, 43 S. W. 384, 385, 142 Mo. 38; Dasey v. Skinner, 11 N. Y. Supp. 821, 823, 57 Hun, 593.

An opportunity of defense is an essential element in the conception of "due process of law." Health Department v. Trinity Church, 17 N. Y. Supp. 510, 512. See, also, Holden v. Hardy, 18 Sup. Ct. 383, 169 U. S. 366, 42 L. Ed. 780; In re Gannon, 18 Atl. 159, 160, 16 R. I. 537, 5 L. R. A. 359, 27 Am. St. Rep. 759; Loeber v. Schroeder, 25 Atl. 340, 341, 76 Md. 347.

"Due process of law" requires an orderly proceeding adapted to the nature of the case, in which the citizen has an opportunity to be heard, and to defend, enforce, or protect his rights. A hearing or an opportunity to be heard is absolutely essential, and a necessity of notice of the time and place of such hearing is conclusively implied. Stuart v. Palmer, 74 N. Y. 183, 189, 30 Am. Rep. 289; Martin v. Central Vermont R. Co., 3 N. Y. Supp. 82-84, 50 Hun, 347; In re Union Elevated R. Co. of Brooklyn, 19 N. E. 664, 668, 12 N. Y. 61, 2 L. R. A. 359; In re City of New York, 47 N. Y. Supp. 965, 966, 22 App. Div. 124; People v. St. Saviour's Sanitarium, 56 N. Y. Supp. 431, 436, 34 App. Div. 363; Goldie v. Goldie, 79 N. Y. Supp. 268, 269, 77 App. Div. 12; Weimer v. Bunbury, 30 Mich. 201, 214; People v. Saginaw County Sup'rs, 26 Mich. 22; Thomas v. Gain, 35 Mich. 155, 156, 24 Am. Rep. 535; Davidson v. New Orleans, 96 U. S. 97, 101, 24 L. Ed. 616; Spencer v. Merchant, 125 U. S. 345, 355, 8 Sup. Ct. 921, 31 L. Ed. 763; State v. Billings, 57 N. W. 794, 55 Minn. 467, 43 Am. St. Rep. 525; City of Philadelphia v. Miller, 49 Pa. (13 Wright) 440; Dietz v. City of Neenah, 64 N. W. 299, 301, 91 Wis. 422; Branson v. Gee, 36 Pac. 527, 528, 25 Or. 462, 24 L. R. A. 355; Ex parte Ah Fook, 49 Cal. 402, 404; Violet v. City of Alexandria, 23 S. E. 909, 911, 92 Va. 561, 31 L. R. A. 382, 53 Am. St. Rep. 825; Parish v. East Coast Cedar Co., 45 S. E. 768, 770, 133 N. C. 478; Stone v. Little Yellow Drainage Dist., 95 N. W. 405, 407, 118 Wis. 388. Such proceedings are "due" because they observe all the securities for private rights which are applicable to particular cases. Carolina & N. W. R. Co. v. Pennearden Lumber & Mfg. Co., 44 S. E. 358, 361, 132 N. C. 644 (citing Civil Rights Cases, 3 Sup. Ct. 18, 27, 109 U. S. 3, 27 L. Ed. 835).

"Due process of law" means notice. Notice precedes trial, trial leads to judgment, and judgment is the sentence of the court. City of Philadelphia v. Pepper, 8 Atl. 241, 243, 115 Pa. 291.

"Due process of law" means that the person entitled to due process of law shall receive a reasonable opportunity to have his grievance redressed. Stillwater & M. St. Ry. Co. v. Slade, 55 N. Y. Supp. 968, 968, 36 App. Div. 587.

"Law of the land," as used in the Constitution, requires a hearing before the condemnation of property, and judgment before dispossession. Ieck v. Anderson, 57 Cal. 251, 253, 40 Am. Rep. 115.

"The rule of justice which forbids the taking of property except according to the 'law of the land' means that there shall be no taking, no condemnation, before hearing." First Nat. Bank v. Swan, 23 Pac. 743, 745, 8 Wyo. 356.

"Due process of law" requires that the party shall be properly brought into court, and that he shall have an opportunity, when there, to prove any fact which, according to the Constitution and the usages of the common law, would be a protection to him or his property. People v. Essex County Sup'rs, 70 N. Y. 228, 234; Brooks v. Tayntor, 40 N. Y. Supp. 445, 449, 17 Misc. Rep. 534; Wright v. Cradlebaugh, 3 Nev. 341, 349; State v. Cutshall, 15 S. E. 261, 263, 110 N. C. 538, 16 L. R. A. 130.

The numerous attempted definitions of "due process of law" to be found in the books, when summed up, amount at least to but different expressions of the principle that every one is entitled to have notice of any proceeding by which his life, liberty, or property may be affected, and to be admitted to make a defense in a proceeding which, following the forms of law, is adapted to the nature of the case, and is in conformity with natural and inherent justice. Hood River Lumbering Co. v. Wasco County, 57 Pac. 1017, 1019, 35 Or. 498.

"Due process of law" means the same as the "law of the land," and, as a general rule, involves an opportunity before a proper tribunal, under established procedure, to make contest in defending or enforcing a legal right. Simmons v. Western Union Tel. Co., 41 S. E. 521, 522, 63 S. C. 525, 57 L. R. A. 607 (citing Murray v. Hoboken Land & Improvement Co., 59 U. S. [18 How.] 272, 15 L. Ed. 372; Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714, 24 L. Ed. 572); In re Ogles (U. S.) 93 Fed. 426, 431.

The phrases "law of the land" and "due process of law," as used in constitutions, are similar in meaning. They both imply a judgment by an authorized tribunal after an opportunity for a hearing. There must be some sort of a tribunal, some opportunity for a hearing, and some sort of an adjudication. These requirements, at least, are ingrained in the fundamental law. The Legislature cannot make that "due process of law" or the "law of the land" which is not that in the constitutional sense. Bennett v. Davis, 37 Atl. 864, 865, 90 Me. 102 (citing Inhabitants of Saco v. Wentworth, 37 Me. 165, 58 Am. Dec. 786; Dunn v. Burleigh, 62 Me. 24; City of Portland v. City of Bangor, 65 Me. 120, 20 Am. Rep. 681).

The principle that property shall not be taken without due process of law includes notice to the owner, but is intended for his benefit, and not for the benefit of third parties. People v. Turner, 2 N. Y. Supp. 253, 255, 49 Hun, 466.

"Due process of law" signifies a right to be heard in one's defense, so that, where a contempt committed out of court is punished without giving the offender a hearing, such punishment deprives him of his liberty without due process of law. McClatchy v. Superior Court of Sacramento County, 51 Pac. 696, 699, 119 Cal. 413, 39 L. R. A. 691.

"Due process of law" necessarily implies and includes the right to answer and to contest a charge. Babcock v. City of Buffalo (N. Y.) Sheld. 317; 340.

The question whether a proceeding is "due process of law," within the meaning of the Constitution, is independent of the question whether it was by a motion or ordinary action, provided the form sanctioned by the state law gives notice and an opportunity to be heard. Iowa Cent. Ry. Co. v. Iowa, 18 Sup. Ct. 344, 345, 160 U. S. 389, 40 L. Ed. 467.

"Due process of law" requires that a hearing or an opportunity to be heard be given by means of due notice by such boards or officers in respect to their action which affects individual property rights and requires the exercise of judgment and discretion of a judicial nature. It has no application to the Legislature. That which is within the legislative province the Legislature may do without notice to any one, and taxation is within that province. In re Curren, 54 N. Y. Supp. 917, 921, 25 Misc. Rep. 432.

Under the provision of the Constitution that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without "due process of law," no one can be deprived of his property without an opportunity to be heard; but an act making debts due for labor preferred claims against the property of the employer, when seized by creditors, or when his business has been placed in the hands of a receiver or trustee, and which requires such claims to be presented under oath to the officer or court holding such property, is not void under such constitutional provision. Henning v. Staed, 40 S. W. 95, 96, 138 Mo. 430.

Same—In assessments for local improvements.

It is essential to the validity of an assessment for public improvements that the property owner, before he is required to pay it, shall have notice and an opportunity to be heard in the courts. A statute allowing such assessments without due notice is unconstitutional as being without "due process of law." Gatch v. City of Des Moines, 18 N. W. 310, 312, 63 Iowa, 718; McGavock v. City of Omaha, 58 N. W. 543, 546, 40 Neb. 64; Scudder v. Jones, 32 N. E. 221, 223, 134 Ind. 547; Ulman v. City of Baltimore, 20 Atl. 141, 142, 72 Md. 587, 11 L. R. A. 224; People v. Mosier, 8 N. Y. Supp. 621, 56 Hun, 64; People v. Henlon, 19 N. Y. Supp. 488, 491, 64 Hun, 471; Violett v. City of Alexandria, 23 S. E. 909, 911, 92 Va. 561, 31 L. R. A. 382, 53 Am. St. Rep. 825. An act relating to taking lands for public improvements, and requiring the city council, before making any improvement, to post near the land affected, and to publish, notice of the intention to make the improvement and of its character, constitute "due process of law." Wulzen v. Board of Sup'rs of City and County of San Francisco, 35 Pac. 353, 354, 101 Cal. 15, 40 Am. St. Rep. 17.

In Davidson v. City of New Orleans, 96 U. S. 97, 104, 24 L. Ed. 616, it was said that whenever, by the laws of a state or by state authority, a tax, assessment, servitude, or other burden is imposed upon property for the public use, whether it be for the whole state or for some more limited portion of the community, and those laws provide for a mode of confirmation or contesting the charge thus imposed in the ordinary courts of justice with such notice to the person or such proceedings in regard to the property as is appropriate to the nature of the case, the judgment in such proceeding cannot be said to deprive the owner of his property without "due process of law." So in Hagar v. Reclamation Dist. No. 108, 111 U. S. 701, 708, 4 Sup. Ct. 663, 28 L. Ed. 569; Lent v. Tillson, 11 Sup. Ct. 825, 829, 140 U. S. 316, 35 L. Ed. 419; Lent v. Tillson, 14 Pac. 71, 78, 72 Cal. 404.

A state statute authorizing assessments for local improvements, and attempting to make a property owner who is a nonresident of the state personally liable for such assessments, is, as to such personal liability, a taking of property without "due process of law." Dewey v. City of Des Moines, 19 Sup. Ct. 379, 173 U. S. 193, 43 L. Ed. 665.

Same—In condemnation proceedings.

It is not necessary for the Legislature in the exercise of the right of eminent domain, either directly or indirectly, through public officers or agents, to invest the proceedings with the forms or substance of judicial process. It may allow the owner to intervene and participate in the discussion before the officer or board to whom the power of determining whether the appropriation shall be made in a particular case, or it may provide that the officers shall act upon their own views of propriety and duty, without the aid of a forensic contest. The appropriation of the property is an act of public administration, and the form and manner of its performance is such as the Legislature shall in its discretion prescribe. Therefore the constitutional provision which declares that no citizen shall be deprived of his property without "due process of law" has no application to proceedings for the condemnation of property under the exercise of the right of eminent domain. People v. Smith, 21 N. Y. 595, 599.

The property of a citizen cannot be taken by the power of eminent domain without some notice to the owner, or some opportunity being afforded him at some stage of the proceedings, to be heard as to the compensation to be awarded him. Branson v. Gee, 36 Pac. 527, 528, 25 Or. 462, 24 L. R. A. 355; People v. Adirondack Ry. Co., 54 N. E. 689, 693, 160 N. Y. 225.

In condemnation proceedings it is not essential that the assessment of damages be made by a jury to constitute "due process of law." Such award may be made by commissioners, at least where there is provision for a review of their proceedings in the courts. There is no denial of due process of law in making the findings of fact, whether by commissioners or jury, final as to such fact, and leaving open to the court simply the inquiry as to whether there was any erroneous basis adopted by the triors in their appraisal, or other errors in their proceedings. Long Island Water Supply Co. v. City of Brooklyn, 17 Sup. Ct. 718, 722, 166 U. S. 685, 41 L. Ed. 1165.

The constitutional requirement of "due process of law" in the taking of private property for public use will be satisfied if there be (1) authority from the sovereign power for the taking; (2) the ascertainment of compensation under legislative direction, and by an impartial tribunal, after the owner shall have had reasonable opportunity to be heard before it, and after it shall have judicially investigated the matters pertinent to its inquiry; and (3) a right afforded to the owner to present his claims for adjudication in the ordinary courts of justice. The owner of property to be condemned for public use has no constitutional right to have his compensation assessed by a jury. State v. Heppenheimer, 23 Atl. 664, 665, 54 N. J. Law (25 Vroom) 268.

The necessity of taking private property for public use is a question for legislative determination, and the provisions of the Code relating to such taking are not, because they fail to provide for a special tribunal to pass upon such a necessity, violative of the constitutional inhibition against taking the property of a citizen without due process of law. Savannah, F. & W. Ry. Co. v. Postal Tel. Cable Co., 42 S. E. 1, 2, 115 Ga. 554. See, also, In re Village of Middleton, 32 N. Y. 196, 201; People v. Adirondack Ry. Co., 54 N. E. 689, 693, 160 N. Y. 225.

The exercise of the right of eminent domain is "due process of law" if the established conditions of its exercise are observed. The fact that the exercise of the power will benefit a railway corporation which has agreed to pay the expense attending it does not affect it. Barr v. City of New Brunswick (U. S.) 67 Fed. 402, 403.

The requirement of "due process of law" in proceedings for the condemnation of private property for public purposes is not violated by permitting the actual taking possession of property pending condemnation proceedings, if adequate provision is made for payment of just compensation when the amount is determined. Nor is a person deprived of his property without due process of law because the condemnation proceedings were had before a common-law jury presided over and controlled by a judge rather than a jury of inquest, or that the question of necessity for taking the property, and the amount of the compensation, were both submitted to the same jury. Backus v. Fort St. Union Depot Co., 18 Sup. Ct. 445, 450, 169 U. S. 557, 42 L. Ed. 853.

Same—In criminal proceedings.

"Due process of law," as used in Const. art. 1, § 6, providing that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without "due process of law," means an ordinary judicial proceeding; in a criminal case an arraignment, formal complaint, confronting the witnesses, and trial and regular conviction and judgment. Wynehamer v. People, 13 N. Y. (3 Kern.) 378, 446, 454.

In Mr. Cooley's recent work on the Principles of Constitutional Law (page 224), we find the following language: "When life and liberty are in question, there must, in every instance, be judicial proceedings; and that requirement implies an accusation, a hearing before an impartial tribunal with proper jurisdiction, and a conviction and judgment, before the punishment can be inflicted. But the states will prescribe their own modes of proceeding and trial. The accusation may be by grand jury, or without one, the trial by jury or by court, and whatever is established will be 'due process of law,' so that it be general and impartial in operation, and disregard no provision of federal or state Constitution. In general, however, an accused person will be entitled to the judgment of his peers, unless that mode of trial is expressly dispensed with by law." Kalloch v. Superior Court of City and County of San Francisco, 58 Cal. 229, 238, 239.

"Due process of law" is a general expression, and is equivalent to "the law of the land." It permits the deprivation of life, liberty, or property according to law, and not otherwise. "Due process of law" in relation to the punishment of an offense, requires a law describing the offense. The offense must be described in an accusation. The accused must be given his day in court. His trial must proceed according to established procedure, consisting of rules of pleading and practice. The admission of evidence for or against him must be according to established rules, and he must be convicted by the judgment of a competent court, and the punishment authorized by law. The definition of the offense, and the authority of every step in the trial, must be founded on the law of the land. The law defining these things may be charged by competent authority, constitutional authority or common law; so that the change in the Constitution to the effect that in all criminal cases except capital cases, the jury shall consist of eight jurors, does not deprive a person of his liberty without "due process of law." State v. Bates, 47 Pac. 78, 79, 14 Utah, 293, 43 L. R. A. 33.

"Due process of law" requires that the accused plead or be ordered to plead, or, in a proper case, that a plea of not guilty be filed for him before his trial can rightfully proceed; and the record of his conviction should show distinctly, and not by inference merely, that every step involved in due process of law and essential to a valid trial was taken in the trial court, otherwise the judgment will be erroneous. Crain v. United States, 16 Sup. Ct. 952, 953, 162 U. S. 625, 40 L. Ed. 1097.

A prisoner in a prosecution for murder is not deprived of a trial by "due process of law" because the solicitor was represented by other counsel with the court's assent. State v. Conly, 41 S. E. 534, 130 N. C. 683.

The provisions of the liquor law that offenses against it shall be entered for trial in the first term, that a continuance shall not be allowed without cause shown, and that a nolle prosequi or discontinuance shall not be entered without cause, and only with consent of the court, does not prevent a trial by due process of law, and in accordance with the law of the land. State v. Hodgson, 28 Atl. 1089, 1094, 66 Vt. 134.

A general statute authorizing a simplified form of indictment for murder is not unconstitutional as depriving a person, convicted for life, of "due process of law." Caldwell v. Texas, 11 Sup. Ct. 224, 226, 137 U. S. 692, 34 L. Ed. 816. Thus Const. art. 3, § 8, in allowing an information to be filed with leave of court, without preliminary examination, affords due process of law. State v. Brett, 40 Pac. 873, 876, 16 Mont. 360.

Proof of a former conviction, in pursuance of Pen. Code, § 688, providing for an increased penalty for the commission of a felony after a former conviction, is not objectionable as not being due process of law. People v. Sickles, 51 N. E. 288, 290, 156 N. Y. 541.

When a state court of competent jurisdiction, in due form, has convicted the defendant of a crime, the verdict and judgment are conclusive evidence of the fact that it is, according to the laws of the state, a crime to do the thing that was done, and the question is whether or not it be a crime at common law; and it is "due process of law," under the fourteenth amendment to the federal Constitution, if the state court deprives the defendant of his liberty by imprisonment until a lawful sentence upon such conviction. In re King (U. S.) 46 Fed. 905, 907.

The provisions of the liquor law that offenses against it shall enter for trial in the first term, that a continuance shall not be allowed without cause shown, that a nolle prosequi or discontinuance shall not be entered without cause, and only with the consent of the court, does not prevent a trial by "due process of law" and in accordance with the "law of the land." State v. Hodgson, 28 Atl. 1089, 1094, 66 Vt. 134.

The expression "law of the land," in the Rhode Island Constitution, is held to include the right to contest the charge and be discharged unless it is proven; therefore it is held that an act of the Legislature of that state which authorized a criminal prosecution upon a complaint against no person in particular, and not containing a charge of the substantive facts necessary to constitute the offense, was not in accordance with the law of the land or due process of law. Greene v. Briggs (U. S.) 10 Fed. Cas. 1135.

Cr. Proc. Act, § 68, distinguishes two degrees of murder, and provides that upon a plea of guilty the court shall proceed, by examination of the witnesses, to determine the degree of the prisoner's crime, and to pass sentence accordingly. It was held that, when such proceeding was held in strict accordance with the Constitution and the laws of the state, it was due process of law. Hallinger v. Davis, 13 Sup. Ct. 105, 107, 146 U. S. 314, 36 L. Ed. 986.

A state law authorizing a prosecuting attorney, in preliminary proceedings had to determine whether or not there is probable cause to charge a party with a certain offense, to compel the attendance of witnesses before him, by subpoena and attachment, and to punish them for disobedience to his writs, is unconstitutional as depriving those who are summoned, and refuse to obey, of their liberty without due process of law. Undoubtedly the Legislature has authority to delegate a part of the judicial power to ministerial offices, as, for example, coroners and county commissioners, but such a proceeding as is contemplated in the statute is an attempt to unite the executive and judicial branches of the government, and thereby create a kind of despotism. In re Ziebold (U. S.) 23 Fed. 791, 794.

When a prisoner sentenced to death carries his case to an appellate court, "due process of law" does not require that he shall be personally present thereon when it pronounces its judgment, since in case of affirmance it pronounces no new sentence, but merely directs that the sentence already imposed be carried into execution. Schwab v. Berggren, 12 Sup. Ct. 525, 528, 143 U. S. 442, 36 L. Ed. 218; Fielden v. People of Illinois, 12 Sup. Ct. 528, 530, 143 U. S. 452, 36 L. Ed. 224.

Same—In tax proceedings.

"Due process of law" is the prosecution of a suit according to the prescribed and well-settled rules of practice, for the purpose of establishing some right or determining the title to or the value of property; and that no person can be deprived of his property against his will without it is entirely proper in judicial proceedings, but has always been held entirely inapplicable in ordinary tax proceedings. In re Tax Sale, 23 N. W. 189, 190, 54 Mich. 417.

Whenever, by the laws of a state or by state authority, a tax assessment or servitude or other burden is imposed upon property for public use, whether it be for the whole state or for some more limited portion of the community, and those laws provide for a mode of confirming or contesting the charge, thus imposed, in the ordinary courts of justice, with such notice to the person or such proceeding in regard to the property as is appropriate in the nature of the case, the judgment in such proceedings cannot be said to deprive the owner of his property without "due process of law." Davidson v. City of New Orleans, 96 U. S. 97, 104, 24 L. Ed. 616.

It has frequently been held by the Supreme Court, when asked to review tax proceedings in state courts, that "due process of law" is afforded litigants if they have an opportunity to question the validity or the amount of an assessment or charge before the amount is determined, or at any subsequent proceedings to enforce its collection, or at any time before final judgment is entered. Gallup v. Schmidt, 22 Sup. Ct. 162, 164, 183 U. S. 300, 46 L. Ed. 207.

If the method for levying taxes is one that in its intended and normal workings will result in equal and uniform taxation as between all its citizens, and the right of hearing upon alleged errors is preserved, such method is "due process of law." The fact that a statute authorized the assessors to double the appraised value of the taxable estate which they may be able to find belonging to a taxpayer who fails to return his taxable estate does not render it void or unconstitutional. Bartlett v. Wilson, 8 Atl. 321, 331, 59 Vt. 23.

Proceedings to raise revenue by levying and collecting taxes are not necessarily judicial, and due process of law, as applied to them, does not imply or require the right to such notice and hearing as are considered to be essential to the validity of the proceedings and judgments of judicial tribunals. Thus an act requiring notice of the time and place of meeting of a board of equalization in no less than five public places, and for the hearing of claims of any inequalities in the assessments, and for the correction of errors, and also requiring a notice of sale, such notices constitute due process of law. Baldwin v. Ely, 28 N. W. 392, 399, 66 Wis. 171.

What is "due process of law" in proceedings for the collection of taxes is left by the Constitution largely to the legislative discretion. The machinery may be simple and the proceeding summary, but it must be a proceeding which is to be, and not which has been, taken. The citizen must have an opportunity to comply with the requirements of the law, and the state, and not the citizen, must be the actor. If, because of the negligence of its agents, the state shall fail to divest the citizen of his title by a sale for taxes, it may begin anew and collect the amount to which it is entitled; but, having proceeded and failed, it cannot by a mere legislative declaration accomplish what it failed to do by the proceeding which it had provided, and validate tax titles which were void under the law in force at the time the tax title was acquired. Dingey v. Paxton, 60 Miss. 1038, 1057, 1058.

As a general rule, confiscation of property without a judicial hearing after due notice is not due process of law, so that a statute, imposing an inheritance tax, which does not give the representative or heir notice or opportunity for him to be heard as to the fixing of the appraisal of the estate of such taxation, deprives him of his property without due process of law. Ferry v. Campbell, 81 N. W. 604, 605, 110 Iowa, 290, 50 L. R. A. 92.

An assessment made in the exercise of the taxing power of the state, in accord with the law, by proceedings wherein are provisions for an appeal or other means of correcting any error, illegality, or want of authority, is not in conflict with the provision of the Constitution against deprivation of property without due process of law. Yeomans v. Riddle, 50 N. W. 886, 890, 84 Iowa, 147.

In discussing the validity of a tax law providing that if an owner fails to enter his lands for taxation they shall be forfeited to the state, it was contended that such law deprived the owner of his property without "due process of law"; but the court said: "We know of no reason why a forfeiture of title to land for sufficient cause, by statute or constitutional legislation, is not by due process of law. It certainly is not for arbitrary exercise of the powers of government which Magna Charta intended to prevent when it declared that no person should be deprived of life, liberty, or property except by the judgment of his peers or the law of the land. The contention that the constitutional provisions re-enacting those of the Great Charter require something in the nature of process and judicial proceedings before divesting title seems inconsistent with accustomed methods of enforcing revenue laws, which are themselves as old as Magna Charta. The objection appears to be not to the right of the state to provide by legislation that a certain act or omission shall work a forfeiture or incur a penalty; it is to declaring the forfeiture complete by the act, without any subsequent legal procedure; but if the act in its very commission involves the forfeiture, nothing remains but to ascertain the fact of its commission, and that can as well be done in a subsequent suit involving the title as by a proceeding brought by the state to enforce the forfeiture." Read v. Dingess (U. S.) 60 Fed. 21, 27, 8 C. C. A. 389. See, also, State v. Sponaugle, 32 S. E. 283, 284, 45 W. Va. 415, 43 L. R. A. 727.

Under the constitutional provision that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without "due process of law," notice of a tax sale was indispensable in order that the title of defendant's property might be transferred to another. To say otherwise would be to hold in effect that the Legislature has the power to take the property of one person and give it to another. Roth v. Gabbert, 27 S. W. 528, 530, 123 Mo. 21. See, also, Newton v. Raper, 50 N. E. 749, 750, 150 Ind. 630.

After quoting the definition of "due process of law" in Davidson v. City of New Orleans, 96 U. S. 97, 24 L. Ed. 616, and Hagar v. Reclamation Dist. No. 108, 111 U. S. 701, 708, 4 Sup. Ct. 663, 28 L. Ed. 569, it was held that a statute providing for the construction of sewers, and levying of assessments therefor according to area, and regardless of improvements and a petition of a majority of the property owners, and providing that during the progress of the work all persons interested shall have opportunity to object to the materials used, and the manner in which the work is done, or any supposed violation of the contract, was not due process of law, since, the levying of assessments being a mere mathematical computation, it was unnecessary to provide an opportunity for lot owners to be heard on the assessment. Gillette v. City of Denver (U. S.) 21 Fed. 822, 823.

Same—Nature and sufficiency of notice in general.

While it is practically impossible, and certainly unwise, to attempt to give a concise and comprehensive definition of "due process of law" and "law of the land," it is certain that notice to the parties to be affected of the claim against them, and an opportunity to be heard upon it, are essential elements of every proceeding in a court of justice which can be said to constitute due process of law or to be in accord with the law of the land. The basic principle of English jurisprudence is that no man shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law—without a course of legal proceedings according to those rules and forms which have been established for the protection of private rights. Such a course must be appropriate to the case and just to the party affected. It must give him notice of the charge or claim against him, and an opportunity to be heard respecting the justice of the order or judgment sought. The notice must be such that he may be advised from it of the nature of the claim against him, and of the relief sought for from the court if the claim is sustained; and the opportunity to be heard must be such that he may, if he chooses, cross-examine the witnesses produced to sustain the claim, and produce witnesses to refute it if a question of fact is in issue; and, if a question of law is presented, the opportunity to be heard must be such that his counsel may, if they desire, argue the justice and propriety of the judgment or order proposed. Judicial orders or judgments affecting the life or property of citizens, in the absence of such a notice and opportunity to be heard to the party affected, are violative of the fundamental principles of our laws, and cannot be sustained. In re Rosser (U. S.) 101 Fed. 562, 567, 41 C. C. A. 497.

"Due process of law" means that those general rules established in our system of jurisprudence for the security of private rights must be observed. Where life and liberty are involved, due process requires that there be a regular course of judicial proceedings, which imply that the party to be affected shall have notice, and an opportunity to be heard; so, also, where title or possession of property is involved. But where the taking of property is in the enforcement of a tax, the proceeding is necessarily less formal, and whether notice to him is at all necessary may depend upon the character of the tax, and the manner in which its amount is determinable. Respect must be had to the cause and object of the taking, whether under the taxing power, the power of eminent domain, or the power of assessments for local improvements, or some of these; and, if found to be suitable or admissible in the special case, it will be adjudged to be due process of law; but if found to be arbitrary, oppressive, and unjust, it may be declared not to be due process of law. Baldwin v. Ely, 28 N. W. 392, 399, 66 Wis. 171.

While the phrase "due process of law," as applied in this country, is more or less controlled by its application to the facts and conditions of the particular case, yet in its universality it implies the right of the person to be affected by a judicial proceeding against him to be present before the tribunal which pronounces judgment upon the question of life, liberty, or property in its most comprehensive sense; to be heard by testimony or otherwise; and to have the right of controverting by proof every material fact which bears on the question of right in the matter involved. If any question of fact or liability be conclusively presumed against him, there is not due process of law. Holden v. Hardy, 167 U. S. 366, 18 Sup. Ct. 383, 42 L. Ed. 780; Zeigler v. South & N. A. R. Co., 58 Ala. 594, 599; Moss v. Whitzel (U. S.) 108 Fed. 579, 582; Ex parte Murray (U. S.) 35 Fed. 496, 497; Meyers v. Shields (U. S.) 61 Fed. 713, 717; Mead v. Larkin, 66 Ala. 87, 88; Wilburn v. McCalley, 63 Ala. 436, 443; McGavock v. City of Omaha, 58 N. W. 543, 546, 40 Neb. 64; Union Pacific Ry. Co. v. De Busk, 20 Pac. 752, 755, 12 Colo. 294, 3 L. R. A. 350, 13 Am. St. Rep. 221; Avant v. Flynn, 49 N. W. 15, 18, 2 S. D. 153.

"Due process of law" means giving a man notice of the charge or claim against him, and opportunity to be heard respecting the justice of the order or judgment. The notice must be such that he may be advised upon it of the nature of the claim against him, and of the relief sought from the court if the claim is sustained. Opportunity to be heard must be such that he may, if he chooses, cross-examine the witnesses to sustain the claim, and to produce witnesses to refute it if question of fact is the issue; and, if the question of law is presented, the opportunity to be heard must be such that his counsel may, if they desire, argue the justice and propriety of the judgment or order proposed. In re Rosser (U. S.) 101 Fed. 562, 566, 41 C. C. A. 497.

Many definitions of "due process of law" have been attempted, but it is believed they all come to this: that a party shall have his day in court—trial—which means the right of each party, plaintiff or defendant, to introduce evidence to establish his right to recover on the one hand, and to establish his defense on the part of the other; after which comes judgment. Any judgment which is rendered without these modes of procedure, or in disregard of them, is not due process of law. Any other procedure condemns before it hears, does not proceed upon inquiry, but renders judgment before trial. Jensen v. Union Pac. Ry. Co., 21 Pac. 994, 995, 6 Utah, 253, 4 L. R. A. 724.

"Due process of law" means by due course of legal proceedings in accordance with established principles and maxims; yet what constitutes due process of law may differ with different cases. While every man has a right to require that his own controversies shall be judged by the same rules which are applied in the controversies of his neighbors, the necessity for general rules is not such as to preclude the legislature from establishing special rules for particular classes of cases, provided these particular cases range themselves under some general rule of legislative power. And hence there are a number of classes of cases where the property of the citizen may be taken without the actual service of ordinary process upon him, or without his ever actually having his day in court. Proceedings in admiralty and in attachments against the property of nonresident debtors are an illustration. Youst v. Willis, 49 Pac. 1014, 1015, 5 Okl. 413.

To give a judicial proceeding any validity if it involves merely a determination of the personal liability of the defendant, he must be brought within its jurisdiction by service of process within the state, or his voluntary appearance. Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714, 733, 24 L. Ed. 565; Brooks v. Dun (U. S.) 51 Fed. 138, 144; Ex parte Stricker (U. S.) 109 Fed. 145, 150; Caldwell v. Armour (Del.) 43 Atl. 517, 519, 1 Pennewill, 545; Kemper-Thomas Paper Co. v. Shyer (Tenn.) 67 S. W. 856, 859, 58 L. R. A. 173; South Platte Land Co. v. Buffalo County Com'rs, 7 Neb. 253, 258.

"Due process of law," as used in Const. art. 1, § 7, providing that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, should be construed as intending to protect the citizens in the enjoyment of life, liberty, or property, and prohibit interference therewith, except in accordance with such provisions of law as the Legislature may enact to protect society and secure the right guarantied by the Constitution. The word "process" cannot mean that no judgment can be authorized except on summons, or some writ of that nature, technically known "as process first issued"; for it is not doubted but that judgments may be entered on confession, by submission to arbitration, by warrant of attorney, and perhaps in other ways without service of process. Davidson v. Farrell, 8 Minn. 258, 262 (Gil. 225, 229). This clause in the Constitution does not prohibit the Legislature from establishing a general rule of practice by which notice of the institution of the action may be given by an attorney or party. Gilmer v. Bird, 15 Fla. 410, 421; City of Brooklyn v. Franz, 33 N. Y. Supp. 869, 87 Hun, 54. "Due process of law" implies notice and hearing, or an opportunity to be heard. Where such is not required or provided for in the act, such act is unconstitutional, even though notice of the fact of the thing to be done was given. In re Jensen, 59 N. Y. Supp. 653, 655, 28 Misc. Rep. 378.

It is not enough that the parties may by chance have notice, or that they may as a matter of favor have a hearing. The law must require a notice to them, and give them the right to a hearing, and an opportunity to be heard. San Mateo County v. Southern Pac. R. Co. (U. S.) 13 Fed. 722, 752. But see Avant v. Flynn, 49 N. W. 15, 18, 2 S. D. 153. If the owner or his agent or representative be present at the time the addition of omitted property is made to the roll and knows thereof, such knowledge is equivalent to personal notice and an addition so made cannot be considered as depriving the owner of his property without due process of law. Code Civ. Proc. § 720, which authorizes a judge by order to permit the judgment creditor to institute supplemental proceedings on a judgment against a debtor of the judgment debtor, is not unconstitutional as taking property without "due process of law." Though it does not provide notice of such proceeding to the judgment debtor, he, having been a party to the action and judgment, must be held to be fully aware of the legal effect of it. High v. Bank of Commerce, 30 Pac. 556, 95 Cal. 386, 29 Am. St. Rep. 121. See, also, Ex parte Murray (U. S.) 35 Fed. 496, 497.

Due process of law does not require that there must be a personal notice to the party whose property is in question. It is sufficient if a kind of notice is provided by which it is reasonably probable that the party proceeded against will be apprised of what is going on against him, and an opportunity is offered him to defend. Happy v. Mosher, 48 N. Y. 313, 317; In re Union Elevated R. Co. of Brooklyn, 19 N. E. 664, 668, 112 N. Y. 61, 2 L. R. A. 359; City of Indianapolis v. Holt (Ind.) 57 N. E. 966, 970; Gilechrist v. Schmidling, 12 Kan. 263, 272; Kansas City v. Duncan, 37 S. W. 513, 515, 135 Mo. 571.

No court of justice in this country can acquire jurisdiction over a person, or a right to render a judgment in personam against him, without a service upon him in person of a summons in the action, unless he enters his voluntary appearance therein. Nothing else is "due process of law." Moredock v. Kirby (U. S.) 118 Fed. 180, 183.

If the mode of service provided by statute is, under the circumstances, reasonable and appropriate to the case, it is "due process of law," and, as to citizens and residents of the state, will give jurisdiction of the person and support a personal judgment against them, although they were not served in person. Town of Hinckley v. Kettle River R. Co., 72 N. W. 835, 836, 70 Minn. 105.

"Due process of law," when applied to judicial proceedings which are not in the nature of proceedings in rem, requires that the defendant should be brought within the jurisdiction, either by service of process within the time, or by his voluntary appearance. Wilson v. American Palace Car Co. (N. J.) 55 Atl. 997, 998.

"Due course or process of law," with respect to actions on a foreign judgment necessarily involves reasonable notice to the defendant of the institution and nature of the action, unless waived, or, if he be a nonresident, by personal service within the jurisdiction, and a fair opportunity to be heard before a tribunal of competent jurisdiction. Fisher v. Fielding, 34 Atl. 714, 67 Conn. 91, 32 L. R. A. 236, 52 Am. St. Rep. 270.

Same—Notice by publication.

Although the Legislature may at its pleasure provide new remedies or change old ones, the power is nevertheless subject to the condition that it cannot remove certain ancient landmarks which have always been recognized and observed in judicial proceedings. Hence it becomes important, in determining what kind of notice would constitute due process of law in judicial proceedings affecting a man's property, to ascertain what notice has always been required and deemed essential—necessary to actions or proceedings of that kind—according to that system of jurisprudence of which ours is a derivative. In an action in personam of a strictly judicial character, proceeding according to the course of the common law, service of process by publication in a newspaper upon resident defendants who are persons within the state and can be found therein is not due process of law, and a statute authorizing such service in actions to foreclose mortgages is unconstitutional and void. Bardwell v. Collins, 46 N. W. 315, 317, 44 Minn. 97, 9 L. R. A. 152, 20 Am. St. Rep. 547.

A service of summons by publication against a nonresident, not accompanied by an attachment of property, is void as being without due process of law. Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714, 733, 24 L. Ed. 565.

Shannon's Code, § 5298, providing that in nonresident attachment proceedings based on attachment of property and service by publication, when the property attached is not sufficient to satisfy the recovery, execution may issue for the residue as in other cases, is, in so far as it attempts to authorize a personal judgment and an execution against a nonserved, nonappearing nonresident for any amount after the appropriation of his impounded property, repugnant to the "due process of law" clause of the fourteenth amendment to the federal Constitution. Kemper-Thomas Paper Co. v. Shyer, 67 S. W. 856, 859, 108 Tenn. 444, 58 L. R. A. 173.

Where a defendant is a nonresident at the time of proceedings for divorce, and is not served with process within the state, and does not appear, a decree for alimony, based solely on publication or service out of the state, is a decree fixing personal liability or obligations without "due process of law," and therefore void under the federal Constitution. Elmendorf v. Elmendorf, 44 Atl. 164, 165, 58 N. J. Eq. 113.

In New York laws relating to the operation and construction of steam railways within cities, providing for the procurement of the consent of the local authorities and owners of one-half in value of the property on the line of the proposed road, and authorizing the grant of such right of way on determination of the necessity of such railway without the consent of such property owners, though the statute made no provision for personal notice to each person interested, constructive notice by publication in a newspaper and by posting notices along the proposed road is sufficient, and constitutes due process of law. In re Union El. R. Co. of Brooklyn, 19 N. E. 664, 667, 112 N. Y. 61, 2 L. R. A. 359.

Conceding that Act May 1, 1897, § 18 (Laws 1897, p. 141), authorizes a finding respecting title to land before an initial registration, as against residents of the state notified only by publication, it does not invalidate the act as authorizing the taking of property without due process of law, as sections 11, 19, 20, and 21 provide for personal service in certain contingencies, and empower a court to direct further notice than that of publication. People v. Simon, 52 N. E. 910, 914, 176 Ill. 165, 44 L. R. A. 801, 68 Am. St. Rep. 175.

Where a city charter provided, in relation to assessments for local improvements, that an estimate of the expenses of such improvements to be assessed and charged to the lot should be made and filed for the inspection of the parties interested before such work should be done; that such work should be let to the lowest bidder, upon notice published in the official paper of the city; that, upon the determination of the amount chargeable upon the abutting lands, notice should be given in such official paper of the letting of the contract for the performances of the work, the filing of such statement, and the proposed issue of bonds, unless the lot owners respectively should elect to pay, etc.—such provisions were not void as being without "due process of law." Meggett v. City of Eau Claire, 51 N. W. 566, 569, 81 Wis. 326.

Same—Notice by statute.

Proceedings to raise a public revenue by levying and collecting taxes are not necessarily judicial. "Due process of law," as applied to that subject, does not imply or require the right of such notice and hearing as are considered to be essential to the validity of the proceedings and judgments of judicial tribunals. Notice by statute is generally the only notice given, and that has been held sufficient. In the Railroad Tax Cases (U. S.) 13 Fed. 752, Mr. Justice Field says due process of law in the proceeding is deemed to be pursued when, after the assessment is made by the assessing officers upon such information as they may obtain, the owner is allowed a reasonable opportunity, at a time and place to be designated, to be heard respecting the correctness of the assessment, and to show any errors in valuation committed by the officers. Notice to him will be deemed sufficient if the time and place of hearing are designated by statute. Hubbard v. Goss, 62 N. E. 36, 38, 157 Ind. 485. See, also, Pittsburgh, C., C. & St. L. Ry. Co. v. Backus, 33 N. E. 432, 438, 133 Ind. 625; Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. v. Kentucky, 6 Sup. Ct. 57, 60, 115 U. S. 321, 29 L. Ed. 414.

Code 1873, § 478, authorizing a personal judgment against a property owner for the amount of the special assessment for street improvement, is not unconstitutional as depriving him of his property without due process of law, though he is a nonresident of the state and has no actual notice of the proceedings, since the law under which the proceedings was had was a public statute of which all persons interested were bound to take notice. Dewey v. City of Des Moines, 70 N. W. 605, 609, 101 Iowa, 416.

Same—Notice by substituted service.

A proceeding in a personal action against absent defendants by substituted services through a curator ad hoc, unaccompanied by any seizure of property, is not due process of law, and the judgment and sale thereunder are absolute nullities. Hobson v. Peake, 10 South. 762, 763, 44 La. Ann. 383.

The provision of Code, § 3354, that, in a suit on an attachment bond, service of notice on the resident surety is service on his non-resident principal, is not unconstitutional as depriving the latter of his property without "due process of law," for, by voluntarily seeking an extraordinary statutory remedy in another state, the plaintiff subjects himself to the statutory liability implied thereby.

Continental Nat. Bank v. Folsom, 3 S. E. 269, 274, 78 Ga. 449.

Where no notice is given to a party of an action against him except by service upon his debtor on attachment of the debt, he is deprived of his property without due process of law. Martin v. Central Vermont R. Co., 3 N. Y. Supp. 82, 83, 50 Hun, 347.

An act which authorizes a service of process on any agent or clerk, where the corporation, company, or individual has an office or agency in any county other than that in which the chief officer or principal resides, is invalid as to citizens of other states, the service not being due process of law. Brooks v. Dun (U. S.) 51 Fed. 138, 144.

Indictment or information necessary.

The words "law of the land," as used originally in Magna Charta, are understood to mean "due process of law"—that is, by indictment or presentment of good and lawful men—and this, says Lord Coke, is the true sense and exposition of these words. Rison v. Farr, 24 Ark. 161, 175, 87 Am. Dec. 52; Bartlett v. Wilson, 8 Atl. 321, 323, 59 Vt. 23; Lavin v. Emigrant Industrial Sav. Bank (U. S.) 1 Fed. 641, 660; Gaines v. Buford, 31 Ky. (1 Dana) 481, 507; Taylor v. Porter (N. Y.) 4 Hill, 140, 145, 40 Am. Dec. 274; People v. Tonybeen (N. Y.) 12 How. Prac. 238, 253; Rowan v. State, 30 Wis. 129, 146, 11 Am. Rep. 559.

The words "without due process of law" mean that no one shall be condemned to lose his liberty unless by the presentment or indictment of a grand jury, and a regular trial according to the course of the common law. Cooper v. Schultz (N. Y.) 32 How. Prac. 107, 123.

The words "due process of law," in the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States, do not necessarily require an indictment by a grand jury in a prosecution by the state for murder. Hurtado v. People of California, 4 Sup. Ct. 111, 113, 110 U. S. 516, 28 L. Ed. 232; McNulty v. Same, 13 Sup. Ct. 959, 960, 149 U. S. 645, 37 L. Ed. 882; In re Dolph, 28 Pac. 470, 471, 17 Colo. 35; Kalloch v. Superior Court of City and County of San Francisco, 56 Cal. 229, 241.

"Due process of law," in relation to one charged with a criminal offense, means compliance by the government with all the fundamental requisites, such as that the party shall be charged with the crime in the way provided by the Constitution and the laws of the United States. Thus, where a crime must be prosecuted by presentment or indictment, a prosecution by information is "without due process of law." Ex parte McClusky (U. S.) 40 Fed. 71, 74.

Due process of law means a proceeding "by indictment or presentment of good and lawful men, where such deeds be done, in due manner, or by writ original, of the common law." Dale County v. Gunter, 46 Ala. 118, 141.

As applicable to police regulations.

Undoubtedly the amendment forbids any arbitrary deprivation of life, liberty, or property, and secures equal protection to all, under like circumstances, in the enjoyment of their rights, and in the administration of criminal justice requires that no different or higher punishment shall be imposed on one than is imposed on all for like offenses; but it was not designed to interfere with the power of the state to protect the lives, liberty, and property of its citizens, and to promote health, peace, morals, education, and good order. In re Kemmler, 10 Sup. Ct. 930, 933, 136 U. S. 436, 34 L. Ed. 519.

"Due process of law," in legislative proceedings, requires no more than conformity to rules and methods of safe government, and the omission to exercise powers inhibited by the Constitution or delegated to the other great departments of government. A legitimate exercise by the government of its police powers does not constitute a deprivation of property "without due process of law." People v. Rosenberg, 22 N. Y. Supp. 56, 58, 67 Hun, 52; Blittenhaus v. Johnston, 66 N. W. 805, 807, 92 Wis. 588, 32 L. R. A. 380; Davis v. State, 68 Ala. 58, 44 Am. Rep. 128; Bertholf v. O'Reilly, 74 N. Y. 509, 519, 30 Am. Rep. 323; Jenkins v. Ballantyne, 30 Pac. 760, 8 Utah, 245, 16 L. R. A. 689.

The provisions of Gen. St. S. C. 1882, c. 40, that the entire expenses of the Railroad Commission, which is thereby created and invested with general supervision of all railroads in the state, shall be borne by the several corporations owning and operating railroads within the state, does not deprive the railroad companies of their property without "due process of law," as the business of such corporations is affected with a public use and subject to legislative regulation. Charlotte, C. & A. R. Co. v. Gibbes, 12 Sup. Ct. 255, 142 U. S. 386, 35 L. Ed. 1051 (followed in People of New York v. Squire, 12 Sup. Ct. 880, 884, 145 U. S. 175, 36 L. Ed. 666).

Act Kan. Feb. 19, 1881, prohibits the sale and manufacture of intoxicating liquors within that state except for medical, scientific, and mechanical purposes, and punishes the manufacture and sale thereof, except for the excepted purposes, as a misdemeanor, and declares all places where such liquors are manufactured, sold, bartered, or given away in violation of this law to be common nuisances, and provides for their abatement. The defendant, who had been engaged in the business of brewing beer prior to the passage of this act, and had made extensive improvements peculiarly adapted to such business, was arrested for selling beer prior to the enactment of the act. It was held that the act did not deprive defendant of his life, liberty, or property without "due process of law." Mugler v. Kansas, 8 Sup. Ct. 273, 298, 123 U. S. 623, 31 L. Ed. 205.

In judicial proceedings the law of the land requires a hearing before condemnation, and judgment before dispossession; but when property is appropriated by the government to public uses, different considerations from those which exist in regard to controversies between man and man must prevail. There is nothing in the Constitution of the state of Texas which requires, as a preliminary to the exercise of the right to condemn horses affected with the glanders, a judicial trial of the issue as to the necessity of such summary action, and the ascertainment and awarding of damages resulting therefrom. It is an exercise of the inherent power of the government, and the manner in which the power is to be exercised by summary process offends no provision of the state or federal Constitution. Chambers v. Gilbert, 42 S. W. 630, 631, 17 Tex. Civ. App. 106.

Manner and mode of arrest as affecting.

The "due process of law" granted by the Constitution of the United States is complied with when the party is regularly indicted by the proper grand jury in the state court, has a trial according to the forms and modes prescribed for such trial, and when in that trial he is deprived of no rights to which he is lawfully entitled. Mere irregularities in the manner in which he may be brought into custody are not sufficient to prevent his being tried for the crime with which he is charged in a regular indictment. He may be arrested for a very heinous offense by persons without any warrant, and without any previous complaint, and brought before a proper officer, and this in a sense may be said to be without "due process of law"; but it would hardly be claimed that after the case had been investigated, and the defendant held by the proper authorities to answer for his crime, he could plead that he was first arrested without due process of law. Ker v. People of Illinois, 7 Sup. Ct. 225, 227, 119 U. S. 436, 30 L. Ed. 421.

"Due process of law," within the provisions of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution, declaring that no state shall deprive a person of his liberty or property without due process of law, relates to legal process in the state; so that where a person was indicted by a grand jury for willful murder, and by the usual and regular process which has existed in the state from time immemorial for the arrest of persons indicted for crime by the grand jury, he is held by due process of law, though the method by which he was brought into the state by private parties did not constitute due process of law in the state to which he had fled. In re Mahon (U. S.) 34 Fed. 525, 530.

Rev. St. c. 38, div. 6, § 4, authorizing arrest without warrant in certain cases, does not conflict with the Constitution, which provides that no person shall be deprived of his life, liberty, or property without due process of law. North v. People, 28 N. E. 966, 972, 139 Ill. 81.

If a person be imprisoned by virtue of process, there being error in the proceeding resulting in that process, yet if the law is valid under which the proceeding is had, such imprisonment is not without due process of law. The bench warrant and indictment by virtue of which the relator is imprisoned must necessarily then be void; not merely irregular and voidable, but absolutely void, or the relator is not imprisoned without due process of law. People v. Sheriff of Chautauqua County (N. Y.) 11 Civ. Proc. R. 172, 178, 179.

Payment of compensation for property taken implied.

As applied to the appropriation of private property for public uses under the power of eminent domain, "due process of law" does not mean mere legislative enactments, nor simply compliance with the forms of law, nor even constitutional provision, if they be inconsistent with previous established legal rights. Such a construction would render the restriction absolutely nugatory, and turn this part of the Constitution mere nonsense. Under this provision of the Constitution no state can lawfully appropriate private property for the public benefit to public uses without compensation to the owner, and any attempt to do so, whether direct or indirect, whether authorized by the Constitution of the state or by legislative enactment, is wanting for that due process of law required by the amendment. Scott v. City of Toledo (U. S.) 36 Fed. 385, 393, 1 L. R. A. 688; Forster v. Scott, 32 N. E. 976, 977, 136 N. Y. 577, 18 L. R. A. 543.

Due process of law forbids that one man's property or right to property shall be taken for the benefit of another, or for the benefit of the state, without compensation. Holden v. Hardy, 18 Sup. Ct. 383, 387, 169 U. S. 366, 42 L. Ed. 780.

"Due process of law," as applied to judicial proceedings instituted for the taking of private property for public use, means such process as recognizes the right of the owner to be compensated if his property be wrested from him and transferred to the public. The mere form of the proceedings against the owner, even if he be admitted to defend, cannot convert the process used into due process of law, if the necessary result be to deprive him of his property without compensation. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. City of Chicago, 17 Sup. Ct. 581, 584, 166 U. S. 226, 41 L. Ed. 979.

There is no "due process of law," no matter what form of procedure, judicial or otherwise, may be prescribed, if the plain purpose and inevitable result of the legislative enactment is the spoliation of private property for the benefit of the public without compensation. It is a mistake to say that the form of law alone constitutes the process. Thus an act forbidding the manufacture of intoxicating liquors by persons whose property had been employed in such manufacture prior to the passage of the act is void as depriving him of his property without due process of law. Kansas v. Walruff (U. S.) 26 Fed. 178, 179.

Taking or transfer of property by legislative act alone.

The mere fiat of the Legislature transferring the property of one person to another is not "due process of law," within the meaning of that provision in the Constitution of the United States. Culbertson v. Ccleman, 2 N. W. 124, 128, 47 Wis. 193.

An act declaring property of a state normal university, which was a private institution, to be state property, is unconstitutional as depriving the corporation of its property without due process of law. Board of Education v. Bakewell, 10 N. E. 378, 382, 122 Ill. 339.

A legislative act which authorizes an officer, without notice to the owner, or even the semblance of a judicial investigation, to seize and destroy the property of a citizen, is taking property without due process of law. Lowry v. Rainwater, 70 Mo. 152, 156, 35 Am. Rep. 420.

Const. art. 7, § 7, declaring that no person shall be deprived of property without "due process of law," refers to the transfer of property from one person to another, and not to the taking of private property for public use. It means that the Legislature shall not have the power to take the property of one person and give it to another by mere enactment, but that to effect such a change there must be a suit or proceeding in some court or before some magistrate, and a judgment thereon according to due course of law. Jordan v. Hyatt (N. Y.) 3 Barb. 275, 281.

By "law of the land" is meant due process of law, and a legislative act which undertakes to deprive one person, against his consent of a vested estate, and to vest it in another for his private use, is not "due process of law" or the "law of the land." Reynolds v. Baker, 46 Tenn. (6 Cold.) 221, 228.

An act of the Legislature which provides for an involuntary transfer of property from one person to another without consent of the owner, although compensation may be made, is without due process of law. In Cooley's Constitutional Limitations it is laid down as an elementary principle that a party cannot by his misconduct so forfeit a right that it can be taken from him without judicial prosecution when such a forfeiture shall be declared in due form. Forfeiture of the right of property cannot be adjudged by legislative acts, and confiscation without a judicial hearing after notice would be void as being without due process of law. Gilman v. Tucker, 28 N. E. 1040, 1042, 128 N. Y. 190, 13 L. R. A. 304, 26 Am. St. Rep. 464.

"Due process of law" has reference solely to taking a man's property by virtue of the legal process, the "law of the land," and against his will. Hence a statute giving a mortgagee the right to foreclose mortgages, containing a power of sale, by advertisement, upon default being made in the conditions of the mortgage therein, does not deprive the mortgagor of his property without due process of law, since the statute is founded upon his agreement, and seeks to carry out the agreement in accordance with, and not against, his will. Robinson v. McKinney, 29 N. W. 658, 4 Dak. 290.

Right of appeal implied.

"Due course of law," as used in Const. art. 1, § 13, providing that all courts shall be open, and every person, for an injury done him in his lands, goods, person, or reputation, shall have remedy by due course of law, applies to a defendant as well as a plaintiff in a cause tried in a district court, and means a trial according to the settled rules of law in that court, and a further hearing in the Supreme Court if either party to the litigation desires it after a final judgment in the trial court. "A law which practically takes away from either party to the litigation the right to a fair and impartial trial in the courts provided by the Constitution for the determination of a given controversy denies a remedy by due course of law. But a party's right to appeal to this court cannot be made to depend on his ability to give a bond which will within itself secure to the party successful in the court below full satisfaction of his judgment." Dillingham v. Putman (Tex.) 14 S. W. 303, 304.

The term "due process of law" has often been defined as such an exercise of the powers of government as is sanctioned by the settled maxims of the law, and under such safeguards for the protection of individual rights, and those safeguards prescribed for the class of cases to which the one question belongs. It has never been construed as the right to be heard in the court of last resort, or even according to the course of common law, but is satisfied by a proceeding applicable to such subject-matter, and conformable to such general rules as affect all persons alike. The provisions of a statute denying the right of appeal from judgments of justices of the peace where the amount claimed does not exceed $20 does not deprive a person of due process of law. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Headrick, 68 N. W. 489, 490, 49 Neb. 286.

Property or rights protected.

It is clear that the right to make contracts and have them enforced as others may is one of the rights secured to every citizen by the phrase "due process of law." State v. Loomis, 22 S. W. 350, 351, 115 Mo. 307, 21 L. R. A. 789.

A clerk appointed under the act of 1806 has an estate in his office, and although the Legislature may destroy the office, and by consequence the estate in it, yet the act of 1832 which continues the office, but transfers the estate in it to another, is unconstitutional and void, since it deprives him of his right of property "contrary to the law of the land." Hoke v. Henderson, 15 N. C. 1, 15, 25 Am. Dec. 677.

The principle that no man shall be condemned in his person or property without due notice and an opportunity of being heard in his own defense extends to the right to acquire property and enter into contracts with respect to property, but this right of contract is itself subject to certain limitations which the state may lawfully impose in the exercise of its police powers. A valued policy statute which applies only to future contracts cannot be said to deprive an insurance company of its property without due process of law by raising a conclusive presumption as to the value of the property in action on such policies. Orient Ins. Co. v. Daggs, 19 Sup. Ct. 281, 283, 172 U. S. 557, 43 L. Ed. 552.

If property can be taken without a forensic trial and judgment, there is no security for life or liberty. None of these things can be taken away by mere legislation. Taylor v. Porter (N. Y.) 4 Hill, 140, 146, 40 Am. Dec. 274; People v. City of Brooklyn (N. Y.) 9 Barb. 535, 552.

A statute which confers the exclusive privilege of carrying on a banking business on corporations as provided by the act is unconstitutional, in that it deprives private bankers of their business and property without due process of law. State v. Scougal, 51 N. W. 858, 865, 3 S. D. 55, 15 L. R. A. 477, 44 Am. St. Rep. 756.

DUE PROOF.

"Due proof" required before the issuing of summons in summary process by a justice of the peace means more than the affidavit of the party. Stanley v. Horner, 24 N. J. Law (4 Zab.) 511, 513; Mitchell v. Morris Canal & Banking Co., 31 N. J. Law (2 Vroom) 99, 107.

The phrase "due proof," in Rev. St. pt. 3, c. 7, tit. 3, art. 1, relative to taking depositions, and providing that due proof must be made by affidavit that the testimony of the witness whose evidence was sought is material and necessary, means legal proof, and legal proof consists of facts and circumstances from which the judge can satisfy his conscience as to the materiality of the testimony to be given by the witness. Swearing in the words of the statute is swearing to a mere conclusion, and therefore is not sufficient. Byrne v. Mulligan, 41 N. Y. Super. Ct. (9 Jones & S.) 515, 516.

Act March 20, 1810, § 14, provides that any justice of the peace shall have jurisdiction for any sum exceeding $1,000 if the parties appear before him for that purpose; but if it afterwards appear by "due proof" that the judgment was confessed for the purpose of defrauding creditors, the justice shall transmit a transcript to the prothonotary of the proper county, who shall file the same for adjudication in the court of common pleas. Held, that proof by affidavit is sufficient within the statute. Minick v. Tharp, 5 Pa. Dist. Ct. R. 44, 45.

The term "due proof," as used in a contract of accident insurance requiring the insured to make due proof of his claim, does not require any particular form of proof which the assurer might arbitrarily demand, but such a statement of facts, reasonably verified, as, if established, would prima facie require payment of the claim. Thus the assigning one cause to an insurer through the agent or by acknowledgment does not prevent the insured from afterwards assigning another cause. Jarvis v. Northwestern Mut. Relief Ass'n, 78 N. W. 1089, 102 Wis. 546, 72 Am. St. Rep. 895.

DUE PUBLICATION.

The phrase "after due publication of the ordinance," in an admission of defendant, in an action for maintaining a nuisance in violation of a city ordinance by the sale of hop ale, that the plaintiff in error had made sales of hop ale in the city after the passage and due publication of a certain ordinance prohibiting such sales, was construed to mean after the expiration of the time requisite to make the publication of the ordinance effective. Laugel v. City of Bushnell, 63 N. E. 1086, 1089, 197 Ill. 20, 58 L. R. A. 266.

DUE REGARD.

The phrase "due regard," as used in Act March 22, 1867, providing that, when an application is made to any court of quarter sessions for license to sell intoxicating drinks, it shall be lawful for the court to hear petitions in addition to that of the applications in favor of and remonstrances against the application of such license, and in all cases to refuse the same whenever in the opinion of the court, having due regard to the number and character of the petitioners for and against such application, such license is not necessary for the accommodation of the public, means a proper, suitable regard, such as is required by the circumstances of the case. These circumstances include the knowledge possessed by the court, facts whereof judicial notice should be taken, the testimony of witnesses, the opportunities of petitioners and remonstrants for knowing the things about which they volunteer information, their bias, prejudice, interest, and like matters. A due regard for the petitioners and remonstrants, their characters being equally good, does not require that the court should be governed by the opinion of the majority absolutely. In re Beaver County Licenses (Pa.) 3 Montg. Co. Law Rep'r, 64.

DUE RETURN.

"Due return" of process means a proper return made in proper time. Waugh v. Brittain, 49 N. C. 470.

"Due return," as used in Act 1777, providing that the sheriff shall execute all process and make due return thereof, means the bringing the process into court with such indorsement on it as the law requires him to make. Whether the indorsement be true or false, if it be such an one as the law requires, it is a true return. But it is a "due return" if the indorsement be such as is authorized by law, whether it be true or false. Harman v. Childress, 11 Tenn. (3 Yerg.) 327, 329.

DUE RIGHTS.

A reservation of all "due rights" under a mortgage and decree of sale, provided the stipulated payments should not be regularly made, means that which law or justice requires to be done. The plain meaning of the clause is that, if the payments are not made as stipulated, the decree should stand in full force and all the rights under it remain unimpaired, and the whole mortgage debt as secured by the decree should remain due and payable. Ryerson v. Boorman, 8 N. J. Eq. (4 Halst. Ch.) 701, 705.

DUE SECURITY.

The rule that trustees cannot loan a trust fund without obtaining "due security" does not necessarily mean that they cannot loan the funds on personal security, though that is the meaning given to the rule in England. Gray v. Fox, 1 N. J. Eq. (Saxt.) 259, 266, 22 Am. Dec. 508.

DUE SERVICE.

"Due service," as applied to the service of process, means a service in the manner provided by the statutes. Steam Stone-Cutter Co. v. Sears (U. S.) 9 Fed. 8.

An admission of the "due service" of a notice implies not only that it was properly served, but that it was served in time to save the parties' legal right. Harmon v. Van Ness, 67 N. Y. Supp. 561, 563, 56 App. Div. 160.

In Woolsey v. Abbett, 48 Atl. 949, 65 N. J. Law, 253, it was held, with reference to an admission of notice required by law to be of 10 days, that "due service" means service made in the proper time and proper manner. Vail v. American Fire Ins. Co., 50 Atl. 671, 672, 67 N. J. Law, 66; Same v. Pennsylvania Fire Ins. Co., Id.

DUE TIME.

"Due time," as used in Code Civ. Proc. § 23, providing that if any action be commenced within due time, and a judgment thereon for the plaintiff be reversed, or if he fail in such action otherwise than on the merits, the plaintiff may commence a new action within one year after the reversal or failure, means before the action has been barred by any statute of limitations. It does not mean a time within which the action may be prosecuted—a time not too soon nor too late—and mean only such time. Seaton v. Hixon, 12 Pac. 22, 24, 35 Kan. 663.

DUEBILL.

A duebill is, in legal effect, a promissory note, and as such assignable, and, where for a money demand, negotiable. Marrigan v. Page, 23 Tenn. (4 Humph.) 247.

In Ex parte Burton (Md.) 3 Gill, 1, 13, a duebill was regarded as equivalent to a written acknowledgment of the indebtedness to a certain extent. In Wilderman v. Rogers, 66 Md. 127, 6 Atl. 588, a duebill was held to be within the statute authorizing a married woman to be sued on any note, bill of exchange, single bill, bond, contract, or agreement which she may have executed jointly with her husband. The court said that while it may not be a formal, negotiable note, containing terms of express promise to pay, any note, the legal import of which is the promise or obligation to pay, is sufficient to gratify the terms of the statute, thus implying that the legal import of a duebill is a promise or obligation to pay. Feeser v. Feeser, 50 Atl. 406, 407, 93 Md. 716.

Both promissory notes and duebills are held to import a promise to pay, but in one class the promise is verbally expressed, while in the other class the promise is usually implied, and no day for performance specifically mentioned. The common as well as the statutory signification of the word "due" in a duebill, when not qualified by a time clause, is that the money or property in the duebill mentioned is due at the time of executing the instrument. Lee v. Balcom, 11 Pac. 74, 76, 9 Colo. 216.

A writing in the nature of a duebill is not a promissory note such as is classed with specialties in the statute of limitations. Currier v. Lockwood, 40 Conn. 349, 350, 16 Am. Rep. 40.

DUEL.

A "duel" is defined to be a combat between two persons, fought with deadly weapons, by agreement. The use of weapons of some kind seems to be a necessary ingredient of the offense, since it is held that challenging to fight a fair fight with fists and hands, and not to use any deadly weapon, is not a "challenge to fight a duel," within Code, § 1012, providing that any person challenging to fight a duel shall be guilty of a misdemeanor. State v. Fritz, 45 S. E. 957, 133 N. C. 725.

Any agreement to fight with loaded pistols, and actually fighting in pursuance thereof, is a "duel," and a challenge, preparation of pistols, attending of friends in the early morning, and the conduct of the respective parties, is sufficient to show such fact. State v. Herriott (S. C.) 1 McMul. 126, 130.

A "duel" is defined by the statute as killing by fight in single combat. Rassett v. State (Fla.) 33 South. 262, 265.

The word "duel," as used in a life insurance policy providing that it should be void if insured was killed in a duel, was used in its ordinary signification, and with the meaning that is ordinarily attached to the term—that is, a combat with deadly weapons between two persons by some prearrangement and understanding, and perhaps with some formality—and so the word is doubtless understood when found in our laws placing disabilities on those who may engage in a duel. Davis v. Modern Woodmen of America, 73 S. W. 923, 924, 98 Mo. App. 713.

DUES.

See "Public Dues."

According to Bouvier's Law Dictionary, the word "dues" may signify what ought to be paid—what may be demanded. As used in Const. Kan. art. 12, § 2, providing that dues from corporations shall be secured by individual liability of the stockholders, it is a comprehensive term, which includes all contractual liabilities of the corporation; but under the rule of equitable construction applicable to constitutional provisions, such term cannot be construed, as against the stockholder, to include a contract which was ultra vires, although under the local rule the corporation itself may be estopped, by receiving the benefit of the contract, from pleading in defense to an action thereon. Judge Story, in the case of Carver v. Braintree Mfg. Co., 5 Fed. Cas. 235, observed that the word "dues" is broader than the word "debts." Ward v. Joslin (U. S.) 105 Fed. 224, 227, 44 C. C. A. 456.

Assessment distinguished.

"Dues," as used in reference to payments by a member to a beneficial association, means money owing to the subordinate concave of the order or association, and not that owing to the supreme concave of the order, the money owing the latter being designated by the term "assessment." Warwick v. Supreme Concave Knights of Damon, 32 S. E. 951, 955, 107 Ga. 115.

Damages for torts.

"The term 'due' is of extended import. Among other definitions, Latham gives the singular: Owed; capable of being justly demanded; that which may be justly claimed. Worcester: That which any one has a right to demand. Webster: That ought to be paid or done to or for another, justly claimed as a right or property; fulfilling obligation; that which belongs or may be claimed as a right; whatever custom, law, or morality requires to be done; right; just title or claim. Bouvier defines it as what ought to be paid; what may be demanded. It seems natural to say that, when one is injured by the negligence of another, reparation is due." As used in Const. art. 13, § 2, providing that "dues" from corporations shall be secured by such individual liability of the stockholders, and other means as may be prescribed by law, etc., it includes not only debts arising on contract, but demands from liquidated damages arising from tort. Rider v. Fritchey, 30 N. E. 692, 694, 49 Ohio St. 285, 15 L. R. A. 513, 516.

"Dues" is a word of general significance, and includes all contractual obligations. Whether or not the term is broad enough to include liabilities for torts seems to be a rather unsettled question. Whitman v. National Bank of Oxford, 20 Sup. Ct. 477, 478, 176 U. S. 559, 44 L. Ed. 587.

As used in Const. art. 12, § 4, providing that "dues from corporations shall be secured by such individual liability of the stockholders * * * as may be prescribed by law," "dues" includes a demand against the stockholders for damages for personal injuries. Flenniken v. Marshall, 20 S. E. 788, 790, 43 S. C. 80, 28 L. R. A. 402.

Future claims.

"Dues," as used in an assignment of sums of money now due and becoming due, to secure a party for labor and materials performed and furnished on account of a house, and promising to pay such party all dues on account thereof, embraces sums to become due, there being at the time of the execution of the instrument only one sum then due. Woods v. Murphy, 58 N. E. 1027, 1028, 177 Mass. 369.

The words "due or dues" and "accrue," in their relation to the idea of the payment of dues for insurance, has more than one signification, and expresses two different ideas. At times it signifies a simple indebtedness, without reference to the time of payment, as "debitum in presenti, solvendum in futuro." At other times the word "due" or "dues" is used to show that the day of payment of a debt is passed. Wiggin v. Knights of Pythias (U. S.) 31 Fed. 122, 125.

Interest.

"Debts, dues, and demands," as the terms are used in a discharge of all debts, dues, and demands, include a special promise to pay the interest upon an assigned note. Howell v. Seaman (Conn.) 1 Root, 383.

Ultra vires obligations.

Const. Kan. art. 12, § 2, provides as follows: "Dues from corporations shall be secured by individual liability of the stockholders to an additional amount equal to the stock owned by each stockholder, and such other means as shall be provided by law." In pursuance of this provision, Laws Kan. 1885, c. 23, § 44, provided that if any corporations created under this or any general statute, except certain corporations, be dissolved, leaving debts unpaid, suits may be brought against any persons who were stockholders at the time of such dissolution. Section 45 provided that, if any stockholder pay more than his due proportion of any debt of the corporation, he may compel contribution from the other stockholders by action. Section 46 provided that no stockholder shall be liable to pay debts of a corporation beyond the amount due on his stock, and an additional amount equal to the stock owned by him. Thus, the word "due" in the Constitution appears to have been regarded as equivalent to "debts," or that which is owed. Mr. Justice Story, in United States v. State Bank of North Carolina (U. S.) 6 Pet. 29, 36, 8 L. Ed. 308, 310, said, in construing a statute there referred to: "The whole difficulty arises from the different senses in which the word 'due' is used. It is sometimes used to express a mere state of indebtedment, and then is equivalent to 'owe' or 'own,' and it is sometimes used to express the fact that the debt has become payable." In Whitman v. National Bank of Oxford, 176 U. S. 559, 20 Sup. Ct. 477, 44 L. Ed. 587, it was said that the word "due" is one of general signification, and includes all contracted obligations. And under such Constitution the obligations which a corporation had no right to incur, because ultra vires, are not dues from the corporation, although the corporation may be estopped from denying the validity of such obligations. Ward v. Joslin, 22 Sup. Ct. 807, 810, 186 U. S. 142, 46 L. Ed. 1093.

DULAIN.

"Dulain" is the name of an explosive compound. Lafin & Rand Powder Co. v. Burkhardt, 97 U. S. 110, 111, 24 L. Ed. 973.

DULY.

"Duly" means: In a due, fit, or becoming manner; properly or regularly. Bank of British Columbia of Victoria v. City of Port Townsend, 47 Pac. 896, 897, 16 Wash. 450; Robertson v. Perkins, 9 Sup. Ct. 279, 280, 129 U. S. 233, 32 L. Ed. 686; Gibson v. People (N. Y.) 5 Hun, 542, 543; People v. Walker (N. Y.) 23 Barb. 304; Burns v. People (N. Y.) 59 Barb. 531, 543; Fryatt v. Lindo (N. Y.) 3 Edw. Ch. 239, 240. In due time or proper manner; in accordance with what is right, required, or suitable; fittingly, becomingly, regularly. Citizens' State Bank v. Morse, 57 Pac. 115, 116, 60 Kan. 526; Beale v. Commonwealth, 25 Pa. (1 Casey) 11, 21.

"Duly," in legal parlance, means according to law. Brownell v. Town of Greenwich, 114 N. Y. 518, 527, 22 N. E. 24, 26, 4 L. R. A. 685; Youngs v. Perry, 59 N. Y. Supp. 19, 21, 42 App. Div. 247. It does not relate to form only, but includes substance also. Brownell v. Town of Greenwich, 22 N. E. 24-26, 114 N. Y. 518, 4 L. R. A. 685; People v. Town Clerk of Bainbridge, 56 N. Y. Supp. 64, 66, 26 Misc. Rep. 220; Robertson v. Perkins, 9 Sup. Ct. 279, 280, 129 U. S. 233, 32 L. Ed. 686.

"Duly," as used in a pleading without a statement of the special facts on which it is predicated, has, in general, no effect, for the term is not only indefinite, but affirms matters of law instead of fact. Hanson v. Langan, 9 N. Y. Supp. 625.

The words "duly," "wrongfully," and "unlawfully," when used in connection with issuable facts, while they do not vitiate a pleading, are surplusage, and had better be omitted. Miles v. McDermott, 31 Cal. 270, 271.

The word "duly," as used in an averment that plaintiff is duly incorporated, imports but a conclusion. It can relate alone to the formalities observed or nonobserved, as the case may be, in the creation of the corporation. The essential fact that plaintiff is incorporated is sufficiently alleged without the use of the word "duly." Bury v. J. E. Mitchell Co. (Tex.) 74 S. W. 341.

The words "duly," "wrongfully," and "unlawfully," when used in a pleading in an action for tort, do not supply the place of words or allegations showing that the acts complained of were illegal. There may be some relations where "wrongfully," "unlawfully," and similar adverbs have some significance, but the ordinary rule is that, for the purpose of pleading, they are utterly valueless. Going v. Dinwiddie, 25 Pac. 129, 86 Cal. 633.

A petition to enforce an assessment for a street improvement, averring that the city council "duly passed and published" an ordinance, and that written notice thereof was caused by the city to be "duly served," etc., contains, in the absence of a motion to make more definite, and as against a general demurrer, a sufficient averment of the valid passage and publication of the resolution, etc., and the proper service of a valid notice. Jessing v. City of Columbus, 1 Ohio Cir. Ct. R. 90, 1 O. C. D. 54, 56.

An allegation, in a complaint for work done for printing a delinquent tax list, that the defendants "duly contracted" with plaintiff to publish and print the delinquent tax list for defendant according to law, sufficiently implied that the newspaper in which the publication was made was of the size, quality, etc., required by the statute, and that the plaintiff was the lowest bidder, as required by the statute. Folsom v. Chisago County, 9 N. W. 881, 28 Minn. 324.

Land was conveyed in trust for the use of a society "not yet fully organized, with covenant by the grantees to convey the same to the trustees as soon as the same shall be duly elected." Held, that the word "duly" referred to the creation of a body corporate of the trustees chosen. Centenary M. E. Church v. Parker, 12 Atl. 142, 145, 43 N. J. Eq. (16 Stew.) 317.

DULY ADJUDGED.

The expression "duly adjudged" means "adjudged according to law"—that is, according to the statute governing the subject—and implies the existence of every fact essential to perfect regularity of procedure, and to confer jurisdiction both of the subject-matter and of the parties affected by the judgment. Brownell v. Greenwich, 24 N. Y. St. Rep. 6.

DULY ALLOWED.

Gen. St. 1878, c. 77, § 2, authorizes the recovery of damages for the negligent killing of an intestate, and, by an amendment of 1891, provides that any demand for the support of the deceased and funeral expenses "duly allowed by the probate court" shall be first deducted from the recovery. Held, that the words "duly allowed by the probate court," found in the amendment, must be construed as having reference merely to the matter of the administration of the fund after a recovery. It cannot mean that the demands must be first allowed by the probate court before there can be any recovery for them in the action. The person liable in the action is not a party to the probate proceedings, and a determination of that court is not binding on him, or even evidence against him as to the existence or amount of such demands. Sykora v. J. I. Case Threshing Mach. Co., 60 N. W. 1008, 1009, 59 Minn. 130.

DULY APPOINTED.

An allegation in a complaint alleging that the plaintiff was "duly appointed" to a certain office would imply that everything had been done which was necessary to a legal appointment. Llethbridge v. City of New York, 15 N. Y. Supp. 562.

In an indictment charging disobedience of the superintendent of a drawbridge, an averment that the superintendent was "duly and legally appointed" means that the legal requirements of the appointment were all complied with, and it was not necessary to state other facts, such as by whom he was appointed. Commonwealth v. Chase, 127 Mass. 7, 13.

An allegation that plaintiff was "duly appointed" receiver was sufficient, without pleading any judgment or proceeding on which such appointment could be made, to authorize proof on the trial of all the facts conferring the jurisdiction necessary to validate the appointment. Rockwell v. Merwin, 45 N. Y. 166, 167.

DULY ASSIGNED.

The term "duly assigned" has no fixed or precise meaning; a bond may be "duly assigned" for one purpose and not for another. It may be assigned conditionally, and for the purpose of being canceled on a certain event, or to await some future appointment or direction of the assignor, or in trust for a third person or for the use of the assignor himself. Allen v. Pancoast, 20 N. J. Law (Spencer) 68, 74.

The words "duly assigned," in 1 Supp. Gen. St. Mass. p. 270, c. 197, providing that a policy of life insurance "duly assigned" to a married woman shall inure to her benefit, whether such transfer be made by her husband or some other person, as used in connection with a transfer by a husband to his wife, necessarily imports that such a transfer can be duly—that is, legally—made. Appeal of Colburn, 51 Atl. 139, 140, 74 Conn. 463.

As used in Pub. St. 1873, c. 83, § 1, cl. 11, providing that any person duly mustered in the service of the United States as a part of the quota of any city or town during the Civil War, or duly assigned as a part of the quota thereof, shall be deemed to have acquired a settlement in such place, "duly assigned" means "assigned in such form that the town had the benefit of the assignment," and the statute does not "re-open in every case the question of fact whether an assignment of many years before was proper." City of Boston v. Inhabitants of Mt. Washington, 29 N. E. 60, 139 Mass. 15.

A complaint alleging that plaintiff "duly assigned" a promissory note to defendant should be construed as meaning that plaintiff did whatever was necessary to make over her right in the note and to transfer the property of the same to defendant; in other words, that she delivered the note to defendant, either actually or constructively. To "assign" is to make over a right to another, and an assignment is a transfer of property. Hoag v. Mendenhall, 19 Minn. 335, 336 (Gil. 289, 290).

DULY AWARDED.

The word "duly" means according to law, and it is to be so construed in a complaint alleging that a certain sum was "duly awarded" as costs and disbursements. Baxter v. Lancaster, 68 N. Y. Supp. 1092, 1093, 58 App. Div. 380.

DULY CERTIFIED.

The phrase "duly certified," as used in a statute giving certain effect to a copy of a mortgage duly certified, does not import a sealing. People v. Ransom (N. Y.) 2 Hill, 51, 54.

DULY COMMENCED.

"Duly commenced," as used in Rev. St. c. 177, § 8, providing that, if any action duly commenced within the time limited by law shall be abated or otherwise avoided or defeated for any matter, the plaintiff may commence a new action for the same cause at any time within one year after the abatement or other determination of the original suit, means the suing out, from a court competent to adjudicate upon the cause of action, a proper writ—that is, a writ adapted to the cause of action—with the intent to implead the defendant in such action. Service of the writ is not essential, but the plaintiff is bound to ordinary diligence to bring the defendant into court, and this implies the seasonable delivery of the process for service to a proper officer of the precinct or jurisdiction in which the plaintiff has reasonable grounds to suppose the defendant resides or may be found or has property. Eaton v. Chapin, 7 R. I. 408, 410.

DULY COMMISSIONED AND SWORN.

Act Nov. 1766, c. 14, declaring that the clerk of the court should give a certificate that the two justices of the peace of the county before whom the acknowledgment of a deed was taken were "duly commissioned and sworn." Held, that a certificate reciting that the justices who took the acknowledgment were "legally authorized and assigned" was a substantial compliance with the act, the words used being substantially of the same meaning as the words "duly commissioned and sworn" used in the act. Hall v. Gitting's Lessee (Md.) 2 Har. & J. 380, 390.

DULY COMPLETED.

Where, in an action by a town against a property owner to recover for constructing a sidewalk, the complaint shows a substantial compliance with the provisions of the statute under which the work was done, an allegation that the work was "duly completed" is a sufficient averment that the work was completed in accordance with the specifications of the ordinance. Town of Auburn v. Eldridge, 77 Ind. 126, 128.

DULY CONVENED.

An allegation in a complaint that, at a meeting "duly convened" of the justices of the superior court, the defendant was removed from office, meant regularly convened, and would import proper notice. People v. Walker (N. Y.) 2 Abb. Prac. 421, 422.

DULY DIRECTED.

When the state speaks of a document to be transmitted by post "duly directed" to the person to whom it is to be sent, it can only contemplate a direction in the ordinary way, written on the outside. Birch v. Edwards, 5 Man. G. & S. 45, 50.

DULY ENACTED.

The phrase "duly enacted for that purpose," used in a statute providing that a street railway corporation may, with the consent of the corporate authorities of any city, given in and by an ordinance or ordinances duly enacted for the purpose, maintain and operate a street railway, have much significance, for they indicate the legislative intent that the municipal authorities shall know what they are doing when they make a street railway grant, and were used for the very purpose of preventing such a grant by an ordinance which has not the grant for its expressed object. The words have an effect like that of the frequent requirement in state constitutions that the purpose of the bill shall be expressed in its title, and should be construed, as that requirement usually is, to be mandatory. City of Detroit v. Detroit City R. Co. (U. S.) 60 Fed. 161, 168.

DULY ENTERED INTO.

An allegation that a contract was "duly entered into" by a city is sufficient to authorize proof that the contract was entered into in accordance with an ordinance of the city. Bank of British Columbia of Victoria v. City of Port Townsend, 47 Pac. 896, 897, 16 Wash. 450.

DULY ESTABLISHED.

Where a complaint, in a suit to restrain the obstruction of a highway, alleges that the highway was "duly and legally established," a highway by dedication and public acceptance may be shown, inasmuch as the words "duly and legally established" are not limited in their signification to highways established under statutes and ordinances. City of Hartford v. New York & N. E. R. Co., 22 Atl. 37, 59 Conn. 250.

DULY EXECUTED.

A will is "duly executed" when it is executed in accordance with the laws of the state. Van Arsdale v. Van Arsdale, 26 N. J. Law (2 Dutch.) 404, 423.

Where land situated in South Carolina was devised by a testatrix who resided in that state, with power of appointment in the devisee "by her last will and testament duly executed," a will duly executed in another state, but not in conformity with the law of South Carolina, was not a valid execution of the power. Blount v. Walker, 28 S. C. 545, 554, 6 S. E. 558.

DULY FILED.

A recital in the record that plaintiffs had "duly filed" their motion indicates that the motion was regularly and properly filed. Citizens' State Bank v. Morse, 57 Pac. 115, 116, 60 Kan. 526.

"Duly," when used with relation to the filing of a pleading, is synonymous with and means "properly and regularly," and indicates that the pleading was regularly and properly filed. Morrison v. Wells, 29 Pac. 601, 602, 48 Kan. 494.

The words "duly filed" mean something more than the mere act of filing, and, where a town law requires propositions to be voted on at elections to be duly filed at least 20 days preceding such town meeting, the words "duly filed" require the petition to be filed 20 days prior to such town meeting. People v. Town Clerk of Bainbridge, 56 N. Y. Supp. 64, 66, 26 Misc. Rep. 220.

DULY FOUND.

Where a lease for years contained a proviso for re-entry in case the lessee should at any time during the term commit any act of bankruptcy, whereupon a commission or fiat in bankruptcy should issue against him, and under which he should be "duly found and declared a bankrupt," it meant that he should be duly found and declared a bankrupt, not only in mere form, but upon a proper foundation, namely, on a full and good petitioning creditor's debt and trading. This construction is necessary in order to give the word "duly" the weight to which it must be entitled. Lloyd v. Ingleby, 15 Mees. & W. 465, 469.

DULY GIVEN OR MADE.

Rev. St. § 2673, providing that in pleading a judgment of a court of special jurisdiction it shall not be necessary to state the facts conferring jurisdiction, but such judgment may be stated to have been "duly given or made," is substantially complied with by alleging that plaintiff "recovered a judgment" against defendant, and that "such judgment was duly docketed." Pierstoff v. Jorge, 56 N. W. 735, 737, 88 Wis. 128, 39 Am. St. Rep. 881.

A statement that a judgment was "recovered, and duly entered and docketed," is not equivalent to the statement that it was "duly given and made," since this may all be true though the judgment was not recovered. Batchelor v. Bacon, 55 N. Y. Supp. 1045, 1047, 37 App. Div. 414.

An allegation that plaintiffs "recovered" judgment cannot be held equivalent to the statutory allegation that the judgment was "duly given or made." Midland Ry. Co. v. Eller, 33 N. E. 265, 266, 7 Ind. App. 216 (citing Hopper v. Lucas, 86 Ind. 43).

Gen. St. 1878, c. 66, § 108, providing that a judgment or determination may be stated in a pleading to have been "duly given or made," does not refer to the regularity of the judgment or its freedom from error, for that cannot be collaterally called in question, but it is equivalent to an allegation of facts showing jurisdiction. Scanlan v. Murphy, 53 N. W. 799, 800, 51 Minn. 536.

To say that a judgment was "duly given or made" is not equivalent to saying that it was "duly rendered." A judgment duly made or given is a complete judgment properly entered in the judgment book, so that it may be pleaded in bar of another action. Young v. Wright, 52 Cal. 407, 410; Harmon v. Comstock Horse & Cattle Co., 9 Mont. 243, 23 Pac. 470, 471.

DULY ISSUED.

An indictment reciting that defendant made an assault on a marshal, who was then and there in discharge of his duty in executing a warrant "duly issued," imports that the warrant was sealed, and that in all matters of form it answered the law. Blake v. United States (U. S.) 71 Fed. 286, 289, 18 C. C. A. 117.

DULY MADE.

The words "duly made," in an averment that defendant duly made a promissory note, implies a delivery. Smith v. Waite, 37 Pac. 232, 103 Cal. 372.

DULY ORGANIZED.

A statute authorizing cities to subscribe to the capital stock of any railroad company "duly organized" under some law of the state does not authorize a subscription to the stock of a mere contemplated corporation. Rubey v. Shain, 54 Mo. 207, 209.

"Duly organized," as used in a will directing testator's executors to grant and convey certain premises to the trustees of a Presbyterian church and congregation duly organized, means organized according to presbyterian law and usage, which law and usage makes it absolutely essential that such organization must be supervised and approved by presbytery, for they only can decide what constitutes the true organization of a Presbyterian church. Appeal of Fidelity Ins., Trust & Safe-Deposit Co., 99 Pa. 443, 449.

DULY PRESENTED.

"Duly presented" means presented according to the custom of merchants. Per Lord Ellenborough, in Patience v. Townley, 2 Smith, J. P. (Eng.) 223, 224.

DULY PROSECUTED.

The term "duly prosecuted," in a statute providing that a pending suit constitutes notice by lis pendens if the suit is duly prosecuted and not collusive, means a full prosecution of the cause from its commencement to the final determination thereof. "In order that there may be said to have been a full prosecution of the suit, it must appear that there has been no such negligent intermission as may appear to be inexcusable and cannot be satisfactorily explained. The ground upon which to place the invalidity of lis pendens for want of full prosecution is not, as in many cases seems to be supposed, negligence merely as such, but estoppel as warranted by such negligence, and from conduct upon the part of those seeking the enforcement of the lis pendens." Tinsley v. Rice, 31 S. E. 174, 176, 105 Ga. 285.

Where an action against an administrator for a debt of his decedent, brought within five years from his death, is prosecuted to judgment within 10 years from the death of said decedent, the suit is "duly prosecuted" within the meaning of the statute (Act Feb. 24, 1834), and the question of the due prosecution of the action cannot be left to a jury. To hold that the jury is to adjudge at its own discretion whether a suit against the administrator has been "duly prosecuted" would be to substitute a wavering, uncertain standard of duty, depending on the caprice or whim of each jury charged with the trial of such a cause, for what ought to be a definite, absolute rule applicable to all like cases. Phillips v. Allegheny Val. R. Co., 107 Pa. 472, 481.

The construction given to the words "duly prosecuted," under the act of 1797 requiring an action to secure a lien for a debt upon a decedent's land to be commenced within 7 years and duly prosecuted, and extending the lien of such debt to 12 years from his death by bringing suit within the first 7 years after that event, is that, no matter at what time within the 7 years suit was brought, it continued the lien for 5 years after the determination of the 7, although judgment was not obtained within the 7. Maus v. Hummel, 11 Pa. (1 Jones) 228, 230.

DULY QUALIFIED.

A statement that a referee had been "duly qualified" should be understood to mean that he had been duly sworn. Edwardson v. Garnhart, 56 Mo. 81, 86.

DULY RECORDED.

When it is said that a mortgage has been "duly recorded," such phrase means recorded in compliance with the requirement of law. Dunning v. Coleman, 27 La. Ann. 47, 48.

An allegation that a mortgage was "duly recorded" did not necessarily imply that the recording was done within the time prescribed by law. Martens v. Rawdon, 78 Ind. 85, 86.

The act of the registrar in copying in his books a forged instrument, deposited with him as part of a criminal scheme, cannot very well be called "duly record ing" a conveyance of land. Marden v. Dorthy, 54 N. E. 726, 731, 160 N. Y. 39, 46 L. R. A. 694.

DULY RENDERED.

A judgment is "duly rendered" when it is duly pronounced in order to be entered. To say that a judgment was "duly given or made" is not equivalent to saying that it was "duly rendered." A judgment duly given or made is a complete judgment properly entered in the judgment book, so that it may be pleaded in bar of another action. Young v. Wright, 52 Cal. 407, 410.

A complaint alleging that on the 16th day of March, 1877, in the Porter circuit court, the plaintiff's intestate, naming her, recovered a judgment, etc., sufficiently shows that the judgment was "duly rendered," and when and where. Hansford v. Van Auken, 79 Ind. 157, 161.

DULY SERVED.

The phrase "duly served," in a statute requiring process to be duly served, means service of personal notice. Kirk v. United States (U. S.) 124 Fed. 324, 337.

Within the rule that a judgment by default can only be taken when it appears that the defendant has been duly served with summons and has failed to answer the complaint, being "duly served with summons" implies that the defendant has been served with summons in the manner described by law in every particular, requiring him to appear in the court of the county where the judgment is taken. White v. Johnson, 40 Pac. 511, 513, 27 Or. 282, 50 Am. St. Rep. 726.

DULY SHOWN.

A city charter, providing that no clerk should be removed except for cause "duly shown," intended that removal should not be without a hearing given. Thompson v. Troup, 49 Atl. 907, 908, 74 Conn. 121.

DULY SUMMONED.

The averment of an indictment that the grand jury has been "duly summoned" means no less than that it has been properly summoned, and in a lawful manner, and for all lawful purposes, at that step in the administration of the law. Keith v. Territory, 57 Pac. 834, 8 Okl. 307.

"Duly" is not synonymous with the word "legally," and the one is not the equivalent of the other. Where a statute required a person to be "legally" summoned, an allegation that he had been "duly" summoned did not show a compliance. State v. Clancy, 56 Vt. 698, 700.

DULY SWORN.

The words "sworn," "duly sworn," or "sworn according to law," used in a statute, record, or certificate of administration of an oath, refer to the oath required by the Constitution or laws in the cases specified, and include every necessary subscription to such oath. Rev. St. Me. 1883, p. 59, c. 1, § 6, subd. 20.

"Duly sworn" means a swearing according to law. Hence, where a record shows that the jury were duly sworn, it must be held to be a swearing according to the form of the statute. Wilson v. Pugh, 32 Miss. 196, 198.

Rev. St. c. 1, § 8, provides that, whenever the expression "duly sworn" or "sworn according to law" is used or applied to any officer who is required to take and subscribe the oath prescribed in the Constitution, it shall be construed to mean that such officer had taken and subscribed the same, as well as the oath faithfully and impartially to perform the duties of the office to which he had been elected and appointed; and, when applied to any person other than such officer, it shall be construed to mean that such person had taken an oath faithfully and impartially to perform the duties assigned to him in the case specified. In the case of an assessor, where the records of the town recite that he was duly sworn, it is not necessary that the oath administered should have been set out in full, but such record is sufficient to show that he had taken the oath which qualified him to act. Bennett v. Treat, 41 Me. 226, 227.

Rev. St. c. 5, § 9, requiring town officers to be "duly sworn," was satisfied by an oath in substance that the officers would "faithfully and impartially perform the duties assigned to them." Patterson v. Creighton, 42 Me. 367, 376.

In an indictment for violation of election laws, an averment that the defendant was "duly sworn" and took his oath means that he was sworn according to the law applicable to such case, and was sufficient without the averment of the form of the oath. Burns v. People (N. Y.) 59 Barb. 531, 543.

On a commissioner's return that witnesses had been "duly sworn," it will be considered that they had been sworn in such manner and form as to render the oath binding in conscience as well as obligatory in law. Fryatt v. Lindo (N. Y.) 3 Edw. Ch. 239, 240.

A return that witnesses before a commissioner were "duly sworn" means that they knew the contents of their answers as written down, and were sworn to speak the truth according to the customary form of oath. Sydnor v. Palmer, 29 Wis. 226, 239.

A provision in court rules that a commissioner's return of proceedings before him should show that the witnesses were "duly sworn" meant that before examination they should be sworn to testify to the whole truth and nothing but the truth relating to the cause, and therefore a return that they had taken such oath was equivalent to a return that they had been duly sworn. Bowman v. Van Kuren, 29 Wis. 209, 214, 9 Am. Rep. 554.

In a statement in a record, after naming the jurors that they were duly impaneled, tried, and sworn, the declaration that they were "duly sworn" implies that the oath was administered with the requisite formality and solemnity; that the jurors in open court were required to hold up their hands and promise to perform the duties specified, there being an appropriate reference to the duty, such as "in the presence of the ever living God," or "so help me God." Minich v. People, 9 Pac. 4, 11, 8 Colo. 440.

DULY VERIFIED.

A requirement in an insurance policy, that the insured should procure and attach to the preliminary proofs of loss a "duly verified" certificate of a builder as to the actual cash value of the building immediately before the fire, does not require an attestation by affidavit. While the term "verify," applied to legal papers generally, means or implies an oath, it does not always or necessarily do so. Summerfield v. Phoenix Assur. Co. (U. S.) 65 Fed. 292, 296.

DUMB ANIMAL.

In statutes relating to or affecting animals, the words "animal" or "dumb animal" shall be held to include every living creature. Ann. St. Ind. T. 1899, § 1298; Code N. C. 1883, § 2490; People v. Brunell (N. Y.) 48 How. Prac. 435, 447.

As used in Pascal, Dig. arts. 2344, 2345, making it an offense for any person to willfully or wantonly kill any dumb animal, the property of another, the term "dumb animal" will be held to include a dog, which has an owner, who keeps the same for use or pleasure. McDaniel v. State, 5 Tex. App. 475, 479.

DUMP CART.

The phrase "dump cart," in a contract calling for a dump cart, means a two-wheeled cart, in the absence of any qualifying or explanatory words. Iverson v. Cirkel, 56 Minn. 299, 303, 57 N. W. 800, 801.

DUN.

The word "dun," as referring to color, partakes of brown and black. Cameron v. State, 44 Tex. 652, 656 (citing Webst. Dict.).

DUNCE.

To say of a barrister generally that he is a dunce is actionable, the word "dunce" being commonly taken to mean a person of dull capacity who is not fit to be a lawyer. Fitzgerald v. Redfield (N. Y.) 51 Barb. 484, 491 (citing Peard v. Johnes, Cro. Car. 382).

DUNNAGE.

Ballast distinguished, see "Ballast."

"Dunnage" is material placed under the cargo to keep it from being wetted by water coming into the hold, or between the different parcels to keep them from bruising and injuring each other. Webster's definition of "dunnage" is "fagots, boughs, or loose materials of any kind laid on the bottom of a ship to raise heavy goods above the bottom to prevent injury by water in the hold; also loose articles of merchandise wedged between parts of the cargo to prevent rubbing, and to hold them steady." Lord Tenterden speaks of "dunnage" as pieces of wood placed against the sides and bottom of the hold to preserve the cargo from the effects of leakage. Great Western Ins. Co. v. Thwing (U. S.) 13 Wall. 672, 674, 20 L. Ed. 607; Thwing v. Great Western Ins. Co., 103 Mass. 401, 405, 4 Am. Rep. 567; Richards v. Hansen (U. S.) 1 Fed. 54, 56.

DUPLICATE.

A note secured by mortgage, given as the purchase price of mortgaged land, bore on its face the word "duplicate," and in an action thereon it was held that the word could not be regarded as performing a similar office to that in which it is generally employed in foreign bills of exchange, as indicating the execution of notes in part, and that the note in question was one of the parts; but it was held that the word created a latent ambiguity, which could be explained by evidence. McCann v. Preston, 28 Atl. 1102, 1103, 79 Md. 223.

"Duplicate," as used in Rev. St. § 1365, which requires that in order to establish a ditch or drain the majority of the resident owners must make an application in writing in duplicate to the supervisors of both such towns, etc., means a document which is essentially the same as the other instrument.

It is defined to be a document which is the same in all other respects as some other instrument, from which it is indistinguishable in its essence and in its operation; an original instrument repeated; a document that resembles another in all essentials. State v. Graffam, 43 N. W. 727, 728, 74 Wis. 643.

As copy.

"Duplicate," as used in Rev. Laws, § 91, providing that in counties under township organization the county clerk shall make out a duplicate of the tax lists for each township, etc., means simply a copy of the original. Radford v. Dixon County, 45 N. W. 275, 276, 29 Neb. 113.

Copy distinguished.

An instrument is said to be executed "in duplicate" when there are two originals of the same tenor, so that a copy will not be a duplicate. Grant v. Griffith, 56 N. Y. Supp. 791, 793, 39 App. Div. 107.

Burrill defines a "duplicate" as an original instrument repeated, a document which is the same as another in all essential particulars, and differing from a mere copy in having all the validity of an original. It is immaterial when a duplicate is executed. If it is in fact a duplicate, it adds no more to the obligation and rights of the parties to the agreement when it is executed at a subsequent date than when its execution is contemporaneous with that of the other duplicate. A duplicate is not a new agreement, but merely written evidence of the lost instrument, executed to take its place. Bank of Gilby v. Farnsworth, 7 N. D. 6, 11, 72 N. W. 901, 38 L. R. A. 843. See, also, Missouri Pac. Ry. Co. v. Heldenheimer, 17 S. W. 608, 610, 82 Tex. 195, 27 Am. St. Rep. 861. A duplicate is an original instrument repeated; a document which is the same as another in all essential particulars, and differing from a mere copy in having all the validity of an original. Dakota Loan & Trust Co. v. Codrington County, 68 N. W. 314, 316, 9 S. D. 159.

A duplicate is an original instrument, just as much so as the original article of which it is a duplicate. It must be executed by the same parties, and in the same manner and with the same formalities, and must contain the same matter as the original instrument, else it is not a duplicate. A certified copy of a record of articles of association is not a duplicate of such articles. When a law requires that a duplicate of a certificate of incorporation shall be filed in the office of the Secretary of State, it is no compliance with the requirement of such law to file in said office a certified copy of the record of such certificate. Nelson v. Blakey, 54 Ind. 29, 36.

The duplicate is not technically or really a copy of the original. It is "the double of anything, an original repeated, a document the same as another, a transcript equivalent to the first or original writer, a counterpart." And. Law Dict. p. 386. Each duplicate is complete evidence of the intention of the parties. On an indictment for forgery of a school-teacher's pay certificate, the duplicate of the forged certificate is admissible without accounting for the original, since such certificates are required by statute to be made out in duplicate, one being called "the original," the other "the duplicate." State v. Allen, 56 S. C. 495, 505, 35 S. E. 204, 207.

A duplicate is the double of anything. It is either one of the two originals, both of which are executed by the same party or parties, and may be offered in evidence. McCuaig v. City Sav. Bank, 111 Mich. 356, 358, 69 N. W. 500.

6 & 7 Vict. c. 18, § 100, provides that, whenever an objector to any list of voters desires to send the notice of his objection by mail, he shall deliver the same in "duplicate" to the postmaster, who shall examine the duplicates and return one to the sender, stamped with the stamp of such office. Under this statute it is held that a copy of such a purported duplicate, retained by the sender, to which his name was signed, but not by himself, though with his approval, was not a duplicate of the notice posted, which was signed by the sender himself, "duplicate" being defined by the court as a document which is essentially the same as some other instrument, it being a very different thing from an examined copy, although an examined copy may, in effect, be a duplicate under certain circumstances. Toms v. Cuming, 7 Man. & G. 88, 94. Nor is a copy similar in all respects to the notice left with the postmaster, except that it has no external address, a "duplicate" within the meaning of the act. Birch v. Edwards, 5 Man. G. & S. 45, 50.

As substitute.

Where a draft purchased from the drawer was lost by the holder, who applied for another, and the drawer issued a second one, across the face of which he wrote the word "duplicate," the true construction of the word "duplicate," in view of the circumstances, was that the draft was made as a substitute for, and to take the place of, the original, and no new liability was created thereby. Benton v. Martin, 40 N. Y. 345, 347.

DUPLICATE OF TAXES.

"Duplicate of taxes," as used in the tax laws, has a well-known and recognized meaning—that by which the tax lists for collection, etc., is usually known—and therefore its use in an indictment was sufficient under Purd. Dig. 379, pl. 18, declaring that, in an indictment for forging any instrument, it shall be sufficient to describe it by any name by which the same may be usually known. Commonwealth v. Beamish, 81 Pa. (31 P. F. Smith) 389, 392.

DUPLICATE TAXATION.

"By 'duplicate taxation,' which is not permissible under any constitution requiring equality and uniformity in taxation, is understood the requirement that one person, or any one subject to taxation, shall directly contribute twice to the same burden, while other subjects of taxation belonging to the same class are required to contribute but once." City and County of San Francisco v. Fry, 63 Cal. 470, 471; Commonwealth v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co., 24 Atl. 609, 611, 150 Pa. 234. The term is used in another sense, as where the same property is taxed to two different individuals. Such taxation is usually held to be valid. State v. Rand, 40 N. W. 835, 838, 39 Minn. 502.

DUPLICITY.

Duplicity in an indictment is the joinder of two or more distinct offenses in one count. Tucker v. State, 6 Tex. App. 251, 253; State v. Dorsett, 21 Tex. 656; Weathersby v. State, 1 Tex. App. 643, 645; Nicholas v. State, 23 Tex. App. 317, 325, 5 S. W. 239, 240. The rule never applies to allegations of different phases of the same misdemeanor. Schulze v. State (Tex.) 56 S. W. 918. And where one felony is of considerable magnitude, and includes within itself other offenses of less magnitude, all may be charged in one count. And in all cases an offense may be set forth in a single count of an information, although such offense may include a smaller offense and attempt to commit the principal offense. State v. Hodges, 26 Pac. 676, 678, 45 Kan. 339; State v. Gorham, 55 N. H. 152, 163.

To constitute "duplicity," there must be joined in the same count separate and distinct crimes committed at different times. Where a person by one continuous act steals a horse, buggy, and harness, a count under the indictment for the larceny of the horse, buggy, and harness is not open to a charge of duplicity. Waters v. People, 104 Ill. 544, 547. An account charging the accused with stealing at the same time several sums of money belonging to different owners is not bad for duplicity, since the act charged connotes but one offense. State v. Warren, 77 Md. 121, 26 Atl. 500, 39 Am. St. Rep. 401.

Duplicity consists in alleging two independent claims in the same count of an information or indictment, and if these claims be distinct to the extent, at least, the different defenses may be interposed as to each, or different evidence may be necessary as to them, the accused has a right to object and insist on their severance. An information which charges the killing of two or more persons by one act is not bad for duplicity. Cornell v. State, 80 N. W. 745, 746, 104 Wis. 527.

The word "duplicity," in the sense of the law of pleading, does not include a union of several facts, constituting together but one cause of action (State v. Warren, 77 Md. 121, 26 Atl. 500, 39 Am. St. Rep. 401; Jackson v. Rundlet, 13 Fed. Cas. 247); and hence where a plaintiff bases her claim on the ground that she has been unjustly deprived of her dwelling house by the negligent conduct of defendants, and details in several counts the circumstances constituting the injury, there is no duplicity. Even in an indictment the joinder of two or more distinct offenses in one count is not duplicity, where the acts imputed are component parts of the same offense. Mere diversity of facts set up in a count will not render it double, when all the facts taken together tend to the statement of one point or ground of recovery. Mullin v. Blumenthal, 42 Atl. 175, 177, 1 Pennewill (Del.) 476.

Duplicity, in a plea or replication, consists in its containing two distinct matters, either of which would be a bar to the action or an answer to the plea. Kellogg v. Miller, 6 Ark. (1 Eng.) 468, 472.

"Duplicity" is defined to be a joinder of different grounds of action to enforce a single right. Devino v. Central Vt. R. Co., 63 Vt. 98, 102, 20 Atl. 953.

Duplicity in pleading consists in traversing distinct matters not necessary to one point. Tucker v. Ladd (N. Y.) 7 Cow. 450, 452.

DURATION.

"Duration," as defined by Webster, means the power of enduring; continuance in time; the portion of time during which anything exists; and, in the statute limiting the session of legislative assemblies of the several territories of the United States to 60 days' duration, it means to an existence of 60 days, and that, whatever the time fixed by the legislative assembly for the session to begin, it could not continue to exist as a legally organized body longer than 60 days from such beginning—60 days of lawful session; 60 days of legal organized existence. Cheyney v. Smith (Ariz.) 23 Pac. 680, 685.

In Const. art. 11, § 7, providing that when the duration of any office is not provided for by the Constitution it may be declared by law, and, if not so declared, it shall be held during the pleasure of the authority making the appointment, "duration" is employed in its ordinary sense, signifying expanse, limit of time. When, therefore, the time of holding is not fixed, the tenure of the office is at the pleasure of the appointing power. People v. Hill, 7 Cal. 97, 102.

Const. art. 11, § 7, provides that the "duration of any office" not fixed by this Constitution shall never exceed four years. This does not mean that the office shall cease to exist after the constitutional limit declared has expired, but the word "duration" evidently means the time which may be fixed by the constituting authority as the limit beyond which the incumbent's right by election or appointment to the office shall not extend. The constitutional inhibition operates as a total restraint to the creation of a term of office by election or appointment of longer duration than four years. So when, by an act of the Legislature, an office is created, and provision is made for filling it with a person who shall be invested with the right and authority to perform the function belonging to it for the period, for instance, of two years, the term thus prescribed is limited by a law of as binding obligation as the Constitution itself, provided it is in no sense repugnant to the organic law, and the incumbent's term is complete and at an end upon the expiration of the term prescribed for its duration; but notwithstanding the incumbent's term in such a case be at an end by lapse of time, it is not to be gainsaid that he may remain in the exercise of the duties of the office as its locum tenens until his successor is elected or appointed. People v. Stratton, 28 Cal. 382, 388.

DURESS.

Duress consists in: (1) Unlawful confinement of the person of the party, or of the husband or wife of such party, or of an ancestor, descendant, or adopted child of such party, husband or wife; (2) unlawful detention of the property of any such person; or (3) confinement of such person, lawful in form, but fraudulently obtained or fraudulently made, unjustly harassing or oppressive. Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 1569; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 3845; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 1198; Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 2114; Bullard v. Smith, 72 Pac. 761, 765, 28 Mont. 387. Thus where the evidence showed that, in order to prosecute the execution of articles of separation between husband and wife, the husband used such personal violence that the wife was in danger of her life, or felt herself to be, she would be held to have executed such articles "under duress." Bueter v. Bueter, 45 N. W. 208, 1 S. D. 94, 8 L. R. A. 562.

Duress consists in any illegal imprisonment, or legal imprisonment used for an illegal purpose, or threats, or bodily or other harm, or other means amounting to or tending to coerce the will of another, and actually inducing him to do an act contrary to his free will. Civ. Code Ga. 1895, § 3538. See McCoy v. State, 3 S. E. 768, 769, 78 Ga. 490.

"Duress," as defined by law writers, means an actual or threatened violence or restraint of a man's person, contrary to law, to compel him to enter into a contract or to discharge one. Noble v. Enos, 19 Ind. 72, 78; King v. Williams, 21 N. W. 502, 65 Iowa, 167; James v. Dalbey, 78 N. W. 51, 53, 107 Iowa, 463; McCormick Harvesting Mach. Co. v. Hamilton, 41 N. W. 727, 729, 73 Wis. 486; Peabody v. Tenney, 30 Atl. 456, 457, 18 R. I. 498; Plant v. Gunn (U. S.) 19 Fed. Cas. 800, 802; Cribbs v. Sowle, 49 N. W. 587, 589, 87 Mich. 340, 24 Am. St. Rep. 166; Stubber v. Weiden, 24 N. W. 215, 216, 17 Neb. 582.

Duress exists where one, by the unlawful act of another, is induced to make a contract or perform some act under circumstances which deprive him of the exercise of free will. City Nat. Bank v. Kusworm, 64 N. W. 843, 845, 91 Wis. 166; Wolff v. Bluhm, 70 N. W. 73, 74, 95 Wis. 257, 60 Am. St. Rep. 115; Batavian Bank v. North, 90 N. W. 1016, 1019, 114 Wis. 637; Phillips v. Henry, 28 Atl. 477, 478, 160 Pa. 24, 40 Am. St. Rep. 706; Peabody v. Tenney, 30 Atl. 456, 457, 18 R. I. 498; Newburyport Water Co. v. City of Newburyport (U. S.) 103 Fed. 584, 594; Hackley v. Headley, 8 N. W. 511, 512, 45 Mich. 569. It may be defined as an unlawful restraint, intimidation, or compulsion of another to such an extent and degree as to induce such person to do or perform some act which he is not legally bound to do, contrary to his will and inclination. It is obvious that if the act is done contrary to the will and inclination of the injured party it cannot be in the exercise of his free will. His will is subjected to that of another, and he is compelled to submit to an illegal exaction because of the dominant power. First Nat. Bank v. Sargent (Neb.) 91 N. W. 595, 597, 59 L. R. A. 296.

By "duress," in its more extended sense, is meant that degree of severity, either threatened or impending or actually inflicted, which is sufficient to overcome the mind and will of a person of ordinary firmness. Darling v. Hines, 32 N. E. 109, 111, 5 Ind. App. 319; James v. Dalbey, 78 N. W. 51, 53, 107 Iowa, 463; Pierce v. Brown (U. S.) 7 Wall. 214, 19 L. Ed. 134; Lafayette & I. R. Co. v. Pattison, 41 Ind. 312, 320 (citing 2 Greenl. Ev. § 301; Fellows v. School Dist. No. 8 in Fayette, 39 Me. 559; Brooks v. Berryhill, 20 Ind. 97; Foshay v. Ferguson [N. Y.] 5 Hill, 154; Ex parte Wells [U. S.] 18 How. 307, 15 L. Ed. 421; Inhabitants of Whitefield v. Longfellow, 13 Me. [1 Shep.] 146; 2 Coke, Inst. 483; Co. Litt. 253; Vin. Abr. tit. "Duress" [B] pl. 23; Bac. Abr. tit. "Duress"; Chit. Cont. 168; Eddy v. Herrin, 17 Me. [5 Shep.] 338, 35 Am. Dec. 261); Tapley v. Tapley, 10 Minn. 448, 458 (Gil. 360, 368), 83 Am. Dec. 76; Johnson v. Roland (Tenn.) 2 Baxt. 203, 206; McCormick v. Dalton, 35 Pac. 1113, 1114, 53 Kan. 146; Landa v. Obert, 14 S. W. 297, 302, 78 Tex. 33; Davis v. Mississippi Cent. R. Co., 46 Miss. 552, 568; Edwards v. Bowden, 107 N. C. 58, 60, 12 S. E. 58; Simmons v. Trumbo, 9 W. Va. 358, 366.

What constitutes duress is matter of law; whether duress exists in a particular transaction is matter of fact. There is no legal standard of resistance which the person acted upon must come up to at his peril of being remediless for the wrong done to him, and no general rule as to the sufficiency of facts to produce duress. The question in each case is, was the person so acted upon by threats of the person claiming the benefit of the contract, for the purpose of obtaining such contract, as to be bereft of the quality of mind essential to the making of a contract, and was the contract thereby obtained? Galusha v. Sherman, 81 N. W. 495, 498, 105 Wis. 263, 47 L. R. A. 417; Rochester Mach. Tool Works v. Weiss, 84 N. W. 866, 867, 108 Wis. 545. To constitute coercion or duress which will be regarded as sufficient to make a payment involuntary, there must be some actual or threatened exercise of power, possessed or believed to be possessed by the party exacting or receiving the payment, over the person and property of another, from which the latter has no other means of immediate relief than by making the payment. Radich v. Hutchins, 95 U. S. 210, 213, 24 L. Ed. 409; Lonergan v. Buford, 13 Sup. Ct. 684, 687, 148 U. S. 581, 37 L. Ed. 569. There must be something more than threat and peril of pecuniary loss. Sawyer v. Gruner, 60 N. Y. Super. Ct. 285, 288, 17 N. Y. Supp. 465; Dennerhy & Co. v. McNulta (U. S.) 86 Fed. 825, 829, 30 C. C. A. 422, 41 L. R. A. 609; Union Ins. Co. v. City of Allegheny, 101 Pa. 250, 252; Buford v. Lonergan, 22 Pac. 164, 166, 6 Utah, 301; Shuck v. Interstate Building & Loan Ass'n, 41 S. E. 28, 31, 63 S. C. 134.

Duress is an actual or threatened violence or illegal restraint of a man's person to compel him to enter into a contract or to do some act which, in the absence of such violence or restraint, might be valid or legally effective. Duress will not, however, always render the obligation contracted void, regardless of the fact of any participation in or knowledge of the circumstances upon the part of the obligee. For example, if one, being attacked by robbers, promises an innocent person a sum of money to deliver him out of their hands, the obligation, though contracted under the impression of the fear of death, is valid. Dimmitt v. Robbins, 12 S. W. 94, 96, 74 Tex. 441.

"Duress," under the decisions, means a condition of mind produced by improper external pressure or influence, that practically destroys the free agency of a party, and causes him to do an act or make a contract, not of his own volition, but under such wrongful external pressure. Whether such external pressure or influence is sufficient to destroy the free agency of a party is a question to be determined by the age, sex, intelligence, experience, and force of will of the party, the nature of the act, and all the attendant facts and circumstances. Pride v. Baker (Tenn.) 64 S. W. 329, 332 (citing Willard v. Willard, 65 Tenn. [6 Baxt.] 297, 32 Am. Rep. 529).

In order to constitute "duress" in its legal sense, it must appear that the party acted under some threatening of life or member, or of imprisonment, or some imprisonment or beating of the party acting, or of his wife, with the view to procure the execution of the deed or other instrument, and that the danger existing or threatened should affect the person, or goods or property. Rollings v. Cate, 48 Tenn. (1 Helsk.) 97, 98 (reaffirmed in Bogle v. Hammons, 49 Tenn. [2 Helsk.] 136, 141, 142, and cited in Loud v. Hamilton [Tenn.] 51 S. W. 140, 144, 45 L. R. A. 400).

Duress consists in restraint or imprisonment or intimidation, or any of those. Where defendant took advantage of plaintiff's impaired mental and physical condition, and persistently urged her to make a certain contract, and finally induced her to make it against her will, it was not error to charge that duress consists of restraint, imprisonment, or intimidation, or anything which tended to restrain plaintiff from acting freely and voluntarily in the matter, and that it made no difference what means were employed, provided they were calculated to and did restrain or coerce her to make such contract. Schoellhamer v. Rometsch, 38 Pac. 344, 347, 26 Or. 394.

Duress implies a constraint which overcomes the will of the person constrained, and this constraint may be the result of imprisonment or threats of imprisonment. Wolf v. Troxell's Estate, 94 Mich. 573, 576, 54 N. W. 383.

To make the defense of duress effective, it must have been so great as to take away the voluntary act and consent of the person urging it as a defense. It must have been of such a character as to incite a sense of fear on his part of some grievous wrong or personal violence, or great bodily injury, or unlawful imprisonment. Iowa Sav. Bank v. Frink, 92 N. W. 916, 919, 1 Neb. (Unof.) 14.

The terms "compulsion" and "duress" cannot be applied to the payment of money to procure a license to transact business in a state, required by ordinance to be taken out, even though such ordinance is void; and therefore such payment cannot be recovered. Mays v. City of Cincinnati, 1 Ohio St. 268, 277.

Money paid under protest does not make the payment a compulsory one, even though the party be under no legal obligation to pay. Union Ins. Co. v. City of Allegheny, 101 Pa. 250, 252.

Within a court rule providing that in an action on a written instrument, where a copy is filed with the declaration, the execution of such instrument shall be taken to be admitted, unless the defendant shall have filed an affidavit denying the signature or obligation of the instrument by reason of fraud, duress, or other sufficient legal cause, the words "fraud" and "duress" relate to the signature or signing of the instrument. Vandergrift v. Hollis (Del.) 6 Houst. 90, 102.

One purchasing liquor from an illegal combination of distillers which controls the market and prices, though impelled thereto by business needs and policy, enters into the contract voluntarily, and not by duress. Dennehy v. McNulta (U. S.) 86 Fed. 825, 829, 30 C. C. A. 422, 41 L. R. A. 609.

"Legal duress" implies that a party has been unlawfully constrained by another to perform an act under circumstances which prevent the exercise of free will. The act of the party compelling the unwilling obedience must be unlawful or wrongful, and there can be no duress of goods in law where the act done or threatened is nothing more than the party has a legal right to do. Fuller v. Roberts, 17 South. 359, 362, 35 Fla. 110.

As defense to criminal prosecution.

Duress consists in threats of bodily or other harm, amounting to or tending to coerce the will of another, and actually inducing him to do an act contrary to his free will. This definition of "duress" relates, however, not to crime, but to contract. To render threats or menaces available as an excuse for a person charged with crime, they must be threats or menaces which sufficiently show that his or her life or member was endangered, or that he or she had reasonable cause to believe, and did actually believe, that his or her life or member was in danger. McCoy v. State, 3 S. E. 768, 769, 78 Ga. 490.

As ground of equitable jurisdiction.

Duress, when employed to procure a conveyance of property, is a species of fraud, and is not of itself a ground of equitable jurisdiction. And hence one, to maintain an action in equity to cancel a deed, must be in such possession as one who seeks to maintain the action on the grounds of fraud.

Treadwell v. Torbert, 32 South. 126, 133 Ala. 504.

As of person or of property.

At common law "duress" meant only duress of the person, and nothing short of such duress, amounting to a reasonable apprehension of imminent danger to life, limb, or liberty, was sufficient to avoid a contract, or to enable a party to recover back money paid. But courts of equity would unhesitatingly set aside contracts where there was imposition or oppression, or whenever the extreme necessity of the party was such as to overcome his free agency. The courts of law, however, gradually extended the doctrine so as to recognize duress of property as a sort of moral duress, which might, equally with duress of the person, constitute a defense to a contract induced thereby, or entitle a party to recover back money paid under its influence. And the modern authorities generally hold that such pressure or constraint as compels a man to go against his will, and virtually takes away his free agency, and destroys the power of refusing to comply with the unlawful demand of another, will constitute duress, irrespective of the manifestation of physical force. Joannin v. Ogilvie, 52 N. W. 217, 49 Minn. 564, 16 L. R. A. 376, 32 Am. St. Rep. 581.

"The principle upon which men are relieved from their contracts procured by 'duress' has been greatly extended in recent years. In the time of Lord Coke no one would have been permitted to avoid his contract for duress, unless the duress was such as not only to put him in fear of illegal imprisonment or great bodily harm, but went so far as to be something that a man of ordinary firmness would not be able to resist. No possible loss to his land or property would be sufficient to enable him to avoid a contract which he had made to prevent it. Bac. Abr. tit. 'Duress' (a). But gradually and by slow degrees the strictness of that rule was abated, until finally it has come to be the rule of law in this country, although perhaps not in England, that where one has been presented with the contingency of serious loss or damage to his property or of a submission to an extortionate claim, if he pay the claim or make the contract which is extorted from him, it is not to be considered a voluntary act, and it may be set aside on the ground of duress. In the case of Foshay v. Ferguson (N. Y.) 5 Hill, 154, 158, it is said by Judge Bronson: 'I entertain no doubt that a contract procured by threats and the fear of battery or the destruction of property may be avoided on the ground of duress. There is nothing but the form of a contract in such a case, without the substance. It wants the voluntary assent of the party to be bound by it.' In the case of Sasportas v. Jennings (S.

C.) 1 Bay, 470, it was held that duress of goods will avoid a contract where unjust and unreasonable advantage is taken of a man's necessities of getting his goods back into his possession, and there is no other speedy means left of getting them back but by giving a bond, or where a man's necessities may be so great as not to admit of the ordinary process of law to afford him relief." Van Dyke v. Wood, 70 N. Y. Supp. 324, 327, 60 App. Div. 208.

Duress is any force which renders a contracting party not entirely free and at full liberty to make or refuse to make the contract, and this not only with respect to their persons, but in regard to their goods and chattels also. Collins v. Westbury (S. C.) 2 Bay, 211, 213, 1 Am. Dec. 643.

Refusal to furnish financial backing.

Where a person claimed to have a verbal contract for grading a mile of roadbed of a railway with another at a stated price per cubic yard, and such other person, desiring to abrogate the verbal contract, demanded of him the signing of a written contract for one-half mile only of the heaviest work of a grading at the same price per cubic yard, and on his refusal declared that he would stand good no more to the men working for him, and on account of such refusal he was unable to carry on the work unless the men were paid, the sense of a contract under such circumstances does not constitute duress. McCormick v. Dalton 35 Pac. 1113, 1114, 53 Kan. 143.

Refusal to pay full claim or amount due.

Duress is commonly said to be of either the person or the goods of the party. Duress of the person is either imprisonment or by death, or by an exhibition of force which cannot apparently be resisted. Duress of goods may exist when one is compelled to submit to an illegal exaction in order to obtain them from one who has them in possession, but refuses to surrender them unless the exaction is submitted to. But where a party threatens nothing which he has not a legal right to perform, there is no duress. Hence, where a debtor refuses to pay the full amount of the claim, the acceptance of a less amount by the creditor because it means financial ruin to him not to have such amount that day does not constitute duress of goods. Hackley v. Headley, 8 N. W. 511, 512, 45 Mich. 569.

Duress of goods consists of seizing by force or withholding from the party entitled to it the possession of personal property, and extorting something as the condition for its release, or the demanding and taking personal property under color of legal authority which in fact is either void or for some reason does not justify the demand. Cooley, Torts, 507. What shall constitute duress of goods as a question of fact is often difficult to determine, and in its determination we are constantly confronted by the maxim, "An injury cannot be done to a willing person," or if he is injured he cannot complain. The refusal of a purchaser to pay the contract price of mining property on the ground of false representation, and the acceptance by the seller of a less sum on account of financial embarrassment, does not constitute duress if the purchaser had done nothing unlawful to cause such financial embarrassment. Adams v. Schiffer, 17 Pac. 21, 30, 11 Colo. 15, 7 Am. St. Rep. 202.

Refusal to remove mechanic's lien.

The term "duress or compulsion" may be properly used to characterize an act of procuring a payment from the owner of property against his protest to remove a mechanic's lien, based upon an unfounded claim, in order to clear the title of record, so that the owner may consummate a loan upon the property which he has negotiated in order to raise money to pay a prior overdue mortgage and other pressing debts, he having no other available means of raising the money. Joannin v. Ogilvie, 52 N. W. 217, 49 Minn. 564, 16 L. R. A. 376, 32 Am. St. Rep. 581.

Refusal to surrender property.

Duress of goods may exist when one is compelled to submit to an illegal exaction in order to obtain them from one who has them, but refuses to surrender them unless the exaction is endured. Fuller v. Roberts, 17 South. 359, 361, 35 Fla. 110.

Where parties contracted to buy certain cattle, and paid a large sum, leaving a small balance due, and could not get possession without completing the stipulated payment, though a part of the property had been transferred to another party, and unless he took possession the property would be at a great risk of loss for want of care during winter, just beginning, his payment of the balance was payment under duress. Loneragan v. Buford, 13 Sup. Ct. 684, 687, 148 U. S. 581, 37 L. Ed. 569.

Duress for which a person may avoid any contract or conveyance made, or recover back any money paid under its influence, exists where one, by the unlawful act of a beneficiary or his authorized agent, or by the act of some person with his knowledge, is constrained, under circumstances which deprive him of the exercise of his free will, to agree or to perform the act sought to be avoided. Duress involves illegality, and where one, having in his possession property of another, demands as a condition of its restoration the payment of a sum for which he is legally entitled to a lien from the owner, the owner cannot be said to have made payment under duress. In re Meyer (U. S.) 106 Fed. 828, 831.

An instruction that if plaintiffs, in order to obtain possession of property mentioned in the contract, were compelled, when making the final payment, to pay for any property to which they were entitled, but which was not delivered to them, such payment was in law a payment under duress and might be recovered, was correct. Buford v. Lonergan, 22 Pac. 164, 166, 6 Utah, 301.

Threats in general.

"Threatened violence of a character under circumstances to impress a reasonable man with fear of it, depriving him of free will, and operating in restraint of liberty, inducing him by such restraint, unlawfully exercised, to do that which he would not otherwise willingly do, and could not be compelled in law to do, is duress." It does not depend on the probable or physical ability of the party complaining of duress to defend himself against the threatened imprisonment or other injury. The party threatened is not required to first submit to wager of battle, and be overcome, before the duress is complete. Looper v. Phillips, 1 Tenn. Cas. 269, 270.

To constitute duress by threats, they must be such as would naturally excite such a fear, grounded upon the reasonable belief that the person who threatens has at hand the means of carrying his threats into present execution, as would overcome the will of a person of ordinary courage. It is not sufficient merely that a party has entered into a contract under the influence of a threat. Where defendants testify that they would not have executed the note if plaintiff had not threatened to kill a third person who was at the time in a distant state, the consideration of the notes being a release of all claims of the payee against such third party for damages for breach of promise to marry, such circumstances do not amount to duress. Barrett v. Mahnken, 48 Pac. 202, 203, 6 Wyo. 541, 71 Am. St. Rep. 953.

To constitute duress by threats, it is sufficient to in fact compel the person threatened to do an act which otherwise he would not have done. First Nat. Bank v. Sargent (Neb.) 91 N. W. 595, 597, 59 L. R. A. 296.

"Duress by threats is where the threats excite a fear of some grievous wrong, as of death, great bodily injury, or unlawful imprisonment." Thus, where a person was guilty of a crime, and was told that he would be prosecuted criminally unless he gave a certain amount of money, but this was denied by the person who was said to have made it, and it appears that the plaintiff did not want his wife to hear of his crime or arrest or of an action being brought against him, and for that purpose paid over the money, it was not obtained under duress. Sieber v. Weiden, 24 N. W. 215, 216, 17 Neb. 582.

Duress by threats does not exist whenever a promise is entered into and contracted under the influence of the threat, but only where such a threat excites the fear of some grievous wrong, as by death or great bodily injury or unlawful imprisonment. But where the threats, whether of mischief to the person or the property or to the good name, was of sufficient importance to destroy the threatened party's freedom, the law would not enforce any contract which he might be induced by any such means to make; but it is not unlawful for a creditor to demand and secure from his debtor a promissory note for bona fide debt under a threat of suit if such note be not given, and such note cannot be avoided. For a threat to amount to duress, the threats must not only be unlawful, but the contract thus obtained must be essentially unjust towards the parties seeking the relief. McClair v. Wilson, 31 Pac. 502, 503, 18 Colo. 82.

Where the defendant in a judgment, who was surety to the principal debtor therein, offered Confederate money to the judgment creditor to apply as a payment on the debt, and she refused to take it, when such surety stated that it was all the money the principal debtor could get, he being in the army; that the Confederate authorities had made it a legal tender; that he inquired the way to Brewster, saying that General Forrest was there, and he would go and see him; that he then got up to start, when the judgment creditor agreed to receive the money, and after he had left said that she had no use for the money, but that she preferred taking it to having any trouble about it—these facts did not show that the money was received under duress. Johnson v. Roland, 61 Tenn. (2 Baxt.) 203, 206.

Mere anger or profane words or strong and earnest language will not constitute such duress as will relieve a party from his conduct. For duress by threats which will avoid a contract only exists where such threats excite or may reasonably excite a fear of some grievous wrong, as bodily injury or unlawful imprisonment. Adams v. Stringer, 78 Ind. 175, 180.

"Duress by threats does not exist whenever a party has entered into a contract under the influence of a threat, but only where such a threat excites a fear of some grievous wrong, as of death or great bodily injury or unlawful imprisonment." Landa v. Obert, 14 S. W. 297, 302, 78 Tex. 33 (quoting 1 Para. Cont. p. 393).

A threat to do a legal act, or to subject the party to the legal consequences of a refusal to make an agreement, is not duress.

Parsons on Contracts, p. 393, says that duress does not exist whenever a party has entered into a contract under the influence of a threat, but only where such a threat excites a fear of some grievous wrong, as of death or great bodily injury or unlawful imprisonment. Phillips v. Henry (Pa.) 10 Montg. Co. Law Rep'r, 9, 11.

Duress is of two sorts, duress of imprisonment, where a man actually lost his liberty, and duress per minas, where the hardship is only threatened or impending. Where there is a threat, serious and violent, with ample capacity to execute it, and its execution certain to endanger the plaintiff more than if, without waiting its execution, he jump from the train as commanded, there was duress. Bogges v. Chesapeake & O. Ry. Co., 16 S. E. 525, 527, 37 W. Va. 297, 23 L. R. A. 777. See, also, Lafayette & L. R. Co. v. Pattison, 41 Ind. 312, 320.

Threats of abandonment.

Duress consists of acts which take away freedom of action and are calculated to overcome the mind of a person of ordinary firmness, when believed in. Hence a threat by a husband to abandon his wife and turn her out, thereby inducing her to sign a conveyance, constituted duress. Tapley v. Tapley, 10 Minn. 448, 458 (Gil. 360, 364), 83 Am. Dec. 76.

Threats of arrest.

A threat to imprison a person on a false criminal charge, and reasonable ground to fear that the threat would be executed, may amount to duress. Schultz v. Culbertson, 1 N. W. 19, 21, 46 Wis. 313.

Duress, in the making of a contract, exists when the person making it is induced to make it by reason of being put in fear by means of threats of arresting him and unlawfully charging him with crime, when the threats and the fear induced thereby are such as would influence a man of reasonable courage or prudence, and do deprive the party making the contract of the exercise of free will in making it. The threatened arrest must be wrongful and unlawful, and apparently about to be enforced. Kennedy v. Roberts, 75 N. W. 363, 365, 105 Iowa, 521.

A threat of arrest for which there is no ground does not constitute duress, as a party could not be put in fear thereby. Knapp v. Hyde (N. Y.) 60 Barb. 80. And threat of imprisonment is not duress unless the imprisonment be unlawful. Boggs v. Slack & Greenbrier Grocery Co., 44 S. E. 777, 778, 53 W. Va. 536 (citing Ham. Cont. § 135, p. 193).

In order to constitute a duress of a person by threats of imprisonment, or by actual imprisonment or restraint, it must appear that a process to that end had actually been issued, or that there was no reasonable doubt that it would be. Mere threats of violence or of prosecution are not enough; there must be a reasonable ground for creating an apprehension that the threats will be carried into execution, in the mind of a man of ordinary firmness and courage, and must operate upon him directly so as to overcome his will. Hines v. Hamilton County Com'rs, 93 Ind. 266, 271 (citing 4 Wait, Act. & Def. p. 490).

At a time when actual war was raging in the country, and the courts and officers of law were in abeyance or powerless, and when the safeguards of the law furnished no protection or vindication against violence and wrong, G., believing his horse had been stolen by B., went to B.'s house, accompanied by five or six men armed with pistols, and demanded payment or settlement, threatening that if B. did not pay or settle he would arrest him and carry him to military headquarters. Held, that a payment made under such circumstances was payment under duress, and void as such. Belote v. Henderson, 45 Tenn. (5 Cold.) 471, 474, 98 Am. Dec. 432.

Mere proof of the existence of danger, without proof that it in fact operated upon the mind of the party, is not sufficient to establish the fact of duress. And so though it may have been generally understood that it was unsafe to refuse to accept Confederate money, and that such refusal might subject the party to peril of imprisonment, yet where the currency constituted an ordinary currency of the country, and the party seeking to have a payment made therein set aside on the ground that he accepted it under duress does not show that he made any objection before or at the time, but, on the contrary, it appears that he voluntarily accepted payment of other debts in Confederate money, the payment will not be set aside as made under duress. Wilkerson v. Bishop, 47 Tenn. (7 Cold.) 24, 29.

Where, at the time of the Civil War, the payee of a note accepted payment in Confederate currency, not under a vague and general apprehension of giving offense to the Confederate authorities, which might have been common to all the citizens, but with a knowledge that a strong military order threatening arrests and imprisonment to those refusing to take Confederate currency had been issued and enforced by arrests in the section of country in which he lived, and under the immediate pressure of personal threats and a zealous and active combination against him which he was powerless to resist, such acceptance of payment was not binding, but was void as having been procured by duress. McCartney v. Wade, 49 Tenn. (2 Heisk.) 369, 374.

During the progress of the Civil War vague and indefinite fears of the power of the Confederate government and its military officers, which might have been common to all citizens, were not sufficient to invalidate payments made in Confederate currency. But where an order containing a threat of fine, imprisonment, or confiscation of those who refused to accept Confederate currency was issued by an officer of high rank, and circulated and published throughout the country by soldiers in arms, and where this order was employed and even misrepresented by a Confederate soldier to compel a contract which he could not otherwise have obtained, the contract was void as obtained under duress. Boyle v. Hammons, 49 Tenn. (2 Heisk.) 136, 142.

Threat of imprisonment, to constitute duress, need not be unlawful imprisonment, but it is sufficient if a person's liability to lawful imprisonment be used against him by way of threat to force the doing of an act which he would not do voluntarily. Hartford Fire Ins. Co. v. Kirkpatrick, 20 South. 651, 654. 111 Ala. 456.

Threats of arrest of another.

The word "duress" may be accurately applied to a payment of money procured from the wife in a charge that her husband had committed crime, and threatening his arrest if the money was not paid, and therefore the wife may recover money so paid. Jaeger v. Koenig, 62 N. Y. Sunn. 803, 804, 30 Misc. Rep. 580.

Threats of attachment.

Threats of attaching a tenant's crop for the payment of rent, made by a person who has entered for the purpose of collecting or securing the rent before its maturity, and who is accompanied by a constable, but who has no legal process, do not constitute duress. Lehman v. Shackelford, 50 Ala. 437, 439.

Threats of business competition.

Duress by government or its officers is defined by the Supreme Court as moral duress not justified by law. Maxwell v. Griswold, 51 U. S. (10 How.) 242, 256, 13 L. Ed. 405. It must be the pressure arising from unlawful acts or demands on the part of the government or its officers to produce that constraint of will or action, or state of necessity or compulsion, which render acts voluntary in form involuntary and void. But where, under an act authorizing a city to erect waterworks, the city had decided to do so, and a subsequent act authorizes the purchase from a private corporation owning waterworks in such place, the fact that the competition by the city with the private corporation, if it erect its own waterworks, would be ruinous to the private corporation, did not render the sale of its waterworks to the city under the second act of the Legislature void as under duress. Newburyport Water Co. v. City of Newburyport (U. S.) 103 Fed. 584, 594.

Threats of civil suit.

It is not duress to institute or threaten to institute civil suits or take proceedings in court, or for any person to declare that he intends to use the courts wherein to insist upon what he believes to be his legal rights. "If the violence used be only a legal constraint," declares Civ. Code, art. 1856, "or the threats only of doing that which the party using them has the right to do, they shall not invalidate the contract." New Orleans & N. E. R. Co. v. Louisiana Const. & Imp. Co., 33 South. 51, 55, 109 La. 13.

It has often been held that threats of civil suits and of ordinary proceedings against property are not enough, because ordinary persons do not cease to act voluntarily on account of such threats. Morse v. Woodworth, 155 Mass. 233, 250, 29 N. E. 525.

A threat to bring suit does not constitute duress, merely because it will subject the party to costs in case he is beaten. Falvey v. Hennepin County Com'rs, 79 N. W. 302, 303, 76 Minn. 257.

A threat to bring a civil suit for a balance due on an overdue account, a part of which is conceded to be justly owing, does not constitute such duress as will avoid a promise made by the debtor under the threat. Atkinson v. Allen (U. S.) 71 Fed. 58, 59.

Threats of destruction of vessel.

Duress arising from threats of destruction of the vessel and cargo of a neutral, captured by a belligerent in time of war, cannot be admitted to avoid a contract of ransom where the capture was justified by proper cause, and still less where condemnation must have ensued in the regular prize proceedings. Maisonnaire v. Keating, 16 Fed. Cas. 513, 517.

Threats of ejectment.

In order to entitle a party to recover back money which was claimed to have been paid under duress, it must appear that it was paid upon a wrongful claim or unjust demand under the pressure of actual or threatened imprisonment, restraint, or harm, or an actual or threatened seizure or interference of his property, of serious import to him, and that he could escape from an injury only by making such payment. Threats that a person, if a certain sum of money is not paid to him for a deed, will eject and turn plaintiff out of possession of a certain tract of land, where it did not appear that he threatened personal violence or ejected plaintiff by force, are not sufficient to constitute duress. Kraemer v. Deustermann, 35 N. W. 276, 277, 37 Minn. 469.

Threats of foreclosure.

Threats of foreclosure in case the mortgagor did not pay the amount claimed by the mortgagee to be due was not duress. Shuck v. Interstate Building & Loan Ass'n, 41 S. E. 28, 31, 63 S. C. 134.

Threats of prosecution.

Where there was no imprisonment or restraint of the party, no process of arrest against the party, no prosecution for any criminal offense instituted, no officer of the law ready to arrest, no threat of any kind made by this particular plaintiff, and no threat made by anybody, directly to the person affected, but only a threat to resort to criminal proceedings made in another state to certain friends of the party by counsel for creditors, and communicated by them to their principal, there was no duress. Phillips v. Henry, 28 Atl. 477, 478, 160 Pa. 24, 40 Am. St. Rep. 706.

It is not sufficient to establish duress that threats were uttered. It must be shown that they constrained the will of the promisor, and so induced the promise. It is not duress to enforce one's legal writing, even by an arrest of the person. The threat of criminal prosecution, designed to coerce, but not shown to have been effective, is not sufficient to constitute duress. Sternback v. Friedman, 50 N. Y. Supp. 1025, 1026, 23 Misc. Rep. 173.

To constitute a payment under duress from fear of prosecution, the money must have been exacted under a threat of prosecution, and have been paid unwillingly and under protest. "It is settled by many authorities that the mere apprehension of legal proceedings is not sufficient to make a payment compulsory, and that where there is a threatened prosecution the payment must be made under protest." Town of Ligonier v. Ackerman, 46 Ind. 552, 562, 15 Am. Rep. 323 (citing Harvey v. Town of Olney, 42 Ill. 336; Elston v. City of Chicago, 40 Ill. 514, 89 Am. Dec. 361; Taylor v. Board of Health of City of Philadelphia, 31 Pa. 73, 72 Am. Dec. 724; Cook v. City of Boston, 91 Mass. [9 Allen] 393).

Duress by threats exists, not wherever a party has entered into a contract under the influence of a threat, but only when such threat excites fear of some grievous wrong, as of death or great irremediable injury or unlawful embezzlement; threats of criminal prosecution, unaccompanied by threats of immediate imprisonment, do not constitute a duress. Thus one who embezzles money, and gave a note in acknowledgment of the debt, cannot defend in an action on the note on the ground that he executed it to escape a threatened criminal prosecution. Beath v. Chapoton, 73 N. W. 806, 807, 115 Mich. 506, 69 Am. St. Rep. 589.

"Duress" implies a constraint which overcomes the will. Where this may be brought about by threat of prosecution for a criminal offense, yet where no threat was made, but defendant was pressing a claim for a debt caused by the action of a clerk in taking property from a store without accounting for it, it does not constitute duress, especially after a settlement was made with a full and fair understanding of the nature of the transaction. Francis v. Hurd, 71 N. W. 582, 584, 113 Mich. 250.

It is not the threat of criminal prosecution in any case that constitutes duress, but the condition of mind produced thereby. The threat must be of such nature, and made under such circumstances, as to constitute a reasonable and adequate cause to control the will of the threatened person, and must have that effect, and the act sought to be avoided must be performed by said person while in such condition. Wolff v. Bluhm, 70 N. W. 73, 74, 95 Wis. 257, 60 Am. St. Rep. 115.

Under the modern doctrine, duress is established where actual or threatened violence or restraint, contrary to law, compels one to enter into or discharge a contract. It is duress when there is a fear of imprisonment excited by threats. Duress was established where it was proven that the plaintiff, a man 72 years old and ignorant of the law, was threatened by defendant with prosecution imprisonment, and fine for selling cider without a license, unless he would pay defendant $150, and that plaintiff, on being confronted with several men who claimed that he had sold them cider, and on being informed by defendant that the men would so testify, under the influence of such threats paid the $150 without any consideration. Cribbs v. Sowle, 49 N. W. 587, 589, 87 Mich. 340, 24 Am. St. Rep. 166.

Where a man of mature years signs a document because an agent of the party with whom he previously had dealt told him that he was liable to imprisonment for grand larceny, and that if he did not make the settlement he would have him sent to state's prison, such threats did not constitute duress. Rochester Mach. Tool Works v. Weiss, 84 N. W. 866, 867, 108 Wis. 545.

Where an officer not authorized to issue a warrant notifies a person that he will have him arrested on a warrant and prosecuted unless he pays a certain tax, and such person because of such threat pays the tax, the payment is not made under duress. Williams v. Stewart, 42 S. E. 256, 115 Ga. 864.

A complaint alleging that the defendant had extorted money from plaintiff by false representation that he had employed the county attorney to bring a civil and criminal suit against him for taking certain property, and threatened that if the plaintiff did not pay a certain sum he would send plaintiff to state's prison for larceny, does not show payment under duress. Darling v. Hines, 32 N. E. 109, 111, 5 Ind. App. 319.

The fact that the defendant, who had unlawfully caused the pregnancy of a girl, was threatened by the girl's father with criminal prosecution unless he gave a note and mortgage to provide for the care of the girl and child, and that he complied with the demand, does not show duress, where several days intervened between the demand and the compliance, during which defendant had consulted with friends, who advised him to settle. Wolff v. Blum, 70 N. W. 73, 74, 95 Wis. 257, 60 Am. St. Rep. 115.

Where the maker of a note testified that he signed it because of a threat; that the payee threatened to prosecute him for obtaining property under false pretenses, and threatened to make it cost him his farm, and that he did not know whether he had done anything criminal or not; and it appeared that he was a man of intelligence, and was surrounded by his family, some of whom counseled him against signing the note—it was not given under duress. James v. Dalbey, 78 N. W. 51, 53, 107 Iowa, 463.

A threat of a criminal prosecution, made to compel the giving of a mortgage to secure a just debt, is not duress. Plant v. Gunn (U. S.) 19 Fed. Cas. 800, 803.

A master who, by his own conduct and representations and that of his attorneys, so arouses his servant's fears by threats of a criminal prosecution for embezzlement that the latter, in compliance with a demand, surrenders up his property to avoid the prosecution, is guilty of duress, and the transaction will be set aside on a proper showing that the servant was in fact innocent of the crime. Landa v. Obert, 14 S. W. 297, 302, 78 Tex. 33.

Threats of prosecution of another.

A wife may avoid her contract on the ground of duress when it was extorted by threat of the criminal prosecution of her husband. City Nat. Bank of Dayton v. Kusworm, 59 N. W. 564, 567, 88 Wis. 188, 26 L. R. A. 48, 43 Am. St. Rep. 880.

Terrifying a woman by threats of prosecuting her husband for alleged embezzlement is such coercion as to avoid a transfer of her property thus obtained. A threat to procure the arrest and imprisonment of a son under a false and criminal charge, and reasonable grounds to believe that such threats will be executed, constitutes duress. McCormick Harvesting-Mach. Co. v. Hamilton, 41 N. W. 727, 729, 73 Wis. 486.

A mortgage executed by a wife upon her separate estate to secure a debt owing by her husband for money embezzled by him is not executed under duress, although done to prevent his being convicted and sent to the penitentiary. Mundy v. Whittemore, 19 N. W. 694, 696, 15 Neb. 647.

DURESS OF IMPRISONMENT.

"Duress of imprisonment is defined as an arrest for an improper purpose without just cause, or an arrest for a just cause but without lawful authority, or for a just cause but for an unlawful purpose, even though under process." Brown v. Pierce, 74 U. S. (7 Wall.) 205, 215, 19 L. Ed. 134; Hatch v. Barrett, 8 Pac. 129, 135; Morrill v. Nightingale, 28 Pac. 1068, 1070, 93 Cal. 452, 27 Am. St. Rep. 207; Richardson v. Duncan, 3 N. H. 508; Davis v. Luster, 64 Mo. 43, 44.

To constitute duress by imprisonment, either the imprisonment or the duress thereto must have been felonious and unlawful. Meacham v. Town of Newport, 39 Atl. 631, 632, 70 Vt. 67; Heaps v. Dunham, 95 Ill. 583.

To constitute duress by imprisonment, the imprisonment must be tortious and without lawful authority, or by an abuse of lawful authority. Imprisonment under a regular and legal process, upon probable cause, without malice, does not constitute duress, so as to invalidate a contract entered into by the prisoner to procure his freedom, unless he has been induced thereto by unlawful force or privations. A threat to do a lawful act, or subject a party to the lawful consequences of a refusal to make an agreement, is not duress. McDonald v. Carlton, 1 N. M. 172, 176 (citing 1 Bouv. Law Dict. 493; 2 Jac. Law Dict. 325).

To constitute duress by means of an arrest, the arrest must have been originally illegal, or have become so by the subsequent abuse of it. An instrument executed while under arrest is not necessarily void therefor on the ground of duress. Fisher v. Walter (Pa.) 3 C. P. Rep. 161, 162.

Duress which will avoid a contract is either by unlawful restraint or imprisonment; or, if lawful, it must be accompanied by circumstances of unnecessary pain, privation, or danger; or when the arrest, though made under legal authority, is made for an unlawful purpose. It is those contracts only which are made under fear of unlawful imprisonment, and not those made under fear of imprisonment which would be legally justifiable, that can be avoided for duress. Sanford v. Sonborger, 41 N. W. 1102, 1106, 26 Neb. 295.

Duress by imprisonment imports that the imprisonment must be unlawful, or there must be an abuse of, or an oppression under, lawful process or legal detention. If there is an arrest for a just cause, but for an unlawful purpose, the party arrested, if he is induced to enter into a contract, may avoid it as one procured by duress. Fillman v. Ryon, 32 Atl. 89, 90, 168 Pa. 484.

Where a person is illegally restrained of his liberty by being confined in the common jail or elsewhere, and during such restraint enters into a bond or other security to the person who causes the restraint, he may avoid the same for duress of imprisonment. Thus where a boy was arrested on a false charge of bastardy, and in order to procure his release consented to marriage, such marriage was void. Shoro v. Shoro, 14 Atl. 177, 60 Vt. 268, 6 Am. St. Rep. 118.

Duress of imprisonment is any illegal restraint of one's liberty without warrant of law; and, moreover, if one be restrained of his liberty on a legal and regular warrant, but yet if, on going behind such warrant, it be found to be bottomed on a false charge without probable cause, and used only as a feint or pretext to cover some illegal design, it will be construed in law as "duress of imprisonment"; and, further, when the charge is well founded, if the prisoner is maltreated while so confined, it would make his confinement duress of imprisonment. Hatter's Ex'rs v. Greenlee (Ala.) 1 Port. 222, 225, 28 Am. Dec. 370.

Where an imprisoned debtor conveys land to his creditor to procure his enlargement, in the eye of the law he acts freely, there being in the case no unlawful restraint or imprisonment. If the imprisonment be lawful in form, but founded upon an abuse of process, it constitutes duress. But if it be lawful, an instrument executed to obtain enlargement cannot be avoided on the ground of duress. Crowell v. Gleason, 10 Me. (1 Fairf.) 325, 333.

Duress by imprisonment is where one is restrained of his liberty by an unlawful imprisonment, or by a tortious detention thereafter. If, therefore, a man, supposing that he has cause of action against another, by lawful process cause him to be arrested and imprisoned, and the defendant voluntarily execute a deed for his deliverance, he cannot avoid such deed by duress of imprisonment, although in fact the plaintiff had no cause of action. And although the imprisonment be lawful, yet, unless the deed be made freely and voluntarily, it may be avoided by duress. And if the imprisonment be originally lawful, yet if the party obtaining the deed detained the prisoner in prison unlawfully by covin with the jailer, this is a duress which will avoid the deed. It is a sound and correct principle of law that when a man shall falsely, maliciously, and without probable cause sue out a process in form regular and legal to arrest and imprison another, and shall obtain a deed from a party thus arrested to procure his deliverance, such deed may be avoided by duress of imprisonment. Watkins v. Baird, 6 Mass. 506, 513, 4 Am. Dec. 170.

A note payable to one who, for the sole purpose of intimidating the maker, illegally and fraudulently procured a warrant for his arrest on a charge of embezzlement, and which note was executed in fear of and to procure immunity from arrest and imprisonment, was executed under duress. Morrill v. Nightingale, 28 Pac. 1068, 1070, 93 Cal. 452, 27 Am. St. Rep. 207.

A person accused before a justice was brought before him by summons, the offense charged being one of which the justice had no jurisdiction save as an examining magistrate. The justice erroneously led the party charged to believe that he had jurisdiction to impose a fine, but that an appeal might be taken, and accused entered a plea of guilty and paid the fine imposed by the justice. If such payment was made in order to procure release from custody, it was a payment made under duress by imprisonment; but if paid, not because of threatened imprisonment, but to avoid further inconvenience in the district court, the payment was voluntary. Houtz v. Uinta County Com'rs (Wyo.) 70 Pac. 840, 846.

DURESS PER MINAS.

"Duress per minas," as defined at common law, is where a party enters into a contract (1) for fear of loss of life, (2) for fear of loss of limb, (3) for fear of mayhem, (4) or for fear of imprisonment. Brown v. Pierce, 74 U. S. (7 Wall.) 205, 215, 19 L. Ed. 134; Hartford Ins. Co. v. Kirkpatrick, 20 South. 651, 654, 111 Ala. 456; Mundy v. Whittemore, 19 N. W. 694, 696, 15 Neb. 647.

Duress, at the common law, is of two kinds, duress by imprisonment and duress by threats. Some of the definitions of "duress per minas" are not broad enough to include constraint by threats of imprisonment. But it is well settled that threats of unlawful imprisonment may be made the means of duress, as well as threats of grievous bodily harm. Morse v. Woodworth, 155 Mass. 233, 250, 29 N. E. 525.

Duress per minas is restricted to fear of loss of life, or of remediless injury to the person, or of imprisonment; but duress by threat of imprisonment must be such as to excite a reasonable fear of immediate imprisonment. We do not think a threat of prosecution, addressed to a man conscious of innocence, is such a threat as would induce in any man of ordinary firmness an overwhelming fear of immediate imprisonment. Buchanan v. Sahlein, 9 Mo. App. 552, 558.

Duress per minas is confined to fear of loss of life or of limb, fear of mayhem, and fear of unlawful imprisonment. While the rigidity of the common-law rule has been somewhat relaxed in this country, and the definition extended by some decisions to include fear of a mere battery or of the destruction of goods, we know of no case in which it has been held to include a threat of lawful punishment. Davis v. Luster, 64 Mo. 43, 44.

DURING.

A statute requiring public notice to be made "during" at least four weeks excludes publication in a periodical published monthly. York Borough Case, 3 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 514, 518.

"During" is defined as in the time of; throughout the continuance of; so that, as used in a contract providing that defendant should employ plaintiff during the seasons of navigation, it was ambiguous, so that evidence was admissible to show whether "during" meant throughout the continuance of or in the course of. Bird v. Beckwith, 60 N. Y. Supp. 1041, 1042, 45 App. Div. 124.

Where a deed contains an exception that a Presbyterian society has the right to have a certain horse shed stand where it now does, "during the life thereof," such phrase should be construed as referring to the shed, and not the Presbyterian society, and means the continuance or existence of the shed as such, making the clause in the deed equivalent to saying that the shed, so long as it could be reasonably used for the purpose for which it was erected, should continue to stand on the land conveyed. Benham v. Minor, 38 Conn. 252, 254.

As throughout the course of.

An answer in an interrogatory addressed to an applicant for insurance, "Is there a watchman in the mill during the night?" means, "Is there such a watchman through the night?" and the answer, "There is a watchman nights," is an affirmative answer, meaning in this connection every night and through the night. Glendale Woolen Co. v. Protection Ins. Co., 21 Conn. 19, 54 Am. Dec. 309.

"During which years," as used in a statement in a ground of appeal that a pauper served certain offices for certain specified years, "during which years he was an inhabitant and resident in C.," imports that he inhabited and resided in C. during the whole of those years, and not at some time in those years. Reg. v. Inhabitants of Anderson, 9 Adol. & El. (N. S.) 663, 668.

"During," as used in a complaint in a suit by a devisee to set aside an execution sale of his testator's estate, alleging that the testator was "during" his lifetime the owner of real estate, should be construed as equivalent to "continuously." Riddell v. Harrell, 12 Pac. 67, 70, 71 Cal. 254.

DURING CONTINUANCE IN OFFICE.

The expression in a sheriff's bond, "during the continuance in office," clearly has reference to the actual duration of the office by virtue of the appointment under which the bond was taken. Commonwealth v. Fairfax (Va.) 4 Hen. & M. 208, 211.

A deputy sheriff's bond, conditioned for the performance of his duty, indemnifying the sheriff "during his continuance in office," without specifying the length of time, binds only for the year for which he was first appointed. Munford v. Rice (Va.) 6 Munf. 81, 82.

Where a banking institution at an annual meeting elected a treasurer for the ensuing year, and such treasurer gave bond to faithfully administer his trust during his continuance in office, the words "during his continuance in office" will be held to cover only the year for which he was elected, and hence the sureties are not liable for defaults made after the expiration of a year from his election. Ulster County Sav. Inst. v. Ostrander, 57 N. E. 627, 628, 163 N. Y. 430.

DURING COVERTURE.

The legal import of the words "during coverture," as employed by Lord Coke (volume 1, p. 149), means "while the marriage lasts." State ex rel. Hamilton v. Guinotte, 156 Mo. 513, 518, 57 S. W. 281, 282, 50 L. R. A. 787 (citing People v. Burbank, 12 Cal., loc. cit. 392; State, to Use of Gentry, v. Fry, 4 Mo., loc. cit. 159).

DURING NATURAL LIFE.

Where a testator devised real estate to his wife "during her natural life," such phrase meant that she was given a user of all income, and could only enjoy it during her life without waste. Appeal of Churchman (Pa.) 12 Atl. 600, 602.

Testator bequeathed a farm to his son "during the term of his natural life and no longer," and "after the death of my said son I give and devise said farm to his heirs forever, but should be desirous to sell the farm I empower him to do so and to convey the land in fee." Held, that the phrase, "during the term of his natural life and no longer," did not mean that the son was to take a life estate instead of a fee. Clarke v. Smith, 49 Md. 106, 118.

A devise of property to a certain person "during her natural life," with remainder over to the heirs of her body, is not sufficient, and cannot be construed as limiting the devisee's interest to a life estate, but vests an absolute property in such devisee. Hughes v. Nicklas, 17 Atl. 398, 70 Md. 484, 14 Am. St. Rep. 377.

In a will giving to testator's wife the horses and farm, with all their appurtenances, and after such horses and cattle and other articles were sold for the payment of debts the balance of the stock, cattle, and other articles should be hers and at her disposal "during her natural life," such phrase cannot be construed to imply a limitation on the right of the wife to dispose of any of the property by alienation. Elyton Land Co. v. McElrath (U. S.) 53 Fed. 763, 767, 3 C. C. A. 649.

A devise "during his natural life, and after his death to his heirs and assigns forever," gives an estate of inheritance. Andrews v. Lowthrop, 20 Atl. 97, 98, 17 R. I. 60.

Where a testator devises land to his daughter "during her natural life, and after her death to the begotten heirs or heiresses of her body," the words of description do not mean simply the children of such daughter, but create an estate tail, under the rule in Shelley's Case, which was converted into a fee simple under Code, § 1325, providing that a person seized of an estate tail shall be held seised in fee simple. Leathers v. Gray, 7 S. E. 657, 659, 101 N. C. 162, 9 Am. St. Rep. 30.

A marriage settlement between parties "during their joint and natural lives" means during their joint lives and the life of each of them. Smith v. Oakes, 14 Sim. 122, 124.

An agreement to pay an annuity to a husband and wife "during their natural lives" binds the party to pay the annuity during the joint lives of the husband and wife and during the life of the survivor. Douglas v. Parsons, 22 Ohio St. 526.

A will bequeathing certain property to one who should pay a certain sum per year "during the lives of said M. and his present wife" means so long as either M. or his wife lives, and does not cease on the death of one of them. Merrill v. Bickford, 65 Me. 118, 119.

DURING PENDENCY OF ACTION OR PROCEEDINGS.

In 14 Stat. 529, providing that no bankrupt shall be liable to arrest during the pendency of proceedings in bankruptcy, the phrase "during pendency of proceedings" means until the bankrupt's discharge is granted or denied, and the proceedings are pending only down to the granting or refusal of the discharge. In re Dole (U. S.) 7 Fed. Cas. 828, 831.

Code Civ. Proc. § 604, authorizing an injunction against the defendant "during the pendency of the action," when it appears by affidavit that the defendant is doing, or is about to do or to procure, or to suffer to be done, an act in violation of plaintiff's rights, relates to the time when the threatened injury is likely to take place, and not to the time when the injunction order may be granted; and, in order to judicially satisfy the judge that the defendant threatens to do some act "during the pendency of the action" that will impair or defeat the plaintiff's remedy, it is not necessary to show that the action has been actually commenced. It is enough if it appears that there is a cause of action, which the plaintiff is about to prosecute, and that defendant threatens to do an act which will render the judgment ineffectual, to confer jurisdiction upon the judge to grant the injunction, which, however, will not become operative unless served with or after the summons. People v. Van Buren, 32 N. E. 775, 777, 136 N. Y. 252, 20 L. R. A. 446.

A statute which authorizes the court, in a suit brought by a married woman for a divorce or separation, "during the pendency of the cause or at its final hearing or afterward," to make such order between the parties for the custody of the children as may seem necessary and proper, means that the court shall provide for the provisional custody of the children during the pendency of the action, and to empower the court, when a decree shall be granted, to award the custody of the children, as their interests may seem to require; and hence, under such statute, the court had no authority, pending the suit, to give judgment awarding the custody of the children to the plaintiff, and to make provision for their maintenance out of the property of the husband. Davis v. Davis, 75 N. Y. 221, 227.

A statute authorizing an injunction in aid of an action at law at any time "during the pendency of the action" is held to be satisfied by the showing of a cause of action which the plaintiff is about to prosecute. People v. Van Buren, 32 N. E. 775, 777, 136 N. Y. 252, 20 L. R. A. 446.

DURING PLEASURE.

"During their pleasure," as used in habendum clause of a lease to the lessees for and during their pleasure, did not create a strict tenancy at will, but a covenant for perpetual enjoyment by the lessees; the other parts of the grant being to "the lessees and their legal representatives." Cole v. Winnipisseogee Lake Cotton & Woolen Mfg. Co., 54 N. H. 242, 277.

An appointment of a person "to continue in office during the pleasure of the Governor for the time being" cannot be construed to mean that if the Governor making the appointment did not remove the appointee during his gubernatorial term the tenure of his appointment ceased by operation of law with the term of such Governor. Kaufman v. Stone, 25 Ark. 338, 344.

DURING THE TERM

A lease providing that the landlord might, in case of a vacancy "during the term," enter and relet the premises for the assignee's account, and that the assignee should meet any deficiency accruing on the reletting, meant not only the actual duration of the leasehold estate, but the period for which the estate was granted; and hence a recovery in summary proceedings by the landlord by reason of the nonpayment of rent was a vacancy occurring "during the term." Baldwin v. Thibaudau, 17 N. Y. Supp. 532, 534, 28 Abb. N. C. 14.

DURING TERM OF OFFICE.

Const. art. 6, §§ 15, 16, providing that the compensation of judges shall not be increased or diminished "during the term" for which they shall have been elected, means during the time or period for which the officer is elected. "When the Constitution says, 'the judge shall hold his office for six years,' it means that this period of six years is the term of his office; it is that quantum of time assigned to him by the Constitution as his right to the enjoyment of the office, and this quantum may not improperly be called a 'term.' If A. is elected district judge, and enters on the office or accepts it for a day, he is disqualified for other office during the whole period of six years, and so after his election it would not be competent for the Legislature to change the compensation." People v. Burbank, 12 Cal. 378, 392.

A sheriff's bond, conditioned that as he had been duly appointed sheriff for three years from and after a certain date, and had accepted such appointment, and undertaken the duties and obligation incident to said office, if he should faithfully discharge the duties of such office, and answer all damages which any person or persons may sustain by any unfaithfulness or neglect in the same "during said term of three years," it should be null and void, should be construed as meaning incident to said term of three years, which would include all obligations and duties which have their origin during that time. It is used merely as descriptive of the sheriff's term of office, and not as restrictive of the obligations of the bond. The sheriff was elected for three years. That is the constitutional requirement, and if there are duties and obligations incident to the term of office that require more than three years for their discharge they are covered by the phrase "during said term of three years." Hence the bond binds the sureties if the sheriff commences service of a writ of attachment during his term of office, and neglects, after his term has expired, to make return of the writ on which property has been taken, and in consequence of such neglect the claim of a creditor has been lost. Baker v. Baldwin, 48 Conn. 131, 134.

DURING TERM TIME.

A rule of court which provided that neither party should be required "during term time" to attend the taking of a deposition except in the town in which the court were holden, and at an hour when the court is not actually in session, unless on special order by the court in good cause shown, does not mean all the time from the commencement to the final rising of the court; and hence where the court adjourned on the 22d to the 29th of the month, and the plaintiff's attorney gave a legal notice of his intention to take a deposition on the 26th of the same month, in the town where the defendant's attorney resided, the deposition was not taken during the term time. Holmes v. Sawtelle, 53 Me. 179, 181.

DURING THEIR LIVES.

Where a testator directed his executors to procure a suitable residence for his daughter at an expense not exceeding $6,000, and to hold the same in trust for her and her son "during their lives," devising the property over, the term "during their lives" clearly imported an intention on the part of the testator to give an interest during their joint lives and the life of the survivor, which, on her death before the testator's death, did not lapse, but went to the son for life. Dow v. Doyle, 103 Mass. 489, 491.

DURING TIME OF CONTEST.

Rev. St. 1889, § 13, provides that if the validity of a will be contested, or the executor be a minor or absent from the state, letters of administration should be granted "during the time of such contest," minority, or absence to some other person. It was held that an order of the probate court revoking letters of administration, issued under such section, made after the determination of a will contest in such court, but during the pendency of an appeal therefrom, was erroneous, the appeal to the supreme court being a part of the time of such contest. State ex rel. Hamilton v. Guinotte, 57 S. W. 281, 282, 156 Mo. 513, 50 L. R. A. 787.

DURING TRIAL.

The statutory provision that no person indicted for any felony can be tried unless he be personally present "during such trial" includes all proceedings had in impaneling the jury, the introduction of evidence, the summing up of counsel, and the charge of the court to the jury, and the receiving and recording the verdict. Maurer v. People, 43 N. Y. 1, 3; State v. Smith, 1 S. W. 753, 755, 90 Mo. 37, 59 Am. Rep. 4; State v. Buckner, 25 Mo. 167, 172.

The phrase "during the trial," in the statutory provision that no indictment for a felony shall be tried unless the defendant be personally present during the trial means that it is necessary that the defendant should be in court at each and every time and on all occasions at which and when any substantive step is taken by the court in his cause, and after the indictment is presented by the grand jury to the court up to and until final judgment (including that also) is pronounced in his cause by the court, and even afterwards, if any subsequent step should be taken by his counsel. Osborn v. State, 24 Ark. 629, 635.

The hearing of a motion to quash the information in a prosecution for felony is a part of the trial, within Code Cr. Proc. § 207, providing, "no person indicted or informed against for a felony can be tried unless he be personally present during the trial." This means throughout the whole trial. State v. Clifton, 57 Kan. 448, 449, 46 Pac. 715.

DURING THE VOYAGE.

"During the voyage," as used in a charter party providing that a ship should with all convenient speed be made ready, and, being loaded, should proceed to Stettin, and deliver the cargo, and so end the voyage, "restraints of princes," etc., "during the said voyage always mutually excepted," applies only to the time after the voyage commenced; that is, after the vessel had left her port. Crow v. Falk, 8 Adol. & Ell. (N. S.) 467, 472.

DURING WIDOWHOOD.

"During her widowhood," as used in a will devising all the testator's real and personal estate to his wife to be held and freely possessed and enjoyed "during her widowhood," are words of limitation, and not of condition, limiting the estate to her during her widowhood. Kent, in drawing the distinction between words of limitation and words of condition, says: "Words of limitation mark the period which is to determine the estate; but words of condition render the estate liable to be defeated in the intermediate time, if the event expressed in the condition arises before the determination of the estate or completion of the period described by the limitation. The one specifies the utmost time of continuance, and the other marks some event which, if it takes place in the course of that time, will defeat the estate." Harmon v. Brown, 58 Ind. 207, 208.

The expression "during her widowhood," as used in a will, means during life unless sooner terminated by marriage—that is, a devise or bequest to a wife during her widowhood, or so long as she remains the widow of testator—and is a gift for life only, which may be terminated by a second marriage of the widow. Kratz v. Kratz, 59 N. E. 519, 520, 189 Ill. 276.

A will wherein testator devised property to his wife "during her widowhood, or while she bears my name," but that in case the wife should marry again then the whole should go to a daughter and her heirs forever, gives the devise to the widow during her widowhood, with a vested remainder to the daughter. Farmers' Bank v. Hooff (U. S.) 8 Fed. Cas. 1032, 1033.

DURING WORKING HOURS.

See "Working Hours."

DUTCH AUCTION.

A "Dutch auction" consists of the public offer of property at a price beyond its value, and then gradually lowering the price until some one becomes the purchaser. Crandall v. State, 28 Ohio St. 479, 482.

Where property was offered at a certain high price, and then gradually lowered until some one accepted it as a purchaser, it was an auction. Village of Deposit v. Pitts (N. Y.) 18 Hun, 475, 477.

DUTCH BEER.

"Dutch beer" is a malt inebriating liquor, and does not differ from strong beer, only in its strength and in being less intoxicating. There is nothing in the ordinary sense of the word "Dutch," as qualifying the word beer, to show that beer designated as "Dutch beer" was not intoxicating. People v. Wheelock (N. Y.) 3 Parker, Cr. R. 9, 15.

DUTCH LOTTERY.

Two kinds of lottery may be distinguished. The Genoese or numerical, and the Dutch or class, lottery. The former is described as a scheme by which out of ninety consecutive numbers five are to be selected or drawn by lot. The players have fixed on certain numbers, wagering that one, two, or more of them would be drawn among the five, or that they would appear in a certain order. In the Dutch or class lottery the number and value of the prizes are regularly estimated. All the ticket holders are interested at once in the play, and chance determines whether a prize or a blank shall fall to a given number. Flemins v. Bills, 3 Or. 286, 291.

DUTCH METAL

Old cannon, composed of above 90 per cent. of copper and 7 per cent. of tin, though practically worthless for use against modern implements of war, are not free from duty as Dutch metal, within paragraph 505, Tariff Act July 24, 1897, c. 11, § 2, Free List, 30 Stat. 151 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1682], but are dutiable as manufactures of metal. Downing v. United States (U. S.) 116 Fed. 779.

DUTIES.

See "Ad Valorem Tax"; "Excise"; "Executive Duties"; "Tonnage Duty."

The term "duties" embraces all impositions or charges levied on persons or things. Alexander v. Wilmington & R. R. Co. (S. C.) 3 Strob. 594, 595. But in its more restrained sense it is often used as equivalent to customs or imposts. Union Bank v. Hill, 43 Tenn. (3 Cold.) 325, 328; Pacific Insurance Co. v. Soule (U. S.) 7 Wall. 433, 435, 19 L. Ed. 95.

The word "duty" ordinarily means an indirect tax imposed on importation, exportation, or a consumption of goods, having a broader meaning than "custom," which is a duty imposed on imports or exports. The term "impost" also signifies any tax, tribute, or duty, but it is seldom applied to any but the indirect taxes. Pollock v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co., 15 Sup. Ct. 912, 915, 158 U. S. 601, 39 L. Ed. 1108 (citing Cooley, Tax'n, p. 3).

"Duties," as used in the federal Constitution, must be confined to the idea which they commonly and ordinarily present to the mind as exactions to fill the public coffers for the payments of the debts and promotion of the general welfare of a country. Worsley v. Second Municipality of New Orleans (La.) 9 Rob. 324, 333, 41 Am. Dec. 333.

As used in Const. art. 1, § 10, cl. 3, which prohibits a state without the consent of Congress from laying any "imposts or duties on imports, exports or tonnage," were at the time of the adoption of the Constitution "known to the commerce of the civilized world to be distinct from fees and charges for pilotage and from the penalties by which commercial states enforced their pilot laws, as they were from charges from wharfage or towage or any other local port charges for services rendered to vessels or cargoes; and to declare that such pilot fees or penalties are embraced within the words 'imposts or duties on imports, exports or tonnage' would be to confound things essentially different, and which must have been known to be actually different by those who used this language"; hence the clause above referred to would not include pilot dues or penalties. Cooley v. Board of Wardens of Port of Philadelphia (U. S.) 12 How. 299, 314, 13 L. Ed. 996.

The term "duty," in a brought note referring to a sale of tobacco to be delivered "duty cash" at a certain price, has but one meaning, and refers to the custom or import charges imposed by the government under the tariff upon the importation of the tobacco. Ashner v. Abenheim, 43 N. Y. Supp. 69, 72, 19 Misc. Rep. 282.

In the case of Huse v. Glover, 119 U. S. 543, 549, 7 Sup. Ct. 313, 30 L. Ed. 487, it was said by the terms "tax," "impost," "duty," mentioned in the ordinance of 1787, is meant a charge for the use of the government, not compensation for improvement. The fact that any surplus remaining from the tolls over what is used to keep the locks in repair, and for their collections, is to be paid into the state treasury as a part of the revenue of a state, does not change the character of the toll or impost, and hence wharfage fees are not included. Ouachita & M. R. Packet Co. v. Aiken, 7 Sup. Ct. 907, 909, 121 U. S. 444, 30 L. Ed. 976. The clause does not prevent the artificial improvement of such streams and the exaction of reasonable tolls by the state to pay therefor. Sands v. Manistee River Imp. Co., 8 Sup. Ct. 113, 117, 123 U. S. 288, 31 L. Ed. 149.

The expression "taxes and duties," as used in a lease of land executed after the passage of St. 1866, c. 174, by which the lessee agreed to pay all the "taxes and duties levied or to be levied thereon during the term," includes assessments for betterments authorized by the statute of 1866. Blake v. Baker, 115 Mass. 188.

"Duty on exports," as used in a clause of the federal Constitution prohibiting any state from imposing any duty on exports, includes stamp duties on bills of lading of goods exported, as such bills are "necessarily always associated with every shipment of articles of commerce from the ports of one country to those of another." Almy v. California (U. S.) 24 How. 169, 174, 16 L. Ed. 644.

As used in Act March 3, 1857, providing that the collector's decision shall be final and conclusive as to the "liability of the importation to duty or exemption," unless, etc., refers to the liability of the importation to duty, and not to the rate or amount of the duty imposed. Benkard v. Schell, 3 Fed. Cas. 192.

DUTIES OF DETRACTION.

"Duties of detraction" are a tax levied upon the removal from one state to another of property acquired by succession or testamentary disposition. This tax was formerly levied very generally where foreigners or emigrants withdrew property acquired by the death of relatives from the state of which the decedent was a citizen. By such term is not intended taxes upon succession to our transfers of property. Frederickson v. State of Louisiana, 64 U. S. (23 How.) 445, 16 L. Ed. 577. So that a transfer tax on all property which shall pass by will or by the intestate laws of a state is a succession tax, and not a duty of detraction. In re Strobel's Estate, 30 N. Y. Supp. 169, 5 App. Div. 621.

DUTIES ON IMPORTS.

As tax, see "Tax—Taxation."

A "duty on imports," within the constitutional provision that no state shall, without the consent of Congress, lay any imposts or duties on imports or exports, except what may be absolutely necessary for executing its inspection laws, is not merely a duty on the act of importation, but a duty on the thing imported. It is not, taken in its literal sense, confined to a duty levied while the article is entering the country, but extends to a duty levied after it has entered the country. Brown v. Maryland (U. S.) 12 Wheat. 419, 437, 6 L. Ed. 678.

DUTY.

See "Active Duty"; "Appropriate Duties"; "Certain Duty"; "Judicial Duty"; "Jury Duty"; "Legal Duty"; "Ministerial Duty"; "Official Duties"; "Positive Duty"; "Specific Duty"; "Line of Duty."

All duties, see "All."

The word "duty," as applied to the military service of a trooper, includes the act of the trooper in learning to ride immediately after his enlistment. Bayley v. Jenners, 1 Strange, 2.

The "duty of a telegraph company," as defined by Gen. St. c. 64, § 10, is that it "shall receive dispatches from and for other telegraph line companies and associations and from and for any person, and on payment of the usual charges for transmitting dispatches according to the regulations of the company shall transmit the same faithfully and impartially." The liability of a telegraph company may be limited by reasonable stipulations expressed in its contracts with the senders of messages, and a regulation that the liability of the company for any mistake or delay in the transmission or delivery of a message, or for not delivering the same, shall not extend beyond the sum received for sending it unless the sender orders the message to be repeated by sending it back to the office which first received it and pays half the regular rate additional, is a reasonable regulation, and binding upon all who assent to it. Grinnell v. Western Union Tel. Co., 113 Mass. 299, 302, 18 Am. Rep. 485.

The phrase "a duty imposed by law," as used in Pen. Code, § 288, punishing omission to perform a duty imposed by law, has reference to persons designated by the common law and by the statute, as parents, guardians, or those who, by adoption or otherwise, have assumed the relation in loco parentis; and the duty so to do is made obligatory on them by statute, though not required by the common law. People v. Pierson, 68 N. E. 243, 245, 176 N. Y. 201.

As debt.

"Duty," as used in a statute for the protection of creditors, and for the avoidance of conveyances made to avoid any debt or duty, was to be construed as to be commensurate only with "debt." Fowler v. Frisbie, 3 Conn. 320, 324.

Discretion implied.

"Duty," as used in an instruction that if the plaintiff has, by a preponderance of the evidence, proved the material allegations of his complaint, the jury will find in his favor, and that it is their duty to determine the amount of his damage, instead of directing them that they "may" find in his favor and "may" assess his damage, will not be construed as coercive upon the jury, and tending to deprive the jury of their freedom of action in the matter, and hence to be an invasion by the court of the province of the jury. North Chicago St. R. Co. v. Zeiger, 54 N. E. 1006, 1007, 182 Ill. 9, 74 Am. St. Rep. 157.

In Comp. St. c. 79, § 4, clause 1, providing that it shall be the duty of the county superintendent to create a new district from other organized districts on a petition signed by one-half of the legal voters in each district affected, "duty" should be construed to mean rather a judicial discretion than a duty to be enforced by the authority of mandamus. State v. Clary, 41 N. W. 256, 257, 25 Neb. 403.

The word "duty," in Act Cong. 1793, declaring that it shall be the duty of the executive authority of the state to cause a fugitive demanded in extradition proceedings by another state to be arrested, etc., means the moral obligation of the state to perform the compact in the Constitution, when Congress had by that act regulated the mode by which the duty was to be performed. The word "duty" was not a mandatory word, but merely declaratory of that obligation which the state was under as a part of its comity with other states. Kentucky v. Dennison (U. S.) 24 How. 66, 107, 16 L. Ed. 717.

As legal obligation.

"Duty," as used in Laws 1811, p. 462, § 3, providing that, when any suit is founded on any writing, the court in which the same is pending shall receive such writing as evidence for the debt or duty for which it is given, means "a legal obligation to perform some act." Allen v. Dickson (Ala.) Minor, 119, 120.

In a canon proposed by counsel as follows: "A communication made bona fide on any subject-matter in which the party communicating has an interest, or in reference to which he has a 'duty,' is privileged, if made to a person having a corresponding interest or duty, though it contained criminal matter which without this privilege would be slanderous and actionable"—the word "duty" cannot be confined to legal duties, enforceable by indictment, action, or mandamus, but must include moral and social duties of imperfect obligation. Harrison v. Bush, 5 El. & Bl. 344, 349.

As obligation.

One's "duty" is what one is bound or under obligation to do. Crockett v. Village of Barre, 29 Atl. 147, 66 Vt. 269 (citing Soule, Syn. [Ed. 1880] p. 129).

In Civ. Code, § 55, providing that consent alone will not constitute marriage, but that it must be followed up by a solemnization, or by a mutual assumption of marital rights, duties or obligations, the word "duties" is synonymous with the word "obligations" as there used, and signifies the obligations which flow from the relation of husband and wife. Sharon v. Sharon, 16 Pac. 345, 349, 75 Cal. 1.

Power implied.

As used in St. 1855, c. 152, declaring it to be the duty of the jury to try, according to established forms and principles of law, all causes which shall be committed to them, the word "duty" includes both power and right. What it is a man's "duty" to do, he has the rightful power to do. Commonwealth v. Anthes, 71 Mass. (5 Gray) 185, 252.

The word "duties," as used in Const. art. 5, § 8, providing that in case of the removal of the Governor from office, or of his death, resignation, or inability to discharge the duties of the office, the same should devolve on the Secretary of State, necessarily implies powers, and in legal effect is equivalent to the words "powers and duties." Chadwick v. Earhart, 4 Pac. 1180, 11 Or. 389.

As service.

"Worcester, among his other definitions, defines 'duty' as follows: 'Any service, business, or office.' A like definition is given in the Imperial Dictionary. When we speak of 'duty,' as applied to a servant or employé, the matter involves his service or business. We intend to refer to what he does in his service or business. When we ask a servant what his general duties are, we intend to ask him what service or work he generally performs." Missouri Pac. Ry. Co. v. Mackey, 6 Pac. 291, 302, 83 Kan. 298.

DWELL

See "Actually Dwells."

"Dwell" means to abide as a permanent resident. Hinds v. Hinds, 1 Iowa (1 Clarke) 36, 41.

To "dwell" is to inhabit; to live in a place; to reside; to have a habitation. Gardener v. Wagner, 9 Fed. Cas. 1154, 1158.

To "dwell" is to abide as a permanent resident, or inhabit for a time; to live in a place; to have a habitation for some time or permanently. It invariably involves the idea of the present home of a person, whether it is designed to be permanent or temporary, and whether for general or special purposes. Ex parte Blumer, 27 Tex. 734, 736.

"Cohabit" means to dwell with, to dwell or live together, as husband and wife; and to "dwell" means to abide as a permanent resident, or to cohabit in a place for a time; to live during a considerable period in a place; to have a habitation for some time or permanence; to be domiciled; to remain. A man and a woman, by stopping one night at a house on a transitory visit and assuming marital relations, did not "dwell" together. Turney v. State, 29 S. W. 893, 987, 60 Ark. 259.

"Dwelleth or hath his home," as used in the Constitution providing that "every person having certain enumerated qualifications shall have a right to give in his vote for senators for the district of which he is an inhabitant, and to remove all doubt concerning the word 'inhabitant' in this Constitution, every person shall be considered as an inhabitant (for the purpose of electing or being elected into any office or place within this state) in that town, district and plantation, where he dwelleth or hath his home," is not to be construed as meaning the same thing as "legal settlement" within the intent of the statutes providing for the support of paupers. A person may have his legal settlement in one town and be entitled to vote in another. The purpose of the law is to give the selectmen of the town the means of scrutinizing the claim of a person to a right to vote. Putnam v. Johnson, 10 Mass. 488, 502.

Act March 21, 1821, declaring that any person resident at any town, who has not within one year received support or supplies from some town as a pauper, shall be deemed to have a settlement in the town where he then "dwells and has his home," means some permanent abode and residence with intention to remain, or at least without an intention of removal; something more than the habits and life of a wanderer, who has no place where he has a right to continue and call it and claim it as his rightful home. Inhabitants of Turner v. Inhabitants of Buckfield, 3 Me. (3 Greenl.) 227, 231.

As used in a statute declaring that the settlement of a pauper shall be the town in which he dwells and has his home, the phrase "dwells and has his home" means a place of fixed abode, as distinguishing the pauper from a tramp. It is not necessary that he should have a dwelling house in the town, so long as he uniformly resides there. Inhabitants of Parsonsfield v. Perkins, 2 Me. (2 Greenl.) 411.

As used in a statute authorizing probate courts of the county in which the deceased dwelt to take jurisdiction of his estate, "dwelt" meant the county in which the deceased was an inhabitant, unless he was a stranger and had only a residence, and did not give a judge of a county where a man happens to die, jurisdiction, though the man was on a temporary absence from home. Harvard College v. Gore, 22 Mass. (5 Pick.) 370, 379.

"Dwells," as used in 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, § 128, giving the superior court a concurrent jurisdiction to the county court where "the plaintiff dwells more than 20 miles from the defendant," means the ordinary dwelling of the party, and not a place like a jail, where a person is temporarily detained, and may be for a single night or day in custody. Dunston v. Paterson, 5 J. Scott (N. S.) 267, 277.

One who resided at Inverness, but had been in the habit for some years of coming to London and residing for some months in Golden Square for the purpose of his business, did not "dwell" in Golden Square within the meaning of 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, relating to the jurisdiction of the county court. Macdougall v. Paterson, 7 Eng. Law & Eq. 510, 518.

Testator devised to his daughter two houses and lots, "she permitting at the same time her mother to occupy and dwell in the better of them for and during her natural life." Held, that "to dwell" means to inhabit, to live in; and there was not a grant of the beneficial interest in the house to the mother, so that she might either occupy it or let it, receiving the rent, but that she might live in it merely. Gardener v. Wagner, 9 Fed. Cts. 1154, 1156.

Actual presence.

"Dwell" means to reside, to inhabit, to have a fixed place of residence; but it is not restricted in meaning to actual presence. Eatontown v. Shrewsbury, 6 Atl. 319, 320, 49 N. J. Law (20 Vroom) 188 (citing Worcester, Dict.).

One who resides in Scotland, and carries on business in London by means of an agent, does not "dwell or carry on his business" within the city of London within the meaning of 10 & 11 Vict. c. 71, requiring such dweller to sue in the city small debt court for a debt not exceeding £20. Sheila v. Rait, 7 Q. B. 116, 118.

Boarding.

"Actually dwells," as used in Rev. St. § 1500, subd. 7, providing that whenever any territory shall be organized into any town every person having a legal settlement in such territory, and who actually dwells or has his home therein, shall have thereafter a legal settlement in such new town, should be construed to include one who is boarded or supported at a particular house. They mean nothing more than the place where the person actually remains, tarries, abides for some length of time, continues, stays, sojourns. The place where he actually lodges and takes his meals must come within the meaning of the words "actually dwells." Town of Hay River v. Town of Sherman, 18 N. W. 740, 741, 60 Wis. 54.

In reference to corporations.

A corporation or quasi corporation "dwells" at the place where its business is carried on, within 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, § 128, authorizing a plaintiff to sue in the superior court or the county court when he dwells more than 20 miles from the defendant. Taylor v. Crowland Gas & Coke Co., 11 Exch. 1.

DWELLING—DWELLING HOUSE.

See "Private Dwelling"; "Inhabited Dwelling House"; "Quasi Dwelling House"; "Separate Dwelling House"; "Single Dwelling House."

As building, see "Building (In Criminal Law)."

"Dwelling house," as used in Rev. St. § 2426, providing that whoever willfully and maliciously burns a dwelling house, or any building adjoining such dwelling house, shall be punished, etc., refers to dwelling houses other than those of the accused, though no other dwelling house is specifically mentioned in the statute. Hicks v. State, 29 South. 631, 632, 43 Fla. 171.

Where the building insured in a policy is described as a "dwelling house," it is merely descriptive of the building, and does not include a warranty that it is used as such. Niagara Fire Ins. Co. v. Johnson, 45 Pac. 789, 791, 4 Kan. App. 16. See, also, Browning v. Home Ins. Co., 71 N. Y. 508, 511, 27 Am. Rep. 87.

Under 2 Rev. St. p. 657, § 9, every house which shall have been usually occupied by a person lodging therein at night shall be deemed a "dwelling house" of any person so lodging therein, so as to render accused setting fire to same guilty of arson in the first degree. Woodford v. People, 62 N. Y. 117, 20 Am. Rep. 464.

The term "dwelling house," in the statute making it an offense to burn a dwelling house, cannot be construed to include a building which is not in fact a dwelling house. Commonwealth v. Hayden, 23 N. E. 51, 150 Mass. 332.

Additions.

A dwelling house is an entire thing; it includes the buildings, and such attachments as are usually occupied and used for the family for the ordinary purposes of a house; and an insurance policy on a "stone dwelling house" covers a wooden kitchen, one story high, attached thereto. Chase v. Hamilton Ins. Co., 20 N. Y. 52, 55.

In a contract to complete a "dwelling house" conveyed, a one-story building annexed to the house proper, designed for a kitchen, and another erection attached to it, designed for a washroom, is included. Hovey v. Luce, 31 Me. 346, 349.

Apartments in tenement.

"Any and every settled habitation of a man and his family is his house or his mansion in respect to its burglarious entry," and a set of apartments in a tenement opening into a common hall is a "dwelling house" within the meaning of the statute defining "burglary." Mason v. People, 26 N. Y. 200, 202; Smith v. Birmingham Waterworks Co., 104 Ala. 315, 16 South. 123, 125.

The plaintiff in error was indicted and convicted as an accessory before the fact to the crime of arson in the first degree. The fire was set in a five-story tenement house, having a common entrance upon the street and from a yard in the rear. Upon the different stories the apartments of the tenants, consisting of several rooms, opened upon common halls. The plaintiff in error and his wife rented and lived in three rooms on the second floor. One K. occupied, with his wife and two children, three rooms adjoining those of the plaintiff in error, but not directly communicating with them. The fire was set in the rooms of the plaintiff in error, and burned portions thereof, but not to any extent the rooms occupied by K. There was no one in the rooms of the plaintiff in error when the fire was set, but there were in those of K. The indictment charged the principal with having in the nighttime set fire to and burned a certain dwelling house of one K. Held, that the indictment properly charged that the fire was set in the dwelling house of K. Levy v. People (N. Y.) 19 Hun, 383, 385.

Attached building.

The term "dwelling house," within the meaning of Nix, Dig. 289, § 34, prohibiting the pulling down or removal of any dwelling house in the construction of roads, was construed to include all the buildings attached to and used in connection with the house in which persons dwelt or usually lived; and therefore it was held to embrace a billiard saloon attached to a hotel and always used in connection with and as a part thereof for business purposes, though it was not actually dwelt in by any person. Rogers v. Troth, 36 N. J. Law (7 Vroom) 422, 424.

Barn or granary.

"Dwelling," as used in Acts 1882, No. 41, which provides that no person shall give away intoxicating liquors except in his "own private dwelling," does not include his barn and granary. State v. Camp, 24 Atl. 1114, 64 Vt. 295.

"Dwelling house," when used in a warrant authorizing an officer to search for liquors in a certain dwelling house, does not include the barn. Jones v. Fletcher, 41 Me. 254, 256.

Under a statute (Comp. Laws, § 5754) defining "burglary" in the same terms in which it was defined at common law, it is held that the term "dwelling house" must be presumed to have been used in the same sense in which it was used in the common-law definition, and that consequently a barn was a "dwelling house" within the statute, the term "dwelling house" including all the occupied buildings occupied and used by the family for domestic purposes. Pitcher v. People, 16 Mich. 142, 143.

Boarding house.

"A man's 'dwelling house' is that in which he and his family, if he have any, eat, sleep, and make their home; and it is none the less his dwelling house because he may not be the owner of it, that in it he keeps rooms for lodgers and furnishes meals to others, and that the license for so doing is in the name of another." It is so used in a statute making larceny from a dwelling house criminal. State v. Leedy, 8 S. W. 245, 246, 95 Mo. 76.

Within the meaning of the statute prohibiting the establishment of a saloon "within 200 feet of the nearest entrance to a dwelling house," the fact that the owner of the house, in which he dwelt with his family, was in the habit of letting rooms in such house by the week to persons who might apply for them, did not make such house a boarding house, or deprive it of its character as a dwelling house. It was not a place where the general public would be invited to enter and transact business, but to every intent it would still be a private house, and its occupants entitled to the privacy which surrounds a dwelling house. In re Veeder, 65 N. Y. Supp. 517, 31 Misc. Rep. 569.

The use of a house leased to be used strictly as a private dwelling, and not for any public or objectional purpose, is violated by its use as a boarding house. Gannett v. Albree, 103 Mass. 372, 374.

The change from a dwelling house or a private dwelling house to a boarding house was not a violation of a policy of insurance of a house insured as a "dwelling house." Rafferty v. New Brunswick Fire Ins. Co., 18 N. J. Law (3 Har.) 480, 482, 38 Am. Dec. 525.

The fact that six or seven boarders live in a house, and a few others take meals there, does not destroy its character as a "dwelling," within the terms of a contract between a waterworks company and the city for domestic rates for water furnished dwellings. Birmingham Waterworks Co. v. Truss, 33 South. 657, 135 Ala. 530.

Buildings in curtilage.

"Dwelling house," as used in a definition of burglary as being a breaking and entering of a dwelling house, etc., has been the subject of much diversity of opinion. Some cases include all within the curtilage, and this, according to Blackstone, appears to have been the common-law rule, while others have been made to turn upon the use. It has been said that burglary may be committed by breaking into a dairy or laundry standing near enough the dwelling house to be used as appurtenant, or into such outbuildings as are necessary to it as a dwelling. State v. Langford, 12 N. C. 253. Also by breaking into a smokehouse opening into the yard of a dwelling house, and used for its ordinary purposes. And cases are to be found which hold that if an outhouse be so near the dwelling proper that it is used with it as appurtenant to it, although not within the same inclosure even, yet burglary may be committed in it. State v. Twitty, 2 N. C. 102. It need have no internal communication with the dwelling proper to give it this character. In Rex v. Lithgo, Russ. & R. 357, the breaking was into a warehouse. There was no internal communication between it and the dwelling of the owner; but they were contiguous, inclosed in the same yard, and under the same roof; and it was held to be burglary. It is difficult to lay down any general rule upon the subject, owing to the nice distinctions to be found in some of the cases. It seems to us, however, that both the use and the situation should be considered. Can the place which has been entered, considering both its situation and use, be fairly considered as appurtenant to and a parcel of the dwelling house, or, as the older writers say, a parcel of the messuage? If so, then burglary may be committed by breaking into it. Mitchell v. Commonwealth, 11 S. W. 209, 210, 88 Ky. 349. See, also, State v. McCall, 4 Ala. 643, 644, 39 Am. Dec. 314; Stearns v. Vincent, 15 N. W. 86, 91, 50 Mich. 209, 45 Am. Rep. 37; People v. Taylor, 2 Mich. 250, Pitcher v. People, 16 Mich. 142, 146; State v. Evans, 18 S. C. 137, 139; State v. Whit, 49 N. C. 349, 352; State v. Mordecai, 68 N. C. 207, 208; Quinn v. People, 71 N. Y. 561, 568, 27 Am. Rep. 87; State v. South, 3^d S. W. 716, 136 Mo. 673; State v. Hecox, 83 Mo. 531, 535.

As used in 21 & 22 Vict. c. 105, enacting that every person who shall sell or expose for sale within the limits of the act, other than in his own dwelling house, any article in respect to which tolls are authorized, shall forfeit a certain sum, the term "dwelling house" was employed in a popular sense, not including the curtilage, the intention being that the established traders of the district who carried on their business in their own dwelling houses or shops should not be interfered with. Llandaff & C. Dist. Market Co. v. Lyndon, 8 C. B. (N. S.) 515, 524.

The term "dwelling" was held in a homicide case to include a net house near the building which defendant occupied as a dwelling; which net house was used not only for preserving the nets, but in the occupation of defendant as fisherman, and also as a permanent dormitory for his servants, though not included with the house by a fence. "It was held in People v. Taylor, 2 Mich. 250, that a fence was not necessary to include buildings within the curtilage, as within a space no larger than that usually occupied for the purposes of the dwelling and customary outbuildings." Pond v. People, 8 Mich. 150, 181.

"Dwelling house," as used in a statute punishing the burglary of a dwelling house, does not include a barn, used for storing grain, 300 yards from the dwelling house and in a different inclosure. This building was not a dwelling house or any part of one; it was an outhouse, and not an outhouse belonging to or used with a dwelling house; it was used for storing the products of a farm, and not for any purpose connected with the occupancy or enjoyment of the dwelling. Whalen v. Commonwealth (Ky.) 32 S. W. 1095, 1096.

A house in which no member of the family slept, and used for the sale of goods, is not a part of the dwelling house, though within 30 feet of it, and within the same inclosure. Armour v. State, 22 Tenn. (3 Humph.) 379, 385.

A log cabin belonging to the owner of a tobacco factory, in which the superintendent of the factory usually slept, being a substantial and permanent one, is a "dwelling house" in which burglary may be committed. But a smokehouse 35 steps from a dwelling house is not included in the term, the dwelling house having no inclosure around it. State v. Jake, 60 N. C. 471, 472.

Under Code, § 4386, in reference to burglary, declaring that all outhouses contiguous or within the curtilage or protection of the mansion or "dwelling house" shall be considered as parts of the same, the breaking and entering a gearhouse, separated from the main yard by a fence and fenced to it, may constitute burglary if there is a gate between it and the main yard always left open at night, so as to constitute one yard under the protection of the yard dog. Bryant v. State, 60 Ga. 358, 359.

Within the meaning of a statute forbidding the pulling down or removal of any dwelling house in laying out a highway, the word "dwelling" is not as comprehensive as when that term is used in defining the crimes of burglary or arson, where it includes not only the dwelling, but also outhouses which are within the curtilage, though not under the same roof. That construction is impracticable in the laying out of a highway. The statute does not prohibit the laying of highways through buildings, except of the enumerated class. With respect to any other building, the ownership of which is in a private individual, a public road may be laid out so as to compel its removal without regard to the expense thereof. The term "dwelling house" in this statute should be restricted to its literal import—a place of habitation. Pancoast v. Troth, 34 N. J. Law (5 Vroom) 377, 383.

"Dwelling house," as used in Rev. Code, c. 34, § 2, punishing arson, means an inhabited house. In deciding whether it was the legislative intent to include inhabited houses only, or to extend the term "dwelling houses" to all structures within the curtilage, it is proper to regard the penalty imposed, since, where such penalty is very high, it may be reasonably supposed that the Legislature intended to restrict the term to inhabited houses. State v. Clark, 52 N. C. 167, 168.

Cellar.

"Dwelling house," as used in Revision 1879, § 1309, providing for the punishment of any larceny committed in a dwelling house, cannot be construed to include an underground cellar used for storing ice and beer, having no internal door of communication with the living rooms in the upper stories of the same building, and not under the control and dominion of any occupant of the building. If one part of a building is used for abode, it gives the character of dwelling house to every other part to which there is an internal communication, even though generally occupied by another person for an entirely different purpose. State v. Clark, 1 S. W. 332, 89 Mo. 422.

Character of building as affecting.

Buildings 12 feet long by 8 feet wide and 7 feet high, without windows or chimneys, not lathed or plastered, and which had not been used as dwellings until occupied by a man of migratory habits, without family, will not be held to be "dwellings" within the meaning of Liquor Tax Law, § 28, providing that there shall be filed with the application for a liquor certificate a consent in writing executed by the owners of at least two-thirds of the buildings occupied exclusively for dwellings. In re Lyman, 53 N. Y. Supp. 577, 578, 24 Misc. Rep. 552.

A shanty put up and occupied for the sole purpose of preventing a condemnation of a stone quarry, and not in good faith for a dwelling house, will not entitle the owner to the exemption of location of quarries within 200 yards of a dwelling house, as provided by statute. Morris v. Schallsville Branch of Winchester & Red River T. P. R. Co., 67 Ky. (4 Bush) 448, 449.

By the term "dwelling house" as used in a statute relating to homesteads, no particular kind of a house is intended. It may be a brownstone front all of which is occupied for a residence, or it may be a building part of which is used for a bank or business purposes, or it may be a tent of cloth. All that the law requires is that the homestead claimant and his family should reside in this habitation or dwelling house, whatever be its character, on the premises claimed as a homestead. Corey v. Schuster, 62 N. W. 470, 44 Neb. 269.

A "dwelling house," which under the statute is exempt when situated on a city lot, means the habitation or abode of the owner thereof and his family, and does not require that it should be constructed in any particular style or built in any prescribed manner, but it is to be in good faith and truly the dwelling house, or residence or abode, of the owner and his family, in order to be exempt. Phelps v. Rooney, 9 Wis. 70, 76 Am. Dec. 244.

Character of use of building as affecting.

A dwelling house "is a building inhabited by man; the abode or residence of a family. The character of its occupation, and not the purpose for which it was erected, govern the question of whether or not it is a dwelling house"; and a building originally erected as a dwelling house, but subsequently for many years used for other purposes, cannot be regarded as a dwelling house. New York Fire Dept. v. Buhler, 33 How. Prac. 378, 383, 35 N. Y. 177.

The word "dwelling" is not free from ambiguity. In a certain sense any house in which people dwell might be considered a dwelling. Glover v. National Fire Ins. Co. (U. S.) 85 Fed. 125, 130, 30 C. C. A. 95.

"Dwelling," as used in a deed providing that the vendee should not erect on the land any building for other use or purpose than a private dwelling, restricts the character of buildings by eliminating all buildings for business purposes, such as stores, livery stables, factories, and the like. Skillman v. Smathehurst, 40 Atl. 855, 856, 57 N. J. Eq. 1.

In construing a prosecution for arson in burning a barn on a farm situated about 30 yards from the dwelling house in which the owner with his family lived, there being a sleeping apartment in the loft of the barn in which a man had slept for more than a month up to the time of the burning, and in which he was sleeping when he discovered the barn on fire, the court said: "Whether a building was a 'dwelling house' or not depended upon the fact whether it was usually occupied by persons lodging therein at night, and not upon the popular understanding of that term. If a part of it was occupied as a sleeping room, it was sufficient, although other parts might be used for other and entirely different purposes. It matters not how rude and devoid of comforts a dwelling house may be, if it is the usual sleeping place of a human being, and he is occupying it when it is feloniously burnt, the statute makes it arson in the first degree. The statute makes no distinction between the burning of a palace and the hostler's room in this respect. In either case a human life is imperiled." State v. Jones, 17 S. W. 366, 368, 106 Mo. 302.

A loghouse without fire or fireplace, and with its single window boarded up, built for the use of wood-choppers when working near by, in which several persons were staying temporarily, with the consent of the owner, sleeping and eating there, is a "dwelling house" within Rev. St. 1889, § 2531, defining the crime of burglary. Being occupied as a dwelling house, it must be held to have been such, for the use to which a house is put usually determines its character. State v. Weber, 56 S. W. 893, 894, 156 Mo. 257.

Whether a building is or is not a dwelling house depends upon the use to which it is put. A barn may be converted into a dwelling house, or a dwelling house into a barn, by the change of uses. So a county infirmary may be or may not be a dwelling house, depending in no wise on the question of its ownership, or the purpose of its original construction, but upon outside facts and circumstances. Davis v. State, 38 Ohio St. 505, 506.

Construction of building as affecting.

In Rev. St. 1889, § 3525, providing that no building shall be deemed a dwelling house within the provisions of the statute relating to burglary unless the same be joined to, immediately connected with, and is a part of the dwelling house, the phrase "part of a dwelling house" means a part of the building which constituted a dwelling house. Where a room was separated from another by about four feet, both being inclosed under the same roof, and connected by porches on each side extending from the door of one to the door of the other, in one of which rooms a person lived, and the other being used for storing and keeping things not in immediate use, the latter room is a part of the dwelling house, though there was no internal communication between this room and the other. State v. Hutchinson, 20 S. W. 84, 111 Mo. 257.

Courthouse and jail.

The term "dwelling house," within the definition of arson as the "burning of a dwelling house," includes a courthouse and jail, when the jailer lives with his family in a part of the building. The court will not inquire into the tenure of interest which such person has when the house burned. It is enough that it was his actual dwelling at the time. People v. Van Blaricum (N. Y.) 2 Johns. 105.

Rev. St. pp. 657, 666, 667, declaring the willful burning of an inhabited dwelling house a crime, etc., includes a gaol or prison. The words "inhabited dwelling house" include such a building, though setting fire to it by a prisoner therein in order to effect his escape would not constitute arson. People v. Cotteral (N. Y.) 18 Johns. 115, 120.

Under Rev. St. 1889, § 3511, providing that the burning of any dwelling in which there shall be at the time some human being, is arson in the first degree, and section 3512, providing that every house, prison, jail, etc., shall be deemed a dwelling house, an indictment for arson in the first degree, charging defendant with burning a jail, which fails to allege that it is a dwelling house, is fatally defective. State v. Whitmore, 147 Mo. 78, 81, 47 S. W. 1068.

Curtilage or surrounding land included.

As used in Rev. St. 1840, c. 81, § 5, providing that no "dwelling house" shall be taken in locating a railroad without the consent of the owner of the house, the term does not include the garden, orchard, or curtilage. Wells v. Somerset & K. R. Co., 47 Me. 345, 347.

As used in Act 1849, which forbade a railroad company to pass through any dwelling house, in the occupancy of the owner or owners thereof without his or her consent, the "dwelling house" embraces as much of the curtilage as is necessary for a reasonable and proper enjoyment of the house as a residence, in view of its location and surroundings. Damon v. Baltimore & P. R. Co., 13 Atl. 217, 221, 119 Pa. 287.

A devise of a dwelling house with all the appurtenances and privileges thereunto belonging, designated as premises which the testator had improved as a boarding house, was construed to pass not only house, with stable, yards, gardens, etc., but also 18 acres of land adjoining the house. Jackson v. White (N. Y.) 8 Johns. 59, 63.

In a statute prohibiting a railroad company from passing through any "dwelling house in the occupancy of the owner thereof without his consent," the term "dwelling house" necessarily includes some curtilage connected therewith. The exact extent of that curtilage cannot be defined by an arbitrary rule as to distance. As each case arises, the right of the owner and occupier of the dwelling house against hostile location of a railroad must be determined by a consideration of what is necessary for a reasonable and proper enjoyment of the house as a residence, in view of its location and surroundings. Within this rule it is held that the taking by the railroad company of a rear corner of a lot, 150 feet from the nearest point to the dwelling house is not prohibited. Appeal of Swift, 2 Atl. 539, 541, 111 Pa. 516.

A grant of a "dwelling house" will convey the buildings belonging to it, its garden, orchard, and the land on which it is built, within reasonable limitations. Marston v. Stickney, 58 N. H. 609, 610.

In an information for forcible detainer, charging that defendant forcibly kept the owner out of a dwelling house, the words, "dwelling house" embraced the land on which it stood, and the charge of its forcible detention was equivalent to a charge of the forcible detention of the land on which it was standing. Endsley v. State, 76 Ind. 467, 469.

Under a statute providing that, on the destruction of a building so as to be unfit for occupancy, the lessee shall not be liable to pay rent thereafter unless otherwise expressly provided, the territory that will be included under the designation "building" or "dwelling house" in a lease of the same, without any qualifying word to restrict its meaning, would pass no more land than is necessary for its complete enjoyment; and where a dwelling house was leased, which was in the center of an 11-acre lot, and the building was destroyed by fire, the fact that certain outbuildings were still uninjured would not prevent the tenant from claiming the benefits of the statute. Avery v. House (Ohio) 1 O. C. D. 463.

Different use of part of building as affecting.

Where the owner of a dwelling house used one room of his house as a shoe shop, and this room was connected with the rest of the house, it was properly held to be a part of the dwelling house. People v. Dupree, 56 N. W. 1046, 1047, 98 Mich. 28.

As used in a fire insurance policy describing the place insured as the "frame dwelling house," a certain number on a street means a building in use as a dwelling house, and not used for any purpose incompatible therewith. The use of part of the building as a grocery store is an inconsistent and incompatible use with that of dwelling. Dougherty v. Greenwich Ins. Co., 42 Atl. 485, 486, 64 N. J. Law, 716.

A lot of land was conveyed subject to a restriction that no building should be erected thereon excepting a dwelling house. It was held a violation of the restriction for the grantee to build a dwelling house on the lot and use the lower story as a grocery. Dorr v. Harrahan, 101 Mass. 531, 534, 3 Am. Rep. 398.

The term "dwelling house," as employed in the act defining arson in the first degree, is one which is wholly or is in part usually occupied by persons lodging therein at night, although other parts or the greater part may be occupied for an entirely different purpose. People v. Orcott (N. Y.) 1 Parker, Cr. R. 252, 255.

A building the front room of which on the first floor was occupied as a store, the back room as a dining room, and the upper rooms as sleeping apartments for the owner, is a "dwelling house," so as to render the riotous destruction of the front door and window of the storeroom within a statute punishing the pulling down or destruction of a dwelling house. Samanni v. Commonwealth (Va.) 16 Grat. 543, 545.

Breaking and entering into a store on the ground floor of a dwelling house, both store and dwelling being occupied by the owner thereof, was a breaking into a "dwelling house" occupied and used by a family for domestic purposes. People v. Griffin, 77 Mich. 585, 586, 43 N. W. 1061.

Where the lower story of a building was occupied for a store, and the upper story for a dwelling, and the back door was common to the store and the dwelling, the store was not a part of the "dwelling," so as to render an officer breaking open the door into the store under an execution guilty of a trespass. Stearns v. Vincent, 15 N. W. 86, 91, 50 Mich. 209, 45 Am. Rep. 37.

The term "dwelling house," as used in the law of burglary, may be applied to a building occupied by one in charge of a plantation, who ordinarily sleeps in one room of it, although another room may be occasionally occupied as an office or bedroom by another, who, while there, is the master of the plantation. Ashton v. State, 68 Ga. 25, 26.

Where by contract with a city a water company agrees to furnish water at a fixed yearly rate to dwellings, a building, the first floor of which is used as a store, the second as offices, and the third as sleeping apartments for single men, is a "dwelling," within the meaning of the contract, to the extent of the rooms occupied as sleeping apartments. Smith v. Birmingham Waterworks Co., 18 South. 123, 125, 104 Ala. 315.

The term "dwelling house," as used in a statute exempting homesteads, does not contemplate any particular kind of a house. This requirement of the law is satisfied if the homestead claimant and his family reside in a habitation, whatever may be its character, on the premises claimed as the homestead. Thus where the building was a two-story frame building, and the debtor used the first floor for mercantile purposes, and resided with his family on the second floor, such building constituted a dwelling house. Corey v. Schuster, 62 N. W. 470, 44 Neb. 269.

As domicile or residence.

A "dwelling house" means a place of abode; a habitation; a house occupied or intended to be occupied as a residence. Agricultural Ins. Co. v. Hamilton, 33 Atl. 429, 430, 82 Md. 88, 30 L. R. A. 633, 51 Am. St. Rep. 457.

In Comp. Laws, § 4893, providing that the service of summons may be made at the dwelling house of defendant in the presence of one or more members of his family, the "dwelling house" as contemplated is one in which a person has his legal residence or domicile, and one in which he permanently resides. Massillon Engine & Thresher Co. v. Hubbard, 77 N. W. 588, 11 S. D. 325 (citing Ames v. Winsor, 36 Mass. [19 Pick.] 247; Opinion of Judges, 46 Mass. [5 Metc.] 587).

"Dwelling house," as used in Prac. Act, § 49, providing that the service of summons shall be made upon the defendant in person, or by leaving it at his dwelling house or usual place of abode, does not mean residence, but is a much more restricted term, meaning the place where defendant is actually living at the time when the service is made. Mygatt v. Coe, 44 Atl. 198, 199, 63 N. J. Law, 510; Hervey v. Hervey, 38 Atl. 767, 773, 56 N. J. Eq. 166; Stout v. Leonard, 37 N. J. Law (8 Vroom) 492, 495.

Where there was a house or building on property claimed as a homestead, and the claimant resided in it, the building should be dignified with the name of a "dwelling." Lozo v. Sutherland, 38 Mich. 168, 170.

The term "dwelling house," as used in an indictment for burglary, means that the building broken and entered into was a place of residence, occupied as such at the time of the breaking and entering. Bell v. State, 20 Wis. 599, 601.

Where a petitioner asks for a cartway leading "from his dwelling house and lands, and through the lands of L., into the public highway," by the words "dwelling" and "lands" is fairly meant the home of the petitioner; the place where he lives; where he settled; and is a sufficient compliance with Code, § 2056, providing that any person "settled upon" any land to which there is leading no public road may petition for a private way. Warlick v. Lowman, 9 S. E. 458, 459, 103 N. C. 122.

The term "dwelling house," within the meaning of a search warrant, authorizing the search of the house of a certain person, means the house in which he dwells. "He may own a dozen houses and live in a hired one himself. A warrant to search the 'dwelling house' of such a person would confer an authority to search the house in which he dwells, but not the houses which he owned and rented to other persons." Humes v. Taber, 1 R. I. 464, 471.

Hotel.

"Dwelling house," as used in Cr. Code, § 3786, defining burglary as the breaking and entering a dwelling house, does not necessarily include an hotel, for an hotel may or may not be a dwelling house, according to the facts as to its occupancy and habitation. Thomas v. State, 12 South. 409, 410, 97 Ala. 3.

The term "dwelling house," as used in a statute limiting the height of dwelling houses in the city, should receive its ordinary and popular import, and does not include hotels. People v. D'Oench, 18 N. E. 862, 111 N. Y. 359.

The term "dwelling house," in a fire policy on a dwelling house, does not correctly describe a house which has been used for years as a hotel and purchased by insured as such, though it is only occupied by a care-taker till insured is able to sell it, and therefore a recovery cannot be had on the policy. Thomas v. Commercial Union Assur. Co., 37 N. E. 672, 673, 162 Mass. 29, 44 Am. St. Rep. 323.

House distinguished.

"Dwelling house" is not synonymous with "house." The former is used in a broader and more comprehensive sense than the latter. State v. Garity, 46 N. H. 61, 62.

As used in a statute taking the benefit of clergy away from persons convicted of burning a dwelling house or barn having corn or grain in it, "dwelling house" should not be construed as synonymous with "house," and hence, where the indictment charges the burning of a house, the benefit of clergy will be allowed. The appropriate meaning of "house" may be the abode of man, but its more general sense, as a covering or place of shelter, is too common to be altogether disregarded. State v. Sutcliffe (S. C.) 4 Strob. 372, 403.

Millhouse.

A millhouse in which no one sleeps, at a distance of 75 yards from its owner's dwelling house, but separated by a public highway therefrom, and not proved to be appurtenant, is not a parcel of the dwelling house so as to be the subject of burglary at common law. State v. Sampson, 12 S. C. 567, 569, 32 Am. Rep. 513.

Ownership as affecting.

A "dwelling house," within Rev. St. 1889, § 3521, defining burglary, includes any house inhabited by man, and is the dwelling of one who resides there, although it is owned by another. State v. Weber, 56 S. W. 893, 894, 156 Mo. 257.

Piazza.

An open piazza in front of a dwelling house and attached to it is not a house, nor can it be a dwelling house. It may be attached to the house, and may in some sense be a part of the house, but it is not of itself the house. To be in such a piazza is not to be in the house, and the piazza is not within the spirit of the law which attaches a sanctity to the house, and adds to the punishment of larceny therefrom on account of that sanctity. Henry v. State, 39 Ala. 679, 680.

Schoolhouse.

A "dwelling house," within the meaning of a statute making the burning of such a house a crime, should be construed to include a schoolhouse, which is the dwelling of the school for the purposes of education. State v. O'Brien (Conn.) 2 Root, 516.

Single room.

A furnished room occupied by a single man as a lodging room in the basement of a building, the upper part of which is occupied by him and others as offices, is a "dwelling house" within a statute punishing every person who shall steal in the daytime from any dwelling house. People v. Horrigan, 36 N. W. 236, 68 Mich. 491.

A room within a house may be a dwelling house, or it may not. A room occupied by a lodger, the key to the outer door of which room is kept by the landlord, is not a dwelling house. Monks v. Dykes, 4 Mees. & W. 566, 568.

"Dwelling house," as used in an information charging one with the crime of burglary in entering the dwelling house of a certain person, should be construed to include a room in a hotel for which a person, who had no other place of abode, paid rent by the week, and in which he kept his personal effects. State v. Johnson, 30 Pac. 672, 673, 4 Wash. 593.

A room or an apartment in a public inn, when it is either hired or occupied, becomes the "dwelling" of the person hiring, under Pen. Code, § 4628, relating to burglary; and the fact that the room was occupied by another, as well as the person hiring it, does not in legal contemplation make it any less the dwelling of the prosecutor. Jones v. State, 75 Ga. 825, 827.

An indictment for breaking and entering a sample room in a "hotel" does not indicate that the place broken was a dwelling house, within Cr. Code, § 3786, defining burglary as the "breaking and entering of a dwelling house." A hotel may or may not be a dwelling house, according to the facts as to its occupancy and habitation. So each separate room in a hotel may be a "dwelling house" within the provisions of the statute, according to such facts, though ordinarily a house is an entirety, each room being merely a constituent part of it; but it cannot be said, as a matter of law, that every hotel is a dwelling house, or that any particular room in a hotel is a dwelling house, where the averment is a mere general description of, or, rather, reference to, the property as "a certain hotel." Thomas v. State, 12 South. 409, 410, 97 Ala. 3.

Stealing in a bedroom over a stable in a yard, not under the same roof nor having any direct communication with the house in which the prosecutor resides, cannot properly be charged as a stealing in his "dwelling house." Rex v. Turner, 6 Car. & P. 407.

The term "dwelling house," within the meaning of the statute in reference to burglary, includes a room in which a person sleeps and lives, though it is in a building in which other rooms are devoted to business purposes. State v. Smith, 14 Mo. App. 585.

Ship's cabin.

The cabin of a ship is not a "house" within the meaning of the statute relative to burglary. Rex v. Humphrey (Conn.) 1 Root, 63.

Store or storehouse.

A clause in a fire policy permitting the use of kerosene oil in dwellings cannot be construed to authorize the use of such oil in stores. Cerf v. Home Ins. Co., 44 Cal. 320, 322, 13 Am. Rep. 165.

The term "dwelling house," in a definition of burglary as being "the breaking and entering of a dwelling house," etc., applies to a part of a storehouse, communicating with the part used as a store, which is habitually slept in by the owner or one of his family for the purpose of protecting the premises; but where the person sleeping there is a mere watchman hired to protect the premises the store is not a dwelling house. State v. Potts, 75 N. C. 129, 130.

The term "dwelling house," within the meaning of a statute making the burning of a dwelling house criminal, does not include a small one-room structure which has not been occupied as a dwelling for 8 or 10 years, and which is unfit for habitation, and has for many years been used only for the storage of cotton. Henderson v. State, 16 South. 931, 105 Ala. 82.

Where a clerk had for four years occupied a counting room as his regular sleeping apartment, such fact constituted the counting room a "dwelling house" within a statute punishing burglary in a dwelling house. State v. Outlaw, 72 N. C. 598, 602.

A "dwelling house" is one designed to be occupied as a place of abode by night as well as by day, and which is constructed with a special reference to that object, and, as long as it is capable of being so used in whole or in part, it retains its character as such. A building erected for a store or warehouse does not become a dwelling house because a place is fitted up in it for persons to sleep at night. Neither does a dwelling house cease to be such though a part of it has been converted into a store. Fire Dept. of New York City v. Buhler (N. Y.) 1 Daly, 391, 394.

"Dwelling house," as used in statute exempting from forced sale one-quarter of an acre of land in a village or city, and the dwelling house thereon owned and occupied by the debtor as a homestead, cannot be construed to include a business block used as a dwelling. The question whether it is a dwelling house or not is not determined by occupation, but by the character and construction of the building. "Dwelling house" should be construed in its common and ordinary sense, and to distinguish such building from other buildings it need not be exclusively used for the purpose of a dwelling, but in some reasonable sense should be susceptible of being a dwelling house. A building may be constructed for a store and dwelling house, but its construction should in some limit and to some extent manifest its character of dwelling house, so as to give some appearance of good faith in calling or claiming it as such. In re Lammer (U. S.) 14 Fed. Cas. 1048, 1049.

The term "dwelling house," as used in Wisconsin homestead statute, does not include a store or saloon which was not originally intended for a dwelling house, and which was in no wise adapted for such purpose, although the owner, previous to the filing of his homestead petition, had moved into such store and claimed to occupy it as his dwelling. In re Lammer (U. S.) 14 Fed. Cas. 1048, 1049.

In an indictment alleging the unlawful burning of a house used as a dwelling house, the term "dwelling house" should be construed to include a building erected for a storehouse, near a mine, which was used by the owner of the mine, when working it, as a dwelling house, there being a bedstead and cord in the house when burned. McLane v. State, 4 Ga. 335, 339.

The term "dwelling house," as understood in reference to burglary, has a technical meaning, not that meaning which is annexed to it in common acceptance. All outhouses standing in the same yard with the dwelling house, and used by the owner of the dwelling house as appurtenant thereto, whether the yard be open or inclosed, are, in the eye of the law, parts of the "dwelling house," and will satisfy that word used in an indictment of burglary. So if a store stand out of the yard and curtilage, and be separated therefrom, but the owner or his servants sometimes sleep therein, it is in law a dwelling house. State v. Wilson, 2 N. C. 242.

The term "dwelling house," in the law of burglary, does not ordinarily include a storehouse, but it may be made to assume the character of a dwelling house by being used habitually and usually by the owner, or his clerk or servant, as a place of sleeping, but not by being used occasionally only for such a purpose. In the latter case it is not and cannot properly be called a "dwelling house," the place of man's repose, which it is necessary for the law to protect from nocturnal invasion by announcing the penalty of death against the invader. Thus we find it stated in 1 Hale, P. C. 557, 558, that if a man hire a shop, in which he or his servant usually or often lodge, burglary may be committed therein; "but," says Mr. East, in his Pleas of the Crown, vol. 2, p. 497, "generally speaking, it seems that a mere casual use of a tenement as a lodging, or only upon some particular occasions, will not constitute it a dwelling house for this purpose." In Brown's Case all the judges agreed that the fact of a servant having slept in a barn the night on which it was broken open and for several nights before, being put there for the purpose of watching against thieves, made no sort of a difference in the question whether burglary or not. So it was said in Smith's Case that a porter lying in a warehouse to watch goods, which was only for a particular purpose, does not make it a dwelling house. But if all communication with the dwelling house of which it is a part be not excluded, it may still be a part of the house in which burglary may be committed. State v. Jenkins, 50 N. C. 430, 432.

It is not necessary, in order to render a storehouse in which the employes of the owner habitually slept a dwelling house, under an indictment for entering a dwelling house, that the employes board, in the sense of taking meals with the employer, in his house or elsewhere. It is not essential that a man's clerk shall eat at his table or in his house in order to establish the relation of employer and clerk. He may feed them at his own house, at a hotel, at a restaurant, or in the storehouse, or they may board themselves wherever it suits their convenience. State v. Pressley, 90 N. C. 730, 732.

Temporary absence as affecting.

Within the meaning of Cr. Code, § 36, defining the crime of "burglary" to be the breaking and entering a dwelling house, etc., "dwelling house" should be construed to include a house in which the owner resided, although she was absent at the time, where the beds, carpets, and curtains had been left in their places, while some of the household effects were packed in boxes, and the more valuable articles removed. Schwabacher v. People, 46 N. E. 809, 811, 165 Ill. 618.

"To constitute a building a 'dwelling house,' it must be a habitation for man, and usually occupied by some person lodging in it at night, though such occupant may for a time be absent, leaving the furniture therein, with an intention of returning." State v. Warren, 33 Me. 30, 31.

A "dwelling house" is a house ordinarily used as a residence, and it does not lose its character as a dwelling house if the owner leaves it temporarily with intention to return. In this country it has been held that if a person have a residence in the city and one in the country, residing with his family during the summer in one and during the winter in the other, both are to be regarded as dwelling houses, so that a breaking of either one is burglary. State v. Meerchouse, 34 Mo. 344, 346, 86 Am. Dec. 109.

Where a husband had left the house which had been his dwelling, with no intention of returning to it, but did not remove his effects therefrom, and his wife spent her days in the house and her nights elsewhere, it was his "dwelling." Bragg v. State, 69 Ala. 204.

Unfinished building.

"Dwelling house," as used in a statute providing that every person who shall willfully and maliciously set fire to the dwelling house of another shall be deemed guilty of arson, means a dwelling house that is or has been actually occupied by another for the use specified, and hence does not include a building in process of erection to be used as a dwelling, but which has never been used for the purpose for which it was being erected. State v. Wolfenberger, 20 Ind. 242; State v. McGowan, 20 Conn. 245, 247, 52 Am. Dec. 336.

As usual place of abode.

The term "dwelling house," in a statute authorizing service of summons by leaving at the dwelling house or usual place of abode of the defendant, is held to be synonymous with "usual place of abode," and to evidently mean a domicile. McFarlane v. Cornelius, 73 Pac. 325, 329, 43 Or. 513.

The term "dwelling house," as used in a return of service of a summons stating that service was made by pasting a copy on the front door of a dwelling house, is not equivalent to "usual place of abode" as used in the statute. The "usual place of abode" means a place where the party usually stays at the time, but a man may have a dwelling house and not dwell or stay in it at or about the time of service or attempted service of process. Lewis v. Botkin, 4 W. Va. 533, 536.

Vacancy of building as affecting.

"Dwelling house," as used in Code, c. 192, § 2, providing for the punishment of any person burning a dwelling house, cannot be construed to include a house more than a mile distant from the owner's residence, in which no one lived or slept, and which had not been occupied as a dwelling for about 10 months previous to its destruction, though such building had once been used as a dwelling house, and though it was intended for the same use in future. Hooker v. Commonwealth (Va.) 13 Grat. 763, 765.

"Dwelling house," as used in Rev. St. c. 126, § 1, defining and punishing arson, means a house, occupied as a place of residence, and a house which has never been occupied by the alleged owner is not a "dwelling house" within the statute. Commonwealth v. Barney, 64 Mass. (10 Cush.) 478, 479.

"In its common acceptation the term 'dwelling house' means the house in which a man resides; the house of his present abode; so at common law a man's 'dwelling house,' to be the subject of burglary, must be inhabited by him, either personally or by some of his family; and although some nice distinctions grew up as to what should be a sufficient occupancy by a particular person to answer the description in an indictment, by which an actual personal occupation by the one described as 'owner' was not in all cases held necessary, yet this was upon the ground that the actual occupants stood in such relation to the owner that their occupancy was deemed his." Bruce v. Cloutman, 45 N. H. 37, 39, 84 Am. Dec. 111.

A vacant house is not a "dwelling house" within How. Ann. St. § 9123, providing for the punishment of one who willfully and maliciously burns the dwelling house of another in the nighttime. People v. Handley, 52 N. W. 1032, 93 Mich. 46.

A dwelling house is the apartment, building, or cluster of buildings in which a man with his family resides. Not even the main structure is a dwelling house, though built for one, unless it is what the law terms "inhabited." And a dwelling house may cease to be such without undergoing any change as a building. If, for example, the furniture is removed, and it is temporarily abandoned to a carpenter for repairs, no one sleeping in it to protect some articles of furniture, its character as a dwelling is suspended. State v. Huffman, 37 S. W. 797, 798, 136 Mo. 58.

A conviction for the burglary of a dwelling house cannot be sustained in the absence of evidence that any family resided in the house charged to have been broken and entered. Fuller v. State, 48 Ala. 273, 275.

The term "dwelling house," as used in the definition of burglary from dwelling houses, includes a house which is occupied by a family, though they have left the house and rented it, and have left some of their goods therein with intention of returning, even though the tenant has left the house before the burglary. If a husband and wife live together in a house, it is his dwelling house as well as hers, though the title may be in her. Harrison v. State, 74 Ga. 801, 802.

As where persons sleep.

Statutes punishing arson and burglary have defined a "dwelling house" as: A building, any part of which is usually occupied by a person lodging therein at night. Pen. Code N. Y. 1903, § 502; Gen. St. Minn. 1894, § 6683; Ann. Codes & St. Or. 1901, § 2172. Any building any part of which has usually been occupied by any person lodging therein at night, and any structure joined to and immediately connected with such building. Ann. Codes & St. Or. 1901, § 2173. Every building or structure which shall have been usually occupied by persons lodging therein at night. Pen. Code N. Y. 1903, § 492. Every house or edifice, any part of which has usually been occupied by any person lodging therein at night, and any structure joined to and immediately connected with such a house or edifice. Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 2432; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 7412; Pen. Code S. D. 1903, § 572.

Every house, prison, jail, or other edifice which shall have been usually occupied by persons lodging therein, shall be deemed a dwelling house of any person having charge thereof or so lodging therein; but no warehouse, barn, shed, or other outhouse shall be deemed a dwelling house, or part of a dwelling house, unless the same be joined to or immediately connected with and a part of a dwelling house. Rev. St. Mo. 1899, § 1872.

As used in definitions of burglary, a "dwelling house" is a habitation for man, usually occupied by some person lodging in it at night. A building which is in fact a dwelling house does not lose its character as such by a mere temporary absence of its inhabitants, who have left with intent to return; but it does not become a dwelling house, though used for having meals and other purposes, unless the person occupying it, or some one of his family or servants, usually sleeps in it at night. Scott v. State, 62 Miss. 781, 782.

"Dwelling house," as used in the definition of burglary to the effect that it is the unlawful breaking and entering of a dwelling house in the nighttime with the intent to commit a felony therein, means any house in which a person sleeps at night. United States v. Johnson (U. S.) 26 Fed. Cas. 625.

"Dwelling house," as used in the definition of burglary, to the effect that it is the crime of breaking and entering a dwelling house in the nighttime with intent to commit a felony, means a house in which one regularly and habitually sleeps in the nighttime. The purpose of the law creating and defining burglary is to protect the sleeping place. One may have several dwelling houses for his own comfort and convenience, and he may make a house where he carries on a business a dwelling house, in which he may sleep himself or have his servants sleep. And it is none the less a dwelling house because the leading motive for making it so is the incidental protection afforded the property stored therein. State v. Pressley, 90 N. C. 730, 732; State v. Williams, 90 N. C. 724, 728, 47 Am. Rep. 541.

The statute relative to arson declares that every house or other edifice which shall have been usually occupied by persons lodging therein at night shall be deemed the "dwelling house" of any person so lodging therein. Levy v. People (N. Y.) 19 Hun, 383, 385.

DWELLING HOUSE OF ANOTHER.

The "dwelling house of another" means a dwelling in the possession of another. State v. Fish, 27 N. J. Law (3 Dutch.) 323. And this shows that the phrase "dwelling house of another" is quite different from the expression "dwelling house, the property of another person." The latter is a subject of arson by a tenant in possession of property belonging to another person. Lipschitz v. People, 53 Pac. 1111, 1113, 25 Colo. 267.

DWELLING PLACE.

A pauper, while supported as such, has no home or "dwelling place," within the meaning of Gen. St. p. 132, providing that upon the division of any town, or the annexation of a part of one town to another town, every person having a legal settlement therein, but being absent at the time of such division or annexation, and not having acquired a settlement elsewhere, shall have his legal settlement in that town wherein his last dwelling place or home shall happen to fall. Town of Wilmington v. Town of Somerset, 35 Vt. 232.

Where the parents of a single woman live in one town, and she, when of age, labors for wages in another, a "dwelling place," within the law relating to the settlement of paupers, is in the town where she labors. It is difficult to define with precision the meaning of "dwelling place" or "home." Much depends upon the pursuits and character of the person in relation to whom these terms are used. A lad absent at college may still retain his dwelling place at his home, where he himself owns a freehold estate, and one absent at sea may still retain a dwelling place at his former residence. Indeed, all minors not emancipated, all femes covert, all servants and slaves, though occasionally absent for particular purposes, would seem still to possess the dwelling place of their parents, husbands, and masters. The dwelling place of servants must, for the term of their service, be termed their "home"; and the pauper having left her father's home for permanent purposes, having ceased to be a minor, must be considered at home in the place where she worked, as any person could be who, without a family or freehold, pursued the employment of a domestic. Town of Gilford v. Town of Gilmanton, 1 N. H. 194, 195.

The term "dwelling place," as used in the pauper law, is synonymous with the word "residence" or "home." Town of North Yarmouth v. Town of West Gardiner, 58 Me. 207, 210, 4 Am. Rep. 279.

Domicile distinguished.

"Dwelling place" means some permanent abode or residence where the person residing intends to remain, "and is not synonymous with 'domicile,' as used in international law, but has a more restricted meaning." Inhabitants of Jefferson v. Inhabitants of Washington, 19 Me. (1 App.) 293.

"Dwelling place and home," as used in a statute making a dwelling place and home requisite to establish the settlement of a pauper, cannot be construed in a vague and indeterminate sense, but contemplate something specific. It was intended to define it so that it could not be misunderstood, and so that it should be obvious to the common sense of every man what should constitute a settlement. The words did not mean constructive dwelling places and homes. They were not used in the sense of "domicile" in its more technical meaning. The words "dwelling place and home" meant some permanent abode or residence with intention to remain. Inhabitants of Jefferson v. Inhabitants of Washington, 19 Me. (1 App.) 293, 301 (citing Inhabitants of Turner v. Inhabitants of Buckfield, 8 Me. [3 Greenl.] 229).

Settlement distinguished.

"Dwelling place" is synonymous with "residence," and means some permanent abode or residence with intention to remain, and has a different meaning from the word "settlement" in the pauper law. Inhabitants of Warren v. Inhabitants of Thomaston, 43 Me. 406, 418, 69 Am. Dec. 69.

"Dwelling house" is not synonymous with a place of pauper settlement, and a pauper minor when emancipated can acquire a different dwelling house from that of his parent. Lisbon v. Lyman, 49 N. H. 553, 562.

DYEING.

The word "dyeing" means to fix color. "Dyeing," technically speaking, and when contrasted with "painting," means a saturation or impregnation of the fiber in order to secure fixation of color. As applied to some animal fibers, such as silk or wool, it means a thorough saturation; as applied to skins, it may signify a thorough or a partial saturation. In other words, skins may be dyed on the surface or a portion of the way through. The dyeing of skins is effected either by plunging or dipping in the dyeing solution, or by spreading the dyeing material on the surface by brushing over it. The Century Dictionary defines "dyeing" as "the operation or practice of fixing colors in solution in textile and other porous substances." Tannage Patent Co. v. Donallan (U. S.) 93 Fed. 811, 817 (quoting Cent. Dict.).

DYEING WORKS.

The term "dyeing works," as used in all laws relative to the employment of labor, shall mean any premises in which the process of dyeing yarn or cloth or any material is carried on. Rev. Laws Mass. 1902, p. 916, c. 106, § 8.

DYING DECLARATIONS.Consciousness of impending death.

"Dying declarations" are such as are made by the party relating to the facts of the injury of which he afterwards dies, and with a fixed belief and moral conviction that his death is impending and certain to follow almost immediately, without opportunity for repentance, and in the absence of all hope of avoidance, when he has despaired of life, and looks to death as inevitable and at hand. Starkey v. People, 17 Ill. (7 Peck) 17, 21; Simons v. People, 150 Ill. 66, 73, 74, 36 N. E. 1019; Westbrook v. People, 18 N. E. 304, 307, 126 Ill. 81; State v. Clemons, 1 N. W. 546, 547, 51 Iowa, 274; May v. State, 55 Ala. 39.

Greenleaf says that dying declarations are admitted because they are considered as standing in the same situation as if they were sworn, the danger of impending death being equivalent to the sanction of an oath. State v. Pearce, 56 Minn. 226, 239, 57 N. W. 652.

The theory upon which dying declarations, being mere hearsay, are admissible, is that, when an individual is in constant expectancy of impending death, all temptation or inducement to falsehood is removed, and the solemnity of his situation is supposed to impress him as strongly with the necessity of strict truthfulness as the obligation of a judicial oath. State v. Eddon, 36 Pac. 139, 142, 8 Wash. 292; Pennsylvania v. Lewis (Pa.) Add. 279, 282; Richard v. State, 29 South. 413, 414, 42 Fla. 528.

It is essential to the admissibility of "dying declarations," and is a preliminary fact to be proved by the party offering them in evidence, that they were made under a sense of impending death; but it is not necessary that they should be stated at the time to be so made. It is enough if it satisfactorily appear in any mode that they were made under that sanction, whether it be directly proved by the express language of the declarant, or be inferred from his evident danger, or the opinions of the medical or other attendants stated to him, or from his conduct, or other circumstances of the case, all of which are resorted to in order to ascertain the state of the declarant's mind. State v. Trusty (Del.) 40 Atl. 766, 767, 1 Pennewill, 319; McDaniel v. State, 16 Miss. (8 Smedes & M.) 401, 402, 47 Am. Dec. 93; Lowry v. State, 80 Tenn. (12 Lea) 142, 145; Newberry v. State, 58 S. W. 351, 68 Ark. 355.

"Dying declarations" are those made under a consciousness of impending death, which, however, the defendant need not express in direct terms. His bodily condition and appearance, his conduct and language, as well as statements made to him by his attendants, may be considered, and his consciousness thence inferred. It is not necessary that the deceased should have said that he believed he would die immediately, but it is sufficient if the facts detailed were such as to indicate that he was conscious, at the time of making his declaration, of his approaching dissolution. To render such declarations receivable in evidence, the deceased need not have been at the time in articulo mortis. It was only necessary that the statements should have been made under a sense of impending dissolution which soon after occurred. State v. Jones, 18 South. 515, 517, 47 La. Ann. 1524.

"Dying declarations" are such as are made under a sense of impending death. It is the fact that they are made under a sense of impending death that renders them admissible in evidence, and, though made within a sufficient length of time before death to justify their admission, they are not "dying declarations" if the deceased at the time believed or strongly hoped that he would recover. Ex parte Nettles, 58 Ala. 268, 277.

In order to constitute a "dying declaration," it must appear that deceased at the time of making the declaration had abandoned hope of life; hence, where it appeared that the wounds inflicted upon deceased were not so serious as to impress on him or those who saw him the fact that they were fatal, and that immediately after the injury deceased asked a person to sell him meat and risk his getting well to pay for it, and that he had no medical attendance nor any one to acquaint him with the nature of his injury, his declarations were inadmissible as dying declarations, notwithstanding his wife testified that he had stated he was about to die. Bell v. State, 17 South. 232, 234, 72 Miss. 507.

While the text-writers sometimes speak of the weakness of dying declarations because of the want of an opportunity for cross-examination, they still lay down the rule that such admissions are fully satisfactory if the declarant is shown to be conscious of the fact that he is in a dying condition. State v. Pearce, 56 Minn. 226, 239, 57 N. W. 652.

Subject of statements.

"Dying declarations" are statements of material facts concerning the cause and circumstances of homicide, made by the victim under the solemn belief of impending death. People v. Fuhrig, 59 Pac. 693, 694, 127 Cal. 412; People v. Kraft, 36 N. Y. Supp. 1034, 1035, 91 Hun, 474; Miller v. State, 25 Wis. 384, 387; State v. Medlicott, 9 Kan. 257, 283. "They are restricted to the act of killing and to the circumstances immediately attending it, and form a part of the res gestæ." State v. Baldwin, 45 N. W. 297, 298, 79 Iowa, 714; State v. Perigo, 45 N. W. 399, 400, 80 Iowa, 37.

"Dying declarations" relate only to the res gestæ of the homicide; that is, the statements must be confined to what actually transpired at the place of the killing, i. e., who were the actors, where it occurred, the positions of persons, what was said by the parties, the instrument used, and how the homicide was committed. A dying declaration is admissible to show all the facts connected with the homicide to which a witness, were he present, could testify. This would exclude narratives of past transactions and opinions or mere conclusions of the declarant. Medina v. State, 63 S. W. 331, 332, 43 Tex. Cr. R. 52 (citing Roberts v. State, 5 Tex. App. 141; Warren v. State, 9 Tex. App. 619, 35 Am. Rep. 745; Boyle v. State, 5 N. E. 203, 105 Ind. 469, 55 Am. Rep. 218; People v. Abbott [Cal.] 4 Pac. 769; State v. Johnson, 1 S. E. 510, 26 S. C. 152).

Declarations having no reference to the facts and circumstances of the conflict from which death resulted, but merely being expressive of the opinion of the deceased as to what would have been the result if the accused had not fired so quickly, are not "dying declarations." Brown v. State, 74 Ala. 478, 483.

Time of death.

In order to be admissible as "dying declarations," the statements need not be made immediately before death, but are "dying declarations" if made at a time when recovery is despaired of, and the deceased feels assured that his disease will prove fatal. State v. Poll, 8 N. C. 442, 444, 9 Am. Dec. 655.

Written or oral.

Mr. Bishop lays down the rule that a dying declaration may be written or oral, be sworn to or not, come through an interpreter, or by a mere pressure of the hand or otherwise. If made before death seems impending, they will be rendered good by repetition or assent afterwards. If in writing, the writing must be produced in evidence of them. If oral, they may be orally proved, and the evidence will suffice. When the declarant leaves a statement so far unfinished that it appears probable he meant to qualify it by something further, it is not admissible; but his inability or mere omission to go over the whole transaction, or to speak to another part of it, will not exclude from the jury what he has said. State v. Parham, 20 South. 727, 728, 48 La. Ann. 1309 (citing 1 Bish. Cr. Proc. § 1213).

DYNAMITE.

"Dynamite" is an explosive, made by combining nitroglycerin, which is its active explosive element, with an absorbent solid material. The combination is made for the purpose of a more convenient use of nitroglycerin, which is a fluid. Sperry v. Springfield F. & M. Ins. Co. (U. S.) 26 Fed. 234, 235, 237.

The word "nitroglycerin," as used in Rev. St. § 5353 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3637], prohibiting the transporting of nitroglycerin upon vehicles engaged in interstate passenger traffic, includes "dynamite," which is made by mixing nitroglycerin with some solid and inert absorbent substance, and contains no other explosive ingredient. United States v. Saul (U. S.) 58 Fed. 763, 764.

DYNAMO.

A "dynamo machine" is a device for converting mechanical energy into electricity. It has a revolving part, called the "armature," usually driven from a steam engine. At one end of the armature there is a projecting part, called the "commutator," standing out something like the hub of a wagon wheel. Upon two opposite sides of this commutator are placed two copper strips, bars or bundles of thin copper leaves, called "commutator brushes," which press upon the surface of the commutator during its revolution. A wire joined to one of these brushes leads away from the machine through the lamps or motors in which the current is used, and back to and through the other brushes. Thus the electric current which is generated in the armature by its revolutions passes out through one brush and back through the other. Thomson-Houston Co. v. Western Electric Co. (U. S.) 65 Fed. 615, 616.

Sibley v. Smith, 2 Mich. 486, 503.

EACH.

As all or every.

The word "each," as used in the statute providing for the formation of a board "who shall 'each' be paid," etc., is a distributive adjective pronoun, and denotes or refers to every one of the persons mentioned. Seiler v. State, 67 N. E. 448, 449, 160 Ind. 605 (citing And. Law Dict.; Adams Exp. Co. v. Lexington, 83 Ky. 657).

"Each" is defined as being either or any unity of a numerical aggregate, consisting of two or three indefinitely; used in predicating the same thing, or both or all the numbers of the pair, aggregate, or series mentioned or taken into account, considered individually or one by one; often followed by one with or before a noun (partitive genitive), as each sex, each side of the river, each stone in the building; each of them has a different course from every other. Beck & Pauli Lithographing Co. v. Evansville Brewing Co., 58 N. E. 859, 861, 25 Ind. App. 662 (citing Cent. Dict.).

In a contract providing that a party would furnish letter heads, business cards, envelopes, statements, at $12 per M., and hangers on chromo plate paper, tinned top and bottom, with trade-mark and proper wording, at 22 cents each, "each" refers to all the articles named which precede it. Beck & Pauli Lithographing Co. v. Evansville Brewing Co., 58 N. E. 859, 861, 25 Ind. App. 662.

Where testator by a clause in a will gives "to each of my nephews, one and all, $100 each," there is no room for doubt as to the meaning of the clause, and it includes all nephews—those who had been previously remembered in the will, and others. Bartlett v. Houdlette, 16 N. E. 740, 741, 147 Mass. 25.

The charter of the city of Lexington, approved April 19, 1882, § 16, providing that the mayor and board of councilmen should have the right to tax and license, and should by ordinance provide for the licensing of, "each express company," must be regarded as indicating that the license fee for each of the companies intended to be included in the provision of the charter, and which were not exempted from city taxation by the then existing law, should be so much, although it is true that the word "each" denotes every one of the two or more comprising the whole. It includes the whole of the class which were not then exempted from such taxation. Adams Express Co. v. City of Lexington, 83 Ky. 657, 659.

"Each," as used in a contract by which a lessee was given the right of purchasing certain machinery and apparatus on the expiration of certain letters patent and all extensions and renewals thereof, in which are set forth and claimed the inventions and improvements, and each of them, contained in said machinery and apparatus, was construed to mean "every." Potter v. Berthelot (U. S.) 20 Fed. 240, 242.

As apiece.

"Each," as used by a testator in bequeathing to "each of my immediate nephews and nieces $1,000 apiece," means the same as the word "apiece," and that is simply that each nephew and niece shall have $1,000. Martin v. Mercer University Trustees, 25 S. E. 522, 523, 98 Ga. 320.

As each one individually.

The word "each" is commonly understood to mean every one of the two or more individuals composing the whole, considered separately from the rest. Knickerbocker v. People, 102 Ill. 218, 233, per Scott, J., dissenting.

"Each" means every one of any number, separately considered. State v. Maine Cent. R. Co., 66 Me. 488, 510.

"Each" means "every one of any number or numerical aggregate, considered individually; equivalent to the adjectival phrase 'each one,' as, 'each went his way,' 'each had two,' 'each of them was of a different size'—that is, from all the others or from every one else in the number." Beck & Pauli Lithographing Co. v. Evansville Brewing Co., 58 N. E. 859, 861, 25 Ind. App. 662; Malcomson v. Wappoo Mills (U. S.) 86 Fed. 192, 194.

Rev. St. S. C. § 102, providing that each ton of phosphate rock, the product of certain mining operations, shall be deemed the property of the state until the persons mining the same shall have paid a certain royalty, means each ton taken severally, individually, shall be deemed the property of the state until the said parties have paid the royalty thereon; that is, on that individual ton. Malcomson v. Wappoo Mills (U. S.) 86 Fed. 192, 194.

Const. 1895, art. 5, § 25, providing that each of the justices of the Supreme Court and judges of the circuit court should have the same power at chambers to issue writs of habeas corpus as when in open court. It was held that the term "each" was used in contradistinction to "all" of the justices, as necessarily implied in the term "court," which was made up of all the justices, and thus that any one of the judges had the same power in regard to issuing the specified writs at chambers as all of the judges had during term of court. Salinas v. C. Aultman & Co., 27 S. E. 385, 387, 49 S. C. 325; State v. Smith, 27 S. E. 933, 934, 50 S. C. 558.

The phrase "each particular lot," in a taxation statute requiring the assessor's list of property to particularly set forth the name of the owner or owners of real estate and the number of acres of land in each particular lot, section, or subdivision thereof, etc., is not satisfied with a list describing the property of a certain person as 100 acres in the north part of two lots. Perkins' Lessee v. Dibble, 10 Ohio, 433, 434, 442, 36 Am. Dec. 97.

In a will directing the distribution of a share to each nephew and niece then living, "each" separates the class into individuals, and is equivalent to a detailed enumeration. By the use of the word "each" testator did in effect designate the persons all individually as plainly as if he had inserted their several names. In re Penney's Estate, 28 Atl. 255, 256, 159 Pa. 346.

A devise to heirs, to them and "each" of them, will be construed as a direction that such heirs are to take per capita, and not per stirpes. Daggett v. Slack, 49 Mass. (8 Metc.) 450, 454.

"Each," as used in a will giving to several persons, designated therein, each a certain sum, in its common acceptation refers singly to the individual designated in the clause. Auger v. Tatham, 61 N. E. 77, 78, 191 Ill. 296.

A bequest to A. and B. of "$2,000 each" was construed to be a gift to A. and B. individually, and therefore the death of one before the testator caused the gift to him to lapse. Clafin v. Tilton, 5 N. E. 649, 141 Mass. 343.

Joint or several obligation created.

A note reciting that it is signed "each as principal" made both signers principals so far as the creditor was concerned. Benedict v. Cox, 52 Vt. 247, 250.

The word "each," following the penalty of a bond signed by defendants, by itself made it a several bond, and the ensuing clause, "for which we bind ourselves and each of us for himself for the whole and entire sum of £1000 each," did not make it a joint undertaking. Collins v. Prosser, 1 Barn. & C. 682.

As used in a contract by two persons with a boatbuilder to pay for a boat to be built for them for a certain sum, each his one-half, the expression "each his one-half" makes such contract several and not joint. Costigan v. Lunt, 104 Mass. 217, 219.

The conclusion of a bond given by several was as follows: "To which payment well and truly to be made or done, we bind ourselves and each of our heirs, executors and administrators." Held, that the word "each" was intended to be applicable to the persons of both obligors, and hence the obligation was several as well as joint. Geddis v. Hawks (Pa.) 10 Serg. & R. 33, 37.

Tenancy in common created.

In a devise or bequest to several persons, to each, the words "to each" make the persons tenants in common. Stetson v. Eastman, 24 Atl. 868, 870, 84 Me. 366.

In cases where construction is necessary to determine whether an instrument creates a joint tenancy or tenancy in common, the distributive words "among," "any," and "each" are used to distinguish estates in common from joint tenancies, and are given controlling effect in determining the estates to be tenancies in common. Sturm v. Sawyer, 2 Pa. Super. Ct. 254, 257.

EACH BEQUEST.

Testator, after directing his debts to be paid, devised his town house and furniture to his sister, directing that all incumbrances thereon should be paid off by the executors. To his brother he devised a country house, subject, however, to sale, if necessary to carry out previous provisions; and the will stated, "It being my intention that 'each bequest' shall be fully carried out in the order in which it appears in the will." Testator then gave several general legacies, and there being a deficiency of assets, the latter bequest must abate proportionately. Held that, while a bequest is properly used relative to personal estate, the phrase "each bequest" refers to the gifts previously made, although consisting in part of realty. Appeal of Pennsylvania Co. for Insurance on Lives and Granting Annuities, 16 Wkly. Notes Cas. 170, 172, 109 Pa. 479, 488.

EACH BLOCK.

Sess. Laws 1887, c. 99, § 4, declares that for all municipal paving, etc., assessment shall be made for the full cost thereof on each block separately. Held, that the words "each block separately" mean that each block, or the street between each block for the distance of a block, shall be separate from that of an adjoining block in the city; that each block, or the two half blocks divided by the street, the distance of a block, becomes a block or taxing district as contemplated by section 4, and does not have reference to a division of the costs and apportionment of the expenses of its improvement between the two half blocks divided by the street. Blair v. City of Atchison, 19 Pac. 815, 816, 40 Kan. 353.

EACH CASE.

In a policy of insurance on a vessel and cargo, it was stipulated that the underwriters should not be liable "for any partial loss of other goods on the vessel or in freight," unless it amounted to 5 per cent. inclusive "in each case," of all charges and expenses incurred for the purpose of ascertaining and proving the loss. Held, that the words "in each case" did not mean at each time of loss, but that they referred to the three several subjects insured—goods, freight, and vessel. Donnell v. Columbian Ins. Co. (U. S.) 7 Fed. Cas. 889, 893.

EACH OFFENSE.

"Each," as used in a statute imposing a penalty "for each offense" upon every keeper of a toll gate, ordered by the inspectors to throw open the same or allow persons to pass without toll, who shall not immediately obey such order, means each violation of the order, and does not relate to the description of the offense. Suydam v. Smith, 52 N. Y. 383, 389.

EACH OTHER.

See "With Each Other."

EACH PARTY.

The words "each party," as used in act of Congress providing that each party, whether in civil or criminal cases, shall be allowed peremptory challenges, are used in the sense of either party to the action, i. e., plaintiff and defendant, regardless as to whether one or more than one person is included as plaintiff or defendant. People v. O'Loughlin, 1 Pac. 653, 655, 3 Utah, 133. See, also, Snodgrass v. Hunt, 15 Ind. 274, 276.

Under Comp. Laws, § 6027, providing that "in all civil cases each party may challenge peremptorily two jurors," defendants, who have united on one issue presented by the same counsel, constitute by their own voluntary action but one party before the court, and any challenge made on behalf of one would necessarily be on behalf of the other also, and when the statutory number of challenges had been made the right of each was exhausted. Nevertheless parties sued in one action, but who plead separately and by a different counsel, are each entitled to the two peremptory challenges allowed by statute.

In such a case their rights and liabilities may be very different, and jurors who, for various reasons, may be objectionable to one, might be perfectly satisfactory to another, and so the adoption of any other rule would result in insuperable difficulties. Stroh v. Hinchman, 37 Mich. 490, 491.

EACH TAXPAYER.

The words "each taxpayer," as used in Const. 1870, art. 2, § 28, providing that the Legislature shall exempt from taxation $1,000 worth of personal property in the hands of each taxpayer, apply to each taxpayer, and not to each head of the family. A married woman is therefore entitled to such exemption, though her husband is entitled to and has been allowed the same exemption. First Nat. Bank v. Town of Morristown, 23 S. W. 975, 93 Tenn. (9 Pickle) 208.

EACH WEEK.

Rev. Laws, p. 218, entitled "An act for the relief of persons imprisoned for debt," and requiring that there should be paid by the dissatisfied creditor to the insolvent debtor a certain sum on the second day of "each week," means that the payments must be made on a fixed day, and that the payments in no instance be more than one week asunder. State v. Stiles, 12 N. J. Law (7 Halst.) 296, 297.

EACH YEAR.

In Laws 1875, c. 510, which provides that corporations shall within 20 days after the 1st of January in each year make a report, which will state the amount of capital and the portion actually paid in, etc., "each year" means annually. Allen v. Clark, 21 N. Y. Supp. 338, 340, 66 Hun, 628.

In a statute providing that it shall not be lawful to catch trout "between the 1st day of October of each year and the 1st day of June of each year," the term "each year" does not mean the same year, so as to forbid the fishing only between June and October; but in view of the order in which the dates are arranged, and the practical construction that has always been placed upon the law, the Legislature evidently intended the close season to run from October of one year to June of the succeeding year. Ex parte Hewlett, 40 Pac. 96, 97, 22 Nev. 333.

EALDERMAN.

See "Alderman."

EAR.

An "ear," in a mechanical sense, is a projecting part from the side of anything.

Consolidated Vapor-Stove Co. v. Ellwood Gas-Stove & Stamping Co. (U. S.) 63 Fed. 698, 699. (Quoting Web. Dict.)

EARLIEST POSSIBLE MOMENT.

An obligation to pay a sum of money at the "earliest possible moment" is not an agreement to pay instantly, unless the maker has the ability so to pay; but it is conditional, and fixes the burden on the person suing on the obligation to prove the ability of the maker to pay the debt. Rowlett v. Lane, 43 Tex. 274, 275.

EARN.

The word "earn" means to gain as a just return or recompense by service, labor, or exertion. Dayton v. Ewart, 72 Pac. 420, 421, 28 Mont. 153.

"Earn" means to gain, get, obtain, or acquire as the reward of labor or performance of some service. Rafferty v. Rafferty, 5 Pa. Dist. R. 453, 458 (citing Worcester, Law Dict.); In re Lewis' Estate, 27 Atl. 35, 156 Pa. 337. Hence, under Act Pa. June 3, 1887, § 1, providing that property of every kind owned, acquired, or "earned" by a woman before or during her marriage shall belong to her and not to her husband, a married woman has an exclusive property in the earnings of her own hands. In re Lewis' Estate, 27 Atl. 35, 156 Pa. 337.

Wages are "earned," in the sense in which that term is used in the bankruptcy act (Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, 30 Stat. 544 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3418]), giving preference to wages earned within three months before the commencement of the proceedings, so long as a bona fide contract of hiring exists, and the clerk or servant continues in the master's employment and does all that he is required to do. The practice of giving vacations with continued pay is very general in all departments of business. Vacation wages cannot be regarded as a mere gratuity given in recognition of past or present services. By continuing the relation of employer and employé during a dull season, the employer holds his working force in readiness for the active season. The relation of the employer and employé is as strictly a business relation as it is during the working season, and there is full legal consideration for the master's promise to pay wages during this period. In re B. H. Gladding Co. (U. S.) 120 Fed. 709, 711.

EARNEST.

"Earnest" means payment of part of the price of goods sold, or a delivery of part of the goods, for the purpose of binding the contract. The idea of "earnest" in connection with contracts was taken from the civil law. As used in the statute of frauds providing that sales of personalty of over a certain value shall be void unless there be a memorandum in writing, or the purchaser receive and accept the same, or give something in earnest, "earnest" means a part payment of the price. Howe v. Hayward, 108 Mass. 54, 55, 11 Am. Rep. 306 (citing 2 Bl. Comm. 447; Pordage v. Cole, 1 Saund. 319b; Walker v. Nussey, 16 Mees. & W. 302); Hudnut v. Weir, 100 Ind. 501, 502.

Earnest is only one mode of binding a bargain and giving to the buyer a right to the goods on payment, and, if the buyer does not come in a reasonable time after agreement and pay for and take the goods, the contract is dissolved. Robinson v. Thoma, 70 Pac. 240, 241, 30 Wash. 129.

The delivery of sacks by the purchaser of corn, who agreed to pay a certain sum per bushel, and as part of the consideration to furnish the sacks in which to put it, was not a delivery of anything in "earnest," for they were not a part payment for the price of the corn. They continued the property of the defendant after, the same as before, they were delivered to the seller, who took no property in them, nor other right except to fill them with corn and return them. Hudnut v. Weir, 100 Ind. 501, 502.

EARNINGS.

See "Gross Earnings"; "Individual Earnings"; "Net Earnings"; "Personal Earnings"; "Professional Earnings"; "Surplus Earnings."

The word "earnings" means the earnings or reward of labor; the price of services performed. Pryor v. Metropolitan St. Ry. Co., 85 Mo. App. 367, 372; Goodhart v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 35 Atl. 191, 193, 177 Pa. 1, 55 Am. St. Rep. 705.

"Earnings" is that which is earned. Dayton v. Ewart, 72 Pac. 420, 421, 28 Mont. 153.

"Earnings" represent, in common speech, the reward for personal services, whether in money or chattels, and they may be acquired or owned or possessed within the fair meaning of a statute providing that a married woman shall have the same right and power as an unmarried person to acquire, own, and possess any property. Nuding v. Ulrich, 32 Atl. 409, 410, 169 Pa. 289.

"Wages and earnings," of a debtor, within the meaning of the exemption statute, include such wages and earnings as long as they can be identified, and they do not lose their character by the mere fact of their being paid to the debtor. Rutter v. Shumway, 26 Pac. 321, 322, 16 Colo. 95.

"Earnings," as used in a Wisconsin statute providing that the earnings of all married persons, and of all other persons who have to provide for the entire support of a family for 60 days next preceding the issuing of any process, shall be exempt from seizure, means the gains of the debtor derived from his services or labor without the aid of capital. If the debtor has no capital, and no credit contributing to increase his profits, except the credit arising from the labor or service in which he is presently engaged, and out of the proceeds of which his obligations on account of such labor or service are discharged, then his net receipts or gains from such labor or service may fairly be accounted "earnings." Campfield v. Lang (U. S.) 25 Fed. 128, 131; Brown v. Hebard, 20 Wis. 326, 330, 91 Am. Dec. 408.

Building contract.

An assignment of a building contract is not an assignment of "earnings," within a statute requiring such an assignment to be recorded. Abbott v. Davidson, 25 Atl. 839, 18 R. I. 91.

Compensation from boarders.

Money due for board furnished to sailors by a debtor, under an agreement with a third person, is "earnings," within the meaning of St. 1865, c. 43, § 2, declaring that an unrecorded assignment of future earnings shall be invalid against a trustee process. Jason v. Antone, 131 Mass. 534, 535.

In Code 1873, § 3074, providing that the earnings of a debtor for his personal services or those of his family at any time within 90 days next preceding the levy are exempt from execution and attachment, the term "earnings" means earnings for personal service, as contradistinguished from the income arising from a business involving other elements of gain than the mere personal services of those conducting it. Money due from boarders for board to a boarding house keeper who rents a house for such business, furnishes for the use of the boarders the proper chambers, kitchen, dining room, and other furniture, buys materials for food and has them cooked, employs servants for cooking, waiting on the table, taking care of the chambers, and other purposes, and pays such servants therefor, who assists in and oversees about the house, and charges the boarders a stated sum per month in a lump for the entire board and lodging thus furnished, is not "earnings." The business of keeping a boarding house involves many elements of profit aside from the mere personal earnings of the proprietor and his family. It involves compensation for the use of the premises, including their value and location, the profits on the raw materials employed, and the general character of the establishment. Shelly v. Smith, 13 N. W. 419, 420, 59 Iowa, 453.

Compensation for expenditures or materials.

In St. 1865, c. 43, § 2, declaring an unrecorded assignment of future earnings invalid against trustee process, "earnings" has a more extensive signification than the word "wages," and applies to the compensation for services, a term which involves more than the mere labor of the person by whom they are rendered, and may include compensation for expenditures incurred or materials furnished, as well as labor. Somers v. Kellher, 115 Mass. 165, 167; Jenks v. Dyer, 102 Mass. 235, 236; Kendall v. Kingsley, 120 Mass. 94, 95.

The term "earnings" implies that the sum due shall be claimed for the personal service of the claimant, and that it shall not include, to any substantial extent, recompense for materials furnished. Dayton v. Ewart, 72 Pac. 420, 421, 28 Mont. 153.

A fund resulting from sales of materials, manufactured iron, products from the land, or general personal property of a corporation, all indicating a final winding up of the business of the concern, can in no sense be called "earnings." Gehr v. Mont Alto Iron Co., 34 Atl. 638, 639, 174 Pa. 430.

Dividends or net earnings.

"Earnings," as used in an acceptance of an order and agreement to pay if the earnings of the drawer are sufficient to cover the amount, should be construed to mean the gross earnings, since the word "earnings" never means net earnings unless so qualified. Smith v. Bates Mach. Co., 55 N. E. 69, 182 Ill. 166.

"Earnings," as applied to a corporation, ordinarily means earnings declared as dividends; but it cannot be doubted that a corporation, in the making of contracts and of by-laws, may give to that term a different meaning, and employ it to designate money earned. Rigbee & W. R. Packet Co. v. Moore, 25 South. 602, 608, 121 Ala. 379.

Earnings by mental effort.

In a statute providing that no person summoned as trustee should be charged as such on account of the "personal services or earnings" of the wife of the debtor at any time, or on account of any labor performed by the debtor or any of his family after the service of the process, "earnings" means something more than the term "labor," which has been construed as confined to services where physical toil was the main ingredient, although directed and made more valuable by mechanical skill. Her personal services and earnings may be as well for works of skill and science as for mere physical toil. They are exempt, no matter how earned. Hoyt v. White, 46 N. H. 45, 48.

By Laws 1872, c. 155, the individual "earnings" of a married woman, except those occurring by labor performed for her husband, are her separate property, and not subject to her husband's control or liable for his debts. Where a married woman having no separate property purchased a farm on credit, taking the title in her own name, which farm was carried on and managed by her husband, without any specific agreement as to his compensation, the crops raised under such management were "earnings" of the wife, and not liable for the debts of the husband. A wife may get or acquire property by her labor, skill, or talents, and hold and enjoy it as earnings. Dr. Webster defines "earnings" to be that which is earned; that which is gained or merited by labor; service or performance; wages or reward. We know that some gifted women acquire or earn large sums of money by their writings, works of art, or by singing or performance on the stage. Others, again, make wealth in carrying on trade, or by sagacious or well-directed efforts in some branch of industry. These earnings and profits the law secures to the married woman as her separate property. Dayton v. Walsh, 2 N. W. 65, 67, 47 Wis. 113, 32 Am. Rep. 757.

Earnings with team.

Earnings as used in Rev. St. c. 134, p. 1553, § 140, exempting from seizure on attachment or execution the earnings of all married persons or heads of families for 60 days preceding the process, did not mean merely the earnings by their own manual labor, but would include earnings obtained with team, wagon, or dray and tackle. Kuntz v. Kinney, 33 Wis. 510, 513.

Profits.

The word "earnings" means the fruit or reward of labor; the price of services performed. Profits derived from an investment or the management of a business enterprise are not earnings. The deduction from such profits of the legal rate of interest on the money employed does not give to the balance of the profits the character of earnings. Goodhart v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 35 Atl. 191, 193, 177 Pa. 1, 55 Am. St. Rep. 705.

Rents.

As used in St. 1865, c. 43, § 2, the term "earnings" cannot, upon any construction, however liberal, include rents payable under an ordinary contract or lease which requires no personal service on the part of the lessor. Kendall v. Kingsley, 120 Mass. 94, 95.

EARTH.

"Earth," in chemistry, is a metallic oxide, inodorous, dry, unflammable, and infusible. Jenkins v. Johnson (U. S.) 13 Fed. Cas. 525, 527.

Within a contract for excavating, the term "earth" includes everything except rocks, grubbing, and clearing. Nesbitt v. Louisville, O. & C. R. Co. (S. O.) 2 Speers, 697, 705.

In St. 1849, c. 437, § 1, authorizing the selectmen of a town to select and lay out a lot of land for a gravel pit for the purpose of securing earth and gravel to be used in the repair of roads, "earth and gravel" should be construed to include any earth, gravel, or stone suitable for use in repairing and constructing roads, and capable of being dug out of the ground and removed by ordinary excavation. The words "earth and gravel" are not to be taken with such extreme strictness as to require that the gravel should be screened, or that the question should be raised and decided judicially how large a piece of gravel or stone may be included in the general description of "earth and gravel." Hatch v. Hawkes, 126 Mass. 177, 181.

Hardpan and gravel.

"Earth," as used in a contract for the excavation of earth at a certain price per yard, should be construed to include hardpan, which Webster defines as "a hard stratum of earth." Webster defines "earth" to be "soil of all kinds, including gravel, loam, and the like, in distinction from the firm rock." Dickinson v. City of Poughkeepsie, 75 N. Y. 65, 71.

"Earth," as used in a contract for the excavation of earth at a certain price per cubic yard, means ordinary earth, and includes all materials whatever from beneath the surface of the ground, which would include indurated earth or gravel. Shepherd v. St. Charles Western Plankroad Co., 28 Mo. 373, 377.

In a contract for grading, the term "earth excavations" mean ordinary earth, and, although excavations in general might include all materials found beneath the surface of the ground, yet the expression "excavations of earth" excludes other materials than ordinary earth, such as indurated earth or gravel. Blair v. Corby, 87 Mo. 313, 317.

EARTH OIL.

Under a policy of fire insurance upon a paper mill and machinery, containing a clause prohibiting the storing or use on the premises of "petroleum, rock or earth oil, etc.," kerosene is prohibited. Buchanan v. Exchange Fire Ins. Co., 61 N. Y. 26, 29.

"In the American Encyclopædia (Ed. 1874), 'earth oil' is said to be a term originally employed as a trade-mark for a mixture of certain liquid hydrocarbons used for purposes of illumination. It has been prepared from bituminous coal, bituminous shales, asphaltum, malthus, wood, resin, fish oil, and candle tar; but it is doubtless true that at the present time its practical business source is petroleum, from which it is obtained by a process of distillation and refinement. It is therefore, in a commercial sense, a refined coal or earth oil." Bennett v. North British & Mercantile Ins. Co., 81 N. Y. 273, 275, 87 Am. Rep. 501.

Naphtha, benzine or benzol, and kerosene are all refined coal or earth oils, not differing in their nature, but only in the degree of inflammability, kerosene being much less inflammable than either of the others. Morse v. Buffalo Fire & Marine Ins. Co., 30 Wis. 534, 538, 11 Am. Rep. 587.

EARTHENWARE.

"Tiles" are defined as plates or pieces of baked clay used for covering roofs, floors, and walls, and for ornamental work, as well as drains. Such pieces being made of earth are earthen, and, being earthen goods, commodities, or merchandise, are "earthenware" within Customs Duty Act March 3, 1883, c. 121, 22 Stat. 488 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2247]. Webster defines "earthenware" as vessels and other utensils, ornaments or the like, made of baked clay. Rossman v. Hedden, 145 U. S. 561, 568, 12 Sup. Ct. 925, 36 L. Ed. 817; Id. (U. S.) 37 Fed. 99, 102.

"Earthenware," by the Century Dictionary, is anything made of clay, and baked in a kiln or dried in the sun, and does not include statuettes found to be made of plaster of paris, 47 per cent. of which is sulphuric acid, 33 per cent. lime, and 20 per cent. water. T. Bing & Co.'s Successors v. United States (U. S.) 121 Fed. 194, 195.

EARTHY MATERIAL.

Carbonate of lead is an "earthy material"; consequently its use with phosphorus in the formation of a composition for the heads of friction matches is an infringement of a patent for the use, in such connection, of "a paste or composition" consisting of phosphorus and "earthy material," with the addition of a glutinous substance for the purpose of cohesion. Bryan v. Stevens (U. S.) 4 Fed. Cas. 510, 511, 513.

An easement is a liberty, privilege, or advantage which one may have in the land of another without profit. Appeal of Big

Mountain Imp. Co., 54 Pa. (4 P. F. Smith) 361; Albright v. Cortright, 45 Atl. 634, 635, 64 N. J. Law (35 Vroom) 330, 48 L. R. A. 616, 81 Am. St. Rep. 504; Pierce v. Keator, 70 N. Y. 419, 421, 26 Am. Rep. 612; Stokes v. Maxson, 84 N. W. 949, 950, 113 Iowa, 122, 86 Am. St. Rep. 367; Cook v. Chicago, B. & Q. Ry. Co., 40 Iowa, 451, 456; Wynn v. Garland, 19 Ark. 23, 68 Am. An easement is a liberty, privilege, or advantage in land, without profit, existing distinct from the ownership of the soil. Harrison v. Boring, 44 Tex. 255, 267 (citing 8 Kent, Comm. 565); Nellis v. Munson, 15 N. E. 739, 740, 108 N. Y. 453; Canfield v. Ford (N. Y.) 28 Barb. 336, 340; Wessels v. Colebank, 51 N. E. 639, 640, 174 Ill. 618; Stokes v. Maxson, 84 N. W. 949, 950, 113 Iowa, 122, 86 Am. St. Rep. 367.

An easement is a service or convenience which one has of another without profit, as a right of way, water course, or washing place on another's ground. Brakely v. Sharp, 9 N. J. Eq. (1 Stockt.) 9, 13 (citing Jac. Law Dict. tit. "Easement"); Dinehart v. Wells (N. Y.) 2 Barb. 432, 435 (citing 3 Cruise's Dig. n. 484). See, also, Peck v. Smith, 1 Conn. 103, 135, 6 Am. Dec. 216; Rhode Island Hospital Trust Co. v. Hayden, 40 Atl. 421, 422, 20 R. I. 544, 42 L. R. A. 107.

"Easement" is defined to be a "right without profit, created by grant or prescription, which the owner of one estate may exercise in or over the estate of another for the benefit of the former." Greenwood, L. & P. J. R. Co. v. New York & G. L. R. Co., 31 N. E. 874, 875, 134 N. Y. 435 (quoting Washb. Easem. 2); Cook v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co., 40 Iowa, 451, 456; McMillian v. Lauer (N. Y.) 24 N. Y. Supp. 951, 954.

An easement is an interest in land created by grant or agreement, express or implied, which confers a right upon the owner thereof to some profit, benefit, dominion, or lawful use out of or over the estate of another. Los Angeles Terminal Land Co. v. Muir, 68 Pac. 308, 312, 136 Cal. 36; Huyck v. Andrews, 21 N. Y. St. Rep. 924, 927, 929; Id., 20 N. E. 581, 582, 113 N. Y. 81, 3 L. R. A. 789, 10 Am. St. Rep. 432; Atlantic & P. R. Co. v. Le Sueur, 19 Pac. 157, 159, 2 Ariz. 428, 1 L. R. A. 244; Northern Pac. R. Co. v. Carland, 3 Pac. 134, 139, 5 Mont. 146; Mayo v. Newhoff, 19 Atl. 837, 838, 47 N. J. Eq. 31; Brew v. Van Deman, 53 Tenn. (6 Heisk.) 433, 436.

An easement is "a privilege without profit which the owner of one tenement has a right to enjoy, in respect of that tenement, in or over the tenement of another person, by reason whereof the latter is obliged to suffer or refrain from doing something on his own tenement for the advantage of the former." Stevenson v. Wallace (Va.) 27 Grat. 77, 87 (quoting Godd. Easem. p. 2); Gray v. McWilliams, 32 Pac. 976, 977, 98 Cal. 157, 21 L. R. A. 593, 35 Am. St. Rep. 163; O'Neill v. Bresse, 23 N. Y. Supp. 526, 527, 3 Misc. Rep. 219; Wolfe v. Frost (N. Y.) 4 Sandf. Ch. 72, 89 (citing Gale & Whatley Easem. 5); Churchill v. Burlington Water Co., 94 Iowa, 89, 93, 62 N. W. 646; Stovall v. Coggins Granite Co., 42 S. E. 723, 724, 116 Ga. 376.

The term "easement" is used to designate some privilege existing in one not the owner of the real estate, constituting a privilege in reference to the land. Rowe v. Nally, 32 Atl. 198, 199, 81 Md. 367.

"An 'easement proper' is a privilege which the owner of one tenement has a right to enjoy, in respect to that tenement, in or over the tenement of another person." Parsons v. Johnson, 68 N. Y. 62, 65, 23 Am. Rep. 149.

"An easement is a charge imposed on one heritage for the use and advantage of a heritage belonging to another proprietor." Manbeck v. Jones, 42 Atl. 536, 537, 190 Pa. 171.

An "easement" may be concisely defined as a privilege without profit which one has for the benefit of his land in the land of another. Bonney v. Greenwood, 52 Atl. 786, 789, 96 Me. 335.

The idea, in definitions of an "easement" to real estate granted, is a privilege off and beyond the local boundaries of the land conveyed. Tucker v. Jones, 19 Pac. 571, 573, 8 Mont. 225 (citing Cave v. Crafts, 53 Cal. 135).

An easement is a quality superadded to the usual rights, and, as it were, passing the ordinary bounds of property, and with the exception of those easements the enjoyment of which depends upon an actual interference of man at each time of enjoyment, as of a right of way, it is attended with a permanent alteration of the two heritages affected by it, showing that one is benefited and the other burdened by the easement in question. Tooth v. Bryce, 25 Atl. 182, 189, 50 N. J. Eq. 589.

"An easement may consist either in suffering something to be done, or in abstaining from doing something upon the servient tenement." 4 Kent, Comm. 419. In the civil law it is denominated a "servitude." A common form of such an easement or servitude is the prohibition of a grantee or lessee from carrying on a particular kind of business or occupation on the servient estate, which, if unobjectionable on grounds of public policy, a court of equity will intervene to establish and protect by asserting a jurisdiction in the nature of specific performance. McMahon v. Williams, 79 Ala. 288, 290.

The following land burdens or servitudes upon land may be attached to other lands as incidents or appurtenances, and are then called "easements": (1) The right of pasturage; (2) the right of fishing; (3) the right of taking game; (4) the right of way; (5) the right of taking water, wood, minerals, and other things; (6) the right of transacting business upon land; (7) the right of conducting lawful sports upon land; (8) the right of receiving air, light, or heat from or over, or discharging the same upon or over, land; (9) the right of receiving water from or discharging the same upon land; (10) the right of flowing land; (11) the right of having water flow without diminution or disturbance of any kind; (12) the right of using a wall as a party wall; (13) the right of receiving more than lateral support from adjacent land or things adjacent thereto; (14) the right of having the whole of a division fence maintained by a coterminous owner; (15) the right of having public conveyances stopped, or of stopping the same, on land; (16) the right of a seat in church; (17) the right of burial. The following land burdens or servitudes upon land may be granted and held, though not attached to land: (1) The right of pasture, and of fishing and taking game; (2) the right of a seat in church; (3) the right of burial; (4) the right of taking rents and tolls; (5) the right of way; (6) the right of taking water, wood, minerals, or other things. Civ. Code S. D. 1903, §§ 267, 268; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, §§ 4052, 4053.

Apparent, continuous, and discontinuous easements.

Easements or servitudes are divided by the Civil Code of France into continuous and discontinuous ones. Lampman v. Milks, 21 N. Y. 505, 515.

"Easements" are divided into two classes, those which are apparent and continuous, and those which are not. The former will pass on the severance of the two tenements as appurtenant without the use of the word "appurtenant," but the latter will not be created unless the grantor uses language in the conveyance sufficient to create the easement de novo. An easement which is continuous, and is made apparent by a permanent structure by means of which the right is enjoyed, is an easement which will be created as an appurtenant without words of grant de novo; as, for instance, the flow of water through a trunk constructed and used for that purpose. Whalen v. Manchester Land Co., 47 Atl. 443, 444, 65 N. J. Law, 206.

Easements are of two kinds, similar to one another in many respects, but differing in many particulars. To the first class belong those easements created by the act of man, and the second those which are given by law to every owner of land. This latter class is given by law because without them there would be no security in the enjoyment of land by the owner. A right to have surface water flow upon the lands of another in the natural way is an easement of the second class. Gray v. McWilliams, 32 Pac. 976, 977, 98 Cal. 157, 21 L. R. A. 593, 35 Am. St. Rep. 163.

As appurtenant to land.

An easement is part of the estate and vests with it, and is not attached to the person. It is the land constituting the dominant estate which possesses the easement, not the owner of the land. Easements may be acquired either by grant or prescription, but, in whatever manner acquired, they are annexed to dominant estates. The enjoyment by a dominant estate of an easement for a sufficient length of time to create a right by prescription will annex the easement to that estate, and it will pass by grant. Ross v. Thompson, 78 Ind. 90, 91.

Generally speaking, an easement is a right which exists in favor of one parcel of land in or over another parcel, and the law of easements relates exclusively to land, and cannot be applied to chattels. In this case it was held that the owner of a building, if he sells part of it, may reserve rights in the part sold, for the benefit of the part retained, which the law will protect. Mayo v. Newhoff, 19 Atl. 837, 838, 47 N. J. Eq. (2 Dick.) 31.

Creation.

An easement is founded on a grant by deed or writing, or by prescription, which supposes one, being a permanent interest in another's land without profit, with a right at all times to enter and enjoy it. Canfield v. Ford (N. Y.) 28 Barb. 336, 340 (citing 3 Kent, Comm. 452); Tabor v. Bradley, 18 N. Y. 109, 111, 72 Am. Dec. 498; Long v. Mayberry, 96 Tenn. (12 Pickle) 378, 382, 36 S. W. 1040; Ferrell v. Ferrell, 60 Tenn. (1 Baxt.) 329.

An easement is an interest in land that cannot be created, granted, or transferred except by operation of law, by an instrument in writing, or by prescription. Smith v. Denniff, 60 Pac. 398, 399, 24 Mont. 20, 81 Am. St. Rep. 408.

As an easement is an interest in land to be acquired and released only by deed, it cannot be extinguished or renounced by a parol agreement between the owners of the dominant and the servient tenements. Dyer v. Sanford, 50 Mass. (9 Metc.) 395, 43 Am. Dec. 399.

Though the grant of an easement is within the statute of frauds and must be in writing, yet a parol grant, executed, will be 3 Wds. & P.—20 upheld under the same circumstances and on the same principles that a parol contract for the sale of lands would be. Johnson v. Lewis, 14 S. W. 466, 467, 47 Ark. 66 (citing Wynn v. Garland, 19 Ark. 23, 68 Am. Dec. 190).

There are two very usual methods of creating an easement or imposing a servitude on land: The owner of a tract of land may convey a portion of it, and in the deed of conveyance may retain an easement in it for the benefit of the portion which he does not dispose of; or he may in the deed convey to his grantee an easement in the land which he retains in his possession. These easements are appurtenant to the land, and pass with it to successive grantees. Rowe v. Nally, 32 Atl. 198, 199, 81 Md. 367.

Essentials.

The essential qualities of easements are these: (1) They are incorporeal; (2) they are imposed on corporeal property, and not on the owner thereof; (3) they convey no right to a participation in the profits arising from the sale of the property; (4) they are imposed for the benefit of the corporeal property; (5) there must be two distinct tenements—the dominant, to which the right belongs, and the servient, upon which the obligation rests. Pierce v. Keator, 70 N. Y. 419, 421, 26 Am. Rep. 612 (citing Bouv. Law Dict.; Wash. Easem. c. 1, § 1); Wolfe v. Frost (N. Y.) 4 Sandf. Ch. 72, 89; Nellis v. Munson, 15 N. E. 739, 740, 108 N. Y. 453; Kellett v. Ida Clayton & G. W. Wagon Road Co., 33 Pac. 885, 886, 99 Cal. 210.

The essential qualities of easements are these: First, they are incorporeal; second, they are imposed on corporeal property; third, they confer no right to a participation in the profits arising from such property; fourth, they are imposed for the benefit of corporeal property. Shirley v. Crabb, 37 N. E. 130, 132, 138 Ind. 200, 46 Am. St. Rep. 376 (citing Robinson v. Thraikill, 110 Ind. 117, 10 N. E. 647; Branson v. Studabaker, 133 Ind. 147, 33 N. E. 98).

Same—Dominant and servient estates.

The existence of an easement involves the idea of two distinct tenements—a dominant estate, to which the right is accessorial; and a servient estate, upon which it is a burden or charge. McMahon v. Williams, 79 Ala. 288, 290.

It is among the essential qualities of every easement that there are two distinct tenements or estates—the dominant, to which the right belongs, and the servient, upon which the obligation is imposed. Bonney v. Greenwood, 52 Atl. 786, 789, 96 Me. 335; Seymour v. Lewis, 13 N. J. Eq. (1 Beasli.) 439, 450, 78 Am. Dec. 108; Nellis v. Munson, 15 N. E. 739, 740, 108 N. Y. 453; Kellett v. Ida Clay- ton & G. W. Wagon Road Co., 33 Pac. 885, 886, 99 Cal. 210; Wolfe v. Frost (N. Y.) 4 Sandf. Ch. 72, 89; Pierce v. Keator, 70 N. Y. 419, 421, 28 Am. Rep. 612; Wagner v. Hanna, 38 Cal. 111, 116, 99 Am. Dec. 354.

"An easement is a right in the lands of another. No one can have an easement in his own lands; and if an easement exists, if the owner of the dominant or servient tenement acquire the other, the easement is extinguished." Denton v. Leddell, 23 N. J. Eq. (8 C. E. Green) 64, 66; Tabor v. Bradley, 18 N. Y. 109, 111, 72 Am. Dec. 498; Miller v. Platt, 12 N. Y. Super. Ct. (5 Duer) 272, 277.

"An easement can only consist of a privilege upon or in the land of another, such as a right of way and the like. From its nature, a man can never have an easement in his own land. Having exclusive and the whole uninterrupted right to this enjoyment, he can in no sense have an easement connected with it;" and hence lands belonging to a bridge company could not pass as an easement to the bridge when it was conveyed by a deed of trust. St. Louis Bridge Co. v. Curtis, 103 Ill. 410, 419.

A person cannot have an "easement," in the legal sense of the word, over his own land. Therefore where two adjoining tracts were owned by the same party, who had been accustomed for years to pass from his mansion on the one, across the other, to and from the public road, no right of way as an easement was established appurtenant to the estate on which the house was built. Stuyvesant v. Woodruff, 21 N. J. Law (1 Zab.) 133, 136, 151, 57 Am. Dec. 156.

An easement or right appurtenant to one tenement to the enjoyment of some privilege in neighboring land may survive the destruction of a part of the servient estate when there is anything remaining upon which the dominant estate may operate. But the right to the use and enjoyment of a privilege in a particular building of another, which does not involve any interest in the soil apart from the building, is extinguished by the destruction of the building, for the obvious reason that nothing remains on which it can operate. Bonney v. Greenwood, 52 Atl. 786, 789, 96 Me. 335.

As incorporeal hereditament.

An easement is an incorporeal hereditament, an interest in the servient estate. Warner v. Rogers, 23 Minn. 34, 37; Mackey v. Harmon, 24 N. W. 702, 703, 34 Minn. 168; Clawson v. Wallace, 52 Pac. 9, 10, 16 Utah, 300.

"An easement is an incorporeal hereditament, and passes with the dominant tenement by grant or succession, and the servient tenement is transmitted subject to the easement in a like manner." Wolfe v. Frost (N. Y.) 4 Sandf. Ch. 72, 73. See, also, Nunnally v. Warner Iron Co., 94 Tenn. (10 Pickle) 397, 413, 29 S. W. 361, 28 L. R. A. 421.

As an incumbrance.

See "Incumbrance (On Title)."

As an interest in land.

An easement is a right in the land of another. Fetters v. Humphries, 18 N. J. Eq. (3 C. E. Green) 260, 262.

An easement creates an interest in land. Robinson v. Thraikill, 10 N. E. 647, 110 Ind. 117; Branson v. Studabaker, 33 N. E. 98, 104, 133 Ind. 147; Shirley v. Crabb, 37 N. E. 130, 132, 133 Ind. 200, 46 Am. St. Rep. 376.

An easement is said to be a permanent interest in another's land, with a right at all times to enter and enjoy it, and must therefore be founded upon a grant by deed or writing, or upon prescription. Emerson v. Bergin, 18 Pac. 264, 266, 76 Cal. 197; Jensen v. Hunter (Cal.) 41 Pac. 14, 17; Canfield v. Ford (N. Y.) 28 Barb. 336, 340; Stokes v. Maxson, 84 N. W. 949, 950, 113 Iowa, 122, 86 Am. St. Rep. 367; Cook v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co., 40 Iowa, 451, 456.

"An easement is a privilege, service, or convenience in the estate of another by grant or prescription, but comprises no interest in the thing itself. It supposes that different rights in the use of the same thing may co-exist in different persons." Peck v. Smith, 1 Conn. 103, 135, 6 Am. Dec. 216; Rhode Island Hospital Trust Co. v. Hayden, 40 Atl. 421, 422, 20 R. I. 544, 42 L. R. A. 107. And nothing is more common than for one to have an easement in the land of another, who has an estate in fee and is in actual possession. It is compatible with the right of the owner of the fee to depasture and mow it, to take the trees and anything growing on it, and hold it in possession for these purposes. Rhode Island Hospital Trust Co. v. Hayden, 40 Atl. 421, 422, 20 R. I. 544, 42 L. R. A. 107.

An easement in land, though an incorporeal right, is a hereditament; an interest in land. Long v. Mayberry, 96 Tenn. (12 Pickle) 378, 382, 36 S. W. 1040 (citing Nunnally v. Southern Iron Co., 94 Tenn. 397, 413, 29 S. W. 361, 28 L. R. A. 421).

The grant of an easement, such as a right of way, is an estate in land, and hence comes within the purview of our registration law, and unless it is registered it is inoperative against subsequent purchasers without notice. Parker v. Meredith (Tenn.) 59 S. W. 167, 170.

The easement of a railroad company in its right of way of which it does not own the fee is not an "easement" in the strict technical sense of the term, which is a right in common with the owner, but is rather in the nature of an interest in the land. Boyce v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., 68 S. W. 920, 922, 168 Mo. 583, 58 L. R. A. 442.

As land.

See, also, "Land."

An easement in a street or other highway appurtenant to an abutting lot partakes of the nature of land. It is a part of the lot to which it is appurtenant, passing to a purchaser with a conveyance of the lot, and descending to the heir on the death of the ancestor. Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Lersch, 51 N. E. 543, 545, 58 Ohio St. 639.

An easement is connected with and appurtenant to real estate, and so far partakes of the character of the lands that it can only be acquired by grant or prescription, which implies a previous grant. Forbes v. Balenseifer, 74 Ill. 183, 185 (citing Washb. Easem. 23); Atlantic P. R. Co. v. Le Sueur, 19 Pac. 157, 159, 2 Ariz. 428, 1 L. R. A. 244.

As property.

See "Property."

As right to use.

"An 'easement' is defined to be the right which one man has to use the land of another for a specific purpose." Jackson v. Trullinger, 9 Or. 393, 397; Tabor v. Bradley, 18 N. Y. 109, 111, 72 Am. Dec. 498.

An easement is a right which one proprietor has to some profit, benefit, or beneficial use out of, in, or over the estate of another proprietor. Ritger v. Parker, 62 Mass. (8 Cush.) 145, 147, 54 Am. Dec. 744.

The right of making use of the land of others, whether it be that of the public or of individuals, for precise and definite purposes not inconsistent with the general right and all property in the owner, especially where it is for a public use, is in legal contemplation an "easement" or franchise, and not a grant of the soil or general property. Boston Water Power Co. v. Boston & W. R. Corp., 33 Mass. (16 Pick.) 512, 522.

"An 'easement' has been defined to consist of a right of an owner in one parcel of land, by reason of such ownership, to use the land of another for a special purpose not inconsistent with a general property in the owner." Warner v. Rogers, 23 Minn. 34, 35 (citing 1 Washb. R. P. 397; 2 Washb. R. P. 25, 78; Washb. on Easem. 2-5; Bouv. Dict. tit. "Easement"); Mackey v. Harmon, 24 N. W. 702, 703, 34 Minn. 168; Wessels v. Colebank, 51 N. E. 639, 640, 174 Ill. 618; Stevens v. Dennett, 51 N. H. 324, 330; Clark v. Glidden, 15 Atl. 358, 360, 60 Vt. 702.

In strictness an "easement" is a mere use of the land of another without taking anything from it. Kennedy Stave & Cooper- age Co. v. Sloss-Sheffield Steel & Iron Co., 34 South. 372, 373, 137 Ala. 401.

An easement is a right issuing out of the soil, and not the right to possess the soil. It admits the possession to be in the owner of the fee. Post v. Pearsall (N. Y.) 22 Wend. 425, 438.

An easement merely gives to a railroad company a right of way in the land; that is, the right to use the land for its purposes. This includes the right to employ the land taken for the purpose of constructing, maintaining, and operating a railroad thereon. The former proprietor of the soil still retains the fee, and his right to the land for every purpose not incompatible with the rights of the railroad company. Chicago & E. I. R. Co. v. Clapp, 68 N. E. 223, 224, 201 Ill. 418.

An easement is always distinct from the occupation and enjoyment of the land itself. Wessels v. Colebank, 51 N. E. 639, 640, 174 Ill. 618.

As title.

Easements are not rights distinct from the title of the land. They are imposed on corporeal property for the benefit of corporeal property. Seymour v. Lewis, 13 N. J. Eq. (2 Beas.) 439, 450, 78 Am. Dec. 108 (citing Gale & Whatley, Easem. 5, 2 Bouv. Inst. 170).

Strictly speaking, an easement does not confer title, but it may affect the title and possession of the owner to such an extent as to be more than an incumbrance. Coleman v. Thomson, 6 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 128, 128.

Unity of title.

That which is claimed to be an easement or servitude must not only be appendant, in utility and fitness for use, to the principal or dominant estate, but there must be a unity of title or right in the same person to both the superior estate and the easement claimed. Meek v. Breckenridge, 29 Ohio St. 642, 648.

Exemption from toll.

The right to take toll is called an "easement," but as a turnpike company has only a right of way or easement in the road, an exemption from toll is not an easement, it not being a right imposed on the corporeal property. Kellett v. Ida Clayton & G. W. Wagon Road Co., 33 Pac. 885, 886, 99 Cal. 210.

Highway distinguished.

See "Highway."

License distinguished.

An easement is a liberty, privilege, or advantage in land, without profit, existing distinct from the ownership of the soil; and, because it is a permanent interest in another's land, with a right to enter at all times and enjoy it, it must be founded upon an agreement by writing or upon prescription. But a license is an authority to do a particular act or series of acts upon another's land without possessing any estate therein. It is founded on personal confidence, and is not assignable or within the statute of frauds. The distinction between a "license" and an "easement" is oftentimes very subtle and difficult to discern.) Cook v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co., 40 Iowa, 456. The right to use a stairway granted by the owner of the building to the owner of an adjoining building, constitutes an easement. Stokes v. Maxson, 84 N. W. 949, 950, 113 Iowa, 122, 86 Am. St. Rep. 367; Cook v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co., 40 Iowa, 451, 456; Jensen v. Hunter (Cal.) 41 Pac. 14, 17; Washburn, in discussing the distinction between an "easement" and a "license," says that "an easement always implies an interest in the land on or over which it is to be enjoyed. A license carries no such interest. The interest of an easement may be a freehold or a chattel one, according to its duration; an easement must be an interest in or over the soil. It lies not in livery, but in a grant, and a freehold interest in it cannot be created or passed otherwise than by deed." Nellis v. Munson, 13 N. Y. St. Rep. 825, 827. See, also, Atlantic P. R. Co. v. Lesueur, 19 Pac. 157, 159, 2 Ariz. 428, 1 L. R. A. 244; Schaeffler v. Miellling, 34 N. Y. Supp. 693, 13 Misc. Rep. 520; Rochester Trust & Safe-Deposit Co. v. Rochester & I. R. Co., 60 N. Y. Supp. 409, 410, 29 Misc. Rep. 222.

An "easement" implies an interest in the land, which can only be created by writing, or constructively, its equivalent, prescription. A "license" may be created by parol. A license is an authority to do particular acts or series of acts on another's land without possessing any estate therein, and hence a "license" and "easement" are distinguished by the fact that it requires words of grant to create an easement or permanent interest in realty; so that a writing signed by N., reciting that for a certain consideration he agrees to allow the W. Co. to pass the muddy water from its ore washers through a stream on his farm so long as the said W. Co. may wish to run or have run said washers, merely gives a license and not an easement. Nunnely v. Southern Iron Co., 29 S. W. 361, 365, 94 Tenn. (10 Pickle) 397, 28 L. R. A. 421.

"License," as a term of real estate law, is defined to be an authority to do a particular act or series of acts upon another's land, without possessing any estate therein, and is generally created by parol, though it may be inferred from circumstances in the relationship of the parties. It is distinguished from an "easement," which must be created by grant or prescription, in the fact that the latter always implies an interest in the land upon which it is imposed; while a "dispensation" or "license" passes no interest, nor does it alter or transfer property in anything, but only makes an action lawful which without it would have been unlawful. Baldwin v. Taylor, 31 Atl. 250, 251, 166 Pa. 507.

A "license" is defined to be an authority given to do some act or a series of acts on the land of another, without passing any interest in the land; while an "easement" is a right in the owner of one parcel of land, by reason of such ownership, to use the land of another for a specific purpose not inconsistent with a general property in the owner; a right which one proprietor has to some profit, benefit, or beneficial use out of, in, or over the estate of another proprietor. The grant of an easement does not pass the realty to the grantee. It conveys an interest in the realty, it is true; but that interest consists of a right to use, like a way over land, or a right of aqueduct or drainage through it, while the general property remains in the grantor. It is well settled that an easement must pass by deed or by prescription, while a mere license to do a particular act or series of acts on the lands may be by parol. It is apparent that the distinction between an "easement" and a "parol license" cannot always be maintained either in respect to the extent of the privilege or its duration. Clark v. Glidden, 15 Atl. 358, 360, 60 Vt. 702.

An easement is a permanent right, conferred by grant or prescription, authorizing one landowner to do or maintain something on the adjoining land of another, which, although a benefit to the land of the former and a burden upon the land of the latter, is not inconsistent with the general ownership. Long Island R. Co. v. Garvey, 159 N. Y. 334, 338, 54 N. E. 60, and cases cited. A franchise is a grant by or under the authority of government, conferring a special, and usually a permanent, right to do an act or series of acts of public concern, and when accepted it becomes a contract, and is irrevocable unless the right to revoke it is expressly reserved. People v. Utica Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 15 Johns. 378, 387, 8 Am. Dec. 243; Bank of Augusta v. Earle (U. S.) 13 Pet. 519, 595, 10 L. Ed. 274; California v. Central Pac. R. Co., 127 U. S. 1, 40, 8 Sup. Ct. 1073, 32 L. Ed. 150. A license is a personal, revocable, and nonassignable privilege given by writing or parol to one, without interest in the lands of another, to do one or more acts of a temporary nature upon such lands. Greenwood Lake & P. J. R. Co. v. New York & G. L. R. Co., 134 N. Y. 435, 440, 31 N. E. 874, and cases cited. "Although originally revocable at the will of the licensor, it may become irrevocable through expenditure of money by the licensee." Id. These definitions, while not comprehensive enough to cover all cases, are sufficient to show that the resolutions of the trustees of a town which give a person liberty to make a roadway and erect a bridge, and which is passed in the exercise of a governmental power conferred by charter in colonial days, creates a franchise rather than a license or an easement. Trustees of Freeholders & Commonalty v. Jessup, 56 N. E. 538, 539, 162 N. Y. 122.

Profit a prendre distinguished.

See "Profit a Prendre."

Right of way.

A right of way over the land of another is designated in common law as an "easement." Manbeck v. Jones, 21 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 300, 302; Western Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Johnston, 59 Pa. (9 P. F. Smith) 290, 294; Kieffer v. Imhoff, 26 Pa. (2 Casey) 438; Clawson v. Wallace, 52 Pac. 9, 10, 16 Utah, 300; Lidgerding v. Zignego, 80 N. W. 360, 361, 77 Minn. 421, 77 Am. St. Rep. 677; Clayton v. Chicago, I. & D. Ry. Co., 25 N. W. 150, 67 Iowa, 238; Appeal of Hoffman, 12 Atl. 57, 60, 118 Pa. 512; Truax v. Gregory, 63 N. E. 674, 676, 196 Ill. 83; Cairo, V. & C. R. Co. v. Brevoort (U. S.) 62 Fed. 129, 135, 25 L. R. A. 527; Northern Pac. R. Co. v. Carland, 3 Pac. 134, 139, 5 Mont. 146.

Right of way in gross distinguished.

The principal distinction between a "right of way in gross" and an "easement" is found in the fact that in the first there is, and in the second there is not, a dominant tenement. The right of way is in gross and personal to the grantee because it is not appurtenant to the other premises. The owner of premises may grant the right of way in either form, and, if it is the intention to grant a right of way in gross, there is no mention of dominant premises. If the grant is of an easement it is always made for the benefit of other premises, and the premises to which the way becomes appurtenant are described in the grant. Wagner v. Hanna, 38 Cal. 111, 116, 99 Am. Dec. 354.

Riparian rights.

The term "easement" includes the servitude in a river, which is an appendant to land fronting thereon. Slingerland v. International Contracting Co., 60 N. Y. Supp. 12, 17, 43 App. Div. 215.

The flow of water to and over riparian lands is not a mere easement, but, while more than an easement, may be stated to include the qualities of an easement. Lux v. Haggin, 69 Cal. 255, 293, 10 Pac. 674, 693.

St. 1840, c. 87, § 1, providing that the Supreme Judicial Court has original and exclusive jurisdiction of all "actions respecting easements on real estate," but not including complaints for flowing land, should be construed to include an action for the erection of a dam below the mill and close of the plaintiff whereby the water of a river was prevented from flowing and passing off from plaintiff's wheel along the river in its usual course, thereby ran water back on the plaintiff's wheel, since the right of plaintiff to have the waters of the river flow over the land of another below his land and mill, at the place where the obstruction was erected, in its accustomed course, free from all artificial obstruction, was a right to a natural easement. The right which a party has to the use of water flowing over his own land is a real or corporeal hereditament, and not an easement; but the right of a party to have the water of a stream or water course flow to or over his lands or mill from the land of another is an incorporeal hereditament and an easement, and it is immaterial whether the water course be natural or artificial, or whether the right was derived ex jure naturæ or by grant or prescription. Cary v. Daniels, 46 Mass. (5 Metc.) 236, 237.

Tenancy in.

The definition of an "easement" excludes the idea of its being held as a tenancy. There may be an enjoyment of the easement, but no possession such as can be made the basis of an action of ejectment. No such action will lie to recover possession of the water course. Swift v. Goodrich, 11 Pac. 561, 563, 70 Cal. 103.

EASEMENT APPURTENANT.

See "Appurtenance—Appurtenant."

EASEMENT IN GROSS.

"An easement in gross is a mere personal interest in the real estate of another, and is not assignable or inheritable. It dies with the person, and it is so exclusively personal that the owner by right cannot take another person in company with him." Cadwalader v. Bailey, 23 Atl. 20, 21, 17 R. I. 495, 14 L. R. A. 300.

An easement is appurtenant and not in gross when it appears that it was granted for the benefit of the grantee's land. A right of way is appurtenant to the land of the grantee if so in fact, although not declared to be so in the deed. If the way leads to the grantee's land, and is useless except for use in connection with it, and after the grant was used solely for access to such land, it is appurtenant to it. Thus, where a right of way was granted by the owner of land on a highway to an adjoining owner who had no means of access to the highway, such right of way was an easement appurtenant to the adjoining owner's loss, and not in gross. Lidgerding v. Zignego, 80 N. W. 860, 861, 77 Minn. 421, 77 Am. St. Rep. 677.

An "easement in gross," as the term is now commonly used, is a mere personal right in the land of another, while an "easement appurtenant" is an incorporeal right which is attached to and belongs to some superior right. In determining whether a right granted is appurtenant or in gross, courts must consider the terms of the grant, the nature of the right, and the surrounding circumstances. Thus a grant of a right of way to the owners of a stone quarry for the purpose of building a spur track from the main track of a railroad to the stone quarry is an easement appurtenant, and not an easement in gross. Stovall v. Coggins Granite Co., 42 S. E. 723, 724, 116 Ga. 376.

An easement in gross is a personal right; one which may be assigned by the grantee to another person. Thus a deed of a lot of land which grants a right of way from a street across the rear of another lot owned by the grantor, to be used in common with the owners of the two lots, gives an easement appurtenant to the land conveyed, and will not be presumed to be personal or an easement in gross. Reise v. Enos, 45 N. W. 414, 415, 76 Wis. 634, 8 L. R. A. 617.

A deed granting to a city the right of going upon the land and constructing and maintaining a canal for its use, and to cut timber and carry stone for such purpose, was an easement in gross, because it does not appear to be appurtenant to any estate in land, and it was upon condition that before letting the water into the canal the city should construct and operate a highway of certain dimensions along the canal. Pinkum v. City of Eau Claire, 51 N. W. 550, 553, 81 Wis. 301.

EASEMENT OF ACCESS.

See "Access (Easement of)."

EASEMENT OF NATURAL SUPPORT.

An "easement of natural support" of the land of one by the land of the adjacent owner applies only to lands in their natural condition, and does not extend so as to give the owner of a building erected on the confines of his land the right to have it supported laterally by the land of his neighbor; and so it has become the settled doctrine of the law that if one by excavating on his own land adjacent to the land of his neighbor, using due care, causes a building on his neighbor's land to topple over, there is no remedy, provided the weight of the building caused the land on which it stood to give way. Booth v. Rome, W. & O. T. R. Co., 35 N. E. 592, 594, 140 N. Y. 267, 24 L. R. A. 105, 37 Am. St. Rep. 552.

EASEMENT OF NAVIGATION.

Clearly the term "easement of navigation" should not be construed in any narrow scientific sense, but, having in mind that the reservation of the easement of navigation by a state in a navigable river is for the benefit of the public in its use of the highway, it should receive a construction in harmony with the nature of the uses of the water by the public, and the objects of a public good to be accomplished by such uses. Those objects relate to trade and commerce, which is the interchange of goods or products between nations or individuals by means of transportation, or, as applied to commerce on the water, by means of navigation. One dictionary meaning of "navigation" is "the science or art of conducting a ship from one place to another." Another definition is "the science or art of ascertaining the position and directing the course of vessels, especially at sea, by astronomical observations or calculations; nautical science or art." And still another definition is "shipping," which would embrace conduct of ships generally. Commerce, then, is the object; navigation, the instrument or incident. In other words, navigation is the means by which commerce is accomplished, and it is for the purpose of aiding commerce that navigation is encouraged and protected. When the term "easement of navigation" is used, therefore, it carries with it the idea of navigation for the purpose of commerce, so that whatever relates to commerce or is incident to it is embraced in the term. Pollock v. Cleveland Shipbuilding Co., 47 N. E. 582, 583, 56 Ohio St. 655 (citing State v. Shannon, 36 Ohio St. 423, 38 Am. Rep. 599; Sweatt v. Boston, H. & M. R. Co., 23 Fed. Cas. 530).

EAST.

In describing courses, the word "east" means true course, and refers to the true meridian, unless otherwise declared. Pol. Code Cal. 1903, § 3903; Pol. Code Mont. 1895, § 4103.

"East of the Cape of Good Hope," as used in Tariff Act 1872, fixing an additional ad valorem duty on goods imported from countries east of the Cape of Good Hope, should be construed to mean countries which, before the construction of the Suez Canal, ordinarily carried on commerce with the United States by passing around the Cape of Good Hope. "Although the act of 1872 was passed after the Suez Canal was in operation, we see no indication of an intention by Congress to give a new meaning to the language employed, which had received a judicial construction. The words used are words of description, and indicate to the popular mind the same countries now as they had before the course of trade was to some extent changed by cutting through the Isthmus of Suez." Powers v. Comley, 101 U. S. 789, 790, 25 L. Ed. 805.

EASTERLY.

The word "easterly," as used in a mining location describing the location of a vein, will not be held to mean due east, as in the case of deeds, but that the general course of the vein or location runs nearer towards the east than any of the other cardinal points of the compass. Wiltsee v. King of Arizona Min. & Mill. Co. (Ariz.) 60 Pac. 896, 898.

There are very few words in our language more indefinite and uncertain in their meaning than the words "southerly," "easterly," and "northerly." The word "southerly," as applied to the course of a proposed highway, designating the course as "thence southerly to avoid a certain creek, and thence easterly and northerly through certain lands," means nearly south, but how near, and whether east or west or south, it is impossible to tell without the use of other qualifying words; and so with regard to the words "easterly" and "northerly." It is impossible to determine with any certainty the course intended thereby. Scraper v. Pipes, 59 Ind. 158, 164.

The words "northerly" and "easterly" in the description in a deed, where there is no object to direct their course, must be taken to mean due north and due east, and, when there are monuments to which they are applicable, they have their legitimate meaning and full force, and yet the course may incline either way any distance, so long as it tends toward the north and east. Foster v. Foss, 77 Me. 279, 280.

The word "easterly" means due east, unless controlled by other words, or by lines, monuments, or natural objects. Pol. Code Cal. 1903, § 3904; Pol. Code Mont. 1895, § 4104.

EASTWARDLY.

"Eastwardly," as used in a deed or grant of land to describe a call or a line to run eastwardly, is an indefinite expression, and means nothing more, necessarily, than that the land shall lie on the eastern, and not on the western, side of a given line. It signifies on which side of the base of the lines marking the survey the land is to lie. Freeble v. Vanhoozer, 5 Ky. (2 Bibb) 118, 120.

"Eastwardly," as used in a grant, means due east, unless there be some object which can be found to control the course, in which case the course will run east, varying from that point to include the object. Simms v. Dickson (U. S.) 3 Tenn. (1 Cooke) 137, 140, 22 Fed. Cas. 158.

"Eastwardly," in a description in a deed, when used alone, will be construed to mean due east, but when used with other words which are added to qualify its meaning, it will be held to mean precisely what the qualifying words make it mean. Thus, where the boundary line on one side of land conveyed is described as running from a given monument eastwardly to a creek parallel with the southerly line of another tract of land, and the line of the other tract is not a straight line, but meanders, then the boundary line described in the deed will run parallel with the other line in its meanders, and not straight due east and parallel with its ordinary course. Fratt v. Woodward, 32 Cal. 219, 227, 91 Am. Dec. 573.

EATING HOUSE.

An eating house for meals cannot be considered an inn, nor can the liabilities attaching to innkeepers be extended to the proprietor of such an establishment. It is wanting in some of the requisites necessary to constitute it an inn, as no lodging places are provided for travelers. Carpenter v. Taylor (N. Y.) 1 Hilt. 193, 195.

"Eating house," as used in Acts 1872-73, c. 144, § 13, imposing a tax for the privilege of carrying on eating houses, cannot be construed to include a stall in a market house at which meals were furnished to the public, for in ordinary conversation nobody would speak of a stall in a market as a "house," nor, because meals were sold at the stall, would it be ordinarily spoken of as an "eating house." State v. Hall, 73 N. C. 252, 253.

The words "regular hotels and eating houses," in Rev. St. § 8092, providing that all places where intoxicating liquors are sold shall be closed on Sunday, but that the term "place," in reference to regular hotels and eating houses, shall be construed to mean a room or part of the room where such liquors are usually exposed to sale, designate the place of the principal, and not the subordinate, business, which is the carrying on the hotel or eating house. Lederer v. State, 3 O. C. D. 303, 304.

EAVES.

The "eaves" of a building are the edges of the roof projecting beyond the face of the walls. Proprietors of Center St. Church v. Machlas Hotel Co., 51 Me. 413, 414.

EAVESDROPPER.

An "eavesdropper" is one who is secretly a listener to conversations between others, and would include a person who merely overheard communications or conversations between a husband and wife. Selden v. State, 42 N. W. 218, 219, 74 Wis. 271, 17 Am. St. Rep. 144.

EAVESDROPPING.

Blackstone, defining the offense of "eavesdropping," says: "Eavesdroppers, or such as listen under walls or windows or the eaves of houses, and harken for discourse, and thereupon frame slanderous and mischievous tales, are a common nuisance." 4 Bl. Comm. 168. Bishop says: "It consists in the nuisance of hanging about the dwelling house of another, hearing tattle, and repeating it, to the disturbance of the neighborhood." State v. Pennington, 40 Tenn. (3 Head) 299, 300, 75 Am. Dec. 771 (citing 2 Bish. Cr. Law, 274).

"Eavesdropping" consists in privately listening, but not looking or peeping, into the affairs of another. Eavesdropping is an indictable offense in Pennsylvania, but it seems that no prosecution would lie for such offense if it was proved to have been committed either by or under the authority of the husband of the prosecutrix, who was the subject of the offense, there being no law which can prevent a husband from setting a watch on his wife. Commonwealth v. Lovett (Pa.) 4 Clark, 5.

EBONY.

The terms "ebony" and "rosewood," as used in Tariff Act July 30, 1846, Schedule B, providing that manufacturers of ebony and rosewood, etc., should be subject to a duty of 40 per cent. ad valorem, did not mean articles manufactured from ebony and rosewood entirely, but included as well fancy boxes made of common wood, and veneered with rosewood or ebony, invoiced as rosewood and ebony boxes, and known to the trade by those names, and also as fancy boxes and furnishing boxes, it not appearing that there are any articles known as "ebony boxes" or "rosewood boxes" made wholly from those woods. Sill v. Lawrence (U. S.) 22 Fed. Cas. 115, 116.

EBRIETY.

"Ebriety" is a word nearly synonymous with "inebriation" and "intoxication," and is expressive of that state and condition which inevitably follows from taking into the body, by swallowing or drinking, excessive quantities of intoxicating liquors. Commonwealth v. Whitney, 65 Mass. (11 Cush.) 477, 479.

ECCENTRICITY.

A distinction between mere "eccentricity" and "unsoundness of mind," similar to that between "weakness" and "unsoundness," must be noticed and remembered. In the order of nature, no two individuals of the same species are exactly alike. Each individual has his own idiosyncrasies or peculiar government of his powers, and, while he resembles all others in certain general features of body and mind, he differs from them in certain particulars. "Eccentricity" is a marked peculiarity and yet essential difference. The great masses of sound minds, like a company of travelers, are found near together, but there are some whose eccentricities travel so widely they are seen apart, yet not so far that it can be said that they have parted company and entered the ranks of the unsound of mind. Ekin's Heirs v. McCracken (Pa.) 11 Phila. 534, 535.

ECCLESIASTICAL.

"Ecclesiastical" is something belonging to or set apart for the church, as distinguished from "civil" or "secular," with regard to the world. Wharton and Black, Law Dicts.

ECCLESIASTICAL CORPORATIONS.

"Ecclesiastical corporations," says Blackstone, "are where the members who compose it are entirely spiritual persons, such as bishops, certain deans, and prebendaries; all archdeacons, parsons, and vicars, which are sole corporations; deans and chapters at present, and formerly priors and convents, abbots and monks, and the like; bodies aggregate." And in describing the class of lay corporations known as "eleemosynary," he adds: "And all these eleemosynary corporations are, strictly speaking, lay and not ecclesiastical, even though composed of ecclesiastical persons, and although they in some things partake of the nature, privileges, and restrictions of ecclesiastical bodies." 1 Bl. 470. It is not the profession of piety by the individuals that renders the corporation of which they are the members ecclesiastical. The corporation must be spiritual in a legal, and not in a popular or scriptural, sense. Lay corporations may be for the advancement of religion, and the members may all be clergymen even, but that does not make the corporation ecclesiastical. Robertson v. Bullions (N. Y.) 9 Barb. 64, 87.

Religious corporations incorporated under the law of New York are not "ecclesiastical corporations" in the sense of the English law. Robertson v. Bullions, 11 N. Y. (1 Kern.) 243, 265, 266.

ECCLESIASTICAL COUNCIL.

An "ecclesiastical council" is a tribunal frequently resorted to in the settlement of clergymen, and reconciling and healing differences and divisions in churches, and adjusting and terminating controversies between pastors and their churches. It is frequently called an "advisory court." Stearns v. First Parish in Bedford, 38 Mass. (21 Pick.) 114, 124.

An "ecclesiastical council" is a judicial tribunal whose province it is, on the proper presentation of charges, to try them on evidence admissible before such a tribunal. They have no power to dissolve a contract, nor to absolve either party from its obligation. They may not only try and determine the existence of the causes which work a forfeiture of a clerical office, but they may also give their advice in cases where there is no forfeiture, and well would it be for parishes and pastors were such advice more frequently followed. Sheldon v. Congregational Parish in Easton, 41 Mass. (24 Pick.) 281, 288, 289.

ECCLESIASTICAL COURTS.

The term "ecclesiastical courts" is used in England to designate the courts administering the canon law. Equitable Life Assur. Soc. of United States v. Paterson, 41 Ga. 338, 364, 5 Am. Rep. 535.

ECCLESIASTICAL JURISDICTION.

The jurisdiction of the lay and ecclesiastical courts. "In Anglo-Saxon times there was no distinction between lay and ecclesiastical jurisdiction. The county court was as much a spiritual as a temporal tribunal. The rights of the church were ascertained and asserted at the same time and by the same judges as the rights of the laity. It was not till after the Norman Conquest that the common-law and ecclesiastical courts were separated and the latter invested with the sole jurisdiction over ecclesiastical cases." Short v. Stotts, 58 Ind. 29, 35 (quoting 3 Chitty, Bl. Comm. pp. 61, 63).

ECCLESIASTICAL LAW.

Of the several branches of the unwritten law of England there is one properly to be deemed common law, yet technically called "ecclesiastical law." To the branch of the common law called "ecclesiastical" the subject of marriage and divorce in England pertains. De Witt v. De Witt, 66 N. E. 136, 138, 67 Ohio St. 340 (citing Bish. Mar. & Div. § 114).

ECCLESIASTICAL THINGS.

The phrase "ecclesiastical things," as used in the corpus juris canonici, which is an abridgment of the canon law of the Church of Rome, includes church buildings, church property, the ornaments, cemetery, or property given to the church for poor orphans or any other pious purpose whatever. Smith v. Bonhoff, 2 Mich. 115, 116, 121.

ECLECTIC.

In medicine "eclectic practice," "is a system of practice which is unusual and eccentric, and not countenanced by the allopathic school of medicine, but characterized by them as spurious and denounced as dangerous. It is essentially different from the allopathic practice, and based on different views of the nature and causes of diseases, their appropriate remedies, and the modes of applying them." Bradbury v. Bardin, 34 Conn. 452, 453.

ECUMENICAL COUNCIL.

An "ecumenical council" is a universal council, a council of all and not of a part, and is only applied to the councils of the Catholic Church. A synod is improperly spoken of as an "ecumenical council." The word "synod" signifies simply a meeting of the few adjoining presbyteries. Groesbeek v. Dunscomb (N. Y.) 41 How. Prac. 302, 344.

EDGE.

A deed of land defining one of its boundaries as the "edge of the mill pond" means the bank of the pond, and gives the land a defined boundary without regard to the contingent subsidence of the water constituting a pond, thereby leaving the land dry, and passes no title to the land under the pond. The grantee can acquire no title to the land thereunder by accretion, as in the case of a navigable stream. Holden v. Chandler, 18 Atl. 310, 311, 61 Vt. 291.

EDIBLE.

The word "edible," in Tariff Act 1890, par. 560, relating to the duties on certain drugs, etc., which are not edible, etc., is intended to exclude from the exemption such of the enumerated articles as are edible according to the common understanding. Cruikshank v. United States (U. S.) 59 Fed. 446, 449, 8 C. O. A. 171.

"Edible," as used in Act Cong. Oct. 1, 1890, relating to the tariff on edible spices, is a relative term, qualified somewhat by the noun which follows it. As applied to spices, it means a spice which is eaten as spices are eaten, namely, as a sauce, a condiment, a relish, not as a food product capable of sustaining life. In re Cruikshank (U. S.) 54 Fed. 676, 677.

EDITION.

An "edition" of a book is the publication of it. Hone v. Kent, 6 N. Y. (2 Seld.) 390, 395.

An "edition" of a publication is the total number of copies issued or published at once. Mooney v. United States Industrial

Pub. Co., 61 N. E. 607, 608, 27 Ind. App. 407.

An "edition" is defined to be a republication, sometimes with a revision and correction; any publication of a book before published; and a publication of court rules of 1874, with appropriate notes, is not a "subsequent edition" of the court rules of 1871. Banks v. McDivitt (U. S.) 2 Fed. Cas. 759, 761.

EDITION DE LUXE.

In reference to the publishing of books, the term "edition de luxe" means an elaborate and costly edition, often limited; a sumptuous edition as regards paper, illustrations, binding, etc. It is a generic expression, meaning simply an elegant edition of some kind, and in an action on a contract of sale, describing the article sold as the "Edition de Luxe of Art and Architecture," it was competent for the defendant to allege and prove that he was led to believe that the expression meant an artist-proof edition. Barrie v. Miller, 30 S. E. 840, 841, 104 Ga. 312, 69 Am. St. Rep. 171.

EDITOR.

Of newspaper.

As printer, see "Printer."

As laborer, see "Laborer."

An editor of a newspaper is one who superintends publication of a newspaper. Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714, 721, 24 L. Ed. 585 (citing Webster).

An editor of a newspaper is one who, while he may not furnish as the production of his mind the words, sentences, and ideas printed, or set the type or work the press, superintends the correction of the proof sheet of the printer, and who, in regard to the publication of the paper, selects the matter for publication. Brown v. Woods' Heirs, 29 Ky. (6 J. J. Marsh.) 11, 17, 18.

Of statutory.

The term "editor" is used in the business of the production of bronze statuary to designate the founder who casts the statuary from the clay model made by the artist. Merritt v. Tiffany, 10 Sup. Ct. 52, 53, 132 U. S. 167, 33 L. Ed. 299.

EDUCATE—EDUCATION.

See "Collegiate Education"; "Common School Education"; "English Education"; "German Education"; "Theological Education."

As charity, see "Charity."

As county purpose, see "County Purpose."

As public use, see "Public Use."

"Education" is the bringing up, physically and mentally, of a child, or the preparation of a person, by some due course of training, for a professional or business life or calling. State ex rel. Henderson v. Lesueur, 13 S. W. 237, 238, 99 Mo. 552, 7 L. R. A. 734.

"Education" is a broad and comprehensive term. It has been defined as the process of developing and training the powers and capabilities of human beings. To "educate," according to one of Webster's definitions, is to prepare and fit for any calling or business, or for activity and usefulness in life. Education may be particularly directed to either mental, moral, or physical powers and faculties, but in its broadest and its best sense it embraces them all. And, where an institution is incorporated for the education of boys, its trustees did not exceed their authority when they established an institution providing a place where young men whose early education had been neglected could be instructed, their physical welfare cared for, and a practical knowledge of work, especially agriculture, given them daily. Mount Herman Boys' School v. Town of Gill, 145 Mass. 139, 146, 13 N. E. 354, 357.

"'Education' is a broad term, and includes all knowledge. If we take it in its full and not in its legal or popular sense, whatever we learn by observation, by conversation, or by other means away from what has been implanted by nature, is 'education.' In fact, everything not known intuitively and instinctively is 'education.'" Cook v. State, 16 S. W. 471, 472, 90 Tenn. (6 Pickle) 407, 13 L. R. A. 183.

Moral and physical training.

As applied to minors, it has been said "education" comprehends not merely the instruction received at school, or knowledge, but the whole course of training, moral, intellectual, and physical. State ex rel. Henderson v. Lesueur, 13 S. W. 237, 238, 99 Mo. 552, 7 L. R. A. 734.

The word "education," in the statement of a father's duty toward a child to the effect that it is his duty to provide for the child's education, means not merely instruction in the pursuits of literature, but comprehends a proper attention to the moral and religious sentiments of the child. Commonwealth v. Armstrong, 1 Pa. Law J. 392-394.

"Educate," as used in Code, § 2521, empowering a county court to remove a guardian for neglecting to educate or maintain his ward, means proper moral as well as intellectual and physical instruction, and a guardian may be removed for his having contaminating principles and domestic associations. Ruohs v. Backer, 53 Tenn. (6 Heisk.) 395, 400, 19 Am. Rep. 598.

Subsistence and personal care.

"Educate and bring up," as used in a will wherein a legacy was given on the condition that the legatee should educate and bring up testator's granddaughter, means to furnish the granddaughter with subsistence and also personal care. Merrill v. Emery, 27 Mass. (10 Pick.) 507, 511.

EDUCATIONAL APPLIANCE.

An "appliance" is anything brought into use as a means to effect some end. An "educational appliance" is something necessary or useful to enable the teacher to teach the school children, such as a blackboard, map, or dictionary, but it must be of the nature that a few will answer for the needs of all. Honaker v. Board of Education of Pocotalico Dist., 24 S. E. 544, 545, 42 W. Va. 170, 32 L. R. A. 413, 57 Am. St. Rep. 847.

"Educational appliances," as used in Rev. St. 1894, § 5920, Rev. St. 1881, § 4444, providing that school trustees may provide suitable furniture, apparatus, and other educational appliances necessary for the thorough organization and efficient management of the schools of his township, does not include reading circle books, and the township cannot be rendered liable for the purchase of such books by the school trustee, under the statute. First Nat. Bank v. Adams School Tp., 46 N. E. 832, 833, 17 Ind. App. 375.

EDUCATIONAL INSTITUTION.

As benevolent association, see "Benevolent Association."

As eleemosynary corporation, see "Eleemosynary."

The term "educational institution," as used in St. 1891, c. 425, exempting educational institutions from taxation on collateral legacies, includes a free public library, and hence legacies given to a town to establish and maintain a free public library are exempt. Inhabitants of Town of Essex v. Brooks, 41 N. E. 119, 120, 164 Mass. 79.

Acts 1891, c. 425, imposing a tax on property passing by will or succession, and exempting property passing to or for charitable, educational, or religious societies or institutions, contemplates an institution which owns property, and not a charitable gift itself; and hence the commonwealth is entitled to levy a tax on a legacy left to a trust company in trust for needy, aged women and men who had been in better circumstances in early life. Hooper v. Shaw, 57 N. E. 361, 362, 176 Mass. 190.

EDUCATIONAL OBJECTS.

Under Revenue Law 1901, §§ 33, 36, imposing an opera-house tax, and exempting from taxation all exhibitions or entertainments given for the benefit of "educational objects," a musical conservatory owning a hall in which it gives musical entertainments for the special benefit of its pupils, charging an admission and selling tickets to the public to defray the expenses of the performances, is not liable for the opera-house tax, the day having long since passed since music can be denied a part in the educational systems of the age. Markham v. Southern Conservatory of Music, 41 S. E. 531, 532, 130 N. C. 276.

EDUCATIONAL PURPOSES.

A will giving property for charitable and educational purposes requires the use to be one which directly promotes the cause of education. Haynes v. Carr, 49 Atl. 638, 642, 70 N. H. 463.

In 3 Starr & C. Ann. St. p. 3706, par. 202, providing that the levy of school taxes shall not exceed a certain per cent. for educational purposes and a certain per cent. for building purposes, the words "building purposes" are special, and apply solely to the building of schoolhouses and matters incident thereto, while the words "educational purposes" are general, and apply to all matters for which a board of directors may levy school taxes. O'Day v. People, 49 N. E. 504, 505, 171 Ill. 293.

A school building is used for "purposes of education," within the meaning of the act incorporating it and exempting it from taxation so long as it is used only for the purposes of education, the greater portion of which is used and occupied in the conduct of the school, though two rooms are let at a monthly rental paid to it, which monthly rental was used in defraying the legitimate expenses of conducting the school, paying salaries of teachers, keeping the building in repair, and in paying debts of the association incurred in the building. North St. Louis Gymnastic Soc. v. Hudson, 85 Mo. 32, 34.

School for blind.

"Institutions for educational purposes," within the meaning of Const. art. 5, § 19, includes the Institution for the Blind at Nebraska City. Curtis v. Allen, 61 N. W. 568, 43 Neb. 184.

District school.

Several persons associated themselves as proprietors of a building to be erected and "used exclusively for an academy and similar purposes," and appointed trustees with power to lease the building. The building was erected on land conveyed to the trustees to hold in trust for the proprietors "while they maintained a building thereon for the purposes of education," and was first used as an academy, but afterwards leased by the trustees to a district school. Held, that the words "building for the purpose of education" should be construed to include a district school, and hence the grantees' estate was not terminated by the lease of the building to the district school. Peck v. Clafin, 105 Mass. 420, 423.

Heating and repairing.

The term "educational purposes" properly characterizes the use by a university of a tract of six acres of land which is part of a larger body, and divided from the residue, on which the main buildings of the university are erected, by streets only, though the only buildings on such six acres are two small buildings erected and used by the primary departments, the remainder of the tract being cultivated by the students, who receive pay for their labor in board and tuition, the products being consumed at the university, and on which it is intended, when funds are procured, to erect another large building, and therefore such tract is exempted from taxation by Const. art. 2, § 28, and Acts 1883, c. 105, §§ 1, 2, exempting from taxation all property belonging to educational institutions and actually used for educational purposes. State v. Fiske University, 10 S. W. 284, 87 Tenn. (3 Pickle) 233.

A tax for heating and repairing purposes is a tax for "educational" and not for "building purposes," the latter words referring to the building of schoolhouses only, within 3 Starr & C. Ann. St. p. 1194, limiting the taxes levied in any one year to a certain per cent. of the assessed valuation for educational purposes and a certain per cent. for building purposes. Chicago & A. R. Co. v. People, 45 N. E. 122, 123, 163 Ill. 616.

EDUCATIONAL STAFF.

The word "educational staff" in Greater New York Charter, § 1117, providing that all superintendents, and all principals, teachers, and other members of the educational staff in the public school system of New York City as constituted by the act, shall continue in office, is to be construed as "teaching staff." "If it had been intended to continue all officers and employes within the possible capacity of the former words when standing alone, they would not have been preceded by the words 'principals' and 'teachers.'" By a well-settled principle of statutory construction, when a particular class is spoken of, and general words follow, the class first mentioned is to be treated as referring to persons ejusdem generis with such class. The words as so used do not include attendance officers." People v. White, 72 N. Y. Supp. 91, 93, 64 App. Div. 390; People v. Board of Education of New York City, 83 N. Y. Supp. 803, 805, 86 App. Div. 537.

EFFECT.

See "Force and Effect"; "Natural Effect"; "Prosecute to or with Effect"; "Take Effect."

"Effect," as used in a statute providing that appeals from the marine court were to be taken in the same manner and with like "effect" as appeals in the Supreme Court, means that the party appealing should have all the benefits and advantages given to a party appealing in the Supreme Court. The manner relates to the mode of proceeding in effecting an appeal. The effect relates to the consequences produced by the appeal, as under what circumstances it shall operate to stay proceedings. "Effect" is an appropriate word to describe a result that follows after the appeal is completed. Roberts v. Donnell, 31 N. Y. 446, 449.

Code Civ. Proc. § 2260, providing that appeals from final orders in summary proceedings may be taken to the same court in the same manner and "with like effect" as appeals from the district court, means "with like results, and this includes any disposition in the one case which the appellate court could make in the other." Moench v. Yung, 9 N. Y. Supp. 637, 16 Daly, 143.

Where specifications of a patent state that so high a temperature is not absolutely necessary to produce a "beneficial effect," and then adds that, as the "effect" does not depend on the nature of the material, other metals than iron may be used, the word "effect" is equivalent to "beneficial effect." Neilson v. Harford, 8 Mees. & W. 806, 825.

Exact copy imported.

Where an indictment alleged that the oath on which perjury was assigned was "not substantial and to the effect, to wit," an exact recital was not necessary, the word "effect" not requiring an exact copy. People v. Warner (N. Y.) 5 Wend. 271, 273.

The words, "effect and purport following," in an indictment for forgery, setting out the forged instrument as being of the effect and purport following, does not render the indictment invalid. "While we concede that the precedents are in favor of the form which uses the tenor rather than the purport and effect, we have no thought that under our statutes a defect of this character would vitiate the indictment. These words might be rejected without in the least changing the meaning of the pleader." State v. Johnson, 26 Iowa, 407, 413, 96 Am. Dec. 158.

A statute requiring that a certain notice be given in a specified form or to the like "effect" was complied with by a notice which gave all the information which the legislature intended to be given by the form recommended. Regina v. Harwich, 1 El. & Bl. 617, 618.

"To that effect," as used in Act April 8, 1883, § 7 (P. L. 249), providing that it shall be proved that the testator at the time of pronouncing the bequest did bid the persons present, or some of them, to bear witness that such was his will, "or to that effect," was intended to prevent the inference that any set form of words should be necessary, but not to diminish the requirement of a distinct and explicit request of the testator to persons present to remember and be ready to testify that the testator was thereby making his will. In re Wiley's Estate, 40 Atl. 980, 981, 187 Pa. 82, 67 Am. St. Rep. 569.

Pub. St. c. 126, § 4, provides that when lands are given by deed or will to a person for life, and after his death to his heirs in fee, or by "words to that effect," the conveyance shall be construed to vest an estate for life only in such degree, and a remainder in fee simple to his heirs. Held, that by the phrase "by words to that effect" were included words which were practically synonymous with "heirs," and that any word used or intended to mean the heirs or issue of the testator was sufficient to bring the devise within the meaning of the statute. Trumbull v. Trumbull, 21 N. E. 366, 367, 149 Mass. 200, 4 L. R. A. 117.

Of climate.

A bill of lading exempting a carrier from liability from loss resulting from the "effect of climate" means the effect of climate in the passage of the vessel, and not damages caused by exposure in the unloading thereof. Wessles v. The Alina (U. S.) 25 Fed. 562, 568.

Of evidence.

Rev. Code, § 2673, declares that the court shall not charge on the "effect of evidence" unless requested to do so by either party. Held, that the phrase "effect of the evidence" was not synonymous with "burden of proof," and therefore a charge on the burden of proof was not objectionable, under the statute. Hill's Adm'r v. Nichols, 50 Ala. 336, 339.

The word "effect," as used in an instruction relative to determining what weight or effect the jury would give the testimony of each witness, etc., is held to mean precisely the same thing as "weight," and hence not to be confusing. Jessen v. Donahue (Neb.) 96 N. W. 639, 640.

Of judgment.

The "effect" of a judgment is not to bear interest, though that is one of its incidents; so that under Pol. Code, § 3716, declaring that every tax has the effect of a judgment against the person, the tax does not bear interest. People v. Central Pac. R. Co., 105 Cal. 576, 38 Pac. 905, 910.

EFFECTED.

An insurance policy providing for no notice of any other insurance effected on said property relates not only to other insurance effected prior to the execution of the policy, but to insurance obtained thereafter. Warwick v. Monmouth County Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 44 N. J. Law (15 Vroom) 83, 85, 43 Am. Rep. 343.

As completed.

In construing Village Law, § 159, providing that persons damaged by the change of a street grade must present a verified claim within 60 days after such change is effected, the word "effected" was held to have been used in the sense of "completed," and that the change of grade for which the injured party may claim damages is not effected until it is completed, and until the village has taken some action to indicate that it has closed the work in connection with the improvement under way. The best evidence of this intention on the part of the village would seem to be the final grading and placing of a permanent sidewalk. Until that time the petitioner, in the absence of other evidence, is not bound to assume that the change of grade contemplated has been effected. Used in one sense, a change of grade might be said to have been effected every time a wagon load of dirt was removed or brought upon the highway, but the change contemplated in the statute requires more than this. It has in view the official and authoritative as well as the physical change of grade. A property owner is not bound to know whether a public improvement has been accomplished when the work is suspended unless there are facts and circumstances which would bring notice to a man of ordinary intelligence. Phipps v. Village of North Pelham, 70 N. Y. Supp. 630, 632, 61 App. Div. 442.

As enforced.

"Effected," as used in Code 1873, § 2018, providing that a landlord's lien on crops may be effected by the commencement of an action within a prescribed period, in which the landlord shall be entitled to a writ of attachment, should be construed to mean "enforced." Nickelson v. Negley, 32 N. W. 487, 488, 71 Iowa, 546.

As procured.

A contract providing that one of several joint owners of land should have a commission on sales which he "effected" means sales of which he was the procuring cause, and did not require a sale in the sense of a binding consummated agreement, or in the sense of an executed conveyance, as he could not complete a sale without the concurrence of the others. McCreery v. Green, 38 Mich. 172, 184.

EFFECTS.

See "Civil Effects"; "Household Effects"; "Personal Effects."

Goods, effects, and credits, see "Goods."
Other effects, see "Other."

"Effects" are defined to be property or worldly substance; property in a more extensive sense than "goods." Union Nat. Bank v. Byram, 131 Ill. 92, 100, 22 N. E. 842 (citing Bouv. Law Dict.); Illinois Anglo-American Storage Battery Co. v. Long, 41 Ill. App. 333, 335; Neely v. Grantham, 58 Pa. (8 P. F. Smith) 433, 440; In re Reimer's Estate, 28 Atl. 186, 187, 159 Pa. 212; Arthur v. Morgan, 5 Sup. Ct. 241, 243, 112 U. S. 495, 28 L. Ed. 825; Campbell v. Prescott, 15 Ves. 500, 507; Welsh v. Parish (S. C.) 1 Hill, 155, 157.

The word "effects," as used in a will disposing of all the effects of which the testator died possessed, was synonymous with "worldly substance," which means whatever can be termed of value; therefore real and personal effects means all a man's property. Hogan v. Jackson, Cowp. 299, 304; The Alpena (U. S.) 7 Fed. 361, 362; Beall's Lessee v. Holmes (Md.) 6 Har. & J. 205, 214.

"Effects" is a term nearly synonymous with "goods," and includes land, tenements, furniture, etc. Vawter v. Griffin, 40 Ind. 593, 601.

Ordinarily, the word "effects," when used in connection with the word "goods," means personal property, and not real property; but this is not its correct meaning where a contrary intention appears from the terms of the instruments in which the word occurs, the word being a very general term, used to denote whatever a man has that can affect, produce, or bring forth money by sale. It is defined to be property or worldly substance. Adams v. Akerlund, 48 N. E. 454, 456, 168 Ill. 632.

A devise of "effects, both real and personal," passes a freehold estate and all chattels, real and personal. Dowdel v. Hamm (Pa.) 2 Watts, 61, 65.

The word "effects," standing alone in a devise of "all or the whole of my effects," is sufficient to pass the testator's entire estate. Ennis v. Smith, 55 N. S. (14 How.) 400, 409, 14 L. Ed. 472; Welsh v. Parish (S. C.) 1 Hill, 155, 157 (citing Campbell v. Prescott, 15 Ves. 500, 507).

"Effects" in law means everything which is subject to the laws of property and ownership, whether real or personal, and as to personality, whether of possession or in action. State v. Newell, 1 Mo. 248, 249.

As ejusdem generis.

See, also, "All."

A will bequeathing "all my effects," my carriage and my horse included, to certain persons, which will was made in France, does not include the testator's personal estate in the United States, it not being alluded to in any way in the will. Effects in French, or the word "effets," has the same meaning, in common parlance and in law, that it has in English. Its meaning, properly, either when used indefinitely in wills, and in connection with something particular and certain, is limited by its association to other things of a like character, and it is from the subject-matter of its use that intention of something else is to be implied, and that, of course, may be larger or less. In some instances in wills the word has carried the whole personal estate. Ennis v. Smith, 55 U. S. (14 How.) 400, 420, 14 L. Ed. 472.

Code, § 3069, providing for the landlord's lien on the goods, furniture, and "effects" belonging to the tenant, his child, etc., must be construed in connection with goods and furniture, and refers to property ejusdem generis. McKleroy v. Cantey, 11 South. 258, 259, 95 Ala. 295; First Nat. Bank v. Consolidated Electric Light Co., 12 South. 71, 72, 97 Ala. 465.

A devise of all the testator's "household furniture and effects" applies to articles of the same kind—that is, household furniture—and not to personality generally. Rawlins v. Jennings, 13 Ves. 38, 44.

In a mortgage of real estate used for a sugar refinery, "and also all the machinery and effects in the said sugar refinery," the word "effects" was not cut down on account of its connection with the preceding word "machinery," under the rule that where general words follow a particular one they are to be used ejusdem generis, but included all personal property. Thurber v. Minturn (N. Y.) 62 How. Prac. 27, 28.

As lands or real estate.

"Effects" will embrace lands, tenements, etc. State v. Newell, 1 Mo. 248, 249.

"Effects," used in a will disposing of testator's effects, will be construed to include land, where it can be collected from other parts of the will that such was testator's intention. The term "effects" is capable of expansion, so as to embrace real and personal estate. "I take 'effect,'" says Lord Mansfield, "to be synonymous to 'worldly substance,' which means whatever can be termed of value, and that therefore real and personal effects means all a man's property." Page v. Foust, 89 N. C. 447, 449.

"Effects," as used in a judgment providing that execution may be levied upon the effects of testator's estate, includes real estate as well as personalty, though the word "effects," when not affected by the context, is generally held to include only personal property. Horton v. Garrison, 20 S. W. 773, 774, 1 Tex. Civ. App. 31.

Under a statute authorizing the institution of trustee process to reach goods, effects, and credits of the debtor, it is held that land fraudulently conveyed is neither goods, effects, nor credits, within the statute. Hunter v. Case, 20 Vt. 195, 197.

Goods are valuable possessions, or pieces of property; effects are goods, movables, or personal estate; and so goods and effects have never been held to include real estate, and will thus be construed as used in the treaty of 1873 between the United States and Sweden (page 1042, Treaties and Conventions between the United States and Other Powers), providing that subjects of the contracting parties may freely dispose of their "goods and effects," either by testament, donation, or otherwise. Meier v. Lee, 76 N. W. 712, 715, 106 Iowa, 803.

"Effects," as used in describing property devised without words of qualification, denotes personalty, and realty will not pass thereunder. Camfield v. Gilbert, 3 East, 516, 522; Haw v. Earles, 15 Mees. & W. 450, 456.

A power of attorney to sell claims and effects was a power to sell personal property, and cannot be construed to embrace real estate. De Cordova v. Knowles, 37 Tex. 19, 20.

A devise by testator to his brother of all of his "property and effects" of all claims he shall have," means that all his property and the produce of all his claims should go to his brother. It is much the same as though he said, "all I have and all I am worth," and was sufficient to pass real estate. Doe v. Morgan, 6 B. & C. 512, 518.

As movables or personalty.

The word "effects" is the equivalent of the word "movables." Appeal of Vandergrift, 83 Pa. 128, 129.

The term "effects" is not as extensive as that of "chattels." State v. Harvey, 42 S. W. 938, 939, 141 Mo. 343.

As the word "effects" is ordinarily used, it is understood to mean goods, movables, personal estate. Hunter v. Case, 20 Vt. 195, 197.

The word "effects" prima facie applies to personal property. Doe v. Morgan, 6 B.

& C. 512, 518. See De Cordova v. Knowles, 37 Tex. 19, 20.

"Effects," means all kinds of personal estate. Planters' Bank of Mississippi v. Sharp, 47 U. S. (6 How.) 801, 821, 12 L. Ed. 447.

In common parlance the term "effects" is confined to personal things, and it has been judicially decided to bear that meaning, unless the context shows that the testator used it in a more comprehensive sense. This was held by all the court of king's bench in the cases of Camfield v. Gilbert, 3 East, 516, and of Doe v. Langlands, 14 East, 370. Haw v. Earles, 15 M. & W. 450, 456.

The word "effects," it is said by Lord Ellenborough in Anderson v. Lainchburg, 11 East, 296, in its natural sense more peculiarly imports movable personal property; and this is no doubt correct, yet it is not infrequently employed to express personal estate generally. West v. Franklin Fire Ins. Co., 3 Pa. Law J. 299, 301.

A statute relating to the garnishment of the property or effects of another in the hands or possession of the garnishee means personal property in his possession capable of being seized and sold under execution. Keyes v. Milwaukee & St. P. Ry. Co., 25 Wis. 691, 693.

The word "effects" is defined in Rev. St. art. 3138, subd. 12, as including all personal property and all interest therein; and "property" is defined to include real and personal property, and effects is used in the sense of personal property, in Pasch. Dig. art. 4636, giving a husband authority to sue to recover the effects of his wife. Read v. Allen, 56 Tex. 182, 194.

"Goods," "chattels," and "effects" are terms that in their proper sense and nature are sufficiently large to include and pass the absolute interest in the whole personal estate of the testator; but a will may be so worded that, according to a reasonable construction, it shows that the testator must have intended to use the terms in a limited and restricted sense. Parker v. Marchant, 1 Y. & Col. Ch. 290, 300.

"Effects" includes all personal property and all interest therein. Rev. St. Tex. art. 1895, art. 3270.

As offset.

"Effects," as used in a notice or statement of the demand for a mechanic's lien for a certain sum over and above all credits and "effects," is substantially the same as offsets, as used in a statute requiring the notice or statement to state the sum claimed over and above all credits and offsets. Merchant v. Humeston, 7 Pac. 903, 904, 2 Wash. T. 433.

After-acquired property.

A will giving all the remainder of testatrix's "effects" to a person designated should be construed to include estate acquired in fee by the testatrix after publication of the will. Ruckle v. Grallin, 39 Atl. 624, 86 Md. 627.

Chose in action.

The term "effects" may include choses in action. Dowdel v. Hamm, 2 Watts, 61, 65.

Choses in action are not, in the hands of an assignee thereof, goods, "effects," or credits of the assignor, so as to be liable to trustee process. Lupton v. Cutter, 25 Mass. (8 Pick.) 298, 300.

Debts.

The word "effects," defining things which are subject to garnishment by service upon the person having such effects in his possession or under his control, is made by the statute to include bills of exchange, promissory notes, certificates of deposit, contracts for payment of money, and other written evidence of indebtedness in the hands of the garnishee at the time of service upon him. The things here defined to be effects are all things of material nature and intangible legal obligations. Debts are not mentioned. Ide v. Harwood, 30 Minn. 191, 195, 14 N. W. 884.

The term "goods and effects," as used in Code Civ. Proc. § 657, authorizing a sheriff to levy attachments, includes a debt, though incapable of manual delivery. In State v. Newell, 1 Mo. 248, it was held that effects in law must mean everything which is subject to the laws of property and ownership, whether real or personal, and of the personality, whether by possession or in action. Minor v. Gurley, 80 N. Y. Supp. 596, 597, 39 Misc. Rep. 662.

Execution.

An execution in the hands of a sheriff for service is not "goods, effects, or credits" of the execution creditor, within the meaning of the statute empowering a creditor to attach the goods, effects, and credits of his debtor in the hands of a third person, where they may be found, and who for this purpose is considered as a trustee of the defendant. Sharp v. Clark, 2 Mass. 91, 93.

Fixtures.

Effects are property; goods and chattels; movables, including fixtures. State v. Harvey, 42 S. W. 938, 939, 141 Mo. 343; In re Reimer's Estate, 28 Atl. 186, 187, 159 Pa. 212.

A declaration in trespass for breaking and entering plaintiff's dwelling house, and taking "goods, chattels, and effects," would include fixtures. Fixtures may be taken in execution under a f. fa. containing similar words. Pitt v. Shew, 4 B. & Ald. 206.

"Effects," as used in an assignment for the benefit of creditors of the assignor's "goods, chattels, and effects," is of broader meaning than the term "goods," and may include fixtures. Dowdel v. Hamm (Pa.) 2 Watts, 61, 65.

Horse or mule.

"Effects," as used in St. June 1859, c. 2230, providing that all boarding house keepers shall have a lien upon the "baggage and effects" of their guests and boarders, includes the horse of a boarder, and entitled the boarding house keeper to a lien on the boarder's horse for the guest's board, but not for the fare and keeping of the horse. Cross v. Wilkins, 43 N. H. 332, 336.

The word "effects" is comprehensive enough to include every article of personal property which the Legislature could have supposed it possible a citizen of the commonwealth would make it a business to buy and sell. It is broad enough to describe every item of the largest estate, except moneys, securities, and land. When, therefore, vendors of "effects of whatsoever kind or nature" are made liable to taxation, a dealer in horses and mules could hardly, on any rational principle, set up a right to exemption. Commonwealth v. Seltzer (Pa.) 2 Woodw. Dec. 23, 24.

Leasehold.

"Goods and effects," within the meaning of Act June 13, 1836, relating to the service of foreign attachments on the goods and effects of the debtor, cannot be construed to include leaseholds of lands and buildings on leaseholds. The meaning of the words is free from all ambiguity or doubt, whether used in the popular, lexicographical, or legal sense. Appeal of Vandergrift, 83 Pa. 126, 129.

Code, § 3069 et seq., giving a landlord a lien on the tenant's goods, furniture, and "effects," does not include a leasehold. First Nat. Bank v. Consolidated Electric Light Co., 12 South. 71, 72, 97 Ala. 465.

Legacy.

Rev. St. c. 86, § 36, authorizing the attachment by trustee process of "effects and credits," includes a legacy in the hands of the trustee. Cummings v. Garvin, 65 Me. 301, 302.

Money and securities.

In Comp. St. c. 83, art. 4, § 2, subd. 8, requiring a state treasurer to pay over to a successor in office and deliver all books and effects of office to him, the word "effects" is broad enough to require the delivery of bonds and other securities belonging to the state permanent school fund. In re State Treasurer's Settlement, 70 N. W. 532, 539, 51 Neb. 118, 36 L. R. A. 746.

An insurance policy on a vessel covering property designated as "goods, specie, and effects" covers a sum of money advanced by the captain for the benefit of the ship, and for which he charges respondentia interest. Gregory v. Christie, 3 Doug. 419.

"Effects," as used in a will giving to testator's brother all his household goods, books, clothing, furniture, etc., that he might desire, the balance of the personal "effects" to be divided among certain others, passes the whole of the testator's residuary estate, consisting of money and securities. It means such funds in the hands of the executor as may be made effective or available for payment of debts and legacies. In re Reimer's Estate, 28 Atl. 186, 187, 159 Pa. 212.

Negotiable paper.

Negotiable paper is not such property, money, or "effects" as the statute contemplates in describing what species of property may be made the subject of garnishment. This view seems to be based largely upon the provision of the statute, that the property, money, or "effects" which may be reached by garnishment must be in the possession of or due from the person garnished to the defendant in the judgment or decree which forms the basis of the garnishment proceeding at the time the writ was served upon him, and that the maker of negotiable paper cannot be regarded as indebted to the original payee before the maturity of the paper. Hubbard v. Williams, 1 Minn. 54, 55 (Gil. 87, 38), 55 Am. Dec. 66.

A note is not "effects," within the meaning of the garnishment law. It is an evidence of debt, and no more. Moore v. Pillow, 22 Tenn. (3 Humph.) 448, 449.

The word "effects," as used in a statute relating to obtaining property by false pretenses, embraces a bill of exchange. State v. Newell, 1 Mo. 248, 249.

All bills of exchange and promissory notes in the hands of a garnishee at the time of the service of the writ of garnishment shall be deemed "effects," under the provisions of the act relating to garnishment. Comp. Laws Mich. 1897, § 10,623.

Bills of exchange and promissory notes not due, in the hands of a garnishee at the time of the service of the summons, shall be deemed "effects" under the provisions of the act relating to proceedings against garnishees. Comp. Laws Mich. 1897, § 1011.

Share of stock.

A share of stock cannot be regarded as otherwise than "property," nor can it be said that it is not "worldly substance." Shares of stock owned by the defendant in attachment, if such certificates have not been issued, are effects, within Rev. St. c. 62, § 5. Illinois Anglo-American Storage Battery Co. v. Long, 41 Ill. App. 333, 335.

Rev. St. c. 11, § 9, provides that writs of attachment shall be executed on the debtor's lands, tenements, goods, chattels, rights, credits, moneys, and effects. Held, that the word "effects," as used in such statute, was a general word intending to include property not properly within the descriptions of the other words as used, and that under such word shares of corporate stock were properly attachable. Union Nat. Bank v. Byram, 22 N. E. 842, 843, 131 Ill. 92.

Ships, etc.

General Admiralty Rule No. 2 allows, in suits in personam, a warrant of arrest, with a clause therein that if the defendant cannot be found to attach his goods and chattels to the amount sued for, or, if such property cannot be found, to attach his credits and effects. Held, that the word "effects" is of very extensive import, and as used in the rule embraces ships and other tangible property. The Alpena (U. S.) 7 Fed. 361, 362.

EFFICIENT.

"Efficient," as used in an instruction in reference to the duty of a master in the selection of fellow workmen, requiring and stating such duty to be the employment of "efficient men," was the equivalent of "competent," and expressed no more than the duty which the law imposed on the employer, and the instruction was proper. Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Ampey, 25 S. E. 228, 232, 93 Va. 108.

"Efficient" machinery is such machinery as is capable of well producing the effect intended to be secured by the use of it for the purpose for which it was made. The word does not necessarily mean new machinery. Maxwell v. Bastrop Mfg. Co., 14 S. W. 35, 36, 77 Tex. 233.

EFFICIENT CAUSE.

The efficient cause is simply the working cause, or that cause which produces effects or results. Pullman Palace Car Co. v. Lanck, 32 N. E. 285, 291, 143 Ill. 242, 18 L. R. A. 215.

EFFORT.

See "Reasonable Effort."

"Effort" means exertion of strength; strenuous endeavor; laborious attempts; struggle directed to the accomplishment of an object. There is no word in the English language better understood by the people generally than "effort," and when told in a trial for homicide that an effort must have been made to execute the threats made by the deceased the jury undoubtedly understood the court to mean an attempt. This means something more than a demonstration of an act manifesting an intention. It means an actual attempt to execute the threats. Miles v. State, 18 Tex. App. 156, 171.

An agreement to pay to another the amount of notes and accounts transferred to him, in the event that he could not collect the same after making an "effort to collect," does not imply that all the means known to the law should be exhausted before the contract to pay should become absolute or the defendant be authorized to demand payment of the party agreeing. The condition on which his liability depends is certainly well performed if such means of collection by the aid of legal process have been resorted to as are usual. The contract did not impose upon the party the duty of prosecuting suits upon the notes and accounts transferred to him to such an extent as to force the parties liable to their payment to take the oath of insolvency. Burnett v. Thompson, 1 Ala. 469, 470.

EITHER.

In school articles signed by several employers, providing that either party can discontinue the school at the end of the quarter, "either" means the teacher, or a majority of the employers. Bird v. Thornburgh, 40 Ky. (1 B. Mon.) 4, 5.

Under the statute the right of action to recover damages for the death of a minor child survives in the father or mother, or "either" of them. If the wife has previous to the death of the child obtained a divorce from her husband, and has the care of the minor children, she can bring the action without his authority. Wilson v. Banner Lumber Co., 32 South. 460, 108 La. 590.

A provision of St. 1864-65, p. 442, requiring a railroad company to maintain a fence on "either or both sides" of its property, simply requires the company to fence its road where it may run through or alongside of the land of private individuals; that is, on either or both sides as necessity may demand. Walsh v. Virginia & T. R. Co., 8 Nev. 110, 116.

As any.

A testator, having several children, provided by his will that, in case "either" of his children should die leaving living issue, such issue should receive the share of his estate devised to such child so dying. Held, that "either" was used in a sense of "any." Lafey v. Campbell, 6 Atl. 300, 301, 42 N. J. Eq.

(15 Stew.) 34. See, also, In re Broomall's Estate (Pa.) 2 Lanc. Law Rev. 183, 184, 2 Del. Co. R. 289, 290.

In Laws 1894, c. 314, amending Brooklyn City charter, providing for bids for street cleaning, and that if the acceptance of either proposal be not in the interest of the city all of them shall be rejected, "either" was used in the sense of "any." People v. Willis, 39 N. Y. Supp. 987, 989, 6 App. Div. 231.

As both.

The term "either" may include each or both. Jackson v. Stewart, 20 Ga. 120, 124.

One of the definitions of the word "either" is each of two, the one and the other; and hence, as used in an ordinance providing that curbstones were to be set on "either" side of the roadway, meant that such curb should be set on both sides of the roadway. Chicago & N. P. R. Co. v. City of Chicago, 49 N. E. 1006, 1007, 172 Ill. 66.

"Either" is used in the sense of one "and" the other of two things, as well as in that one "or" the other. Thus it is common to say "on either hand," "on either side," meaning on each hand or side. Chidester v. Springfield & I. S. E. Ry. Co., 59 Ill. 87, 89.

As used in Act Cong. June 23, 1868, providing that all contracts for service between masters and servants, when either of the contracting parties is of Hawaiian birth, shall be rendered and printed in both the Hawaiian and English languages, the word "either" is a distributive or alternative term. It carries the meaning that, when one of the parties is of Hawaiian birth and the other is not, such contract shall be executed in Hawaiian and English. The negative or excluding force of the word "either" is equal to its affirmative and including force. The term "either" does not include "both," nor does "both," the greater, intend and therefore include the less, "either." Martin v. Nahoia, 4 Hawaii, 427, 429.

One of any number.

"Either," as used in Act 1887, providing that in "either of the foregoing cases such child and its issue shall inherit from its parents respectively, and from their lineal and collateral kindred," etc., includes each and every case previously named. Webster defines "either" as "one or another of any number." The word "either," according to the strictly accurate and authoritative signification of the word, relates to two units or particulars only, but it often in actual use, though inaccurately, refers to some one of many. Messer v. Jones, 34 Atl. 177, 179, 88 Me. 349 (citing Cent. Dict.); Lyon v. Lyon, 34 Atl. 180, 88 Me. 395.

"Either," as used in a policy insuring "all or either" of the freight buildings at C., renders the insurers liable if either of the buildings is damaged. Commonwealth v. Hide & Leather Ins. Co., 112 Mass. 136, 137, 17 Am. Rep. 72.

The word "either," in an ordinance authorizing a street car company to make extensions on "either of the following named streets," etc., does not mean all, but does mean one or the other of two or more specified things. Ft. Worth St. Ry. Co. v. Rose-dale St. Ry. Co., 4 S. W. 534, 538, 68 Tex. 169.

In a provision that if "either of my sons should die without a lawful heir, the longest liver heirs the whole of both estates," the word "either" signifies one or another of any number, but it is here confined to two by force of the word "both," which signifies two, considered as distinct from others, or by themselves. Dew v. Barnes, 54 N. C. 149, 151; Graham v. Graham, 23 W. Va. 36, 43, 48 Am. Rep. 364.

EITHER PARTY.

The phrase "either party," as used in Act March 3, 1875, § 2, cl. 1, providing for the removal of causes from state to federal courts, and authorizing either party to remove the cause if there shall be a controversy between citizens of different states, means all the plaintiffs or all the defendants. Maine v. Gilman (U. S.) 11 Fed. 214, 215.

EJECT.

In an instruction in an action for damages alleged to have been caused by putting plaintiff's intestate off from defendant's train, the word "ejected" means that deceased was forcibly put off the train, rather than helped off according to his desire or that he voluntarily left the train. To "eject" a person means to compel him against his desire to leave. Bohannon's Adm'r v. Southern Ry. Co. in Kentucky, 65 S. W. 169, 170, 112 Ky. 106.

EJECTMENT.

See "Equitable Ejectment."

Originally the action of ejectment "was designed to recover only damages for the wrongful ejection of the plaintiff from the possession of land in which he had a term of years. Later the recovery was extended to the possession of the land. To succeed, the plaintiff was required to prove a lease to himself for a term of years, made by a lessor entitled to the possession and on the land when the lease was made, his entry under the lease, and ouster by the defendant. The action was usually instituted against a person not interested in the land, called the 'casual ejector,' who gave notice of the suit to the actual possessor, and he, on application to the court, was substituted as defendant. But, as a condition of such substitution, the court required him to stipulate that at the trial he would confess the lease, entry, and ouster alleged by the plaintiff, thus leaving the only fact to be proved by the plaintiff the title of his lessor. If, however, the claim of the applicant was such as would warrant him in ousting the plaintiff, and yet would justify his own possession, as if he claimed only a joint tenancy with the lessor, then he stipulated to confess ouster of the plaintiff only in case the plaintiff should prove actual ouster of the lessor. If, at the trial, the plaintiff showed such title in his lessor as made the confessed ouster wrongful, or if, when ouster was only conditionally confessed, he showed an actual ouster of the lessor, or a title against which any possession by the defendant was wrongful, then he recovered damages and possession; otherwise his suit failed. Thus the technical issue in the case was always whether the defendant had wrongfully ousted the plaintiff. Under our statute the technical issue remains the same, although presented by a different procedure. The real claimant, the old lessor, is the plaintiff, and his complaint is that the defendant wrongfully deprives him of possession. The defendant is the real counterclaimant, and if he means to defend absolutely he pleads not guilty, and by that plea admits a possession or claim of title which should exclude or oust the plaintiff; while, if he means to defend only for a possession or claim of title which does not exclude the plaintiff—e. g., as joint tenant with him—he must give notice with his plea that he admits the right of the plaintiff to an undivided share of the land and denies actual ouster. Combs v. Brown, 29 N. J. Law (5 Dutch.) 36. Then if, at the trial on the simple plea, the plaintiff shows a title against which the defendant's exclusive possession or claim would be wrongful, or, on the plea and notice, he shows an actual ouster, wrongful in view of his admitted right, or a greater right, which makes the defendant's possession a wrongful ouster, the plaintiff will be entitled to judgment; otherwise not." French v. Robb, 51 Atl. 509, 510, 67 N. J. Law, 260, 57 L. R. A. 956, 91 Am. St. Rep. 433.

Ejectment was first in reality an action by a lessee against an intruder, commenced by writ. It next became a fiction both as to the lease and the lessee, and was commenced by declaration and notice, and the lessor was the person really interested, and it was then used for the purpose of trying his title, or his right to make a lease. As the lessor could try title, it was but mutual that the tenant should also call to his aid, not only any title which he might have, but the title of another from whom he derived his possession." Crockett v. Lashbrook, 21 Ky. (5 T. B. Mon.) 530, 538, 17 Am. Dec. 98.

At common law the action of ejectment was strictly a possessory remedy, but it has now by gradual growth come to be the ordinary method of trying title to lands. Wilson v. Wightman, 55 N. Y. Supp. 806, 810, 38 App. Div. 41.

At common law ejectment was a mere possessory action between fictitious parties. The judgment therein did not determine the estate or interest of parties in the property, nor did it conclusively determine the right to possession. But in the majority of the states the common-law action has been pruned of its fiction and made a simple remedy for the recovery of the possession of real property, and the trial of title thereto. Hoover v. King, 72 Pac. 880, 881, 43 Or. 281.

An ejectment is an action to try the right of possession to the land in controversy. Wood v. Grundy (Md.) 3 Har. & J. 13, 19.

The words "action of ejectment" refer to an action to recover the immediate possession of real property. Code Civ. Proc. N. Y. 1899, § 3343, subd. 20; Boyd v. Boyd, 33 N. Y. Supp. 74, 75, 12 Misc. Rep. 119; Leprell v. Kleinschmidt, 19 N. E. 812, 814, 112 N. Y. 364; Risley v. Rice, 3 N. Y. St. Rep. 168, 169. Hence an action for the recovery of the possession of real property, and damages incidental to a wrongful occupation thereof, comes within such definition. Leprell v. Kleinschmidt, 19 N. E. 812, 814, 112 N. Y. 364.

Though the Code abolished many forms of civil action, and provided for an action in civil cases, denominated a "civil action," the term "ejectment" has been properly retained to designate an action brought for the possession of lands, and asking damages for the unlawful detention thereof. Bernhamer v. Hoffman, 54 N. E. 132, 133, 23 Ind. App. 34.

"Ejectment," in the state of Pennsylvania, is the remedy where one party claims right of possession to lands which are held by another, a remedy by which the party who claims the right of possession may obtain his possession if he is entitled to it under the law. Dewaters v. Kuhnle, 49 Atl. 264, 199 Pa. 439.

The "action of ejectment," as defined and regulated by the Oregon Code of Civil Procedure, c. 4, tit. 1, is a possessory action, and although the estate or interest of the parties in the premises may be ascertained by the verdict therein, yet the plaintiff can only have judgment for the possession wrongfully withheld from him, with damages for such detention, and costs; and the defendant can only have judgment for costs. Goldsmith v. Smith (U. S.) 21 Fed. 611, 613.

Grounds and elements of action.

Ejectment is a possessory action ex delicto, founded on a trespass, actual or supposed, committed by defendant in wrongfully obtaining possession of plaintiff's land. Henninger v. Boyer, 10 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 506, 508.

The action of ejectment is a possessory remedy, and can be resorted to only when a right of entry exists. United States Pipe Line Co. v. Delaware, L. & W. R. R. Co., 41 Atl. 759, 762, 62 N. J. Law, 254, 42 L. R. A. 572; Jackson v. Buel (N. Y.) 9 Johns. 298, 299; Aiken v. Benedict (N. Y.) 39 Barb. 400, 401; Leprell v. Kleinschmidt, 1 N. Y. Supp. 821, 822, 49 Hun, 605.

The action of ejectment looks only to the legal title, and cannot be maintained unless the plaintiff has the legal estate in the premises, and an equitable title cannot be set up in this action against the legal title. Hubbard v. Godfrey, 47 S. W. 81, 83, 100 Tenn. 150.

Ejectment is a possessory action, to the existence of which the right of possession of the premises on the part of the plaintiff at the commencement of the suit is essential. Title, without right of possession, is not enough, nor can plaintiff recover unless he shows title in himself, irrespective of the validity of defendant's title. McFarland v. Goodman (U. S.) 16 Fed. Cas. 90, 91.

Ejectment "is an action to recover the possession of realty, the elements of which are a right of possession in the plaintiff and a possession in the defendant at the time the action is brought, both of which facts must be established to entitle the plaintiff to judgment." Owen v. Fowler, 24 Cal. 192, 195.

A plaintiff in ejectment must recover on the strength of his own title, and show in himself a present right to enter and possess, without regard to the character of defendant's possession. When he relies on a conveyance from another, there must be evidence that at the time of the conveyance there resided in the grantor a legal title to the lands. Baucum v. George, 65 Ala. 259, 267.

The action of ejectment is, strictly speaking, a possessory action, the plaintiff being required to show and present legal right to the possession of the premises as against the defendant. Bradshaw v. Ashley, 21 Sup. Ct. 297, 301, 180 U. S. 59, 45 L. Ed. 423.

Ejectment is a possessory action, and the lessor of the plaintiff must have the right to enter for the purpose of making the lease. Whenever that right is destroyed, the ejectment which is founded on such supposed right must fail. Pearce v. House, 4 N. C. 722, 725.

Same—Possession by defendant.

Ejectment is a possessory action operating only on the possession, and must be commenced against the person in possession. Wilson v. State, 22 South. 567, 568, 115 Ala. 129.

Ejectment "is a common-law action to recover possession of realty, which can be brought only against the person who at the commencement of the action withholds the possession; that is to say, against the occupant. The action can never be brought against the owner of the paramount title, unless he is also an occupant." Hawkins v. Reichert, 28 Cal. 534, 536; Owen v. Fowler, 24 Cal. 192, 195.

Ejectment "is a possessory action, and must be brought against the occupant. It determines no rights but those of possession at the time, and it matters not who has or claims to have the title of the premises. It will only lie against a party out of possession claiming title when the premises are unoccupied and his claim is accompanied by acts of ownership, such as inclosure, cultivation and the like." Garner v. Marshall, 9 Cal. 268, 270.

Ejectment is a possessory action and determines none but possessory rights, and, as a general rule, must be brought against the person who is in possession and wrongfully withholding the premises. Chicago & E. I. R. Co. v. Clapp, 66 N. E. 223, 227, 201 Ill. 418.

Interest or rights recoverable.

The action of ejectment can be resorted to only where the thing or interest is tangible, so that possession can be delivered. United States Pipe-Line Co. v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co., 41 Atl. 759, 762, 62 N. J. Law, 254, 42 L. R. A. 572; Jackson v. Buel (N. Y.) 9 Johns. 298, 299.

By the common law, ejectment will not lie for anything whereon entry cannot be made, or by which the sheriff cannot give possession. Thus an action of ejectment will not lie for the projection of eaves of a building over land. Leprell v. Kleinschmidt, 1 N. Y. Supp. 821, 822, 49 Hun, 605; Aiken v. Benedict (N. Y.) 39 Barb. 400, 401.

Where a grantor in his deed reserved to himself, and his heirs and assigns forever, "the right and privilege of erecting a mill-dam at a certain place described, and to occupy and possess the same without any hindrance or molestation from the grantee and his heirs," it was held that the right reserved was an interest in the land as that an action of ejectment would lie for. Jackson v. Buel (N. Y.) 9 Johns. 298, 299.

The owner of land subject to a private easement may maintain ejectment to recover possession, subject to the easement, against the dominant tenant. Wilson v. Wightman, 55 N. Y. Supp. 806, 810, 36 App. Div. 41.

As a proceeding in personam.

The action of ejectment, in the District of Columbia, is held not to be a proceeding in rem, but a proceeding in personam, involving the right to the possession of the property described in the declaration. Staffan v. Zeust, 10 App. D. C. 260, 264.

As a real action.

An action of ejectment has been variously declared to be a personal action, a mixed action, and a real action. In common law the action was strictly a possessory remedy, and in many of the states of the Union it is still regarded as such. Ejectment is a real action in Tennessee, and is to be regarded as a strictly legal remedy. Hubbard v. Godfrey, 47 S. W. 81, 83, 100 Tenn. 150.

Unlawful detainer distinguished.

The action of unlawful detainer and that of ejectment are not the same action or the same kind of action, either in substance or in form. The first is by a person who claims the possession, not only of the real property, and founds his right to recover the possession solely upon a prior possession, constructive or actual, in himself or grantor, and against a person who cannot or has not the right to set up any right of possession as against the plaintiff, and no question of title or estate can be litigated in the case; while the second action is to recover an estate, legal or equitable, in the real property, with the title and the incidental right of possession; and the two cases must be brought in different forums and presented to the courts by very dissimilar pleadings, and hence the pendency of an action of unlawful detainer will not cause an action of ejectment as to the same land to abate. Buettinger v. Hurley, 9 Pac. 197-199, 34 Kan. 585.

Use and occupation distinguished.

Action for use and occupation and the action of ejectment are not the same. In re Polsgrove, 5 Pa. (5 Barr) 500, 502.

EJECTMENT (Writ of).

The technical name of the writ in an action of ejectment is not a "writ of ejectment," although an "ejectment," in its ordinary definition of an expulsion or ouster of the defendant, results from the writ. Bartley v. Bingham, 15 South. 592, 593, 34 Fla. 19.

EJECTMENT BILL.

An "ejectment bill" is one brought merely for the recovery of real property, together with an account of the rents and profits, without setting out any distinct ground of equity jurisdiction. A bill of such description would be demurrable, and receive no countenance in court. Crane v. Conklin, 1 N. J. Eq. (Saxt.) 346, 353, 22 Am. Dec. 519.

EJECTION OF THE TERM.

Ejection of the term "is a mixed action, somewhat between real and personal, in which restitution of the term for years, and damages for the ouster or wrong, are simultaneously recovered." Hodgkins v. Price, 137 Mass. 13, 16.

EJECTOR.

See "Casual Ejector."

EJIDOS.

"Ejidos" is a term used in the Spanish law to designate common lands located within the limits of a city, pueblo, or town, but is sometimes used to designate common lands without the limits of the town. It is distinguished from "solares," or house lots, and "suertes," or sowing grounds within the limits of the city, pueblo, or village. Hart v. Burnett, 15 Cal. 530, 554.

EJUSDEM GENERIS.

"Ejusdem generis" means of the same kind or species. The words are used to designate a rule of construction that: "When an author makes use, first, of terms, each evidently confined and limited to a particular class of a known species of things, and then, after such specific enumeration, subjoins a term of very extensive signification, this term, however general and comprehensive in its possible import, yet, when thus used, embraces only things 'ejusdem generis'—that is, of the same kind or species—with those comprehended by the preceding limited and confined terms. Ex parte Leland (S. C.) 1 Nott & McC. 460, 462.

The doctrine of "ejusdem generis" is that, where an enumeration of specific things is followed by some more general word or phrase, such general word or phrase is to be held to refer to things of the same kind. Spalding v. People, 172 Ill. 40, 49, 49 N. E. 993, 995. So also in the construction of wills. Bills v. Putnam, 64 N. H. 554, 561, 15 Atl. 138.

The rule "ejusdem generis" ordinarily limits the meaning of general words to things of the same class as those enumerated under them. Benton v. Benton, 63 N. H. 289, 295, 56 Am. Rep. 512 (citing 1 Jarm. Wills, 716).

By application of the maxim "ejusdem generis," which is only an illustration or specific application of the broader maxim "noscitur a sociis," general and specific words which are capable of an analogous meaning, being associated together, take color from each other, so that the general words are restricted to a sense analogous to the less general. End. Interp. St. § 400. But it has never been supposed that the rule required the rejection of the general terms entirely, but only that they should be restricted to cases of the same kind as those expressly enumerated. State v. Williams, 2 Strob. 474. On the contrary, it must yield to another salutary rule of construction, viz., that every part of a statute should, if possible, be upheld and given its appropriate force. Misch v. Russell, 136 Ill. 22, 25, 26 N. E. 528, 529, 12 L. R. A. 125.

"The rule of 'ejusdem generis,' in statutory construction, is by no means a rule of universal application, and its use is to carry out, not to defeat, the legislative intent. When it can be seen that the particular word by which the general word is followed was inserted, not to give a coloring to the general word, but for a distinct object, and then to carry out the purpose of the statute, the general word ought to govern. It is a mistake to allow the 'ejusdem generis' rule to pervert the construction." State v. Broderick, 7 Mo. App. 19, 20.

The proper rule in the construction of wills, to which this one of "ejusdem generis," and all others except those founded upon public policy, are not only subordinate but ancillary, is that the intention of the testator—to be ascertained by the particular words used, from the context, and from the general scope and purpose of the instrument—is to prevail and have effect. In an enumeration of particulars, general and comprehensive terms are sometimes used, in the construction of which reason and good sense require that, if you would not violate the intention of the writer, their meaning must be restricted to things of a like nature and description with the particulars among which they are found. This is a rule of intention, and it readily yields where the circumstances show that a reliance upon it would defeat rather than effectuate the intention. Williams v. Williams, 18 Tenn. (10 Yerg.) 20, 23, 26.

EL CANON.

"El canon" is a term used in the Spanish law. "According to Escriche, 'el canon' means the annual charge or rent which is paid in recognition of the dominium utile by the person who holds the dominium utile (vide Escriche, verba 'Canon' and 'Pension')." Hart v. Burnett, 15 Cal. 530, 556.

ELASTIC.

The word "elastic" is not aptly descriptive of bookcases or file cabinets constructed in sectional parts so that their size may be increased or diminished by adding or taking away sections, but is at the most only suggestive of such fact, which does not preclude its operation as a trade-mark by the manufacturer of such bookcases and cabinets to identify the goods of its manufacture. The word "elastic" may have been used for such a length of time by one as to have acquired a secondary meaning in the trade and with the general public as to identify sectional bookcases and similar articles of its manufacture, and to entitle it to protection as against the use of such word in connection with the goods of other manufacturers, even if not valid as a technical trade-mark. Globe-Wernicke Co. v. Brown (U. S.) 121 Fed. 185, 186.

ELASTIC SEAM.

The words "elastic seam," used to designate a garment having a strip of elastic knitted material inserted at the seams, are wholly descriptive, and cannot be monopolized as a trade-mark. Scriven v. North (U. S.) 124 Fed. 894, 895.

ELATERIUM.

"Elaterium" is the residue deposited by the juice of the fruit of echallium elaterium, which is a little fruit resembling somewhat the cucumber, with a hollow interior filled with juice. The fruit is gathered just before it is ripe, because when ripe it breaks in handling. It is cut in two, when the juice flows out, which is allowed to stand until the sediment is deposited at the bottom. The juice is poured off, and the sediment is dried as quickly as possible, to avoid fermentation. The British Pharmacopœia contains the following formula for the preparation of the drug as imported: "Cut the fruit lengthwise, and lightly press out the juice. Strain it through a hair sieve, and set it aside to deposit. Carefully pour off the supernatant liquor, pour the sediment on a linen filter, and dry it on porous tiles, in a warm place." It is imported in little cakes, and varies much in quality. It is not used in this form by the physician. The manufacturer extracts from the cakes their vital principle, which is known as "elaterine." United States v. Merck (U. S.) 66 Fed. 251, 252, 13 C. C. A. 432.

ELDERS.

8 Rev. St. 292, § 3, declares that, on the day of the election of the elders and churchwardens of a religious society, two of the elders or churchwardens shall be chosen to preside as in charge of the election. Held, that the word "elder," as used in such statute, meant a deacon or member of the governing board, and was not synonymous with the "pastor" or "preacher." People v. Peck (N. Y.) 11 Wend. 604, 27 Am. Dec. 104.

ELDEST.

Testator in 1775 gave to his brother W.'s son N., during his natural life, and to his "eldest male heir," and after his decease to "said male heirs and assigns forever, all and singular my homestead," etc. At the time of making the devise N. had no issue, but he afterward had several children, of whom the third son alone survived him. Held, that the words "eldest male heir" was a distinction of a particular individual, and not nomen collectivum, and that the words "said male heirs" were intended to designate the eldest male heirs who should take in succession after the death of the first remainderman. Canedy v. Haskins, 54 Mass. (13 Metc.) 389, 403, 46 Am. Dec. 739.

A testator gave land to one son "for his life," and to such son's "eldest legitimate son" after his death, and "in default of such issue" the land was given in like manner to another son, and in case the latter had no legitimate male issue it was given to the "offspring about to be born from" testator's wife, and in default of such issue, then to testator's heirs, etc. Held, that the term "eldest legitimate son" was not designatio personæ, but nomen collectivum, creating an estate tail in the eldest son, etc. Lewis v. Puxley, 16 Mees. & W. 733, 741.

Testator directed a division of his estate to be made at the expiration of seven years from his death, provided his daughter had then been dead two years, and gave out of the fourth part a sum of $500 to the legatee, and that the residue should be paid to the trustee, to keep the same invested and to pay the income to S. and B. until the eldest child of S. M. should arrive at the age of 21 years, then to divide it among the children of the said S. M. Held, that the term "eldest child" meant the child who should first arrive at age. Butler v. Butler (N. Y.) 1 Hoff. Ch. 344, 347.

ELECT—ELECTED—ELECTION.

See "Annual Election"; "Equitable Election"; "Free Election"; "General Election"; "Municipal Election"; "National Elections"; "New Election"; "Next Election"; "Popular Election"; "Primary Election"; "Public Election"; "Regular Election"; "Special Election"; "State Election"; "Town Election."

See "Members Elected."

Any election or election law, see "Any."

Bet on election, see "Bet."

First proper election, see "Proper Election."

The primary meaning of the word "election" is choice; the act of choosing. State v. Tucker, 54 Ala. 205, 210; Seaman v. Baughman, 47 N. W. 1091, 1092, 82 Iowa, 216, 11 L. R. A. 854.

"Election" is defined to be "the choice which several persons collectively make of a person to fill an office or place." Maynard v. Board of District Canvassers, 47 N. W. 756, 759, 84 Mich. 228, 11 L. R. A. 332 (quoting Bouv. Law Dict.); State v. Williams, 58 Pac. 476, 477, 60 Kan. 837; State ex rel. Nicholls v. City of New Orleans, 6 South. 592, 597, 41 La. Ann. 156.

The word "election," when standing alone, is defined as the act of choosing; choice; the act of selecting one or more from others. Hence, appropriately, the act of choosing a person to fill an office or employment by any manifestation of preference, as by vote, uplifted hands, or viva voce. Brown v. Phillips, 36 N. W. 242, 247, 71 Wis. 239; State v. Hirsch, 24 N. E. 1062, 1063, 125 Ind. 207, 9 L. R. A. 170.

"Election" means, according to Bouvier, choice; the selection of one man from amongst more to discharge the duties in a state, corporation, or society; and Anderson, in his Dictionary, defines the term as a choosing or selecting; also the condition of having been chosen or selected; choice or selection. Bowler v. Eisenhood, 48 N. W. 136, 138, 1 S. D. 577, 12 L. R. A. 705.

The term "election" carries with it the idea of choice, in which all those who are to be affected with the choice participate. Bouvier, under the word "election," says that, etymologically, election denotes choice; selection out of the number of those choosing. In common use, however, it has come to denote such a selection made by a distinctly defined body. In Rap. & L. Law Dict., it is said, "Election is the selection of a person by the votes of an entire class." Wickersham v. Brittan, 28 Pac. 792, 793, 93 Cal. 84, 15 L. R. A. 106, 108.

"The term 'election,' in its constitutional sense and meaning, is used to designate a selection by the popular voice of a district, county, town, or city, or by some organized body, in contradistinction to the appointment by some single person or officer." Police Com'rs v. City of Louisville, 66 Ky. (3 Bush) 597, 602; Rogers v. Jacob, 11 S. W. 513, 514, 88 Ky. 502; Speed v. Crawford, 60 Ky. (3 Metc.) 207, 209; Magruder v. Swann, 25 Md. 173, 213; State v. Harrison, 16 N. E. 384, 388, 113 Ind. 434, 3 Am. St. Rep. 663.

The word "election" is not limited in its definition and meaning to the act or process of choosing a person for a public office by a vote of the qualified electors at the time, place, and manner prescribed by law. The Century Dictionary defines "election" to mean a deliberate act of choice; particularly a choice of means for accomplishing a given end; the choice of a person or persons for office of any kind by the voting of a body of qualified or authorized electors. In Worcester's Dictionary the word "election" is defined as the act of electing or choosing; power of choosing; free choice; preference; selection. State v. Hirsch, 24 N. E. 1062, 1063, 125 Ind. 207, 9 L. R. A. 170.

Elections are contrivances of government by which persons called "electors" exercise their will as to who shall exercise the functions of government. People v. Board of County Canvassers of Onondaga County, 29 N. E. 327, 334, 129 N. Y. 395, 14 L. R. A. 624.

In statutes relative to elections the term "election" shall apply to the taking of a vote upon a proposed amendment to the Constitution; upon the questions of granting licenses for the sale of intoxicating liquors; and upon any other question by law submitted to the voters. Rev. Laws Mass. 1902, p. 104, c. 11, § 1.

The word "election," as used in the article relating to registration and elections in cities with 1,000 inhabitants or over, shall be construed to designate elections had within any city, for the purpose of enabling electors to choose some public officer or officers under the laws of the state or the United States, or to pass any amendment, law, or other public act or proposition submitted to vote by law. Rev. St. Mo. 1899, § 7357.

The word "election," as used in the chapter of the Penal Code relating to crimes against the elective franchise, designates only elections had within the state for the purpose of enabling electors, as such, to choose some public officer or officers under the laws of this state, or of the United States. Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 6892.

The construction of Laws 1898, c. 182, p. 373, § 17, enacting that the common council shall be "the judge of elections, return and qualifications of its members," cannot be varied by the presence or absence of punctuation marks, or the use of words either in the singular or the plural, as the expression "election returns and qualifications" has a well-defined and settled meaning in American jurisprudence, and though we find "elections" in the plural, followed by a comma, the term gives to the board of aldermen the power to determine who was elected, and his qualification to membership. People v. Fornes, 67 N. E. 216, 217, 175 N. Y. 114.

As appoint.

The term "an election" is not, according to its true meaning, necessarily confined to the process by which the people indicate their choice of officers, but may properly and appropriately be applied to the process by which members of city councils or other legislative bodies choose or elect officers, and is so used in a statute punishing bribery at elections. Commonwealth v. Root, 98 Ky. 563, 536, 29 S. W. 351.

The word "elected," as used in Laws 1896, c. 247, § 4, relating to the election of the president of the village of Saratoga Springs, is used in the same sense in which the word "appointed" is used in the constitution, prescribing the mode of election of the officer. People v. Sturges, 47 N. Y. Supp. 999, 1001, 21 Misc. Rep. 605; Id., 50 N. Y. Supp. 5, 6, 27 App. Div. 387.

"Elected," as used in Const. art. 4, § 27, providing that the present judges of the circuit courts shall continue to act as judges of the respective circuit courts within the judicial circuits in which they respectively reside until the expiration of the term for which they were respectively elected, and until their successors are elected and qualified, is not synonymous with "appointed," and means chosen by the people. Magruder v. Swann, 25 Md. 173, 213.

"Elected," as used in the Constitution, providing that officers shall be entitled to hold until their successors are elected and qualified, means the choosing of an officer by the people at large, or by an organized body, as the Legislature, and hence the terms "elected" and "qualified" should be construed to mean until the successor shall have been designated in whatsoever manner is provided by the Constitution or law creating the office; and, though the terms "elect" and "appoint" are not, in general, synonymous, the term as used in the Constitution applies equally to officers who are to be appointed by the General Assembly as those elected by the people. State v. Harrison, 16 N. E. 384, 388, 113 Ind. 434, 3 Am. St. Rep. 663.

Laws 1857, c. 243, providing that three of the commissioners of pilots shall be elected by the members of the Chamber of Commerce, and the other two by presidents and vice presidents of the marine insurance companies of the city of New York represented in the Board of Underwriters of said city, does not mean that such commissioners should be chosen by the ordinary mode of voting by the people, but means "appointed"; the mode of selecting such commissioners being, in legal effect, an appointment. Sturgis v. Spofford, 45 N. Y. 446, 449.

How. Ann. St. § 729, provides for filling vacancies in the board of supervisors by appointment. Section 489 authorizes such board, by a vote of two-thirds of all the members elect, to designate a place to which to remove the county seat, and, after a vote of the electors in favor thereof, to establish such county seat. Held, that members of the board appointed to fill vacancies have the same right as members elected to take part in such proceedings, and to have their votes counted. Peck v. Berrien County Sup'rs, 102 Mich. 346, 60 N. W. 985.

The word "elected," employed in Const. art. 15, § 3, which provides that an officer shall hold his office until his successor shall have been elected and qualified, cannot be construed to mean chosen or designated, so as to deprive an incumbent of his office by the appointment of a successor, but means a successor chosen at a regular election. Kimberlin v. State, 29 N. E. 773, 130 Ind. 120, 14 L. R. A. 858, 30 Am. St. Rep. 208.

"Discriminating authorities sanction the use of the word 'appointed' in a sense which includes the notion of election by a body, as well as selection by an individual, and also the use of the word 'elected' as applied to those who are chosen by the votes of a body limited in numbers. By way of authoritative definitions, we have the following: Bouv. Law Dict.: 'Appointment. The designation of a person by the person or persons having authority therefor to discharge the duties of some office or trust.' 'Election. Choice; selection. The selection of one person from a specified class to discharge certain duties in a state, corporation, or society.' Cent. Dict.: 'Appoint. To allot, set apart, or designate, nominate or authoritatively assign, as for use, or to a post or office.' 'Elect. To pick out; select from among a number; to select for an office or employment by a majority or plurality of votes; choose by ballot or any similar method, as to elect a representative or a senator; to elect a president or mayor.' In this connection, an election of an archbishop by the monks of a certain convent is instanced as a proper use of the verb 'to elect.' Under these definitions, the distinction seems to be that election signifies the act of choosing where several participate in the selection. Appointment relates to the bestowal of the office upon the person selected, whether the choosing be the act of one or of many. Where the choice rests in the sole discretion of an individual, the usual authoritative evidence that a selection has been definitely made is in the act of bestowal; hence in such cases the word 'appointment' has come to include the function of selection, as well as the function of authoritatively designating the person selected. That the functions are distinct, however, appears when we come to consider those cases where one has the exclusive function of selection, but the appointment is subject to the approval of others. For instance, the Governor nominates, and, with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoints, certain officers. But where the power of making an appointment resides in a numerous body, the exercise of the power necessitates a previous agreement, by majority of voices or otherwise, with respect to the person to be chosen, and the choice so made is an election, after which the person selected receives the appointment, and can properly be said to be appointed, although he is the choice of many. Under our system of government, the most familiar example of election is that which is participated in by the people at large. At the same time it requires the use of the phrase, 'popular election,' or 'election by the people,' to clearly express the thought." Reid v. Gorsuch, 51 Atl. 457, 459, 67 N. J. Law, 396.

The words "appointment" and "election" represent different tenures. The people elect. The Governor or other functionary appoints. Section 1 of the Statutes of California concerning offices and officers, providing that "there shall be elected or appointed as hereinafter declared the following officers," etc., and the other provisions of the act, use the term "election" as applied to the action of the people in choosing officers, and the term "appointment" as applied to the action of whatever officer or board is vested with the power to fill the given vacancy. Where the officer is chosen by the people, he takes by virtue of his election. Where the office, from any cause, became vacant before the expiration of the term, and it is filled by the choice of the Governor or some other public functionary, the officer chosen takes by virtue of his appointment. In the case of an election to office by the people, the issuance of the commission is a mere ministerial act. Conger v. Gilmer, 32 Cal. 75, 78.

The word "election," in the strict sense, undoubtedly means the choice of an officer, in the exercise of which all the qualified electors have an opportunity to participate, while the word "appointment" is understood to mean the selection by one or more persons, who have been commissioned for that purpose, of another, who, by virtue of the choice, represents or may exercise some authority over the persons delegating the power to make the appointment. In People v. Langdon, 8 Cal. 1, it was insisted that the words "elected" and "appointed," as used in a section of the California Constitution, were not equivalent expressions of the meaning intended to be imported by the framers of that instrument, but the court said: "Much stress is laid upon the word 'appoint,' as used in this section. This is mere hypercriticism. The word 'appoint' was probably used as a more comprehensive term to convey the idea of a mode of constituting or designating an officer with public election or otherwise. In fact, the words 'elect' and 'appoint' seem to be regarded as synonymous by the convention. The word 'elect' simply means to pick out, to select from among a number, or to make choice of, and is synonymous with the words 'choose,' 'prefer,' 'select,' and was evidently used in this sense in the Constitution." And the word "elect," as used in Const. art. 15, § 1, declaring that all officers shall hold their office until their successors are elected and qualified, is not limited to offices which are filled by an election of the people, as contradistinguished to those to which appointment is made by the Legislature. State v. Compson, 54 Pac. 349, 351, 34 Or. 25.

In the popular sense, an election is a choice which several persons collectively make of a person to fill an office or position, while an appointment is a choice for such office or position by some single officer or person. Where a police judge was selected by the several members of the city council, it was not inappropriate to say that he was elected. State v. Williams, 58 Pac. 476, 477, 60 Kan. 837.

An election is the direct choice of all the members of the body from whom the choice can be made, as distinguished from an appointment, which is generally made by one person, or by a limited number, acting with delegated powers. Wickersham v. Brittan, 28 Pac. 792, 793, 93 Cal. 34, 15 L. R. A. 106, 108. See, also, State v. Squire, 39 Ohio St. 197, 199.

As authorized election.

There can be no valid election without some valid authority behind it. A few voters putting tickets in a box does not alone make an election; and where, on the claim that a vacancy existed in the office of alderman, without any order of the common council, or notice that an election was to be held to fill such vacancy, a few voters deposited ballots for an alderman to fill such vacancy, the court held that the person voted for was not elected, saying: "An election implies opportunity to re-elect or choose another, and such was not given. It is a misnomer to call such a proceeding an election." People v. Crissey, 91 N. Y. 616, 634, 635.

As choice by plurality.

"Election" means the choice of a person for some office by a plurality of votes. State v. Anderson, 12 N. E. 656, 659, 45 Ohio St. 196.

One of the cardinal principles on the subject of elections is that the person who receives a majority or plurality of the votes is the person elected. Generally a plurality of the votes of the electors present is sufficient, but in some states a majority of all the votes is required. Each elector has one vote. Maynard v. Board of Canvassers, 47 N. W. 756, 760, 84 Mich. 228, 11 L. R. A. 332.

As choice by popular election.

An election is the embodiment of the popular will; the expression of the sovereign power of the people. In re Wheelock, 82 Pa. 297, 299; Stinson v. Sweeney, 30 Pac. 997, 1000, 17 Nev. 309.

The term "elected," generally speaking, imports a popular election. Ex parte Faulkner, 1 W. Va. 269, 299.

"Among lexicographers and theologians, the meaning of the word 'elect' is to choose; to take by preference; and there is nothing in its accepted meaning which necessarily signifies a popular election." Speed v. Crawford, 60 Ky. (3 Metc.) 207, 210.

"Elected," in its strict sense, means choice by popular vote. Wickersham v. Brittan, 15 L. R. A. 106, 108, 93 Cal. 34, 28 Pac. 792; State v. Compson, 54 Pac. 349, 351, 34 Or. 25.

The constitutional provision prohibiting the Legislature from passing a local or special law regulating the election of county and township officers means popular election, and therefore it operates to prohibit the making of distinctions between counties and townships in the matter of popular election of their officers. The word "election," in the constitutional provision providing that the Legislature shall provide by law for the election of a board of county commissioners in each county, and the phrase "election by the people," in the clause providing that the Legislature shall provide for the election by the people of sheriffs and other necessary officers, are limited in meaning to popular elections. State v. Irwin, 5 Nev. 111, 121.

"Elected," as used in the Constitution, must be received in its ordinary and usual meaning, which carries with it the idea of a vote generally popular, sometimes more restricted, and cannot be held to be the synonym of any other method of filling an office. State v. Torreyson, 34 Pac. 870, 872, 21 Nev. 517; State v. Irwin, 5 Nev. 111, 120.

The word "election," as used in Const. art. 2, § 6, which provides that all elections by the people shall be by ballot, means a choice of persons for public officers made by the people. Seaman v. Baughman, 47 N. W. 1091, 1092, 82 Iowa, 216, 11 L. R. A. 354.

As choice by those qualified.

Civ. Code, § 315, providing that, upon the application of any person or corporate body aggrieved by an election held by any corporate body, the district court of the district in which such election is held may inquire into such election, etc., means an election by the stockholders, and not the selection of a person to fill a vacancy by the board of directors. Wickersham v. Brittan, 28 Pac. 792, 793, 93 Cal. 34, 15 L. R. A. 106, 108.

Const. art. 6, § 10, providing that the General Assembly may provide for the election, for a term not exceeding four years, of such other county or district ministerial and executive officers as shall from time to time be necessary and proper, means a selection of officers by qualified voters at the polls. Ader v. City of Newport (Ky.) 6 S. W. 577, 578.

As choice in manner provided by law.

Where a city charter provided that all officers shall hold their offices until their successors are elected or appointed, the words "elected or appointed" mean selected in the manner provided by law. State v. Daggett, 68 Pac. 340, 346, 28 Wash. 1.

The term "election" implies a choice by an electoral body, at the time and substantially in the manner and with the safeguards provided by law, of a qualified person to an office. Foster v. Scarff, 15 Ohio St. 532, 534.

As choice of eligible person.

"Elected," as used in Const. art. 5, § 2, providing that none of the officers of the executive department shall be eligible to any other state office during the period for which they shall have been elected, means the choosing of a person eligible to be chosen. State v. Boyd, 48 N. W. 739, 754, 81 Neb. 682.

An election is the deliberate choice of a majority or plurality of the electoral body. This is evidenced by the votes of the electors. But if a majority of those voting, by mistake of law or fact, happen to cast their vote upon an ineligible candidate, it by no means follows that the next to him on the poll should receive the office. Lewis v. Boynton, 55 Pac. 732, 734, 25 Colo. 486 (citing Saunders v. Haynes, 13 Cal. 145).

As day's voting.

The word "election," as used in a statute providing for an election to determine the site of a county seat, and declaring that, if at the first election no place receives a majority, a second election shall be had, and as further used in a statute providing that in no case shall the validity of an election be inquired into, beyond the one last had and on which the proceeding is based, means a day's voting, and is not confined to its meaning to choice or selection, in the sense that no election is had until a result is reached. In re County Seat of Linn County, 15 Kan. 500, 526.

As declared elected.

The term "election," as generally used, is understood to mean one who has by some legally constituted board been declared elected to an office. The expression "the person whose election he intends to contest," in Comp. Laws, § 1489, relating to contests of election, means a person who has been decided or declared to be elected by a board or officer authorized to determine the result of the election—one no longer simply a candidate voted for, or subject to be declared elected, but one so declared or decided to be elected, and who has received, or is found entitled to receive, a certificate of his election. Bowler v. Eisenhood, 48 N. W. 136, 138, 1 S. D. 577, 12 L. R. A. 705.

As entire proceedings.

An election, under the Constitution, involves every element necessary to the complete ascertainment of the expression of the popular will, embracing the entire range, from the deposit of the ballot by the elector up to the final ascertainment and certification of the result. An election by the people means and includes the perfected ascertainment of such result. State v. McCoy (Del.) 43 Atl. 270, 273, 2 Marv. 576.

The word "election," as used in Rev. St. § 3397, providing that, after the result of an election under the local option law has been declared, the election may be tested, and that if it appear that it was illegal or fraudulently conducted, or such a number of voters were denied the privilege of voting as might have changed the result, or the true result of the election cannot be ascertained, "another election shall be ordered," means the act of casting and receiving the ballots from the voters, counting the ballots, and making returns thereon. State v. Tucker, 54 Ala. 205, 210. That is the meaning of the word "election" in the ordinary usage, and it must be so construed; there being nothing in the law to suggest that the Legislature intended to use it in a different sense. Norman v. Thompson, 72 S. W. 62-64, 96 Tex. 250; Ex parte Conley (Tex.) 75 S. W. 301, 302.

As inducted into office.

"Election," as used in Rev. St. 1833, c. 24, § 6, respecting appointments to fill vacancies in the office of constable, and providing that the person so appointed shall be qualified to act until the next election of constables, should be construed to mean not only the act of choosing, but the act of choosing and inducting into office. Waring v. Wilroy, 32 N. C. 329, 332.

As time when ballots were cast.

"Election," as used in Rev. Code, § 162, fixing the number of days after the election within which official bonds must be filed, and as found in different sections regulating elections in the state, meant the time when the ballots were cast, and not when the final choice was made. State v. Tucker, 54 Ala. 205, 210.

As election on question submitted.

Under Ky. St. tit. "Elections," § 1586, the word "election," whenever used in the chapter in reference to state, district, county, or municipal elections, shall be deemed to include the decision of questions submitted to the qualified voters, as well as the choice of officers therein. Commonwealth v. Steele, 97 Ky. 27, 29, 29 S. W. 855.

The word "election," until quite lately, when applied to political speeches, was never used to denote the choice of a principle or a rule of action, but was merely for the purpose of determining a choice of persons. To make the word "election" mean the choice of a state law is to invent for the word a new meaning, which it never previously had. There are very few decisions which militate against this obvious distinction. That a city or town may accept or reject a statutory proposal of a grant of local power is not an exception, for, as we have seen, the power lies in grant; and it is not supposed that any set of persons are bound to accept or use a grant which they refuse to accept, though every one must obey a state law, whether he consents or not. The only exception to the above rule is where the inhabitants of a county are permitted to vote whether there shall be fence laws within its quarters. Thornton v. Territory, 17 Pac. 896, 899, 3 Wash. T. 482.

In Const. § 157, providing that no county shall become indebted to an amount exceeding in any year the income and revenue provided for such year, without the assent of two-thirds of the voters therein voting at an election to be held for that purpose, the word "election" referred to the proposition upon which the vote is to be taken, and hence the provision does not require the consent of two-thirds of the voters voting at the same time for public officers. Montgomery County Fiscal Court v. Trimble, 47 S. W. 773, 774, 104 Ky. 629, 42 L. R. A. 738.

The term "election," as used in Const. art. 7, § 1, providing that every male person possessing the following qualifications shall be entitled to vote at all elections, is not used in its general or comprehensive sense, but in its restricted political sense, meaning public elections for the choice of public officers, and will not include an election to determine the question of an annexation of a town or city. Hence the electors at such election may be required to have different qualifications. Town of Valverde v. Shattuck, 34 Pac. 947, 19 Colo. 104, 41 Am. St. Rep. 208.

The term "election," within the meaning of a statute prohibiting bets on elections, does not include a method prescribed by the Legislature to take the sense of the qualified voters of a county on the question of removing the county seat. Moore v. Commonwealth, 7 Ky. Law Rep. 292.

District school meeting.

The word "election," as used in Const. § 6, art. 2, requiring all elections by the people to be by ballot, refers to a choice of persons for public offices, and has no application to the meetings of electors of a district township for the transaction of the general business of the township. Seaman v. Baughman, 82 Iowa, 216, 220, 47 N. W. 1091, 1092, 11 L. R. A. 354.

Where a statute authorizes the election of certain officers at a district school meeting, who are to be elected by the electors qualified to vote thereat as prescribed by statute, such meeting constitutes an election, within the provisions of 1 Hill's Ann. Laws, § 1846, declaring a punishment for a person who shall vote at any legally authorized election, knowing himself not entitled to vote. State v. Hingley, 52 Pac. 89, 32 Or. 440.

Municipal election.

Const. art. 1, § 1, provides that "all elections shall be by ballot," and that "every male citizen of the United States * * * who has been a resident of the state for one year, and of the legislative district of Baltimore City or of the county in which he may offer to vote, for six months next preceding the election, shall be entitled to vote, in the ward or election district, in which he resides, at all elections hereafter to be held in this state." Baltimore City is the only municipality mentioned eo nomine in any part of the Constitution. It provides for the creation of certain offices, state and county, which are filled either by election or by appointment; and we regard it as an unreasonable inference to suppose that municipal elections held within the state (outside the corporate limits of Baltimore City) can be properly termed "elections," under the Constitution, such as state and county elections, or that the framers of the Constitution even contemplated that article 1, § 1, of that instrument, was intended to apply to municipal elections, such as the one now under consideration, which is the mere creature of statute. Hanna v. Young, 35 Atl. 674, 675, 84 Md. 179, 34 L. R. A. 55, 57 Am. St. Rep. 396.

Primary election.

The word "election," in the act entitled "An act to promote the purity of elections by regulating the conduct thereof," etc., does not mean primary election. People v. Cavanaugh, 112 Cal. 674, 676, 44 Pac. 1057, 1058.

The term "election," in Gen. St. c. 47, art. 2, § 1, making it criminal to bet upon the result of an election under the Constitution and laws of the commonwealth or of the United States, does not include a primary election. Commonwealth v. Helm, 9 Ky. Law Rep. 532.

A primary election is not an election, so as to render a fraud committed at a primary election within the common-law offense of fraud at an election. Woodruff v. State, 52 Atl. 294, 296, 68 N. J. Law, 89.

Rev. St. 1881, § 2098, making it a crime to sell or give away intoxicating liquors to be drunk as a beverage on a day of election in a town or city where the same may be holden, is not limited to elections between the candidates of the various parties, but includes a primary election held by a political party to select candidates. State v. Hirsch, 24 N. H. 1062, 1063, 125 Ind. 207, 9 L. R. A. 170.

Act March 24, 1817, as amended by Act July 2, 1839, providing that the officers having the care of the poor must bring a suit against the stakeholder or party winning in a bet or wager upon the result of any election within this commonwealth, should be construed to mean only elections for public officers, and not to include primary elections for the selection of party candidates to be voted for in the election for the officers. Commonwealth v. Wells, 1 Atl. 310, 311, 110 Pa. 463.

The word "election," as used in Const. art. 7, declaring that every male person of the age of 21 years or upwards, belonging to either of the following classes, who shall have resided in the United States one year, and in this state 4 months next preceding any election, shall be entitled to vote at such election, etc., does not include the election of candidates to the position of nominees held pursuant to the primary election law of the state (Laws 1889, c. 349). State v. Johnson, 91 N. W. 840, 841, 87 Minn. 221.

Town meeting.

A statute authorizing a town to vote with reference to subscribing for the stock of a railroad at any annual or special election meant any lawful assemblage of voters of a town for the purpose of making a choice or determining public questions by vote or ballot. The Legislature intended to use the word "election" according to its general signification, and not in its more restricted sense, and therefore the term included a town meeting at which various public matters of importance to the town were transacted. Phillips v. Town of Albany, 28 Wis. 340, 355.

Act March 30, 1869, § 6, providing for the issuance of bonds in aid of a certain railroad company by towns and villages along its route, and that the election to determine such issuance should be held and conducted and return thereof made as provided by law, should be construed to include a town meeting presided over by a moderator, though not held by the supervisor, assessor, and collector as judges of the election. The voting for town officers at annual town meetings in the manner prescribed therefor by the statutes is called an "election," and a special voting in the same manner for the object of issuing bonds in aid of a railroad was an elecdion, within the meaning of the act of 1869. Town of Oregon v. Jennings, 7 Sup. Ct. 124, 133, 119 U. S. 74, 30 L. Ed. 323.

ELECTED DOMICILE.

The term "elected domicile" designates the domicile of parties fixed in a contract between them for the purposes of such contract. Woodworth v. Bank of America, 19 Johns. 391, 417, 10 Am. Dec. 239.

ELECTION.

See "Waiver by Election"; "Right of Election."

"Election," as used in a deed conveying certain mine hills and ore banks, and excepting and reserving to the grantor, his heirs and assigns, the right of digging and hauling away a sufficient quantity of iron ore for the supply of any one furnace, at the election of the grantor, his heirs and assigns, at all times thereafter, means election or choice, and is not used in its technical signification, as meaning an obligation imposed on a party to choose between two alternative rights or claims in mines, where there is a clear intention of the person from whom he derives one that he did not enjoy both. Coleman v. Brooke (Pa.) 12 Phila. 503, 504.

In criminal law.

"Elect," as used in speaking of the right to elect upon one of several counts of an indictment on which a prosecution will be based, implies a knowledge of facts which go to make up two or more offenses; and while the solicitor may, by his own acts and questions, involuntarily effect an election, yet, to hold him to have elected to proceed for a certain offense, he must have learned enough to enable him to individualize the transaction, and then pursue his inquiry with a view to learning the details or particulars of the act or transaction thus individualized. Jackson v. State, 10 South. 657, 95 Atl. 17.

In equity.

Election is the internal, free, and spontaneous separation of one thing from another, existing in the mind and will. Wells, Fargo & Co. v. Robinson, 13 Cal. 133, 144 (citing Dyer, 281).

Election, in law, is when a man is left to his own free will to take or do one thing or another, which he pleases. Arthur v. Nelson (N. Y.) 1 Dem. Sur. 337, 346.

"Election," as used in its legal sense, is defined to be the choice of one or two rights or things, to each one of which the party chosen has an equal right, but both of which he cannot have. 1 Bouv. Law Dict. Bliss v. Geer, 7 Ill. App. (7 Bradw.) 612, 617.

"Election," says Judge Story, "is the obligation imposed on a party to choose between two inconsistent or alternative rights or claims in cases where there is a clear intention of the person from whom he derives one that he should not enjoy both." Nutt v. Nutt (Miss.) Freem. Ch. 128, 132; First Nat. Bank v. Holland, 39 S. E. 128, 130, 99 Va. 495, 55 L. R. A. 155, 86 Am. St. Rep. 898; Hattersley v. Bissett, 29 Atl. 187, 189, 51 N. J. Eq. (6 Dick.) 597, 40 Am. St. Rep. 532; Norwood v. Lassiter (N. C.) 43 S. E. 509, 510; Gilroy v. Richards (Tex.) 63 S. W. 664, 666; Gilman v. Gilman, 54 Me. 453, 458; Van Steenwyck v. Washburn, 17 N. W. 289, 293, 59 Wis. 483, 48 Am. Rep. 532.

In every case the election, therefore, presupposes a plurality of gifts or rights, with an intention, expressed or implied, of the party who has a right to control one or both, or of the law, that one should be a substitute for the other. The party who is to take has a choice, but he cannot enjoy the benefits of both. Norwood v. Lassiter, 43 S. E. 509, 510, 132 N. C. 52; Gilman v. Gilman, 54 Me. 453, 458; Salentine v. Mutual Ben. Life Ins. Co., 48 N. W. 855, 856, 79 Wis. 580, 12 L. R. A. 690; Van Steenwyck v. Washburn, 17 N. W. 289, 293, 59 Wis. 483, 48 Am. Rep. 532.

An election by the obligor or promisor is not common, and it is usually and oftenest used as a legal term, as the choice of one of two things, to each one of which the party choosing has equal right, but both of which he cannot have. An election will not be compelled until the party has had time and opportunity to become fully informed of the facts affecting its choice. On the failure of a person who has the right to make an election in proper time, the right of election passes over to the opposite party. Salentine v. Mutual Ben. Life Ins. Co., 48 N. W. 855, 856, 79 Wis. 580, 12 L. R. A. 690.

Election need not be made in a moment of time, nor need it be made in words, nor does it require in all cases a surrender, or work a forfeiture. It is not an unbending rule. It is a rule that springs from manifest principles of equity, intended to do justice to all parties concerned. It may be considered as pretty well settled that the doctrine of election is as well satisfied by compensation as by forfeiture. In that case justice is done to all. Farmington Savings Bank v. Curran, 44 Atl. 473, 475, 72 Conn. 342.

"An election, in equity, is a choice which a party is compelled to make between the acceptance of a benefit under an instrument, and the retention of some property already his own, which is attempted to be disposed of in favor of a third party by virtue of the same instrument. The doctrine rests upon the principle that a person claiming under an instrument shall not interfere by title paramount to prevent another part of the same instrument from having effect according to its construction. He cannot accept and reject the same instrument. It is a doctrine which is principally exhibited in cases of wills, but it has been applied also to cases of voluntary deeds, to cases of contracts for value resting upon articles, and to contracts completely executed by conveyance and assignment." Frierson v. Branch, 30 Ark. 453, 457 (citing Bisp. Eq. § 295); Fitzhugh v. Hubbard, 41 Ark. 64, 69.

Same—Conclusiveness.

Where an election is once made and completed, the party is concluded. Bliss v. Geer, 7 Ill. App. 612, 617; Lawrence v. Ocean Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 11 Johns. 241, 261.

The principle of law is that if a man has an election to do or demand one of two things, and he determines his election, it shall be determined forever. New York Firemen Ins. Co. v. Lawrence (N. Y.) 14 Johns. 46, 55. In Garrison v. Marie (N. Y.) 7 Civ. Proc. R. 113, 121, it is said that, where a person has made an election as to rights, he should not afterwards be permitted to change his position, and set up an inconsistent right. Hopf v. United States Baking Co., 27 N. Y. Supp. 217, 218, 6 Misc. Rep. 158.

Same—Ignorance as affecting.

The doctrine of election depends, not on technical rules, but on principles of equity and justice and actual intention. An election made in ignorance of material facts is, of course, not binding, when no other person's rights have been affected thereby. So, if a person, though knowing the facts, has acted in misapprehension of his legal rights, and in ignorance of his obligation to make an election, no intention to elect, and consequently no election, is to be presumed. Watson v. Watson, 128 Mass. 152. An election by matters in pais can only be determined by plain and unequivocal acts under a full knowledge of all the circumstances and of the party's rights. Appeal of Anderson, 38 Pa. (12 Casey) 476. Kent was of the opinion that, to bind one by an election, it must have been an intentional choice of one thing instead of another, and that it must appear to have been with knowledge, and that, where knowledge is not proved, it will not be presumed in order to conclude a party by the supposed election. Madden v. Louisville, N. O. & T. Ry. Co., 66 Miss. 258, 278, 6 South. 181 (citing Dash v. Van Kleeck, 7 Johns. 477, 5 Am. Dec. 291).

Election exists when a party has two alternative and inconsistent rights, and is determined by a manifestation of choice; but the fact that a party wrongly supposed he had two such rights, and attempted to choose the one to which he was not entitled, is not enough to prevent his exercising the other, if entitled to it. Priest v. Foster, 38 Atl. 78, 79, 69 Vt. 417.

Election is the internal, free, and spontaneous separation of one thing from another, existing in the mind and will. That designed selection cannot occur if the party be ignorant of his rights. He cannot deliberately select one of two or more remedies if he know of but one to which he is entitled. Therefore an election made by a party under a mistake of facts, or a misconception as to his rights, is not binding in equity. In order to constitute a valid election, the act must be done with a full knowledge of the circumstances of the case, and the right to which the person put to his election was entitled. Standard Oil Co. v. Hawkins (U. S.) 74 Fed. 395, 398, 20 C. C. A. 468, 33 L. R. A. 739.

Where a person has actually pursued one of two courses of conduct because he believed he could not successfully pursue the other, that is making an election between them. Election is the choosing between two rights by a person who derives one of them under an instrument in which a clear intention appears that he should not enjoy both. Appeal of Carter, 59 Conn. 576, 587, 22 Atl. 320, 321, 322.

In law of wills.

Election is where the testator gives what does not belong to him—what belongs to some other person—and gives that person some of his own, whereby a condition is implied that he will depart with his own estate, or not take the bounty. Appeal of Little (Pa.) 3 Walk. 225, 228; Hattersley v. Bissett, 25 Atl. 332, 333, 50 N. J. Eq. (5 Dick.) 577; Broome v. Monck, 10 Ves. 597, 611. It is founded on the apparent intent of the testator that the legatee should surrender some right in exchange for the legacy, and can therefore never arise where the legatee had not at the time of the execution of the will any interest or right in the property devised. Hattersley v. Bissett, 25 Atl. 332, 333, 50 N. J. Eq. (5 Dick.) 577.

The principle on which this doctrine rests is for the donee to accept the benefit conferred, while he declines the burden imposed, is to defraud the design of the donor. Hattersley v. Bissett, 29 Atl. 187, 189, 51 N. J. Eq. (6 Dick.) 597, 40 Am. St. Rep. 532.

The definition of what is meant by "election under a will" may be thus stated: That every person whom the instrument proposes in any way to benefit must elect whether he will claim under the will or against its provisions. This implies, of course, that the person thus put to election has some rights in regard to the same subject which he could maintain independent of the will. Citing 2 Redf. Wills, 737. Where the testator assumes to dispose of any estate which in fact belongs to any devisee or legatee under the will, such devisee or legatee must elect to take under the will or against it. Id. 740. Sir Wm. Grant defines "election" thus: "When one legatee under a will insists on something by which he would deprive another legatee under the same will of the benefit to which he would be entitled if the first legatee permitted the whole will to operate." Id. 741.

"It seems clear that, to constitute a case of election, there must be an actual disposition of the property belonging to the person who is to be put to the election." Gilman v. Gilman, 54 Me. 453, 458 (quoting 2 Redf. Wills, 744).

As applied to the law of wills, it simply means that he who takes under a will must conform to all its provisions. He cannot accept a benefit given by the testamentary instrument, and evade its burdens. If he takes a beneficial interest in the estate of the will, equity will hold him to his choice, and it will be conclusively presumed that he intends thereby to ratify and conform to every part of it. In order to put the donee of a benefit under a will to an election, two things are essential: (1) The testator must give property of his own; and (2) he must profess to dispose of property belonging to the donee. The foundation of a doctrine of election rests upon a presumptive intention upon the part of the testator that the donee was not to take a double benefit. Gilroy v. Richards, 63 S. W. 664, 666, 26 Tex. Civ. App. 355.

In order to amount to an election to take property in its actual, as contradistinguished from its eventual or destined, state, the act must be such as to absolutely determine and extinguish the converting trust; and hence it would seem to follow that, where two or more persons are interested in the property, it is not in the power of any one co-proprietor to change its character in regard even to his own share, for, as the act of the whole would be requisite to put an end to the trust, nothing less would suffice to impress upon the property a transmissible quality foreign to that which it has received from testator. Wayne v. Fouts, 65 S. W. 471, 474, 108 Tenn. 145.

Of remedies.

Election is the choice between two alternative rights or claims. If a statute gives a remedy in the affirmative, without a negative, express or implied, for a matter which was actionable at the common law, the party may sue at common law as well as upon the statute. Almy v. Harris (N. Y.) 5 Johns. 175, 176.

The doctrine is well settled that, where there exists an election between inconsistent remedies, the party is confined to the remedy which he first prefers and adopts. McNutt v. Hilkina, 29 N. Y. Supp. 1047, 1049, 80 Hun, 235.

Where plaintiff has a choice between inconsistent remedies—as where one action is founded on affirmance, and the other upon disaffirmance, of a voidable sale or contract—any decisive act of affirmance or disaffirmance, if done with knowledge of the facts, determines the legal rights of the parties once for all, and the institution of a suit is such decisive act, and in such case constitutes an election. Welsh v. Carder, 68 S. W. 580, 581, 95 Mo. App. 41.

To conclude one by an election of remedies, the remedies must be inconsistent. As regards what are known as "consistent remedies," the plaintiff may, without let or hindrance from any rule of law, choose one or all in a given case. He may adopt and select one as better adapted than the others to work out his purpose, but his choice is not compulsory or final, and, if not satisfied with the result of that, he may commence and carry through a prosecution of another. New York Land Imp. Co. v. Chapman, 118 N. Y. 288, 23 N. E. 187; Simons v. Fagan (Neb.) 87 N. W. 21, 23.

The whole doctrine of election is based upon the theory that there are inconsistent rights or remedies of which a party may avail himself, and a choice of one is held to be an election not to pursue the other. The principle does not apply to coexisting and consistent remedies. F. C. Austin Mfg. Co. v. Decker, 80 N. W. 312, 314, 109 Iowa, 277.

The term "election" is often used to designate the right to bring an action of assumpsit instead of an action for tort. Foote v. Ffoulke, 67 N. Y. Supp. 368, 370, 55 App. Div. 617.

It is a familiar rule that, when a party has the choice of two remedies, he must make his election between them, and after he has made such election he cannot pursue the other remedy. This election may be made by actions amounting in themselves to a choice of remedies. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Bigley, 95 N. W. 344, 345, 1 Neb. (Unof.) 225.

Of trial by jury.

An election for a trial before a jury is a mere designation of the mode of trial, and has nothing to do with the thing to be tried; and, since a declaration in an action should contain no averments or statements beyond those that are necessary to set forth the cause of action, an election should form no part of it. What is true of a declaration is true also of the pleas. Baltimore City Pass. Ry. Co. v. Nugent, 38 Atl. 779, 783, 86 Md. 349, 39 L. R. A. 161.

Of widow.

"An election may be express, as where the party elects by some specific and unequivocal act, whereby the intention is clearly indicated, as by the execution of a written instrument declaring the election, or it may be implied from the acts of the party; from his conduct, his acts, or omissions; from his mode of dealing with and treating the property, etc. To raise an inference of election from the party's own conduct, merely, it must appear that he knew of his right to elect, and not merely of the instrument giving such right, and that he had full knowledge of all facts concerning the property. As an election is necessarily a definite choice by the party to take one of the properties and to reject the other, his conduct, in order that an election may be inferred, must evince an intention to elect, and must show such an intention. The intention, however, may be inferred from a series of unequivocal acts. Where a widow is required to elect between a testamentary provision in her favor and her dower, any unequivocal act of dealing with the property given by the will as her own, or the exercise of any unmistakable act of ownership over it, if done with knowledge of her right to elect, and not through a clear mistake as to the condition and manner of the property, will be deemed an election by her to take under the will and to reject her dower." Burroughs v. De Couts, 11 Pac. 734, 738, 70 Cal. 361.

The term "election," as used in speaking of the election of a widow to take under a will or the statute, means a choice between two courses of action—acquiescence by the widow in her husband's disposition of his property, or disregard of it and assertion of the rights the law gives her. In re Cunningham's Estate, 20 Atl. 714, 715, 137 Pa. 621, 21 Am. St. Rep. 901.

The term "election," when speaking of the election of a widow to take dower or under a will, implies a choice between different things, and it is therefore impossible that there can be an election where the will gives only what without it passes by operation of law to the party. Ward v. Ward, 25 N. E. 1012, 1013, 134 Ill. 417.

"Election," as used in Comp. Laws 1879, c. 117, § 41, providing that a widow shall make an election, within 30 days after the service of a citation, whether she will take under the testator's will, or take what she is entitled to under the law of distribution, means a deliberate and intelligent choice; and it is essential that she should act with a full knowledge of all the circumstances and of her rights, and it must appear that she intended by her acts to elect, and these acts must be plain and unequivocal. Sill v. Sill, 1 Pac. 556, 562, 31 Kan. 248.

8 Wds. & P.—22

An election of the widow to take under a will, instead of the provision made for her by statute, does not arise from her taking possession of the personal property bequeathed to her by the will, and also having possession of the real estate. In order that acts of a widow shall be regarded as equivalent to an election to waive dower, it is essential that she act with a full knowledge of all the circumstances and of her rights, and it must appear that she intended by her acts to elect to take the provision which the will gave her. These acts must be plain and unequivocal, and be done with a full knowledge of her rights and the condition of the estate. A mere acquiescence, without a deliberate and intelligent choice, will not be an election. Sill v. Sill, 1 Pac. 556, 559, 31 Kan. 248.

ELECTION BY THE PEOPLE.

The phrase "election by the people" means an election which is participated in by the people at large. Reid v. Gorsuch, 51 Atl. 457, 459, 67 N. J. Law, 396.

The phrase "election by the people," in the clause of the Constitution providing that the Legislature shall provide for the election by the people of sheriffs and other necessary officers, has the same meaning as the word "election" in the clause providing that the Legislature shall provide by law for the election of a board of county commissioners in each county, and is limited to a popular vote. State v. Irwin, 5 Nev. 111, 121.

ELECTION CONTEST.

See "Contested Elections."

ELECTION DAY.

Acts 1892, art. 13, § 10, providing for the punishment of any one who sells, loans, gives, or furnishes any person with intoxicating liquors on election day, means 24 hours, including the period during which the election is actually held, for it is a maxim applicable to every transaction or occurrence that the fraction of a day is not regarded in law, and consequently the sale or gift of liquors at any time during the 24 hours of an election day is a violation of the law, though 4 o'clock p. m. is the time prescribed by statute when voting on an election day shall cease. Commonwealth v. Murphy, 23 S. W. 655, 95 Ky. 38. See, also, Schuck v. State, 34 N. E. 663, 50 Ohio St. 493.

ELECTION DISTRICT.

An election district is defined in the general election law as denoting the territory within which there is a single polling place for all the voters therein. Otis v. Lane, 54

Atl. 442, 443, 68 N. J. Law, 656; In re Swain, 23 Atl. 421, 54 N. J. Law (25 Vroom) 82.

In Pennsylvania, from 1799 down to the present time, the election districts, within the meaning of the statutes, have denoted subdivisions of the state's territory, marked out by known boundaries, prearranged and declared by public authority. And the Constitution has taken up the term in the same sense, though without defining it. Chase v. Miller, 41 Pa. (5 Wright) 403, 420.

The term "election district," as employed in the Constitution and statutes of Pennsylvania, defining the persons who may vote at an election, may be defined to be any part of the city or county where its boundaries are fixed by law, either by legislative enactments, or by the judgment of the court or other authorities to whom this power is delegated, where the citizens within the boundaries themselves would assemble to vote for public officers, whether their authority is local, or they are to act in governing the affairs of the state or nation. In re McDaniel's Case, 3 Pa. Law J. 310, 312, 2 Clark, 82.

ELECTION FOR PRESIDENT.

The words "election for president and vice president," in an indictment alleging an election for president and vice president of the United States, and that defendant did bet, hazard, and wager certain property upon said election, include the election in one county of a state, and the indictment is sufficient to sustain the conviction for a bet made upon the result in such county. Somers v. State, 37 Tenn. (5 Sneed) 438.

ELECTION OFFICER.

As used in Act Cong. May 31, 1870 (16 Stat. 145) § 22, providing that any officer of election at which any representative or delegate in the Congress of the United States shall be voted for, who shall neglect or refuse to perform any duty in regard to such election required of him by any law of the United States, or of any state or territory thereof, or violate any duty so imposed, shall be deemed guilty of a crime, and liable to prosecution and punishment therefor, cannot be construed to include the Governor of a state, as these words are apt and usual words to describe the clerks and judges of the election, but not to describe the Governor of a state. Such is not their ordinary or usual meaning. To make them apply to the executive of a state would be a forced and unnatural meaning. We hazard nothing in saying that, in popular use, no one would naturally infer that "officer of election" included the chief executive of a state. United States v. Clayton (U. S.) 25 Fed. Cas. 458, 459.

"Election," as used in Act Cong. May 31, 1870, § 22 (16 Stat. 145, c. 114), providing that it is criminal for any officer of election to fraudulently make any false certificate of the result of any congressional election, should be construed so as not to include the Governor of a state. The words properly mean the clerks and judges of the election, etc. United States v. Clayton (U. S.) 25 Fed. Cas. 458, 459.

ELECTION RETURNS.

"Election returns," as used in the city charter, giving the aldermen the power to judge of the election returns, clearly limit the power of the board to determine who, from the returns of the election as canvassed by the board of county canvassers and certified to by the board of elections, were properly elected members of the board. People v. Fornes, 80 N. Y. Supp. 385, 389, 79 App. Div. 618.

Section 1115, Code Civ. Proc., provides: "When an elector contests the right of any person declared elected to such office, he must, within forty days after the return day of such election, file with the county clerk a written statement," etc. The Codes do not in any other place speak of any return day, but several sections in the Political Code direct the precinct officers to transmit to the county clerk certain matters pertaining to the election. The papers to be transmitted must be in packages, and, in section 1278, Pol. Code, are spoken of as "returns." The board is directed to meet on the first Monday after the election to canvass the returns. If the returns have not all been received, the canvass must be postponed from day to day until all the returns have been received, or until six postponements have been had. The canvass shall be had by opening the returns and estimating the votes. Pol. Code, §§ 1278, 1280, 1281. In other sections the election returns are mentioned, so that there can be no doubt as to the meaning of the phrase "election returns." Carlson v. Burt, 111 Cal. 129, 131, 43 Pac. 583.

ELECTION WITHIN STATE.

An "election held within the state," within the meaning of a statute prohibiting wagers on the result of any public election held within the state, does not include an election for the presidency of the United States, and therefore a wager as to the result of the election in the several states is not within the prohibition of the statute. Covington v. State, 14 S. W. 126, 127, 28 Tex. App. 225.

"Election in this state," as used in St. 1823, c. 25, § 2, prohibiting betting on any "election in this state," does not mean exclusively a state election of state officers, but any election held in the state, though for federal officers, and hence includes a presidential election. Quarles v. State, 24 Tenn. (5 Humph.) 561.

ELECTIVE FRANCHISE.

In People v. Barber (N. Y.) 48 Hun, 198, the Supreme Court says: "The elective franchise is not a natural right of the citizen. It is a franchise depending upon the law by which it must be conferred to permit its exercise. It is a political right, to be given or withheld at the exercise of the lawmaking power of the sovereignty." Judge Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Limitations, says: "Participation in the elective franchise is a privilege, rather than a right, and it is granted or denied upon grounds of general policy." Cooley, Const. Lim. (6th Ed.) 752. A law requiring the names of all candidates to be certified and printed on an official ballot, thus preventing electors from writing the names of candidates on the official ballot, was held valid, even though Const. art. 6, § 19, provided that elections should be free and equal, and no power should at any time interfere to prevent the free exercise of the right of suffrage. Chamberlain v. Wood, 83 N. W. 109, 110, 15 S. D. 216, 56 L. R. A. 187, 91 Am. St. Rep. 674.

The elective franchise is at once a right and a trust conferred by the people of a state, acting in their supreme and sovereign capacity, upon such members of the body politic as they, in their sovereign discretion, deem should hold and exercise it, having regard to the protection both of private rights and of public interests. Once conferred upon the citizen, it is a franchise in which he has a right of property, which the law protects. But it is a franchise having its origin in the will of the body politic; and is a power held by the citizen in trust to be exercised for the public welfare, and which, in a moral point of view, the citizen has no right to use for his private benefit in opposition to the public interest. Being a franchise, the law protects the right of the citizen in it, but, inasmuch as it is also a trust, the citizen has no right to misuse it, and commits a crime if he sell it. State v. Staten, 46 Tenn. (6 Cold.) 233, 255.

The elective franchise is defined to be the right or privilege of a qualified voter to cast his ballot freely in favor of the man of his choice in an election authorized by law to be held. Parks v. State, 13 South. 756, 759, 100 Ala. 634.

ELECTIVE OFFICE.

In statutes relative to elections, the term "elective office" shall apply to any office to be filled by the voters at any state, city, or town election. Rev. Laws Mass. 1902, p. 104, c. 11, § 1.

ELECTOR.

See "Assembly of Electors"; "Qualified Elector."

Electors voting thereat, see "Voting Thereat."

Const. art. 8, § 7, which declares that no elector shall be deprived of the privilege of voting by reason of his name not being registered, means a duly qualified voter. Appeal of Cusick, 20 Atl. 574, 577, 136 Pa. 459, 10 L. R. A. 228.

An elector is one who elects or has the right of choice; a person who has, by law or Constitution, the right of voting for an officer. Webster. One who has the right to make choice of public officers; one who has a right to vote. Bouv. City of Beardstown v. City of Virginia, 76 Ill. 34, 39.

In determining the meaning of the word "elector," in St. 1897, p. 455, providing that each member of the board of supervisors must be an elector of the district which he represents, "we must look to the Constitution of the state. An elector is a person possessing the qualifications fixed by the Constitution. The meaning of the word in the statute is that each member of the board of supervisors must have the qualifications for an elector fixed by the Constitution, and a person having such qualifications is eligible for the office, although he cannot vote because he has failed to register as required by statute." Bergevin v. Curtz, 59 Pac. 312, 127 Cal. 86 (citing O'Flaherty v. City of Bridgeport, 29 Atl. 466, 64 Conn. 159).

The phrase "electors of such city," in Const. 1899, art. 6, § 17, requiring judicial officers of cities not otherwise provided for to be chosen by vote of the electors of the city, is comprehensive enough to include all the persons entitled to vote within the municipality. People v. Dooley, 75 N. Y. Supp. 350, 355, 69 App. Div. 512.

The Code provides that those electors who have the right to vote in a precinct have also the right to be present at the counting of the votes in the free, open, and public manner required by law at the polling place appointed and registered for that purpose. Held that, while a candidate has a right to vote in that precinct, if he has not exercised that right, but has voted elsewhere, he is not an elector at that precinct, within the statute, though he may, as any citizen, be present at the public count provided by law; no one being prohibited from such attendance. United States v. Badinelli (U. S.) 37 Fed. 138.

"Electors," as used in Const. art. 13, § 9, providing that all city, town, and village officers whose election or appointment is not provided for by the Constitution shall be elected by the electors of such cities, towns, or villages, or of some division thereof, is synonymous with "voters," and means those persons who have the qualifications of electors prescribed by the Constitution. State v. Tuttle, 9 N. W. 791, 792, 53 Wis. 45.

Under Laws 1888, c. 525, providing for the acquisition of parks by villages on a ma-majority vote of the electors of the village, a nontaxpayer may vote, notwithstanding Laws 1870, c. 291 (Gen. Village Act) tit. 2, § 13, providing that only taxpayers shall vote to purchase property; the statute not having assumed to vary the definition of the term "electors," in the natural and accurate sense of the word. Scott v. Twombly, 20 App. Div. 535, 537, 46 N. Y. Supp. 699.

From the context of the act, it is apparent that the word "electors," in Act March 26, 1889, amending the charter of the city of Bridgeport (section 11), which provides that, at the annual city meeting on the first Monday of April for the choice of officers, votes shall be received from the electors then registered, means freemen of the city—qualified voters of the city—and some confusion will be avoided in construing the act by remembering that it uses the word "elector" inaccurately throughout. The Constitution has given to the word "elector" a precise, technical meaning, and it is ordinarily used in our legislation with that meaning only. An elector is a person possessing the qualifications fixed by the Constitution, and duly admitted to the privileges secured, and in the manner prescribed, by that instrument. O'Flaherty v. City of Bridgeport, 29 Atl. 466, 467, 64 Conn. 159.

The word "electors," as used in the title relating to elections, shall mean electors of president and vice president of the United States. V. S. 1894, 57.

Voter distinguished.

There is a difference between an elector and a voter. The voter is the elector who votes—the elector in the exercise of his franchise or privilege of voting—and not he who does not vote. There would be no propriety in saying, in the sense of his having voted, that an elector was a voter at a meeting or election which he did not attend. But in a statute providing that a majority of the legal voters of a school district may determine the money to be levied and collected, if the Legislature had intended a majority of the "qualified electors" of the district, they would have undoubtedly used those words, instead of the words "legal voters." Sanford v. Prentice, 28 Wis. 358, 362; Bergevin v. Curtz, 59 Pac. 312, 313, 127 Cal. 86.

ELECTRIC.

The term "electric," as used in the phrase "electric smelting," in itself carries the idea of fusing and electrolyzing, both being its well-known functions. Cowles Electric Smelting & Aluminum Co. v. Lowrey (U. S.) 79 Fed. 331, 343.

A contract of assignment conveying any and all discoveries and inventions relating to "electric smelting processes" and furnaces does not embrace processes solely electrolytic. Lowrey v. Cowles Electric Smelting & Aluminum Co. (U. S.) 68 Fed. 354, 371.

ELECTRIC ARC.

The flow of electric current over an air gap caused by the interruption of the continuity of the circuit by throwing open a bridge connecting the two stationary terminals connected to the opposite branches of a circuit is called an "electric arc," and is "mainly a stream of metallic vapor" which comes from the fusing and vaporizing of the contacts or of the electrodes, for an electric arc "is the source of an intense heat and light." Thomson-Houston Electric Co. v. Nassau Electric R. Co. (U. S.) 107 Fed. 277, 278, 46 C. C. A. 263.

ELECTRIC LIGHT PLANT.

"Plant," as defined in Houston's Electrical Dictionary, is a word sometimes used for installation, or for the apparatus required for carry on any manufacturing operation. An "electric plant" includes the steam engines or other prime motors, the generating dynamo or dynamos, the lamps and other electro-receptive devices, and the circuit connected therewith. Fisher Electric Co. v. Bath Iron Works, 74 N. W. 493, 494, 116 Mich. 293.

Poles.

In an action for personal injuries caused by the falling of a telegraph pole on which plaintiff was working, it was said that a telegraph pole may properly be regarded as coming within the meaning of the word "plant" as used in the statute providing that a corporation shall be liable for injury to its employes when the injury is suffered by reason of a defect in the condition of the ways, works, plant, tools, and machinery. Cleveland, C., C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Scott, 64 N. E. 896, 900, 29 Ind. App. 519.

ELECTRICAL APPARATUS.

Apparatus of electric company, see "Apparatus."

ELECTRICAL PLANT.

In technical parlance, an "electrical plant" consists of dynamos, converters, switchboard, lamps, etc., with the necessary wiring and connections. John A. Roebling's Sons Co. v. Humboldt Electric Light & Power Co., 44 Pac. 568, 112 Cal. 288.

ELECTRICITY.

"Electricity" is defined by the Imperial Dictionary as the name given to the series of phenomena exhibited by various substances, and also to the phenomena themselves. We are totally ignorant of the nature of this cause—whether it be a material agent, or merely a property of matter. But as some hypothesis is necessary for explaining the phenomena observed, it has been assumed to be a highly subtle, imponderable fluid, identical with lightning, which pervades the power of all bodies, and is capable of motion from one body to another. Electricity, when accumulated in large quantities, becomes an agent capable of producing the most sudden, violent, and destructive effects, as in thunder storms; and even in its quiescent state it is extensively concerned in the operation of nature." Spensley v. Lancashire Ins. Co., 11 N. W. 894, 897, 54 Wis. 433.

"Whatever electricity may be, it seems to be absolutely within the power and under the control of the company that brings it into being. It is compelled by the process employed to come into being. It is secured, stored, poured out, or liberated at will. Its manifestations are both seen and felt. It moves with incredible velocity and power. It carries the tones and inflections of the human voice, or moves loaded cars, depending on the volume of the current and the manner of its application. It may be in the hands of the physician a soothing remedial agent, and in the hands of the law an instrument of execution, swifter and surer than the headsman's ax. It may be too early to say just what it is. * * * We have no need to decide that question." Commonwealth v. Northern Electric Light & Power Co., 22 Atl. 839, 840, 145 Pa. 105, 14 L. R. A. 107.

ELECTRODE.

"Electrode," as used in the claim for a patent for an electric-lighting gas-burner, a magnet for turning the gas cock by one electric impulse, combined with a fixed electrode and a movable electrode, normally in contact, and mechanism connecting the armature with the movable electrode, means the platinum or other metal point constituting the poles of the circuit. "The Century Dictionary defines it as a pole of the current from an electric battery, applied generally to the two ends of an open circuit. Webster's International Dictionary gives the following definition: 'The path by which electricity is conveyed into or from a solution or other conducting medium, especially the ends of the wires or conductors leading from the source of electricity, and terminating in the medium traversed by the currents.' All the other definitions agree that electrodes are simply the poles of an open electric circuit, and that the poles are the ends of the two wires, or the points of the wires." California Electrical Works v. Henzel (U. S.) 48 Fed. 375, 378.

ELECTROLYSIS.

"Electrolysis," as used in connection with metallurgical operations, takes place whenever a current of electricity of sufficient quantity and intensity is passed through a chemical compound in a fluid condition as to cause a chemical disruption thereof, the result being that one of the elements will go to the anode, or the place at which the current enters the fluid mass, and the other will go to the cathode, or place where the current leaves it. If the compound treated is metallic, the metal element will gather at the cathode, while the other will go to the anode. Lowrey v. Cowles Electric Smelting & Aluminum Co. (U. S.) 68 Fed. 354, 366.

ELECTRO-METALLURGY.

"Electro-metallurgy" is a term characterizing all processes in which electricity is applied to the working of metals. Electrotyping and electroplating are branches of electro-metallurgy. Edison Electric Light Co. v. Westinghouse (U. S.) 55 Fed. 490, 508.

ELEEMOSYNARY.

Charitable synonymous, see "Charity."

"Eleemosynary" means, according to Blackstone, something constituted for the perpetual distribution of alms or bounty of the founder. Cresson v. Cresson (U. S.) 6 Fed. Cas. 807, 809.

Eleemosynary corporations "are such as are constituted for the perpetual distribution of the free alms and bounty of the founder, in such manner as he has directed; and in this class are ranged hospitals for the relief of poor and impotent persons, and colleges for the promotion of learning and piety, and the support of persons engaged in literary pursuits." Dartmouth College Trustees v. Woodward, 17 U. S. (4 Wheat.) 518, 667, 4 L. Ed. 629 (quoting Bl. Comm.); Trustees of Phillips Academy v. King, 12 Mass. 546, 557; Robertson v. Bullions (N. Y.) 9 Barb. 64, 89; Beckman v. People (N. Y.) 27 Barb. 260, 306; Williams v. Williams, 8 N. Y. (4 Seld.) 525, 533; Board of Education v. Bakewell, 10 N. E. 378, 381, 122 Ill. 339; American Asylum v. Phoenix Bank, 4 Conn. 172, 177, 10 Am. Dec. 112.

An "eleemosynary corporation" is a private charity constituted for the perpetual distribution of the alms and bounty of the founder. In this class are ranked hospitals for the relief of poor, sick, and impotent persons, and colleges and academies established for the promotion of learning and piety, and endowed with property by public and private donations. Allen v. McKean (U. S.) 1 Fed. Cas. 489, 497 (citing 2 Kent, Comm. [2d Ed.] Lecture 23, p. 274); People v. Fitch, 47 N. E. 983, 988, 154 N. Y. 14, 38 L. R. A. 591.

In Angel & Ames on Corporations, it is said: "Eleemosynary corporations are such as are instituted upon a principle of charity, their object being the perpetual distribution of the bounty of the founder of them to such persons as he has directed. Of this kind are hospitals for the relief of the impotent, indigent, and sick, or deaf and dumb. And of this kind also are all colleges and academies which are founded where assistance is given to the members thereof in order to enable them to prosecute their studies or devotion with ease and assiduity." Section 39. Morawetz, in his work on Corporations, says: "The distinguishing feature of charitable corporations is that they are formed for the administration of charitable trusts, and not for the profit of the corporators themselves." Section 4. An institution for the blind, incorporated for the purpose of instructing children who were born blind, or who may have become blind by disease or accident, and affording an asylum for other blind persons, and which was authorized by subsequent acts of the Legislature to receive certain indigent blind persons whose expenses should be paid by the state, and which received certain moneys from the state for the enlarging and improving of its buildings, though partially educational, is also to some extent a charitable or "eleemosynary" institution. People v. Fitch, 47 N. E. 983, 988, 154 N. Y. 14, 38 L. R. A. 591.

In the case of Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 17 U. S. (4 Wheat.) 518, 641, 642, 4 L. Ed. 629, Marshall, C. J., said that a college which was founded to promote the spreading of Christian knowledge among the savages was an "eleemosynary institution incorporated for the purpose of perpetuating the application of the bounty of the donors to the specified objects of that bounty," and further on he says that the "consideration of the gifts of the donors was the perpetual application of the fund to its object in the mode prescribed by them." Williams v. Williams, 8 N. Y. (4 Seld.) 525, 533.

The establishment of an institution for the dissemination of learning has always been considered a charity. American Asylum v. Phoenix Bank, 4 Conn. 172, 177, 10 Am. Dec. 112.

Blackstone says that the universities of Cambridge and Oxford are not eleemosynary corporations, though stipends are annexed to particular magistrates and professors, any more than any other corporations where the acting officers have standing salaries, for these are rewards pro opere et labore, not charitable donations only, since every stipend is preceded by service and duty. Those institutions are considered of this kind where the plan is one of bounty, charity, and benevolence to others, not those which are for the use of, and beneficial and make return to, the donors. Robertson v. Bullions (N. Y.) 9 Barb. 64, 89.

Where a trust was created for the furthering of an educational institution, it was contended that it was void as creating a perpetuity which did not come within the exception of the Constitution forbidding perpetuity except for "eleemosynary" purposes. It was argued that "eleemosynary" pertains exclusively to almsgiving; that alms are given to the poor; and that consequently the Constitution never meant to permit perpetuities for strictly educational purposes. But the court said: "It is quite true that the word 'eleemosynary' comes to us from a Greek word meaning alms. But while it is always interesting to note the origin and first meanings of words, this knowledge is frequently more curious than valuable. Words by use are sometimes degraded, sometimes ennobled, sometimes narrowed in meaning, sometimes broadened. And 'eleemosynary' has come in the law to be interchangeable with the word 'charitable,' thus including an educational institution." People v. Cogswell, 45 Pac. 270, 271, 113 Cal. 129, 35 L. R. A. 269.

The term "eleemosynary" includes a charitable purpose (People v. Cogswell, 113 Cal. 129, 130, 45 Pac. 270, 35 L. R. A. 269), as used in Const. art. 20, § 9, providing that no perpetuity shall be allowed except for eleemosynary purposes. In re Gay's Estate, 71 Pac. 707, 708, 138 Cal. 552, 94 Am. St. Rep. 70.

ELEEMOSYNARY CHARITY.

The term "eleemosynary charity" includes a bequest for the establishment of an orphan asylum and a hospital for sick and infirm persons, which is unsectarian and not limited by any religious restrictions or limitations. If the bequest is so limited, it is not such a charity. Attorney General v. Moore's Ex'rs, 19 N. J. Eq. (4 C. E. Green) 503, 506.

ELEGIT.

By the writ of "elegit" authorized by ancient statute, the sheriff is commanded to take the personal property of a debtor and to appraise the same, and to deliver it at its appraised value to the creditor, and also to deliver to the creditor formerly one-half, and now by recent statute the whole of the judgment debtor's freehold estate of which he was seised at the time of the docketing of the judgment. North American Fire Ins. Co. v. Graham, 7 N. Y. Super. Ct. (5 Sandf.) 197, 200.

ELEMENTARY SCHOOL.

An "elementary school" is a school in which instruction and training are given in spelling, reading, writing, arithmetic, English grammar and composition, geography, and history of the United States, including civil government and physiology. Bates' Ann. St. Ohio 1904, § 4007—1.

ELEMENTS.

Strictly speaking, "elements" are the ultimate, indecomposable parts, which unite to form anything, as gases which form air and water are elements respectively of those substances. Van Wormer v. Crane, 16 N. W. 686, 687, 51 Mich. 363, 47 Am. Rep. 582.

A lease provided that the tenants covenanted to repair the premises, but that damages by the elements or acts of Providence were excepted from its operation, and it was contended that damages by the "elements" had a different signification than the term "acts of Providence" or "acts of God"; but the court held that those acts are to be regarded in the legal sense as an act of God which did not happen through human agency, such as storms, lightning, tempests, but that if injury is sustained in any way through the intervention of man it is not an act of God, and that since the elements are means through which God acts, the damage by the elements was synonymous with and a correlative term with "act of God" or "act of Providence" as used in the laws. Polack v. Pioche, 35 Cal. 416, 423, 95 Am. Dec. 115.

"Damage by the elements," as the term is ordinarily used in the exception in a lessee's covenant to keep in repair, means injuries to buildings by wind, rain, frost, and heat, and all the ordinary decay from natural causes. Anciently it was supposed there were four elements of material things—earth, air, fire, and water; and, when it came to be known that this classification had no scientific basis, the term had found a place in common speech which it still retains. As so understood the phrase "damage by the elements" would include any damage from purely natural causes, as a destruction by fire. Van Wormer v. Crane, 16 N. W. 686, 687, 51 Mich. 363, 47 Am. Rep. 582.

As used in a lease providing that, where the leased building shall be destroyed or so injured by the elements or other cause as to be untenable, the lessee shall not be liable for further rent, "elements or other cause" means some sudden and unexpected injury, and does not refer to mere decay. Hatch v. Stamper, 42 Conn. 28, 30.

A lease providing that the premises shall be rendered in good condition, etc., damages by the "elements" excepted, refers to some sudden, unusual, or unexpected action of the elements, such as floods, tornadoes, or the like, and does not include the percolation of water through sidewalks. Harris v. Corlies, 41 N. W. 940, 941, 40 Minn. 106, 2 L. R. A. 349.

"Damage by the elements" is the equivalent of the phrase "act of God"; hence, where a warehouseman contracted to deliver wheat, "damages by the elements excepted," it was no defense for his failure to deliver that the warehouse had been partly destroyed by fire of incendiary origin without negligence on his part. Pope v. Farmers' Union & Milling Co., 62 Pac. 384, 130 Cal. 139.

ELEVATED RAILROAD.

As a street railroad, see "Street Railroad."

An "elevated railroad," properly speaking, is one which is placed above the surface of the street which is used by the general public. State v. Superior Court of King County, 70 Pac. 484, 485, 30 Wash. 232.

ELEVATOR.

See "Floating Elevator"; "Through Elevators."

As common carrier of passengers, see "Common Carrier of Passengers."

The term "elevators" is used to designate warehouses for the storage and ready shipment of grain. Erie County v. Erie & W. Transp. Co., 87 Pa. 434, 437.

Under a policy insuring a "steam power elevator building and additions, with porches and platforms attached," a warehouse standing within 2½ feet of the elevator building and about the same size as the elevator, and fastened to the elevator by strips of board nailed upon each building, and used exclusively for storing grain, which was first received into the elevator and then spouted into the warehouse through two spouts which extended from one building to the other, and was taken from the warehouse by a conveyor running under the warehouse and elevator, no grain being received into or discharged from the warehouse except through the elevator, and there being no means of entrance into the warehouse except through a window, which was reached by a ladder or by cleats nailed onto the side of the building, such warehouse was in effect merely a bin of the elevator building, and covered by the policy. Cargill v. Millers' & Mfrs.' Mut. Ins. Co., 22 N. W. 6, 33 Minn. 90.

ELEVEN O'CLOCK.

Where a notice of a sale under a trust deed stated that the sale would take place at the hour of "eleven o'clock" of a certain day, and the sale was not made at 11 o'clock, but at half past 11, it was apt time under the notice, inasmuch as 11 o'clock should be construed to mean until it was 12. McGovern v. Mutual Life Ins. Co., 109 Ill. 151, 155.

ELIGIBLE.

"Eligible" is defined "by law and other standard lexicographers thus: Black: 'Capable of being chosen; competency to hold office.' Bouvier and Anderson: 'This term relates to the capacity of holding, as well as that of being elected to, an office.' Abbott: 'The term "eligible to office" relates to the capacity of holding as well as the capacity of being elected.' 19 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 397: 'Capacity of being chosen, implying competency to hold office, if chosen.' Worcester: 'Legally qualified; capable of being legally chosen.' Webster: 'That may be selected; legally qualified to be elected to hold office.' Some law-writers define the word as legally qualified; as eligible to office; legally qualified to hold office; electible; proper to be chosen; qualified to be elected." Demaree v. Scates, 32 Pac. 1123, 1124, 50 Kan. 275, 20 L. R. A. 97, 34 Am. St. Rep. 113.

The term "eligible," as applied to candidates for office, means capable of being chosen, the subject of selection or choice; and also implying competency to hold the office, if chosen. Carroll v. Green, 47 N. E. 223, 224, 148 Ind. 362.

The word "eligible," in Const. art. 14, § 8, refers to the capacity to be elected or chosen to office as well as to hold office. State v. Moores, 73 N. W. 299, 304, 52 Neb. 770.

Const. art. 4, § 9, declares that no person holding any lucrative office under the government of the United States or in power shall be eligible to any civil office of profit under the state. Held, that the word "eligible" meant both incapable of being legally chosen and incapable of legally holding. State v. Clarke, 3 Nev. 566, 570.

As applicable to appointive offices.

"Eligible," as used in Const. art. 4, § 9, providing that no person holding any lucrative office under the government of the United States or any other power shall be eligible to any civil office of profit under the state, refers not only to elective officers, but to appointed officers as well. It includes capacity to hold office as well as to be elected to an office, and there is no distinction between elective and appointive offices. If the incumbent is ineligible to hold an office, it can make no difference whether he obtained it in the first instance by election or appointment. State v. Clarke, 31 Pac. 545, 546, 21 Nev. 333, 18 L. R. A. 313, 37 Am. St. Rep. 517.

As capable of being chosen.

"Eligible," as used in Const. art. 7, § 7, providing that every person entitled to vote at any election shall be eligible to any office which now is or may hereafter be elective, means proper to be chosen, qualified to be elected. Taylor v. Sullivan, 47 N. W. 802, 803, 45 Minn. 309, 11 L. R. A. 272, 22 Am. St. Rep. 729.

Etymologically, the meaning of "eligible" is capable of being chosen, and therefore denotes a condition existing at the time of choosing, whether by election or by appointment. This is the accurate meaning of the term, and the primary definition given by all lexicographers. But in some dictionaries a secondary definition is given of the word, as legally qualified. It must also be conceded that often, not only colloquially, but also in judicial opinions, the word is used in this latter sense. In Searcy v. Grow, 15 Cal. 118, the Constitution providing that no person holding any lucrative office under the United States or any other power shall be eligible to any civil office of profit under the state, it was held that the election of a postmaster to the office of a sheriff was not rendered valid by his resignation as postmaster before commencement of the term as sheriff. It was said that we understand that the term "eligible" means capable of being chosen; the subject of selection or choice. And as used in the statute providing that no county treasurer, superintendent of the poor, school commissioner, etc., shall be eligible to the office of supervisor of any town or ward in this state, the word "eligible" will be taken in its meaning as capable of election and appointment. So that no one can be elected supervisor unless he is eligible at the time of his election. People v. Purdy, 47 N. Y. Supp. 601, 602, 21 App. Div. 66.

"Eligible," as used in Const. art. 5, § 2, providing that no person shall be eligible to the office of Governor who shall not have attained the age of 30 years and been for 2 years next preceding his election a citizen of the United States and of the state, and that none of the officers of the executive department shall be eligible to any other state office during the period for which they shall have been elected, means "qualified to be chosen, legally qualified for election or appointment." State v. Boyd, 48 N. W. 739, 745, 31 Neb. 682.

As capable of holding office.

The word "eligible," as used in Gen. St. 1889, p. 1622, providing that persons holding any state, county, township, or city office, or any employer, officer, or stockholder in any railroad in which the county owns stock, shall not be eligible to the office of county commissioner, means legally qualified; that is, capable of holding the office. It does not mean eligible to be elected to the office of county commissioner at the date of the election, but eligible or legally qualified to hold the office after the election; that is, at the commencement of the term of office. Demaree v. Scates, 32 Pac. 1123, 1124, 50 Kan. 275, 20 L. R. A. 97, 34 Am. St. Rep. 113.

Const. art. 7, § 16, declares no person elected to any judicial office shall, during the term for which he is elected, be eligible to any office of trust or profit under the state other than a judicial one. Held, that the word "eligible" means legally qualified, and the ineligibility referred to the right and fitness to be inducted into and discharge the duties of an office other than a judicial one, and did not refer to the right to be voted for. Smith v. Moore, 90 Ind. 294, 297.

"Eligible to any office," as used in Const. art. 10, § 2, providing that no holder of public moneys shall be eligible to any office until he shall have paid over any moneys in his hands, means eligible to hold the office, and does not refer to the election. If a person is eligible to hold the office when the time for induction into office arrives, he may take the office though not eligible to hold the office when elected. The words "eligible to any office" refer to the capacity to hold the office; the term "eligible" means legally qualified. Shuck v. State, 35 N. E. 993, 995, 136 Ind. 63.

"Eligible," as used in Rev. St. c. 24, par. 34, declaring that no person shall be eligible to the office of alderman if he be in arrears of any tax or liability due the city, means legally qualified, and refers to the office, and not to the election. And hence, though one be disqualified at the time of his election, he may take the office if the disqualification be removed before the commencement of the term. People v. Hamilton, 24 Ill. App. 609, 612 (citing State v. Murray, 28 Wis. 96, 9 Am. Rep. 489).

The word "eligible" is variously defined as "proper to be chosen," "legally qualified as eligible to office." Primarily the word, which is from the Latin "eligere" (to elect), means "capable of being elected," or, if we may temporarily coin a word, "eligible" means "electible." As used in Const. § 100, providing that no person shall be eligible to the office of clerk unless he shall have procured from a judge of the Court of Appeals a certificate that he has been examined by the clerk of his court and that he is qualified for the office, the words "eligible to the office" mean legally qualified to hold the office. Kirkpatrick v. Brownfield, 31 S. W. 137, 138, 97 Ky. 558, 29 L. R. A. 703, 53 Am. St. Rep. 422.

"Eligible," as used in Const. art. 4, § 20, providing that no person holding any lucrative office under the United States or any other power shall be eligible to any civil office of profit under the state, means eligible to hold office as well as to be elected to office, and disqualifies a person from holding an office under the state after he had received and entered on the duties under a lucrative federal appointment. People v. Leonard, 14 Pac. 853, 73 Cal. 230.

Qualified distinguished.

The word "eligible," when used in speaking of a candidate for office as being "eligible," means capable of being chosen, while "qualified" means the performance of the acts which the person chosen is required to perform before he can enter into office. Bradley v. Clark, 65 Pac. 395, 396, 133 Cal. 196; State v. Bemenderfer, 96 Ind. 374, 376.

ELISOR.

An "elisor" is a person appointed to perform certain duties pertaining to certain officers when the latter are disqualified. He was originally confined to the duty of returning a jury in the event of such disqualification, but in some states his duties are extended to the service of other process, but only in the event of the disqualification of some other officer. If the sheriff be not an indifferent person, as if he be a party to the suit, or be related, either by blood or affinity, to either of the parties, he is not then trusted to return the jury, but the venire shall be directed to the coroners, who in this, as in many other instances, are the substitutes of the sheriff to execute process when he is deemed an improper person. If any exception lies to the coroners, the venire shall be directed to two clerks of the court, or two persons of the county, named by the court, and sworn. And these two, who are called "elisors" or "electors," shall indifferently name the jury, etc. Bruner v. Superior Court of City and County of San Francisco, 28 Pac. 341, 343, 92 Cal. 239.

ELIZA.

"Eliza" is a commonly used abbreviation of "Elizabeth," and judicial notice will be taken of such fact. Goodell v. Hall, 87 S. E. 725, 112 Ga. 435.

ELLEN.

The name "Ellen" is one universally applied to females only, and indicates that the person to whom it is applied is a female. Taylor v. Commonwealth (Va.) 20 Grat. 825, 828.

"Ellen" is not commonly used as meaning the same as "Helen," nor is it an abbreviation or corruption of "Helen." They have been generally known and recognized as different and distinct, and are not commonly or indiscriminately used as the same. Thomas v. Desney, 10 N. W. 315, 316, 57 Iowa, 58.

ELOIGNMENT.

"Eloignement" is the taking away beyond the jurisdiction of a court, or the concealing of the object matter. Garneau v. Port Blakeley Mill Co., 86 Pac. 463, 465, 8 Wash. 467.

ELOPEMENT.

To constitute an "elopement" which will forfeit a wife's right of dower, she must not only leave the husband, but go beyond his actual control. Hence a wife did not forfeit her dower by living in adultery during the life of her husband while he was absent, where it did not appear that she had left her husband and departed and dwelt with the adulterer, for there was no "elopement." Cogswell v. Tibbetts, 3 N. H. 41, 42.

ELSEWHERE.

"Elsewhere" as used in shipping articles for a voyage from Boston to the Pacific, Indian, and Chinese Oceans, or elsewhere on a trading voyage, is an indefinite expression, and cannot control or extend the meaning of the other certain description of the voyage, or constitute of itself a sufficient description. Brown v. Jones (U. S.) 4 Fed. Cas. 405.

A devise of all the testator's lands in Littleton, Marston, and Millbrook, or "elsewhere," passed lands of greater value in another county. The word "elsewhere" was the most significant, sensible, and comprehensive word that could be used for that purpose, and was equivalent to naming the lands. Chester v. Chester, 3 P. Wms. 56, 61.

As ejusdem generis.

"Elsewhere," as used in an ordinance making it criminal to make, aid, maintain, or assist in any improper noise, riot, disturbance, or breach of the peace in the streets or highways, or elsewhere within the city, is to be construed in connection with the words "streets and highways," and must be regarded as "signifying places ejusdem generis; namely, parks, squares, and places frequented by the public." State v. City of Camden, 19 Atl. 539, 540, 52 N. J. Law (23 Vroom) 289.

The word "elsewhere," as used in Pen. Code, § 240, subd. 2, punishing a person who entices an unmarried female "into a house of ill fame or of assignation or elsewhere for the purpose" of prostitution, means a place similar in character to a house of ill fame or of assignation. State v. McCrum, 38 Minn. 154, 156, 36 N. W. 102.

As without.

"Elsewhere," as used in a memorandum of association of a company providing that its object was to purchase or otherwise acquire and work in mines, minerals and mining rights, lands, hereditaments, and chattels in the state of Missouri or elsewhere, means elsewhere than in the state of Missouri, and therefore the business in the purchase and operation of mines is not restricted to Missouri. Missouri Lead Mining & Smelting Co. v. Reinhard, 21 S. W. 488, 490, 114 Mo. 218, 35 Am. St. Rep. 746.

EMANCIPATION.

Emancipation is an act by which a person who was once in the power of another is rendered free. Town of Fremont v. Town of Sandown, 56 N. H. 300, 303 (citing Bouv. Law Dict.).

Emancipation, under the pauper law, exists when the minor contracts a new relation inconsistent with being a part of the family. Town of Sherburne v. Town of Hartland, 37 Vt. 528, 529; Wells v. Westhaven, 5 Vt. 322, 326; Town of Tunbridge v. Town of Eden, 39 Vt. 17, 20.

A child is not emancipated by separation from his parents until he is of age, has married, or has contracted a relation inconsistent with the relation of parent and child, and by which, therefore, the parent loses all authority over him. Overseers of Poor of Bradford v. Overseers of Poor of Lunenburg, 5 Vt. 481, 490 (citing Rex v. Inhabitants of Edgworth, 3 Term R. 353).

To "emancipate" is to release, to set free. It need not be evidenced by any formal or required act. It may be proven by direct proof or by circumstances. To free a child for all the period of minority from care and custody, control and service, would be a general emancipation; but to free him from only a part of the period of minority, or from only a part of the parents' lives, would be limited. Porter v. Powell, 44 N. W. 295, 297, 79 Iowa, 151, 7 L. R. A. 176, 18 Am. St. Rep. 353.

"Emancipation" is the act by which he who was not free, but under the control of another, is set at liberty and made his own master; thus, the release of a child from the duty to serve and obey his parent. It is a general rule that the emancipation of a child is when he leaves his father's house to seek his own fortune. Overseers of Poor of Alexandria Tp. v. Overseers of Poor of Bethlehem Tp., 16 N. J. Law (1 Har.) 119, 123, 31 Am. Dec. 229.

The right of action for a minor's services is presumed to be in the father. But the father may voluntarily relinquish this right to the child. This is called "emancipation."

This agreement may be expressed, or implied from the circumstances. Thus, where it appeared that a father told his son that he could have all he made, the emancipation was express. In re Dunavant (U. S.) 96 Fed. 542, 547.

An agreement by a father with his minor child to relinquish to the child the right which he would otherwise have in his services, and authorizing those employing him to pay him his wages, constitutes emancipation. Varney v. Young, 11 Vt. 258, 259.

Becoming of age.

It is a general rule that attaining the age of 21 years is not ipso facto emancipation of a child from his father, although at that age a child may emancipate himself by separating from his father. Overseers of Poor of Alexandria Tp. v. Overseers of Poor of Bethlehem Tp., 16 N. J. Law (1 Har.) 119, 123.

Consent to adoption.

The new relation inconsistent with the relation of parent and child which constitutes emancipation may be contracted by the minor by consent of his parents, as in case of marriage, or, if the minor be an infant, the new relation may be contracted by his parents for the infant. "In order to constitute emancipation of an infant, it must appear that his parents have absolutely transferred all their right to the care and control of the infant and all their right to his services, and that the person to whom such rights are transferred has accepted the infant as his own and agreed to stand in loco parentis. It should clearly appear that such was the intention of the parties. Where parents gave a pauper about 18 months old to a suitable person to keep as his own child, the gift being absolute, depending on no condition or contingency, the breach or happening of which would restore the child to his natural parents, or revive their right to his services or their right to the control of his person, the donee receiving the child for the purpose and with the intention of keeping him as his own child, and continuing to keep and care for him for about four years, during which time the infant was a member of his family and subject to his care, control, and authority, there was an emancipation of such child." Town of Tunbridge v. Town of Eden, 39 Vt. 17, 20.

Consent to enlistment.

The consent of a father to his minor son's enlistment into the military service of the government is a virtual emancipation or discharge of the minor from all obligations of service or obedience to the father, so long, at least, as the enlistment contract exists. Baker v. Baker, 41 Vt. 55, 57.

Gift of earnings.

"The significance of the word 'emancipation' is not exact, and is used sometimes to signify the mere gift by a father to his son of the latter's earnings, and sometimes to signify the complete severance, so far as legal rights and liabilities extend, of the parental relationship." The mere gift by a father to a son of the son's earnings does not operate as a complete severance of all the mutual rights and duties arising out of the relationship of parent and child, so as to relieve the father from liability for the son's act. Dunks v. Grey (U. S.) 3 Fed. 862, 865.

Living separate.

A mere residence with another, separate from the family of the parent, is not emancipation, nor is a minor's living separate from his mother from the age of 16 until he was 21, emancipation. Town of Sherburne v. Town of Hartland, 37 Vt. 528, 529.

Marriage.

Marriage emancipates the child, for it is a new relation inconsistent with subjection to the control and care of the parent. The husband becomes the head of a new family. His new relations to his wife and children create obligations and duties which require him to be master of himself, his time, his labor, earnings, and conduct. He can no longer be subject to the control of his parents. Town of Sherburne v. Town of Hartland, 37 Vt. 528, 529.

The marriage of a minor daughter is an emancipation from the power of her parents, for thereby her husband became seised of any estate of inheritance belonging to her, acquired the power to sue for and reduce to possession choses in action due her, became answerable for her debts contracted before coverture, became bound to maintain her with necessaries, and became liable for her torts committed during coverture, and was entitled to her society and the benefit of her services to the entire exclusion of her father. Town of Fremont v. Town of Sandown, 56 N. H. 300, 303.

EMBANKMENT.

"Embankment," in its common, usual, and accepted meaning, imports a ridge of earth of sufficient height and base to form a serious obstruction to a highway, if raised across its passage. State v. Day, 52 Ind. 483, 485.

Embankments, except for retaining walls, are normally made of earth, not rock. Curley v. Chosen Freeholders of Hudson County, 49 Atl. 471, 473, 66 N. J. Law, 401.

As part of bridge.

See "Bridge."

Levee synonyms.

"Embankment" is defined to be "an artificial bank or mound of earth." Webster. It is not synonymous with the term "levee." Every levee is an embankment, but every embankment is not a levee. State ex rel. City of New Orleans v. New Orleans & N. E. R. Co., 7 South. 226, 228, 42 La. Ann. 138.

Ties of railroad included.

In General Railroad Law Feb. 19, 1849 (P. L. 83) § 10, providing that, whenever any company shall locate its road in and on any street or alley in any city or borough, ample compensation shall be made to the owners of lots fronting on such street or alley for any damages sustained by reason of any embankment made in the construction of such road, "embankment," should be construed to include the ties used by the railroad company in the construction of such railway, and the ballasting or filling in between the same. Pittsburgh, V. & C. R. Co. v. Rose, 74 Pa. (24 P. F. Smith) 362, 363.

EMBARGO.

"Embargo" is defined to be a prohibition to sail. The William King, 15 U. S. (2 Wheat.) 148, 153, 4 L. Ed. 206.

An "embargo" is a restraint and detention by public authority. Delano v. Bedford Ins. Co., 10 Mass. 347, 351, 6 Am. Dec. 132.

An "embargo" is as much a restraint and detention, although it amounts to nothing more than a legal prohibition against the sailing of the vessel, as if she were taken into the custody of the officers of the government, and were deprived of all the means of removing from the wharf. King v. Delaware Ins. Co. (U. S.) 14 Fed. Cas. 516, 518.

"Embargo," ex vi termini, means only a temporary suspension of trade. A general and permanent prohibition of trade would not be an embargo. An embargo is not required to be definite as to time on the face of the act. It is frequently otherwise. McBride v. Marine Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 5 Johns. 299, 308.

EMBARRASSED.

The word "embarrassed," in its application to a man's financial condition or standing, ordinarily means incumbered with debt; beset with urgent claims and demands; unable to meet his pecuniary engagements, etc. It is substantially of the same meaning as the words "bad circumstances," "insolvent," "unworthy of credit," and is libelous. Hayes v. Press Co., 18 Atl. 331, 332, 127 Pa. 642, 5 L. R. A. 643, 14 Am. St. Rep. 874.

EMBEZZLE—EMBEZZLEMENT.

As used in Gen. St. c. 118, § 107, providing for the commitment to jail by a judge of insolvent persons who have refused to submit themselves to an examination on oath on a complaint made to him on oath that they were suspected of having fraudulently concealed, embezzled, and conveyed away the money, goods, effects, and estate of an insolvent debtor, "embezzled" cannot be construed as referring to a criminal embezzlement. Its meaning is rather to be found in the words with which it is connected, and as importing an act which is a violation of a civil right, and not the technical offense of embezzlement in the statute. Sawin v. Martin, 93 Mass. (11 Allen) 439, 440.

The terms "larceny" and "embezzlement" in a bond conditioned to reimburse an employer for such pecuniary loss as he may sustain by any act of fraud or dishonesty, amounting to larceny or embezzlement, committed by a designated employé, are used as generic terms to indicate the dishonest and fraudulent breach of any duty or obligation upon the part of an employé to pay over to his employer, or account to him for, any money, securities, or other personal property, the title to which is in the employer, that may in any manner come into the possession of the employé. Champion Ice Mfg. & Cold-Storage Co. v. American Bonding & Trust Co., 75 S. W. 197, 198, 25 Ky. Law Rep. 239.

The word "embezzlement," as used in a bond insuring a firm against any pecuniary loss from the fraudulent or dishonest acts of its agents amounting to embezzlement, means embezzlement as defined in the criminal law, and therefore, unless embezzlement is proven against the agent, the sureties on the bond are not liable for his acts. Reed v. Fidelity & Casualty Co., 42 Atl. 294, 189 Pa. 596.

Embezzlement is the fraudulent application by one of the money intrusted to his care by another. Thus, to say of a railway conductor that he failed to ring up the fares collected, does not necessarily imply that he embezzled the money. Pittsburgh, A. & M. Pass. Ry. Co. v. McCurdy, 8 Atl. 230, 232, 114 Pa. 554, 60 Am. St. Rep. 363.

As breach of trust.

"Embezzlement" is defined in Bouvier's Law Dictionary as "the fraudulent removing and secreting the personal property with which the party has been intrusted, for the purpose of applying it to his own use." People v. Belden, 37 Cal. 51, 53.

Embezzlement is the fraudulent appropriating to one's own use the money or goods intrusted to one's care and control by another. Fagnan v. Knox, 40 N. Y. Super. Ct. (8 Jones & S.) 41, 49.

"Embezzle" means the appropriation to one's self by a breach of trust of the property or money of another. The term necessarily imports fraud or breach of trust." Alleghany

County Sup'rs v. Van Campen (N. Y.) 3 Wend. 48, 53.

"Embezzle" means to appropriate fraudulently to one's own use; to apply to one's private use by a breach of trust, as to embezzle public money. State v. Sullivan, 21 South. 688, 689, 49 La. Ann. 197, 62 Am. St. Rep. 644.

The act of embezzlement consists of a fraudulent misappropriation by one of another's goods to his own use, or at least to depriving the true owner of them. Foster v. State (Del.) 43 Atl. 265, 267, 2 Pennewill, 111.

Embezzlement is where one fraudulently appropriates the property of another intrusted to his care, or fraudulently misapplies it, instead of applying it to its own proper purpose. State v. Foster (Del.) 40 Atl. 939, 942, 1 Pennewill, 289.

"Embezzlement," in its technical sense, most usually means a felonious appropriation by a servant of his master's property while it is in his keeping. And, where an act of Congress uses the word "embezzlement," it will be construed in its technical signification. United States v. Greve (U. S.) 65 Fed. 488, 489.

The word "embezzle" has a well-defined meaning. In the Century Dictionary it is defined as the act to steal slyly; to appropriate fraudulently to one's own use, as what is intrusted to one's care; apply to one's private use by a breach of trust, as a clerk or servant who misapplies his master's money or valuables. It is also defined as larceny by clerk or servant or agent; appropriation to one's own use of anything belonging to another, whether rightfully or wrongly in the possession of the taker; theft. State v. Trolson, 32 Pac. 930, 931, 21 Nev. 419.

"Embezzlement" is defined as the act of fraudulently appropriating to one's own use what is intrusted to the party's care and management. Chaplin v. Lee, 18 Neb. 440, 443, 25 N. W. 609 (quoting Webst. Dict.); McAleer v. State, 64 N. W. 358, 359, 46 Neb. 116; State v. Yeiter, 38 Pac. 320, 322, 54 Kan. 277; Taylor v. Kneeland (Mich.) 1 Doug. 67, 72.

"Embezzlement" is the fraudulent appropriation of property by a person to whom it has been intrusted. People v. Westlake, 57 Pac. 465, 466, 124 Cal. 452; Pen. Code Cal. § 503; Popple v. McMahon, 65 Pac. 571, 572, 133 Cal. 278; People v. Treadwell, 10 Pac. 502, 509, 69 Cal. 226; People v. De Coursey, 61 Cal. 134, 135; Gordon v. Eans, 11 S. W. 64, 67, 97 Mo. 587; In re Grin (U. S.) 112 Fed. 790, 796; Ex parte Hibbs (U. S.) 26 Fed. 421, 434; United States v. Harper (U. S.) 33 Fed. 471, 474; United States v. McClure (U. S.) 107 Fed. 268, 271; Moore v.

United States, 16 Sup. Ct. 294, 295, 160 U. S. 268, 40 L. Ed. 422; Mills v. State, 73 N. W. 761, 764, 53 Neb. 263; McAleer v. State, 64 N. W. 358, 359, 46 Neb. 116; Commonwealth v. Clifford, 27 S. W. 811, 96 Ky. 4; State v. Davis (Del.) 50 Atl. 99, 3 Pennewill, 220; State v. Winstandley, 58 N. E. 71, 72, 155 Ind. 290; Colip v. State, 55 N. E. 739, 741, 153 Ind. 584, 74 Am. St. Rep. 322; People v. Hill, 3 Pac. 75, 79, 3 Utah, 334; State v. Wolff, 34 La. Ann. 1153, 1154; State v. Collins, 61 N. W. 467, 4 N. D. 433; Commonwealth v. Scott (Pa.) 3 C. P. Rep. 98, 100; Golden v. State, 2 S. W. 531, 537, 22 Tex. App. 1.

"Embezzlement" is defined as the fraudulent appropriation or conversion of the property of another by any one who is intrusted with the possession. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co. v. Miller (Ky.) 71 S. W. 921, 922.

"Embezzlement" may be defined to be the appropriation to one's own use or benefit of property or moneys intrusted to him by another, such as the embezzlement by clerks, servants, and agents of their employer's money or property. 4 Bl. Comm. 230, 231. Under this definition the debt created by the conversion to an agent's own use of money received by him on a note taken for collection is a "debt created by embezzlement," within the meaning of section 33 of the bankruptcy act of 1867, providing that a discharge from bankruptcy shall not relieve the bankrupt from a debt created by embezzlement. Fulton v. Hammond (U. S.) 11 Fed. 291, 293.

Embezzlement involves two general ingredients or elements: First, a breach of trust or duty in respect to the moneys, property, and effects in the party's possession belonging to another; and, second, the wrongful appropriation thereof to his own use. United States v. Harper (U. S.) 33 Fed. 471, 474.

The essential elements of embezzlement are the fiduciary relation arising where one intrusts property to another, and the fraudulent appropriation of the property by the latter. People v. Gordon, 65 Pac. 746, 747, 133 Cal. 328.

The word "embezzle" implies the moral turpitude of a breach of trust equal to felonious taking. State v. Stevenson, 39 Atl. 471, 472, 91 Me. 107.

"Embezzlement" does not seem to have had any technical meaning at common law, and has been used to signify every kind of stealing; but when used in statutes it is almost, if not quite universally, confined to the misappropriation of property by those to whose care it has been confided as officers or agents. People v. McKinney, 10 Mich. 54, 109, 110.

"Embezzlement" is a species of larceny, and the term is applicable to cases of furtive and fraudulent appropriation by clerks, servants, or carriers of property coming into their possession by virtue of their employment. People v. Burr (N. Y.) 41 How. Prac. 293 294.

By the provision of Pen. Code, § 508, every clerk, agent, or servant of any person, who fraudulently appropriates to his own use, or secretes with a fraudulent intent to appropriate to his own use, any property of another which has come into his control or care by virtue of his employment as such clerk, agent, or servant, is guilty of embezzlement. People v. Tomlinson, 5 Pac. 509, 66 Cal. 344; People v. Gallagher, 35 Pac. 80, 100 Cal. 466. There are four positions of fact to be made out under this statute. (1) That the party was such a clerk, agent, or servant; (2) that he received the property of his principal; (3) that he received it in the course of his employment; (4) that he converted it to his own use with intent to steal. In re Grin (U. S.) 112 Fed. 790, 799.

To constitute the crime of embezzlement, the owner must be deprived of the property by an adverse use or holding. Chaplin v. Lee, 18 Neb. 440, 443, 25 N. W. 609.

Same—By bank officer.

The word "embezzle," in Rev. St. § 5209 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3497], providing that every president, director, cashier, etc., of any banking association who embezzles any moneys or makes any false entry with intent to injure or defraud the association or any person shall be deemed guilty, etc., is used to describe a crime which a person has an opportunity to commit by reason of some office or employment, and which is some breach of confidence or trust. United States v. Conant (U. S.) 25 Fed. Cas. 591.

The crime of embezzlement is a species of larceny. It is applicable to the unlawful conversion of property by clerks, agents, and servants acting in a fiduciary or trust capacity, and, under the United States statutes, by a president, director, cashier, teller, clerk, or agent of a national banking association. United States v. Harper (U. S.) 33 Fed. 471, 474; Same v. Lee (U. S.) 12 Fed. 816, 818.

As used in Rev. St. § 5209 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3497], providing that every president, director, cashier, teller, clerk, or agent of any association who embezzles any of the moneys, funds, or credits of the association shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, "embezzlement" means a crime which a person has the opportunity to commit by reason of some office or employment, which may include in its signification some breach of trust—some misuse of an opportunity of that sort. United States v. Conant (U. S.) 25 Fed. Cas. 591.

Embezzlement is the unlawful conversion by the officer of a bank, to his own use, of funds intrusted to him, with intent to injure or defraud the bank. United States v. Youtsey (U. S.) 91 Fed. 864, 867.

Same—By public officer.

If any person charged with the safe-keeping of public money converts the same to his own use, or loans any portion of such money, he shall be guilty of embezzlement. St. 1881, p. 82. State v. Nevin, 7 Pac. 650, 653, 19 Nev. 162, 3 Am. St. Rep. 873.

"Embezzlement" is defined in Rev. St. 1881, § 1942, to include conversion to one's own use, or that of another, of public funds intrusted to him. Winchester Electric Light Co. v. Veal, 41 N. E. 334, 145 Ind. 506.

The offense of "embezzlement" by a disbursing officer of the United States, as defined in Rev. St. § 5488 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3703], is broader than that defined in either the first, fourth, or ninth paragraph of the sixtieth article of war, and means such an offense as is generally understood where one having the money of another in his custody appropriates it to his own use with felonious intent, intending to deprive the true owner thereof. Carter v. McClaughry (U. S.) 105 Fed. 614, 619.

"Embezzle," as used in Crimes Act, § 148, providing for the punishment of any person holding an office of trust and profit under authority of the state, or any public or private corporation existing by the laws thereof, who shall embezzle any of the money, property, or securities committed to his keeping, with intent to defraud, means "to fraudulently appropriate to one's own use the property of another. It means a breach of trust." State v. Lyon, 45 N. J. Law (16 Vroom) 272, 274.

Pen. Code, § 504, declares that every officer, and every deputy clerk or servant of such officer, who fraudulently appropriates to any use or purpose not in the due and lawful execution of his trust any property which he has in his possession or under his control by virtue of his trust, or secretes it with a fraudulent intent to appropriate it to such use or purpose, is guilty of embezzlement. People v. Cobler, 41 Pac. 401, 403, 108 Cal. 538. Under such statute the fact that the officer charged with embezzlement of moneys of an association is a member of such association does not relieve the act from being an embezzlement. People v. Mahlman, 23 Pac. 145, 82 Cal. 585.

Embezzlement only occurs when an agent or servant converts to his own use property intrusted to his care and possession by his principal or employer. Thus where a postmaster issued postal money orders to a fictitious person, payable at a bank, and wrote to the bank in the name of such person directing that the money be collected and forwarded to him at another place in a registered package, and intercepted such package and appropriated the proceeds, he was not guilty of embezzlement, since the United States had never intrusted him with the money he obtained from the several postmasters on these false orders, or in any way gave him the possession thereof. Ex parte Hibbs (U. S.) 26 Fed. 421, 434.

By Hill's Ann. St. & Codes Wash. p. 913, § 1771, it is provided that any bailee who wrongfully converts to his own use the money or property of another delivered or intrusted to his care or control shall be deemed guilty of larceny and punished accordingly, this offense is generally called "embezzlement," and was not known at common law. United States v. Clark (U. S.) 76 Fed. 560, 561.

As common-law offense.

The crime of embezzlement is a statutory offense, and was unknown to common law. It is said that in the common-law definition of "larceny" there were two gaps through which, in the expansion of business, many criminals escaped. The first of these gaps was caused by the rule that, to sustain a charge of larceny, it was necessary that the stolen goods should have been at some time in the prosecutor's possession. The second was in the assumption that, when possession was acquired by a bailee, no subsequent fraudulent conversion constituted larceny while the bailment lasted. It was to meet these defects in the common law that statutes have been passed in most, if not all, of the states of our Union, in some of which an offense is created known as "embezzlement larceny," and in others, as in our own statute, designating the offense as "embezzlement." People v. Gallagher, 35 Pac. 80, 100 Cal. 466.

The first appearance of the crime of embezzlement is in St. 21 Hen. VIII, c. 7, which makes the conversion of property of a master by a servant embezzlement. This statute has undergone an immense amount of legislative patchwork both in England and this country, until finally the offense of conversion or embezzlement by a bailee has been evolved. United States v. Clark (U. S.) 76 Fed. 560, 561.

Embezzlement is an offense created by statute, in order to provide for deficiencies in the law of larceny. Embezzlement is not a common-law offense. The first statute on the subject was of the time of Henry the Eighth, in which the descriptive words were, "did embezzle or otherwise convert the money to his own use." State v. Wolff, 34 La. Ann. 1153, 1154.

Embezzlement was a felony at common law, of the same grade as larceny. That was when a servant fraudulently converted to his own use his master's goods of the value of 40 shillings, not having the actual possession, but only the care and oversight, of the goods. By St. 21 Hen. VIII, c. 7, the offense was extended to all cases of fraudulent conversion by a servant of the master's goods of the value of 40 shillings. This statute was enforced at the time of the settlement of our colonies, and so presumably became a part of the common law of this country. It was repealed in the time of George the Fourth. United States v. Cadwallader (U. S.) 59 Fed. 677, 680.

All authorities treat embezzlement as akin to larceny, and the statutory offense of embezzlement mainly originates in a necessity which resulted from the inapplicability of the common law of larceny to breaches of trust by persons occupying fiduciary relations. Golden v. State, 22 Tex. App. 14, 15, 2 S. W. 531, 537.

Embezzlement is the statutory expansion of common-law larceny made to prevent a failure of justice that would occur under the technical rules that the law had applied to larceny. It covers cases where the property which is the subject of the offense comes into the possession of the defendant without any technical trespass; in other words, where property is intrusted to the party. State v. Collins, 61 N. W. 467, 4 N. D. 433.

Embezzlement is a sort of statutory larceny committed by servants and other like persons where there is a trust reposed, and therefore no trespass, so that the act could not be larceny at the common law. State v. Trolson, 32 Pac. 930, 931, 21 Nev. 419; Commonwealth v. Clifford, 27 S. W. 811, 96 Ky. 4.

As descriptive of offense.

The word "embezzle" is defined as to appropriate or divert falsely to one's own use, as money and goods intrusted to one's care and control officially or by another; so that a complaint charging that a person "embezzled" money which had been intrusted to him charges all the elements necessary to constitute embezzlement, the word "embezzlement" having a significant meaning entirely descriptive of the offense. In re Grin (U. S.) 112 Fed. 790, 796; State v. Trolson, 32 Pac. 930, 931, 21 Nev. 419.

Embezzlement is purely a statutory offense, being unknown to common law, and in the statute of Oregon the acts which are generally included in embezzlement are termed "larceny," so that an indictment which states that defendant was guilty of "embezzlement" does not define the offense. In re Richter (U. S.) 100 Fed. 295, 297.

Embezzlement is the fraudulent removing and secreting of personal property, with which the party has been intrusted, for the purpose of applying it to his own use; so that a statement, in an order of arrest, that it was for a conversion of money embezzled or fraudulently misapplied by defendant while attorney for plaintiff's testator, merely gives a definition of the offense, and does not constitute a variance with a complaint alleging facts sufficient to constitute embezzlement. Quail v. Nelson, 56 N. Y. Supp. 865, 867, 39 App. Div. 18.

In United States v. Northway, 120 U. S. 327, 7 Sup. Ct. 580, 30 L. Ed. 664, the word "embezzle" was recognized as having a settled technical meaning of its own, like the words "steal, take, and carry away," as used to define the offense of larceny; and it was said that an allegation that a person "did embezzle and convert to his own use" sufficiently alleged that the moneys had come into the possession of the accused in his official character, so that he held them in trust for the use and benefit of the association, and hence sufficiently described the offense of embezzlement. But where an indictment charges the embezzlement of a certain sum of money belonging to the United States by defendant, a post-office employé, if the words charging the defendant with being such an employé are material, it must be averred that the money embezzled came into his hands by virtue of such employment, and the word "embezzle" is not sufficient for that purpose. Moore v. United States, 16 Sup. Ct. 294, 295, 160 U. S. 268, 40 L. Ed. 422.

"Embezzle," with or without the usual addition, 'convert to his use,' finds its definition in the text-books, and is of constant use in the statutes for the punishment of crimes. The words have a technical and popular significance, and plainly convey the wrongful appropriation of the property of another by the party intrusted with or who has possession of it under some trust, duty, or office." With this significance, couched in the appropriate technical terms, "embezzle" alone, and with "convert to his own use," is to be found in the crimes act of the United States, and notably in the familiar sections of the Revised Statutes dealing with the officials of national banks, as well as in our own Criminal Code. Rev. St. U. S. §§ 5209, 5439, 5453 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, pp. 3497, 3675, 3681]; Rev. St. 1870, § 907; Pierce & King's Revisory Legislation of 1852, p. 198; Acts 1855, No. 120, § 83, p. 143; Rev. St. 1856, p. 149, § 84; Rev. St. 1870, p. 179. State v. Nicholls, 23 South. 980, 981, 50 La. Ann. 699 (citing Rosc. Cr. Ev. p. 438; 2 Whart. Cr. Law, § 1907; United States v. Britton, 107 U. S. 655, 666, 2 Sup. Ct. 512, 27 L. Ed. 520; Same v. Northway, 120 U. S. 327, 334, 7 Sup. Ct. 580, 30 L. Ed. 664; Moore v. United States, 160 U. S. 268, 16 Sup. Ct. 294, 40 L. Ed. 422).

The word "embezzlement" of itself implies a fraudulent and unlawful intention on the part of the person charged. No one can "lawfully" or "honestly" embezzle money or other property, and hence the use of the word "embezzle" in an indictment against employés of the Post-Office Department, charging them with embezzling and secreting valuable letters, is sufficient to charge the offense, and it is not necessary to allege that the same was done with a fraudulent intent. United States v. Atkinson (U. S.) 34 Fed. 316, 317.

As fraudulently convert.

The word "embezzle" and the words "fraudulently convert to his own use" mean the same thing, as used in Cr. Code, § 80, providing that if any officer, etc., embezzles or fraudulently converts to his own use, etc., he shall be imprisoned in the penitentiary. Spalding v. People, 49 N. E. 993, 998, 172 Ill. 40.

The words "embezzle" and "fraudulently convert" are synonymous. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co. v. Miller (Ky.) 71 S. W. 921, 922.

The word "embezzled," as used in an indictment charging that the defendant fraudulently embezzled and converted a certain sum of money, is synonymous with the word "converted" as there used. State v. Jamison, 38 N. W. 508, 509, 74 Iowa, 602.

"Embezzle" includes in its meaning appropriation to one's own use, so that the use of that word in an indictment or information contains within itself the charge that defendant appropriated the money or property to his own use. Hence it is proper to connect the word "embezzle" with the phrase "converted to his own use" by the copulative "and." Mills v. State, 73 N. W. 761, 764, 53 Neb. 263.

The terms "shall embezzle" and "convert to his own use," found in Cr. Code, § 121, are synonymous. For an agent to convert to his own use is made embezzlement by this statute. Hamilton v. State, 64 N. Y. 965, 966, 46 Neb. 284.

As infamous crime.

"Embezzlement" is not an "infamous crime" within the intention of the fifth amendment of the Constitution of the United States. United States v. Reiley (U. S.) 20 Fed. 46; Same v. Baugh (U. S.) 1 Fed. 784, 787.

The crime of embezzlement and making false entries by the president of a national bank is an infamous crime. United States v. Dewalt, 9 Sup. Ct. 111, 128 U. S. 393, 32 L. Ed. 485; Same v. Cadwallader (U. S.) 59 Fed. 677, 679.

Intent to defraud.

The two essential elements of embezzlement are (1) the appropriation of the property by the bailee, agent, or officer to his own use, or that of some other person than the true owner; (2) such appropriation must have been made with the intent to deprive or defraud the true owner of the property, or of the use or benefit thereof. If the agent or officer does with the property lawfully in his possession, custody, or control what a person must intend to do with property unlawfully taken by him in order to be guilty of common-law larceny, then such agent or officer is guilty of statutory larceny, formerly called "embezzlement." In other words, to constitute the statutory crime, the appropriation of the property must be made with the same intent to deprive the owner of it with which the taking must be done to constitute larceny at common law. State v. Kortgaard, 64 N. W. 51, 53, 62 Minn. 7.

The word "embezzle," in embezzlement laws, means "the failure to pay over the money by the agent, after it is collected, with the felonious intent at the time of the commission to appropriate it to the agent's use and to deprive the owner of it. Criminal intent is essential to the crime." State v. Reilly, 4 Mo. App. 392, 396.

A prosecution for embezzlement cannot be sustained unless the wrongdoer had an intent to convert the property to his own use, and the question of intent is one for the jury. People v. Galland, 22 N. W. 81, 55 Mich. 628.

To constitute embezzlement, the conversion must be something more than an honest mistake, so that where, under a construction of a contract, the person was entitled to the use of the money until the time of settlement, his use thereof would not constitute embezzlement, even though such construction was a mistaken one. State v. Wallick, 54 N. W. 246, 248, 87 Iowa, 369.

Before the offense of embezzlement can be made out, it must distinctly appear that the respondent has acted with a felonious intent and made an intentional wrong disposal, indicating a design to cheat and deceive the owner. A mere failure to pay over money is not enough if that intent is not plainly apparent. People v. Hurst, 28 N. W. 838, 839, 62 Mich. 276.

An essential element in the offense of embezzlement is a fraudulent intent. People v. Treadwell, 10 Pac. 502, 509, 69 Cal. 226.

In order to constitute embezzlement, an intent to feloniously appropriate the property at the time of the appropriation is essential, and if the appropriation is made upon the belief, honestly entertained by the accused, that he has lawful title or right to appropriate it, the act is not criminal. Beaty v. State, 82 Ind. 228, 232; State v. Smith, 16 South. 938, 941, 47 La. Ann. 432; Gordon v. Eans, 11 S. W. 64, 65, 97 Mo. 587.

3 Wds. & P.—23

As used in St. 1857, c. 233, declaring that if any person to whom any money, goods, or other property which may be the subject of larceny shall have been delivered shall "embezzle" or secrete with intent to embezzle such money, goods, or property, he shall be deemed to have committed the crime of simple larceny, cannot be construed to apply to the fraudulent conversion to one's own use of money paid or property delivered through mistake, for there is no breach of a trust or violation of a confidence intentionally reposed by one party and voluntarily assumed by the other, which is essential to the crime of embezzlement. "'Embezzle' is applied to persons having in their possession, by virtue of their occupation or employment, the money or property of another which has been fraudulently converted in violation of a trust reposed in them." Commonwealth v. Hays, 80 Mass. (14 Gray) 62, 64, 74 Am. Dec. 662.

Pen. Code, § 507, defining "embezzlement," does not require an intent to steal to constitute the crime, but makes him guilty who fraudulently converts the same, or the proceeds thereof, to his own use. People v. Jackson, 71 Pac. 566, 567, 138 Cal. 462.

The definition of the word "embezzlement" is given by Bouvier as "the fraudulent appropriation to one's own use of the money or goods intrusted to one's care by another," and, as the word "embezzled" implies a fraudulent intent, the addition of the word "fraudulent" is mere surplusage, and would not enlarge or restrict the signification of the word. Grin v. Shine, 23 Sup. Ct. 98, 102, 187 U. S. 181, 47 L. Ed. 130.

The fraudulent intent may be consummated in any manner capable of effecting it. Golden v. State, 22 Tex. App. 14, 15, 2 S. W. 531, 537.

To constitute the offense, there must be a criminal intent, but where the money of the principal is knowingly used by the agent in violation of his duty, it is none the less embezzlement because of an intent at the time to restore it. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co. v. Miller (Ky.) 71 S. W. 921, 922.

There can be no embezzlement under our statutes where there is no intent to defraud. There are cases where one uses the money of another as he has no right to use it, and thereby converts and appropriates it to his own use, in which the statute will infer a fraudulent intent and punish the act as an embezzlement. But where money was deposited or taken into a bank under the practice of years, and by an arrangement of a city treasury the money ceased to be the property of the treasurer and became the property of the bank, the loss of the money by the failure of the bank did not constitute embezzlement. People v. Wadsworth, 30 N. W. 99, 101, 63 Mich. 500.

Lawful possession or custody.

"Embezzlement" is where one fraudulently appropriates the property of another, intrusted to his care, or fraudulently misapplies it, instead of applying it to its proper purpose. And it is necessary for the state to prove that the property actually came into the custody of the defendant as bailee, and, while being so in his custody as bailee, he embezzled or fraudulently misapplied or converted it to his own use. State v. Davis (Del.) 50 Atl. 99, 3 Pennewill, 220.

"Embezzlement" implies the fraudulent appropriation or conversion of the property of another by one who has the rightful possession or is intrusted with it. Vansant v. State, 53 Atl. 711, 713, 96 Md. 110.

In order to constitute this crime it is necessary that this property, money, or effects embezzled should have previously come lawfully into possession or custody of the party charged with such offense, and that while so in his possession or custody, held for the use and benefit of the real owner, he unlawfully converted the same to his own use. In other words, there must be an actual and lawful possession or custody of the property of another by virtue of such trust, duty, agency, or ultimate permit to the person charged, and while lawfully in the possession or custody of such property the person must unlawfully convert the same to his own use in order to constitute the crime of embezzlement. United States v. Harper (U. S.) 33 Fed. 471, 474. See, also, Same v. Lee (U. S.) 12 Fed. 816, 818.

In the statutory embezzlement there is no felonious taking, for the thing comes to the servant by delivery thereof from the master or a third person; so that the question is, by what act, after it is received, does the servant commit embezzlement? We may infer from the authorities, and from the reasons inherent in the question, that, if the servant intentionally does with the property under his control what one must intend to do with property taken to commit larceny of it, he embezzles it, while nothing less is sufficient. State v. Rigall, 70 S. W. 150, 151, 169 Mo. 659.

Nature of possession.

While the statute uses the word "embezzle," and thereby refers us to the ordinary acceptance of the term for its definition, it expressly requires that the thing embezzled must have come into the possession and care of the servant by virtue of his employment. It is not sufficient that he was intrusted with it, but it must have been in his capacity as a servant. McAleer v. State, 64 N. W. 358, 359, 46 Neb. 116.

To constitute the crime of embezzlement, it is not necessary to show that the party charged receive the money by virtue of his employment, nor that he had authority to receive it; but if it was received in the name or on the account of the master or employer, then it is "embezzlement" within the statute. Denton v. State, 26 Atl. 1022, 1023, 77 Md. 527.

The term "embezzlement," in Burns' Rev. St. 1894, § 2022, declaring that any agent or employé having access to, control, or possession of money belonging to the employer shall be guilty of embezzlement if he appropriates the same, imports that such agent must have control, as agent, of the money so appropriated, and such fact must be stated in the indictment. State v. Winstandley, 58 N. E. 71, 72, 155 Ind. 290. He must be in possession by reason of some special trust imposed. Colip v. State, 55 N. E. 739, 741, 153 Ind. 584, 74 Am. St. Rep. 322.

Under Ky. St. § 1203, providing that if any carrier or other person to whom money or other property which may be the subject of larceny may be delivered to carry for hire, or any other person who may be intrusted with such property, embezzles or fraudulently converts it to his own use before delivery at the place or to the person to whom the same shall be delivered, he shall be punished, etc. To constitute embezzlement the money appropriated need not be intrusted to the accused by the owner thereof, and it is sufficient if the money was consigned to his employer, who intrusted it to him. Commonwealth v. Clifford, 27 S. W. 811, 96 Ky. 4.

Property subject.

It is embezzlement for a township treasurer to misappropriate his trust funds to his private purposes, and to fraudulently refuse to account for them. He is as guilty as though he had made a similar misuse of specific coins or bills which he had no right to exchange for their equivalents. Of course, there may be losses and failures to pay, or even to account, where the failure is due to misfortune or other cause not criminal. But where the demand is criminal, the misuse of a fund belonging to the public, though changing its form constantly, is just as clearly an embezzlement of the property of the public as if any specific chattel had been so misapplied. People v. Bringard, 39 Mich. 22, 24, 25, 33 Am. Rep. 344.

Series of acts.

Embezzlement may and most often does consist of many acts done in a series of years, and the fact at last disclosed that the employer's money and funds are embezzled is the crime against which the statute has been leveled, so that the prosecution should not be compelled to elect from which one of the many acts of a series that constitutes the corpus delicti it will attempt to found the prosecution. Willis v. State, 33 South. 226, 234, 134 Ala. 429.

Time and place as elements.

Embezzlement is a crime in every state of the Union, and neither time nor place are essential elements in the crime. Ex parte Pearce, 23 S. W. 15, 17, 32 Tex. Cr. R. 301.

False charge.

For conviction of the offense of embezzlement, it is essential that the prosecution establish the propositions: (1) That the accused was the clerk, agent, servant, or apprentice of a private person; (2) that the money or property came into his possession by virtue of his employment; (3) that he embezzled or fraudulently converted it to his own use, or fraudulently secreted it with the intention to convert it to his own use. Hence where a traveling salesman, under a contract whereby his employer was to pay his expenses, in his account rendered for expenses made a false charge for a meal, he was not guilty of embezzlement, there being no evidence that the employer advanced the money, or that defendant collected money out of which it was paid. Grider v. State, 32 South. 254, 133 Ala. 188.

Fraudulent banking.

Although the term "embezzlement" in Burns' Rev. St. 1894, § 2031, declaring every officer of an incorporated bank guilty of embezzlement who fraudulently receives money from a person not indebted thereto when the bank is insolvent, etc., is an inapt naming of the crime defined in this statute, and the offense aimed at is really fraudulent banking; nevertheless it does not follow that the rules of pleading applicable to embezzlement are not controlling. State v. Winstandley, 57 N. E. 109, 154 Ind. 443.

Larceny distinguished.

"Embezzlement" is a broader term than "larceny," but is not exclusive of it. State v. Sullivan, 21 South. 688, 689, 49 La. Ann. 197, 62 Am. St. Rep. 644.

Embezzlement is the fraudulent appropriation of property by a person to whom such property has been intrusted, or into whose hands it has lawfully come. It differs from larceny in the fact that the original taking of property was lawful or with the consent of the owner, while in larceny the felonious intent must have existed at the time of the taking. Moore v. United States, 16 Sup. Ct. 294, 295, 160 U. S. 268, 40 L. Ed. 422; United States v. Lee (U. S.) 12 Fed. 816, 818; Same v. Harper (U. S.) 33 Fed. 471, 474.

Embezzlement differs from larceny in this: that the latter implies a wrongful taking from another's possession, but embezzlement denotes a wrongful appropriation of what is already in the wrongdoer's possession. State v. Yeiter, 54 Kan. 277, 283, 38 Pac. 320, 322 (citing Maxw. Cr. Proc. 120-122); Chaplin v. Lee, 18 Neb. 440, 443, 25 N. W. 609.

"Embezzlement is a species of larceny. It is distinguished from 'larceny,' properly so called, as being committed with respect to property which is not at the time in the actual possession of the owner." People v. Burr (N. Y.) 41 How. Prac. 293, 294; People v. Perini, 29 Pac. 1027, 1028, 94 Cal. 573.

The gist of common-law larceny, as distinguished from embezzlement, is the felonious taking of what is another's, with the simultaneous intent in the taker of misappropriating it; while in statutory embezzlement there is no felonious taking, for the thing comes to the servant by delivery either from the master or a third person. Spalding v. People, 49 N. E. 993, 998, 172 Ill. 40.

Embezzlement is a fraudulent appropriation of such property as the statute makes the subject of embezzlement under the circumstances, in the statute pointed out, by the person embezzling to the injury of the owner thereof. Bish. Cr. Law, § 332. The embezzlement statutes were passed to provide for cases which larceny at common law did not include, so that nothing that is larceny at common law is included in the embezzlement statutes, and nothing that is included in the embezzlement statutes is larceny at common law. The embezzlement statutes may generally be divided into two classes: First, those meeting the case of servants and clerks appropriating their master's property before it reaches his possession; and, secondly, those meeting the cases of trustees and bailees appropriating goods of which they obtained possession bona fide. Griffin v. State, 4 Tex. App. 390, 409.

The distinction between "larceny" and the statutory crime of "embezzlement" is sometimes hard to draw. The definition of the latter offense in Pen. Code, § 503, is very broad, being the fraudulent appropriation of property by a person to whom it has been intrusted. Where the property has been taken forcibly or furtively, or when the possession is gained by a trick or artifice, and the owner had no intent to yield possession and intrust the property to another, in such cases there is no embezzlement. People v. Johnson, 27 Pac. 663, 664, 91 Cal. 265.

Misapplication distinguished.

"Embezzlement" and "misapplication" are not convertible terms. "Misapplication" is the broader, and covers "embezzlement." So that where, in an indictment for willfully misapplying funds, a count charges defendant with misapplying the assets which were in his actual possession, which would be embezzlement, he was properly convicted. Jewett v. United States (U. S.) 100 Fed. 832, 840, 41 C. C. A. 88, 53 L. R. A. 568.

"Embezzle" may mean to appropriate to one's own use, but it also embraces the meaning of "to misappropriate," so that, where the indictment charged that defendant did convert to his own use and embezzle a check, an instruction that defendant was guilty if he received the check and misapplied it fraudulently, whether he converted it to his own use or not, was proper. The statute renders it indictable to embezzle or fraudulently convert to one's own use. This indicates that these acts are not necessarily and strictly synonymous. State v. Foust, 19 S. E. 275, 114 N. C. 842.

As used in Rev. St. § 5209 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3497], punishing the president, cashier, or agent of any national bank who shall embezzle or willfully misapply any of its funds, the words "embezzle" and "willfully misapply" are not synonymous. In order to misapply the funds of a bank, it is not necessary that the officer charged should be in actual possession of them by virtue of a trust committed to him. He may abstract them from the other funds of the bank unlawfully and afterwards criminally misapply them, or by virtue of his official relation to the bank he may have such control, direction, and power of management as to direct an application of the funds in such a manner and under such circumstances as to constitute the offense of willful misapplication. United States v. Northway, 7 Sup. Ct. 580, 583, 120 U. S. 327, 30 L. Ed. 664.

"Embezzlement," as commonly understood, is a breach of trust, to the embezzler's own use. As used in the statute relating to embezzlement of the funds of a national bank, it is a breach of trust by the officers or agents of the association to their own use, or the word may be used to describe the willful misapplication of the moneys, funds, or credits of the association. United States v. McClure (U. S.) 107 Fed. 268, 271.

The fifty-fifth section of the national banking act of 1864 provides for the punishment of those who "embezzle, abstract and willfully misapply" the funds of the bank "with intent to injure or defraud the association." Held, that the word "embezzle," and perhaps also the word "abstract," refers to acts done for the benefit of the actor as against the bank, while the word "misapply" covers acts having no relation to pecuniary profit or advantage of the doer thereof. United States v. Taintor (U. S.) 28 Fed. Cas. 7, 9.

Misapplication of credits.

Where an officer of a bank so arranged his scheme that credits given to his bank on the security of its property pledged as collateral with two New York banks were converted by payment of the drafts of his bank against such credit so that the money was diverted from the treasury of his bank into his own possession, he "embezzled" the money in the ordinary sense of the term, so that a statement in a proof of loss under a fidelity insurance policy that he embezzled the money was sufficient, though technically he did not embezzle the money. American Surety Co. v. Pauly (U. S.) 72 Fed. 484, 486, 18 C. C. A. 657.

Robbery distinguished.

"Robbery" and "stealing" imply a wrongful taking of another's goods, while "embezzlement" denotes the wrongful appropriation of what rightfully came into one's possession. Taylor v. Kneeland (Mich.) 1 Doug. 67, 72.

Theft distinguished.

The terms "theft" and "embezzlement" cannot characterize the same act, because they are repugnant to and irreconcilable with each other. United States v. Thomas (U. S.) 69 Fed. 588, 590.

Embezzlement is a crime unknown to the common law, but depends entirely on statutory enactments. It is a sort of statutory larceny, and, though kindred to theft, it is a separate and distinct offense. Theft involves the idea of unlawful acquisition, whereas embezzlement is a fraudulent conversion of personal property after its possession has been unlawfully acquired. State v. Harmon, 18 S. W. 128, 132, 106 Mo. 635.

Theft is the fraudulent taking of personal property under certain designated circumstances, and necessarily involves the idea of unlawful acquisition, thereby differing from embezzlement, which is the fraudulent conversion of similar property after its possession has been lawfully acquired. Simco v. State, 8 Tex. App. 406, 407.

"Theft," as distinguished from "embezzlement," is taking property of another from the possession of the owner with intent to defraud. "Embezzlement," as distinguished from "theft," is taking property of another in the possession of the accused with intent to defraud. The crimes are essentially the same, but most unfortunately are, for the purposes of prosecution, entirely distinct. The one demands, as an essential element, a trespass, a breach of technical possession; the other cannot be committed unless the element of trespass or breach of technical possession is absent. The former is a crime at common law; the latter is a statutory offense." State v. Hanley, 39 Atl. 148, 149, 70 Conn. 265.

EMBLEM.

See "Appropriate Emblem or Design."

EMBLEMENTS.

A crop left growing on the premises by an outgoing tenant is an "emblemment." Wood v. Noack, 54 N. W. 785, 84 Wis. 398.

When a tenant holding for an uncertain time sows the land, he is entitled to the crop as "emblements." Davis v. Brocklebank, 9 N. H. 73, 74; Whitmarsh v. Cutting (N. Y.) 10 Johns. 360, 361. Where that is certain, there exists no title to emblements. Whitmarsh v. Cutting (N. Y.) 10 Johns. 360, 361.

In order to entitle one claiming to be a tenant, or his legal representative, to emblements, the following facts must appear: The existence of a tenancy of uncertain duration; second, a termination of the tenancy by the act of God or the act of the lessor; third, that the crop was planted by the tenant, or some one claiming under him, during the right of occupancy. Miller v. Wohlford, 119 Ind. 305, 309, 21 N. E. 894.

By the term "emblements" is understood the crops growing upon land, and by "crops" is here meant the products of the earth which grow yearly, and are raised by annual expense or labor, and by great manurance and industry, such as grain; but not fruits which grow on trees, which are not to be planted yearly, and grasses and the like, though they are annual. Cottle v. Spitzer, 4 Pac. 435, 436, 65 Cal. 456, 52 Am. Rep. 805.

The common law has established a distinction between the right to emblements and the cost of plowing and manuring the ground, so that the determination of an estate at will would give to the lessee his emblements, but not any compensation for these improvements. He might be ousted of the possession before the crop was in the ground, and wholly lose the expense of plowing and manuring the land, though, if he was ousted afterwards, he would be entitled to the emblements. The doctrine of emblements is founded on the clearest equity and the soundest policy, and ought to receive a liberal encouragement. Compensation for preparing the ground for seed is not indemnity for the loss of the crop, which includes the loss of the seed, the labor of sowing and nursing it, and the hopes of the laborer and his family of a fruitful harvest. Stewart v. Doughty (N. Y.) 9 Johns. 108, 112.

The term "emblements" is used to designate corn, cotton, and other like products, not the spontaneous growth of the earth, but produced annually by labor and industry. Walker v. State, 20 South. 612, 613, 111 Ala. 29. Vegetable chattels called "emblements" are the growth of the earth produced annually, not spontaneously, but by labor and industry. Reiff v. Reiff, 64 Pa. (14 P. F. Smith) 134, 135.

The doctrine of emblements extends not only to corn and grain of all kinds, but to everything of an artificial and annual profit that is produced by labor. Owens v. Lewis, 46 Ind. 488, 508, 15 Am. Rep. 295.

Fruits and trees.

Emblements are the annual product or fruit of things sown or planted. Hops, berries, and the like are emblements, but the roots and bushes from which they grow are perennial, and not strictly emblements. Hamilton v. Austin (N. Y.) 36 Hun, 138, 142.

While all emblements are produced by manurance and labor of the owner, and are called "fructus industriales" for that reason, the manner as well as the purpose of planting is an essential element to be taken into consideration. If the purpose of planting is not the permanent enhancement of the land itself, but merely to secure a single crop, which is to be the sole return for the labor expended, the product would naturally fall under the head of "emblements." Thus, at common law, those products of the earth which are annual, and are raised by yearly manurance and labor, and essentially owe their annual existence to the cultivation of man, are termed "emblements"; but blackberries, while grown on bushes, do not come within the meaning of such term. Sparrow v. Pond, 52 N. W. 36, 49 Minn. 412, 16 L. R. A. 103, 32 Am. St. Rep. 571.

"Emblements" do not include fruit which grows on trees which are not planted yearly, grass, and the like. It only includes those crops which grow yearly, and are raised annually by expense and labor or great industry. The fruits and products of the earth other than emblements, while they are hanging by the roots, are a part of the realty. As soon as they are gathered they are personal estate. Rogers v. Elliott, 59 N. H. 201, 202, 47 Am. Rep. 192.

Grass.

"Emblements" do not include grass, which is not an annual crop. Perley v. Chase, 11 Atl. 418, 419, 79 Me. 519.

The term "emblements," in 2 Rev. St. 1876, p. 505, § 34, which requires administrators to take possession of and to inventory the emblements and annual crops, whether severed or not from the land, raised by labor, etc., does not include uncut grass growing in a field, but such grass descends with the land to the heir. The distinction between annual crops, merely vegetable productions of the soil, raised by labor bestowed during the year, and trees, fruits, and grass, which are to a greater or less extent of spontaneous growth, may be said to be well recognized and firmly established by the authorities. Evans v. Hardy, 76 Ind. 527, 531.

Crops are divided into two kinds, fructus industriales and fructus naturales, the material difference being that the latter are the part of the crop which does not go to the outgoing tenant as emblements, nor to the personal representative as against the heir. This division is only made in favor of the landlord, and not against him. In Reiff v. Reiff, 64 Pa. (14 P. F. Smith) 134, it was held in favor of the landowner that, when the tenant for life died during the year, the grass uncut, even when cultivated grass ready for cutting, went to the owner of the reversion, and not as emblements to the lessees of the land. State v. Crook, 44 S. E. 32, 33, 132 N. C. 1053.

Increase of stock.

The hirer of a farm, with the stock upon it, for a year, is the owner of the natural increase of the stock raised during that time. Woods v. Charlton, 62 N. H. 649.

EMBOLISM.

See "Cerebral Embolism."

EMBRACE.

Within the meaning of Railroad Law, § 104, requiring street railroad companies leasing their lines to carry passengers for one fare to any point or portion of any railroad "embraced" in such contract, roads built or acquired after such lease are not included, as they cannot be said to be "embraced in such contract" when they are not in existence. Mendoza v. Metropolitan St. Ry. Co., 62 N. Y. Supp. 580, 582, 48 App. Div. 62.

In Rev. St. § 2275 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1381], relating to the selection of indemnity lands in lieu of school lands by a state, and providing that where any state is entitled to certain sections for school uses, on which settlers have located, or where they are reserved to any territory, notwithstanding they may be embraced within a military, Indian, or other reservation, the selection of lands in lieu thereof as indemnity shall be a waiver of its right to such sections, the word "embraced" is a synonym of "included." As defined by lexicographers and as commonly used, it has, among others, the two meanings ascribed to the word "include," the first of which accords with its etymology from "claudere." To "shut" is "to confine within; to shut up; to hold, as the shell of a nut 'includes' the kernel; a pearl is 'included' in a shell." Webst. Dict. The second and derivative meaning is to "comprehend, as a genus the species; the whole a part." Webster defines the word "embraced" thus: "To encircle; to encompass; to surround or inclose; to include, as parts of a whole, or as subordinate divisions of a part; to comprehend; as, natural philosophy 'embraces' many sciences." The statute speaks of the school sections "embraced" within a reservation, not within the exterior boundary of a reservation, the word "embraced" meaning that the school section was a constituent part of the reservation. Hibberd v. Slack (U. S.) 84 Fed. 571, 578.

Unchastity imported.

The "embracing" of a man and woman does not necessarily indicate unchastity. It is regarded as appropriate and is of common occurrence among relatives and friends, upon meeting or taking their departure from each other, but the circumstances may be such that the statement that a man and a woman were "embracing" each other may impute unchastity and be slanderous. Mason v. Stratton, 1 N. Y. Supp. 511, 512, 49 Hun, 606.

EMBRACERY.

"Embracery" consists of all such practices as tend corruptly to influence a juror. State v. Williams, 136 Mo. 293, 305, 38 S. W. 75.

"Embracery" consists in an attempt to influence a jury corruptly, whether done by persuasion or bribery. Remarks made by a witness to a juror respecting the nature of the case and the nature and character of the evidence offered on the trial, or the principles on which the jury ought to decide the case under their consideration, obviously calculated to influence the juror in favor of one party and against the other, amount to "embracery." Grannis v. Branden (Conn.) 5 Day, 260, 274, 5 Am. Dec. 143.

"Embracery" is where one attempts to corrupt, or influence, or instruct a jury, or any way to incline them to be more favorable to the one side or the other, by money, letters, promises, threats, or persuasions, except only by the strength of evidence and the arguments of counsel in open court at the trial of the cause." Brown v. Beauchamp, 21 Ky. (5 T. B. Mon.) 413, 415, 17 Am. Dec. 81.

"Embracery" consists in such practices as tend to unduly influence the administration of justice by improperly working upon the minds of the jurors. To constitute the offense there must be an attempt to carry into effect the corrupt purpose. To form the purpose, and give it expression merely in words, is not sufficient. State v. Brown, 95 N. C. 685, 686.

"Embracery" is an attempt to influence a juror or jurors corruptly to one side by threats or menaces, or by promises, pressure, entreaties, money entertainments, and the like. Mills' Ann. St. Colo. 1891, § 1297.

Influencing grand juror.

The definition of the crime of "embracery" given in section 75 of the Penal Code is as follows: "A person who influences or attempts to influence improperly a juror in a civil or criminal action or proceeding, or one drawn or summoned to attend to such a juror in respect to his verdict or decision in any case or matter pending or about to be brought before him in any case, is guilty of a misdemeanor." An attempt to influence a grand juror to prevent a certain prosecution is sufficient to sustain a conviction under the statute. People v. Glen, 71 N. Y. Supp. 893, 894, 64 App. Div. 167.

Unsuccessful attempt.

The crime of embracery is made up of the attempt to influence a juror. Upon such attempt being made, whether successful or not, the crime is consummate. The corpus delicti—the body, essence and substance of the offense—being the corrupt attempt, it is wholly immaterial whether the would-be corrupter gains his point or not, or whether the juror thus approached gives any verdict or not, or whether the verdict be true or false. State v. Williams, 38 S. W. 75, 77, 136 Mo. 293.

Any attempt or effort corruptly to influence a juror, whether it be successful or not, is embracery. The crime may be committed though the object of the embracer be not accomplished, and his only act consists of an attempt to carry out a corrupt purpose. There is no such an offense as an "attempt to commit an embracery," as the act itself is but an attempt. State v. Sales, 2 Nev. 268, 270.

EMBROIDERY.

Tariff Act Oct. 1, 1890, Schedule J, par. 373, provides for a certain tariff upon "embroidered and hemstitched" handkerchiefs. Held, that the handkerchiefs referred to must be both embroidered and hemstitched, and it was not intended to refer to those handkerchiefs which were either embroidered or hemstitched. In re Gribbon (U. S.) 53 Fed. 78, 80.

"Embroidery," as used in Tariff Act Oct. 1, 1890, par. 373, does not include a fabric made on a loom with a Jacquard attachment, and which is not known in the trade as "embroidery," or an article of wearing apparel embroidered by hand or machine. In re Fellheimer (U. S.) 66 Fed. 720, 721.

EMERGENCY.

Other emergency, see "Other."

Webster defines the word "emergency" as "any event or occasional combination of circumstances which calls for immediate action or remedy; pressing necessity; exigency." An emergency requiring the building of a bridge, arising before and continuing after an emergency act went into effect, is an "emergency" within the act. People v. Supervisors, 21 Ill. App. 271, 274.

An emergency is a "sudden or unexpected happening; an unforeseen occurrence or condition." Cent. Dict. Under Laws 1897, c. 378, § 618, providing that in case of emergency a park commissioner may purchase articles immediately required, without calling for competition, at an expense not exceeding $1,000 during any one month, a person who, in an immediate possibility of frost, furnished material to be used on a greenhouse in a public park, on an order of the superintendent of parks, may recover the same from the city. The emergency arose because of the fact that a heavy frost would probably have destroyed defendant's plants if plaintiff had not furnished the material. Sheehan v. City of New York, 75 N. Y. Supp. 802, 803, 37 Misc. Rep. 432.

Under Acts April 3, 1876, and April 1, 1878, making the practice of medicine without a license, except gratuitously and in case of emergency, a misdemeanor, an "emergency" is a case in which the ordinary medical practitioners of the schools provided for by the statute, who are provided with the proper diplomas and have submitted themselves to the proper examination, are not readily obtainable. This is an "emergency," as where the exigency is of so pressing a character that some kind of action must be taken before such parties can be found or procured. Where a party is satisfied that another school of physicians or another individual can render him more efficient aid, more beneficial services, than another, and he therefore seeks his aid, that is not an "emergency." People v. Lee Wah, 11 Pac. 851, 71 Cal. 80.

EMIGRANT.

An "emigrant" is one who emigrates or quits one country or region to settle in another; one who quits his country for any lawful reason, with a design to settle elsewhere, and takes his family with him. Williams v. Fears, 35 S. E. 699, 110 Ga. 584, 50 L. R. A. 685; Varner v. State, 36 S. E. 93, 110 Ga. 595; Woodson v. State, 40 S. E. 1013, 1014, 114 Ga. 844.

EMIGRANT AGENT.

An "emigrant agent," within the meaning of a Georgia statute imposing a tax upon each emigrant agent doing business within the state, means persons engaged in hiring laborers to be employed beyond the limit of the state. State v. Hunt, 40 S. E. 216, 129 N. C. 686, 85 Am. St. Rep. 758; Williams v.

Fears, 21 Sup. Ct. 128, 129, 179 U. S. 270, 45 L. Ed. 186; Id., 35 S. E. 699, 110 Ga. 584, 50 L. R. A. 685; Varner v. State, 110 Ga. 595, 36 S. E. 93.

One who comes into the state and employs on his own behalf laborers to work for him outside the state is not an "emigrant agent," and not subject to a tax. Theus v. State, 39 S. E. 913, 114 Ga. 53.

An "emigrant agent," is defined by the emigrant act, 22 St. at Large, p. 812, as any person engaged in hiring laborers or soliciting emigrants in this state to be employed beyond the limits of the state. State v. Napier, 41 S. E. 13, 15, 63 S. C. 60.

EMIGRANT LABORERS.

"Emigrant laborers," as used in the representation that a ship "will carry emigrant laborers not over forty," applies to men only, and is not violated though, with their wives and children, that number is exceeded. Richards v. Hayward, 2 Man. & G. 574, 590.

EMIGRANT PASSENGERS.

The expression "emigrant passengers," as used in Act Cong. March 2, 1882, regulating the number of emigrant passengers to be carried by ships in a certain territory, is restricted to passengers other than cabin passengers. It is common knowledge that the great bulk of emigrant travel from foreign countries is transatlantic. The conditions of this travel are such that emigrant passengers are exposed to the danger of overcrowding, a danger that is aggravated by the length of the voyage, but which does not exist in short and coastwise voyages. The Danube (U. S.) 55 Fed. 993, 995.

EMIGRATE.

To "emigrate" is to remove from one country or state to another for the purpose of residence. Williams v. Fears, 110 Ga. 584, 596, 35 S. E. 699, 50 L. R. A. 685 (quoting Webst. Internat. Dict.).

EMINENT DOMAIN.

Right of, as franchise, see "Franchise."

Eminent domain is the rightful authority which exists in every sovereignty to control and regulate those rights of a public nature which appertain to its citizens in common, and to appropriate and control individual property for the public benefit as the public safety, necessity, convenience, or welfare may demand. Cherokee Nation v. Southern Kan. R. Co. (U. S.) 33 Fed. 900, 905 (quoting Cooley, Const. Lim.); People v. Humphrey, 23 Mich. 471, 475, 9 Am. Rep. 94;

Portage Tp. v. Van Hoesen, 49 N. W. 894, 895, 87 Mich. 536, 14 L. R. A. 114.

The right to take private property for public use without the consent of the owner is called "eminent domain." Consumers' Gas Trust Co. v. Harless, 131 Ind. 446, 450, 29 N. E. 1062, 15 L. R. A. 505; City of Madison v. Daley (U. S.) 58 Fed. 751, 753.

"Eminent domain is the right to resume possession of private property for public use." Beekman v. Saratoga & S. R. Co. (N. Y.) 3 Paige, 45, 73, 22 Am. Dec. 679; Bloodgood v. Mohawk & H. R. R. Co. (N. Y.) 18 Wend. 9, 11, 13, 31 Am. Dec. 313; Weir v. St. Paul, S. & T. F. R. Co., 18 Minn. 155 (Gil. 139); Forney v. Fremont, E. & M. V. R. Co., 36 N. W. 806, 808, 23 Neb. 465.

Eminent domain is the right of a government to take and appropriate private property to public use whenever the exigency requires it. Commonwealth v. Alger, 61 Mass. (7 Cush.) 53, 85; Commonwealth v. Bearse, 132 Mass. 542, 547, 42 Am. Rep. 450; State v. Griffin, 39 Atl. 260, 69 N. H. 1, 41 L. R. A. 177, 78 Am. St. Rep. 139; Forney v. Fremont, E. & M. V. R. Co., 36 N. W. 806, 808, 23 Neb. 465.

"Eminent domain" embraces only cases where, by the authority of the state and for public good, the property of the individual is taken without his consent for the purpose of being devoted to some particular use. Newburyport Water Co. v. City of Newburyport (U. S.) 103 Fed. 584, 587.

"Eminent domain" is defined to be the sovereign power vested in the state to take private property for public use. Groff v. Bird-in-Hand Turnpike Co., 18 Atl. 431, 128 Pa. 621, 5 L. R. A. 661; Baltimore & F. Turnpike Road v. Baltimore, C. & E. M. Pass. R. Co., 31 Atl. 854, 855, 81 Md. 247; Jockheck v. Shawnee County Com'rs, 37 Pac. 621, 625, 53 Kan. 780; Forney v. Fremont, E. & M. V. R. Co., 36 N. W. 806, 808, 23 Neb. 465; Weir v. St. Paul, S. & T. F. R. Co., 18 Minn. 155, 163 (Gil. 139, 146), (citing 1 Redf. R. R. § 63); State v. Jacksonville Terminal Co., 27 South. 225, 237, 41 Fla. 377; American Print Works v. Lawrence, 21 N. J. Law (1 Zab.) 248, 257; Hale v. Lawrence, 21 N. J. Law (1 Zab.) 714, 728, 47 Am. Dec. 190; Buffalo & N. Y. C. R. Co. v. Brainard, 9 N. Y. (5 Seld.) 100.

The power of "eminent domain" is the public power of buying what is necessary for public use. Varney v. Manchester, 58 N. H. 430, 432, 40 Am. Rep. 592.

It may be defined as that superior right of property pertaining to sovereignty by which private property acquired by its citizens under its protection may be taken or its use controlled for the public benefit, without regard to the wishes of its owner. Cherokee Nation v. Southern Kan. R. Co. (U. S.) 33 Fed. 900, 905 (citing Cooley, Const. Lim. pp. 523, 524).

The right of eminent domain is a right which a government possesses of taking the property of its subjects for necessary public uses at a fair valuation. Southwest Pennsylvania Pipe Lines v. Directors of Poor, 1 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 460, 462 (citing Bouv. Law Dict.).

The right belonging to the society or to the sovereign of disposing, in cases of necessity and for the public safety, of all the wealth contained in the state, is called the "eminent domain." Jones v. Walker, 13 Fed. Cas. 1059, 1066 (citing Vatt. Law Nat.); Jockheck v. Shawnee County, 37 Pac. 621, 625, 53 Kan. 780; Caldwell v. State (Ala.) 1 Stew. & P. 327, 379; Stark v. McGowen (S. C.) 1 Nott. & McC. 387, 392.

The right of disposing of part of the property of individuals for the public good in a state is what is called "eminent domain." Lindsay v. East Bay St. Com'rs (S. C.) 2 Bay, 38, 45.

The right of eminent domain is a right of a civilized state to take private property for public use, and in order to promote the general welfare. It is called "eminent domain" because it is superior to all private rights, and is an exercise of the sovereign authority, which of necessity resides in all governments for the common benefit and welfare of their citizens. Twelfth St. Market Co. v. Philadelphia & R. T. R. Co., 21 Atl. 989, 142 Pa. 580.

The right of eminent domain is the right of the sovereignty to use the property of its members for the public good or public necessity. In the civil law the right is termed "dominium eminens." Gilmer v. Lime Point, 18 Cal. 229, 250.

The right to take private property for public use, or of eminent domain, is a reserved right attached to every man's land, and paramount to his right of ownership. The right consists of two elements—the right to take, and the right to judge of and to determine the exigency and necessity for taking it. They are both and equally vested in the legislature. Bouv. Law Dict. says: "It belongs to the legislature to decide what improvements are of sufficient importance to justify the exercise of the right of eminent domain." Todd v. Austin, 34 Conn. 78, 88.

The right of eminent domain is the right of a state, through its regular organization, to reassert, either temporarily or permanently, its dominion over any portion of the soil of the state on account of public exigency and for the public good; thus, in time of war or insurrection, the proper authorities may possess and hold any part of the territory of the state for the common safety; and in time of peace the legislature may authorize the appropriation of the same to public purposes, such as the opening of roads, construction of defenses, or providing channels for trade or travel. Civ. Code Ga. 1895, § 3052.

As attribute of sovereignty.

In every political sovereign community there inheres necessarily the right and the duty of guarding its own existence, and of protecting and promoting the interests and welfare of the community at large. This power, denominated the "eminent domain" of the states, is, as its name imports, paramount to all private rights invested under the government. This power and this duty are to be exerted, not only in the highest acts of sovereignty, and in the external relations of government; they reach and comprehend likewise the interior polity and relations of social life, which should be regulated with reference to the advantage of the whole society. State v. Deslesdenier, 7 Tex. 76, 99 (citing West River Bridge Co. v. Dix, 47 U. S. [6 How.] 531, 12 L. Ed. 535).

The right of eminent domain appertains to every independent government. It requires no constitutional recognition. It is an attribute of sovereignty. The provision found in the constitutions of our various states providing for just compensation for private property taken or damaged for public use is a limitation only on the exercise of that right. Southern Illinois & M. Bridge Co. v. Stone, 73 S. W. 453, 456, 174 Mo. 1, 63 L. R. A. 301.

The right of eminent domain is an incident of sovereignty, and exists in every government. Private mischief, rather than public, must, of necessity, be endured. Symonds v. City of Cincinnati, 14 Ohio, 147, 174, 45 Am. Dec. 529. This right is inherent in government, and is perhaps inseparable from the idea of sovereignty. Gilmer v. Lime Point, 18 Cal. 229, 250.

The right of eminent domain does not comprehend all, but only is among, the prerogatives of majesty. Charles River Bridge v. Warren Bridge, 36 U. S. (11 Pet.) 420, 640, 9 L. Ed. 773, 938.

The power of eminent domain is not created by constitution or statute. It is an inherent attribute of sovereignty. It existed in the sovereign long before the adoption of any constitution. Kennebec Water Dist. v. City of Waterville, 52 Atl. 774, 777, 96 Me. 234.

The right of eminent domain is an exercise of the highest act of sovereignty. It can only be called into existence by the authority of the legislature, and must be exercised in the mode and by the tribunal provided by law. City of Madison v. Daley (U. S.) 58 Fed. 751, 753.

The right of eminent domain is a high prerogative of sovereignty, which cannot be exercised without an expressed grant or one necessarily implied. To take private property for public use is in derogation of private rights. The necessity of taking private property for public use must be determined by the person or tribunal designated by law for that purpose. This right of taking private property for public use existed at common law. Park Com'rs of Louisville v. Du Pont, 62 S. W. 891, 892, 110 Ky. 743.

Eminent domain is one of the highest attributes of sovereignty. By it the sovereign power, state or federal, is enabled to take private property and appropriate it to public use. But, subject to this sovereign power, private ownership is absolute, and such absolute ownership is safeguarded by a twofold constitutional protection, viz., it can only be taken away by due process of law, and then on payment of just compensation. It is also true that the sovereign state or nation can, by virtue of its superior dominion or eminent domain, reappropriate to an additional or secondary public use property it has once set apart to public use; for it must be apparent that the sovereign power cannot, by dedicating property to one use, preclude itself from rededicating the same property to some other public use. It will therefore be apparent that the federal government in promoting federal constitutional powers, and the state in its sphere, have the sovereign right to appropriate private property to public use, and to reappropriate property once set apart to public uses to other and additional ones. Western Union Tel. Co. v. Pennsylvania R. Co. (U. S.) 120 Fed. 362, 370, 371.

In holding that the right of eminent domain existed in the United States government, and could be exercised within the state so far as necessary to the enjoyment of the powers conferred upon the federal government by the constitution, it was said by Mr. Justice Strong that "no one doubts the existence in the state governments of the right of eminent domain,—a right distinct from and paramount to the right of ultimate ownership. It grows out of the necessities of their being, not out of the tenure by which lands are held. It may be exercised though the lands are not held by grant from the government either mediately or immediately, and independent of the consideration whether they would escheat to the government in case of a failure of heirs. The right is an offspring of political necessity, and it is inseparable from sovereignty unless denied to it by its fundamental law. But it is no more necessary for the exercise of the powers of a state government than for the federal government. That government is as sovereign within its sphere as the states are within theirs. True, its sphere is limited; certain subjects only are committed to it; but its power over those subjects is as full and complete as the power of the states to which their sovereignty extends. The powers invested by the Constitution in the general government command for their exercise the acquisition of lands in all the states. These are needed for forts, armories, and arsenals, for navy yards, lighthouses, for customhouses, post offices, and court-houses, and other public uses. If the right to acquire property for such uses may be made a barren right by the unwillingness of property holders to sell, or by the action of the state prohibiting a sale to the federal government, the constitutional grants of power may be rendered nugatory, and the government dependent for practical existence upon the will of the state, or even upon that of a private citizen." Kohl v. United States, 91 U. S. 367, 371, 23 L. Ed. 449.

It is a right which pertains to no other power than sovereignty, and does not come out of the tenure by which lands are held. Cherokee Nation v. Southern Kan. R. Co. (U. S.) 33 Fed. 900, 905.

The power of eminent domain, or, in other words, the power to take private property for public use, is in the state. All property is subject to this power. It is a power recognized under the Constitution and law of the land. Fort St. Union Depot Co. v. Backus, 61 N. W. 787, 789, 103 Mich. 556.

Same—Exercise by corporations, etc.

The right of eminent domain belongs alone to the sovereign. Consumers' Gas Trust Co. v. Harless, 131 Ind. 446, 450, 29 N. E. 1062, 15 L. R. A. 505. It embraces all cases where, by the authority of the state and for the public good, the property of the individual is taken without his consent, for the purpose of being devoted to some particular use, either by the state in its sovereign capacity, or by a corporation, public or private, or by a private citizen, to whom such right has been granted by the state. Consumers' Gas Trust Co. v. Harless, 131 Ind. 446, 450, 29 N. E. 1062, 15 L. R. A. 505.

The state as a sovereign possesses eminent domain as a necessary attribute of sovereignty, and there is no reason why the Legislature, representing the state, may not enact laws by which "eminent domain" may be exercised by a private corporation; for there is nothing in the term which implies any restriction as to the manner in which this power of the sovereignty to take private property for public uses may be exercised. Weir v. St. Paul, S. & T. F. R. Co., 18 Minn. 155, 163 (Gil. 139, 146).

The property may be appropriated by the legislature, or the power of appropriating it may be conferred upon private corporations.

to be exercised by them in the execution of works in which the public is interested. Southern Illinois & M. Bridge Co. v. Stone, 73 S. W. 453, 456, 174 Mo. 1, 63 L. R. A. 801.

Compensation.

The power of eminent domain is the right to take private property for public use, compensation therefor first having been made. City of Belleville v. Hallowell, 21 Pac. 105, 107, 41 Kan. 192.

Eminent domain is the right to resume the possession of private property for public use, on paying a just compensation therefor. Bloodgood v. Mohawk & H. R. R. Co. (N. Y.) 18 Wend. 9, 11, 13, 31 Am. Dec. 313. Eminent domain is the power of compelling a landowner to sell it for public purposes. In re Opinion of the Justices, 33 Atl. 1076, 1077, 66 N. H. 629.

A payment either made, or by the agreement of the parties to be made, is an essential part of the legal idea of a purchase, whether voluntary or compulsory. Voluntary and without payment, it is a donation; compulsory and without payment, it is a robbery. Orr v. Quimby, 54 N. H. 590, 611.

Eminent domain is the right of the government to take and appropriate private property to public use whenever the public exigency requires it, which can be done only on condition providing a reasonable compensation therefor. State v. Griffin, 39 Atl. 260, 69 N. H. 1, 41 L. R. A. 177, 76 Am. St. Rep. 139; Commonwealth v. Bearse, 132 Mass. 542, 547, 42 Am. Rep. 450; Forney v. Fremont, E. & M. V. R. Co., 36 N. W. 806, 808, 23 Neb. 465; Wells v. Somerset & K. R. Co., 47 Me. 345, 347. The obligation to make compensation, however, follows this right, as the shadow does the substance, and is concomitant with it. It is not in all countries a legal obligation, but it is an obligation of natural equity and justice everywhere. It is, however, incorporated in our organic law that compensation in money shall be made to the owner whenever his property is appropriated for the public welfare. That just, full, and adequate compensation must be made and in money is certain; more cannot be required. Symonds v. City of Cincinnati, 14 Ohio, 147, 174, 45 Am. Dec. 529.

The limit to the right of eminent domain in this state is that no man's property shall be taken by law without just compensation, nor, except in case of the state, without such compensation first assessed and tendered. Consumers' Gas Trust Co. v. Harless, 131 Ind. 446, 450, 29 N. E. 1062, 15 L. R. A. 505.

Extent of power.

The power of eminent domain is a prerogative of sovereignty. It is limited only by the public exigency upon which it is founded. All kinds of property are alike subject to it. Property once taken for public use may be taken for a different use whenever, in the judgment of the legislature, the public exigency therefor exists. Indianapolis & V. R. Co. v. Indianapolis & M. Rapid Transit Co. (Ind.) 67 N. E. 1013, 1014 (citing Worcester & N. R. Co. v. Railroad Com'rs, 118 Mass. 561; City of Terre Haute v. Evansville & T. H. R. Co., 149 Ind. 174, 46 N. E. 77, 37 L. R. A. 189).

The state may, in the exercise of the right of eminent domain, appropriate the water of any stream to any purpose which will subserve the public interests. Clark v. Cambridge & A. Irr. & Imp. Co., 64 N. W. 239, 241, 45 Neb. 798.

Public use or necessity.

It has its foundation in the imperative law of necessity, which alone justifies and limits its exercise. The states of the Union cannot exercise this right within their territorial limits for purposes which, under the division of powers between the United States and the individual states, are within the sphere of the sovereignty of the United States. Such purposes, though to be accomplished within the territorial limits of a state, are beyond the scope of the eminent domain of such state. The right of eminent domain in every sovereignty exists only for its own purposes. People v. Humphrey, 23 Mich. 471, 475, 9 Am. Rep. 94.

Eminent domain is the right of the government to appropriate private property to public uses in case of necessity. Hale v. Lawrence, 21 N. J. Law (1 Zab.) 714, 728, 47 Am. Dec. 190.

The right of eminent domain is to be exercised only when the public necessities or convenience require it. Consumers' Gas Trust Co. v. Harless, 131 Ind. 446, 450, 29 N. E. 1062, 15 L. R. A. 505.

The right of eminent domain, or inherent sovereign power, gives the legislature the control of private property for public use, and as a general rule it rests in the wisdom of the legislature to determine what is a public use. City of Pittsburg v. Scott, 1 Pa. (1 Barr) 309, 314.

Eminent domain is the power to take private property for public use. This right may be exercised when required for the public good in the construction of a railroad, by-road, canal, or the like. The right of eminent domain, however, does not permit the sovereign power to take the property of one citizen and transfer it to another, even for full compensation. In other words, the right of eminent domain gives to the legislature the control of private property for public uses, and for public uses only. Forney v.

Fremont, E. & M. V. R. Co., 38 N. W. 806, 808, 23 Neb. 465.

The right of eminent domain can only be invoked for the compulsory taking or the enforced appropriation of private property when some public exigency requires the exercise of that sovereign right. Blackman v. Halves, 72 Ind. 515, 518. Nor will the legislative declaration that the use for which authority is given to exercise the right to seize the property of the individual is a public use, make it a public use. Great Western Natural Gas & Oil Co. v. Hawkins, 66 N. E. 765, 768, 30 Ind. App. 557.

"Although the sovereign power in free governments may appropriate all the property, public as well as private, for public purposes, making compensation therefor, yet it has never been understood, at least never in our republic, that the sovereign power can take the private property of A. and give it to B. by the right of eminent domain, or that it can take it at all, except for public purposes, or that it can take it for public purposes without the duty and responsibility of making compensation for the sacrifice of the private property, and one for the good of the whole." Charles River Bridge v. Warren Bridge, 36 U. S. (11 Pet.) 420, 640, 9 L. Ed. 773, 938.

"The right of eminent domain does not imply a right, in the exercise of the power, to take the property of one citizen and transfer it to another, even for a full compensation, where the public interest will in no way be promoted by such transfer. And if the legislature should attempt thus to transfer the property of one individual to another, where there could be no pretense of benefit to the public by such exchange, it would probably be a violation of the contract by which the land was granted by the government to the individual, or to those under whom he claimed title, and repugnant to the Constitution of the United States." Beekman v. Saratoga & S. R. Co. (N. Y.) 3 Paige, 45, 73, 22 Am. Dec. 679.

The right of eminent domain is the right to take private property for public uses when needed to execute the powers conferred by the Constitution, and is possessed by the United States without the consent of the state. Ft. Leavenworth R. Co. v. Lowe, 5 Sup. Ct. 995, 998, 114 U. S. 525, 29 L. Ed. 264.

When the use is determined to be a public one, the necessity or expediency of appropriating any particular property is not a subject of judicial inquiry. Southern Illinois & M. Bridge Co. v. Stone, 73 S. W. 453, 456, 174 Mo. 1, 63 L. R. A. 301.

Due process of law affecting.

It is not necessary for the legislature, in the exercise of the right of "eminent domain," either directly or indirectly, through public officers or agents, to invest the proceedings with the forms or substance of judicial process. It may allow the owner to intervene and participate in the discussion before the officer or board to whom the power of determining whether the appropriation shall be made in a particular case, or it may provide that the officers shall act upon their own views of propriety and duty without the aid of a forensic contest. The appropriation of the property is an act of public administration, and the form and manner of its performance is such as the legislature shall in its discretion prescribe. Therefore the constitutional provision which declares that no citizen shall be deprived of his property without due process of law has no application to proceedings for the condemnation of property under the exercise of the right of eminent domain. People v. Smith, 21 N. Y. 595, 599.

As an estate.

Eminent domain is not of the nature of any estate or interest in property reserved or otherwise acquired, but simply a power to appropriate enough property as the public interests require, and which pertains to sovereignty as a necessary consonant and inextinguishable attribute. Jockheck v. Shawnee County, 37 Pac. 621, 625, 53 Kan. 780.

Police power distinguished.

See, also, "Police Power."

Eminent domain does not include the right to regulate property devoted to the use in which the public has an interest, but such regulation falls within the police power of the state. State v. Jacksonville Terminal Co., 27 South. 221, 223, 41 Fla. 363.

The destruction of a building to prevent the spread of a conflagration rests upon the ground of private, and not public, necessity, and hence is not the exercise of the right of eminent domain. American Print Works v. Lawrence, 21 N. J. Law (1 Zab.) 248, 257.

Taxation distinguished.

See, also, "Tax—Taxation."

Eminent domain is the right of the sovereignty to use the property of its members for the public good or public necessity, and, though in a broad sense it includes the right of levying taxes on private property, the term, in its modern acceptance, applies especially to the taking of some particular private property for some particular public use. Gilmer v. Lime Point, 18 Cal. 229, 251.

The exercise of the power of assessments for grading, paving, opening, widening, or vacating streets and other purposes for which, within proper limits, they may be authorized, is not by way of eminent domain, but referable solely to the taxing power. In re Vacation of Center St., 8 Atl. 56, 59, 115 Pa. 247.

EMIT.

"Emit," as used in United States Constitution, providing that no state shall emit bills of credit, means issue. Briscoe v. Bank of Kentucky, 36 U. S. (11 Pet.) 257, 316, 9 L. Ed. 709, 928.

The word "emit," in the constitutional provision declaring that no state shall emit bills of credit, means "an emission of paper; a putting off, putting out, putting forth, or issuing bills by a state for the payment of money at some time, by some person, and on credit." Briscoe v. Bank of Kentucky, 36 U. S. (11 Pet.) 257, 328, 9 L. Ed. 709, 928.

To emit bills of credit is to issue paper intended to circulate through the community for its ordinary purposes as money, which paper is redeemable at a future day. Craig v. Missouri, 29 U. S. (4 Pet.) 410, 418, 7 L. Ed. 903; Ramsey v. Cox, 26 Ark. 366, 369 (citing 4 Kent, Comm. 408; 2 Story, Const. Lim. §§ 1358-1370; Craig v. Missouri, 29 U. S. [4 Pet.] 431, 7 L. Ed. 903). And it does not mean those contracts by which a state binds itself to pay money at a future day for services actually received or for money borrowed for present use. Craig v. Missouri, 29 U. S. (4 Pet.) 410, 432, 7 L. Ed. 903; Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Texas, 20 Sup. Ct. 545, 552, 177 U. S. 66, 44 L. Ed. 672.

EMOLUMENT.

Emolument is the profit arising from office or employment; that which is received as compensation for services, or which is annexed to the possession of office, as salary, fees, and perquisites. Reals v. Smith, 56 P. 690, 692, 8 Wyo. 159; Apple v. Crawford County, 105 Pa. 300, 303, 51 Am. Rep. 205, 14 Wkly. Notes Cas. 322, 324, 41 Leg. Int. 322; Vansant v. State, 53 Atl. 711, 714, 96 Md. 110; Town of Bruce v. Dickey, 6 N. E. 435, 439, 116 Ill. 527.

"Emolument," as used in Comp. Laws, § 6303, providing that every executive officer who asks or receives any emolument, excepting such as is authorized by law, for doing any official act, is guilty of a misdemeanor, includes the word "fee," and also the word "compensation." State v. Bauer, 47 N. W. 378, 379, 1 N. D. 273.

"Emoluments," as used in Act Cong. April 30, 1802, providing that when the actual emoluments of any collector exceed a certain sum the excess should be accounted for, necessarily embraces in the limitation the fees as well as the commissions belonging to the office. The argument would be quite as strong in favor of excluding "commissions" as in the case of "fees," as the one can in no more appropriate sense be regarded as emoluments of office than the other. These terms denote a compensation for a particular kind of service to be performed by the officer, and are distinguishable from each other, and are so used and understood by Congress in the several compensation acts. They also are distinguishable from the term "emoluments," that being more comprehensive and embracing every species of compensation or pecuniary profit derived from a discharge of the duties of the office. Hoyt v. United States, 51 U. S. (10 How.) 109, 135, 13 L. Ed. 348, 576,

Board of prisoners.

Const. art. 3, § 13, declares that no law shall extend the term of any public office, or increase or diminish the salary of the officer, or emoluments of his office, after his election or appointment. Held, that the word "emolument" imported more than salary or fees, embracing all the profits derived from an office, which would include the compensation provided to be paid to a sheriff for the boarding of prisoners; and hence, the amount having been fixed at a certain sum per diem, the Legislature had no power, during the sheriff's term of office, to provide that the compensation for such service should rest in the discretion of a majority of the judges of the court of quarter sessions. Apple v. Crawford County, 105 Pa. 300, 303, 51 Am. Rep. 205, 14 Wkly. Notes Cas. 322, 324; Id., 41 Leg. Int. 322.

Exemption from military duty.

The word "emolument" means profit or advantage, and may, in our opinion, comprehend an exemption from military duty, as the term is used in the federal statute prescribing the oath to be taken by those who are employed in the care or carriage of the mail, and declaring that such oath shall be taken before they enter upon their duties, or become entitled to receive the emoluments of their offices. Twombly v. Pinkham, 8 N. H. 370, 376.

Interest on official deposits.

The term "emoluments," as used in a statute providing that county treasurers shall receive as their compensation an annual salary, to be paid out of the fees, commissions, and emoluments in their offices, was clearly intended to be taken in a general and comprehensive sense, so as to embrace all other proper receipts of the office not included within the terms "fees" or "commissions" as defined and understood. To hold that "emolument" as used in this connection means any accretion, increment, gain, or profit to the office is in accord with common sense and common usage as well as with the established rules for the interpretation of the English language and for the construction of statutes. Such emoluments do not include interest on money deposited by the treasurer without the consent of the county commissioners, as the statute forbids the deriving of benefit by any officer from the deposit of public funds in his charge. Arapahoe County Com'rs v. Hall, 49 Pac. 370, 371, 372, 9 Colo. App. 538.

The term "emoluments," as used in Code, art. 17, § 14, making the bond of the clerk of court liable for the "emoluments of his office," includes interest drawn by him on license fees deposited in bank. Vansant v. State, 53 Atl. 711, 714, 96 Md. 110.

EMOTIONAL INSANITY.

The term "emotional insanity," or "mania transitoria," applies to the case of one in the possession of his ordinary reasoning faculties who allows his passions to convert him into a temporary maniac. Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Terry, 82 U. S. (15 Wall.) 580, 583, 21 L. Ed. 236.

It is not error to state, in a charge in a criminal case upon the defense of insanity, that the law rejects the doctrine of what is called emotional insanity, which begins on the eve of the criminal act, and leaves off when it is committed. People v. Kernaghan, 14 Pac. 566, 568, 72 Cal. 609.

EMPANEL.

See "Impanel."

EMPIRICISM.

"Empiricism" is defined as a practice of medicine founded on mere experience, without the aid of science or the knowledge of principles. Nelson v. State Board of Health, 57 S. W. 501, 503, 108 Ky. 769, 22 Ky. Law Rep. 438, 50 L. R. A. 383.

Where defendant was engaged in the practice of magnetic healing without license provided by the statute, it may be presumed that he was engaged in "empiricism," which is defined as a practice of medicine, using that term in its popular sense, founded on mere experience, without the aid of science or a knowledge of its principles. Parks v. State, 64 N. E. 862, 868, 159 Ind. 211, 59 L. R. A. 180.

EMPLOY.

Under the constitution of the Methodist Church, giving the president of the annual conference, during its recess, power to employ such ministers and preachers as are duly recommended, the president of the conference has power to station a minister in a particular church during a recess of the conference without the consent of such church. Robinson v. Cochen, 46 N. Y. Supp. 55, 57, 18 App. Div. 325.

Act Feb. 28, 1887, requires all railroad engineers to be examined as to color blindness, and requires the railroad employing them to pay the expenses of such examination. In construing the statute, it was held that the provision relating to employing had no reference to the mere contract under which the services were performed, so as to affect a contract of hiring made in another state, but that it relates to and regulates the services procured to be performed for the corporation. Its meaning in the statute is to make use of; to intrust with some agency or duty; making use of; intrusting with some agency or duty. Nashville, C. & St. L. Ry. Co. v. State, 3 South. 702, 703, 83 Ala. 71 (citing Worcester's Dict.).

In a United States statute providing for a forfeiture by any person building, fitting out, or otherwise preparing or sending away any ship; or causing any of certain acts to be done with intent to employ such ship or vessel for the purpose of procuring any negroes to be transported as slaves, "to employ" is not equivalent to, and synonymous with, "should be employed," as used in an indictment averring the fitting out of a vessel with the intent that it should be employed in such trade. United States v. Gooding, 25 U. S. (12 Wheat.) 460, 476, 6 L. Ed. 693.

Compensation implied.

In St. 1890, c. 437, § 2, providing that whoever contracts to buy or sell securities or commodities on credit or margin, with no intention to perform the contract by actual receipt or delivery, or whoever employs another so to buy or sell in his behalf, may sue for and recover from the other party to the contract any payment made thereon, the term "employ" implies services rendered or to be rendered for compensation, and is nearly or quite synonymous with "hire," though, as said by the authors of the Standard Dictionary, a word of more dignity than that. Where, therefore, one, without compensation, and without any understanding or agreement that he shall receive compensation, renders a service to another as a friendly act, and for his accommodation, it cannot be fairly said that the party receiving the benefit of the service employs the other, and the party rendering the service cannot be fairly said to be employed by the other; nor can it make any difference that the service is rendered at the request of the party receiving the benefit of it. What is done under such circumstances is more in the nature of a favor done by one person to another, than of an employment of one by the other. Bingham v. Scott, 58 N. H. 687, 689, 177 Mass. 208.

"Employ" means to use as an instrument or means of effecting an object. It is a word of a more enlarged signification than the word "hire." A man hired to labor is employed, but a man may be employed in work who is not hired. Materials are employed for building lots, but they are not hired. A man who does his own work, or the work of another, is employed in it, although he receives no wages. McCluskey v. Cromwell, 11 N. Y. (1 Kern.) 593, 605.

A statute provided for the recording of an assignment for future earnings in the town where the assignor is employed, when not a resident of this state. It is held that the word "employed" indicates that the assignment contemplated by the statute was an assignment of wages owned under a contract of hiring by one employed, and not assignments of contracts. Abbott v. Davidson, 25 Atl. 839, 840, 18 R. L. 91.

The term "employ" has a different meaning at times than to have one work for hire. It sometimes means to use, to occupy; to intrust; and hence, in an action upon a partnership liability of defendant as a member and officer of an unincorporated association to recover premiums awarded by it, he having acted as a judge of the races at the fair, an instruction speaking of his acts at the fair as those of an employé was not faulty or misleading, though there was no evidence that he was working for hire. Murray v. Walker, 48 N. W. 1075, 1077, 83 Iowa, 202.

"Employ" means ordinarily to use; to have in service; to cause to be engaged in doing something; and hence, as used in Code, § 1125, providing that the city council shall detail and employ from two to four special policemen for each precinct at any special election, it does not imply an obligation to pay for the services rendered. Mousseau v. City of Sioux City, 84 N. W. 1027, 1028, 113 Iowa, 246.

Contract required.

A charter of a city providing that the board of education shall have power to employ and dismiss teachers means nothing more than that the board was clothed with power to contract with suitable persons to engage in the work of teaching in the public schools of the city at a fixed salary or compensation, so that where the board had, immediately after balloting for a teacher, refused to declare her elected, no contract of employment existed. Malloy v. Board of Education of City of San Jose, 36 Pac. 948, 949, 102 Cal. 642.

"Employ" carries with it the idea, and almost the essence, of a contract, when used to the effect that a person has been employed. United States v. Nourse (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 192, 195.

As applicable to skilled labor or profession.

To employ "is to engage or use another as an agent or substitute in transacting business or the performance of some services. It may be skilled labor, or the service of the scientist or professional man, as well as servile or unskilled manual labor." Gurney v. Atlantic & G. W. R. Co., 58 N. Y. 358, 371.

EMPLOYE.

See "Co-employé"; "Railroad Employé."

Webster defines the word "employé" as one who is employed. The word, although of French derivation, was long since transplanted and adopted as an English, or at least an American, word. In this country it is of such common use, that its meaning is not at all uncertain. Thus the use of the term in describing defendant as an employé, in an indictment under Rev. St. Ind. 1881, § 1944, defining and prescribing the punishment for embezzlement by an officer, agent, attorney, clerk, servant, or employé, is not bad, upon a motion to quash, although the indictment does not state the position held by the defendant, or the capacity in which he was engaged. Ritter v. State, 12 N. E. 501, 502, 111 Ind. 324; Nichols v. State, 63 N. E. 783, 785, 28 Ind. App. 674.

An employé is a person who is employed; one who works for wages or a salary. In re Cortland Mfg. Co., 45 N. Y. Supp. 630, 631, 21 Misc. Rep. 226.

An employé is one who works for an employer; a person working for salary or wage. The word is applied to any one so working, but usually only to clerks, workmen, laborers, etc., and but rarely to the higher officers of a government or corporation, or to domestic servants. Palmer v. Van Santvoord, 47 N. E. 915, 153 N. Y. 612, 38 L. R. A. 402.

The term "laborer" is no more comprehensive than the term "employé," and does not include a more extensive class of services than such word. The term refers to those in regular and continued service. Within the ordinary acceptance of the term, one who is engaged to render service in a particular transaction is not an employé. The word implies continued service, and includes those employed for a single transaction. Frick Co. v. Norfolk & O. V. R. Co. (U. S.) 86 Fed. 725, 738, 32 C. C. A. 31 (citing Louisville, E. & St. L. R. Co. v. Wilson, 138 U. S. 501, 11 Sup. Ct. 405, 34 L. Ed. 1023); Clark v. Renninger, 42 Atl. 928, 929, 89 Md. 66, 44 L. R. A. 413; Lewis v. Fisher, 30 Atl. 608, 609, 80 Md. 139, 26 L. R. A. 278, 45 Am. St. Rep. 327.

Employés are generally considered as embracing laborers and servants, and those occupying other inferior positions (citing People v. Board of Police, 75 N. Y. 38, 39), and as used in Act Feb. 20, 1891, § 1, providing for liens for claims of laborers and employés, "employé" is synonymous with "laborer," and will not include the owner of a threshing machine, for work done thereby. Johnston v. Barrills, 41 Pac. 656, 658, 27 Or. 251, 50 Am. St. Rep. 717.

The act of 1897, referring to wages of the employé of an insolvent corporation, states that the term "employé" means "a mechanic, workman or laborer, who works for another for hire." Cochran v. A. S. Baker Co., 61 N. Y. Supp. 724, 30 Misc. Rep. 48.

There is no distinction between the terms "laborer" and "employé," as regards the element of personal service. Farmer v. St. Croix Power Co., 93 N. W. 830, 834, 117 Wis. 76.

Agent.

The terms "clerk, servant, or employé," within the meaning of a statute making it criminal for any clerk, servant, or other person in the employ of another to embezzle moneys received by virtue of such employment, do not include an independent agent for the solicitation of newspaper subscriptions and jobwork, who is charged on the books of the newspaper company at a definite price with the papers and bills of jobwork sent him, and therefore his collection and appropriation of the moneys paid him for the same only render him liable as a debtor. Commonwealth v. Behle (Pa.) 1 Lack. Leg. N. 303.

Attorney.

A lawyer employed by a railroad company on a yearly salary, payable monthly, is not an employé, within the meaning of Sand. & H. Dig. § 1425, providing that no preference shall be allowed among the creditors of insolvent corporations, except for the wages and salaries of laborers and employés. Latta v. Lonsdale, 107 Fed. 585, 47 C. C. A. 1, 52 L. R. A. 479.

In an order appointing a receiver of a railroad, authorizing him to pay out of the income, besides the current expenses and charges, all wages due to employés at the date of the order for services within 90 days theretofore, "employés" means regular employés employed generally, and not for a particular act, and includes a lawyer at a fixed salary per month. Finance Co. of Pennsylvania v. Charleston, C. & C. R. Co. (U. S.) 52 Fed. 526, 527.

An attorney retained on a salary is not an employé, within Laws 1892, c. 688, § 54, imposing on stockholders a personal liability for corporate debts to employés. Bristol v. Smith, 53 N. E. 42, 43, 158 N. Y. 157; Same

v. Kretz, 49 N. Y. Supp. 404, 406, 22 Misc. Rep. 55.

An attorney employed in a single suit is not within the meaning of the word "employé." Louisville, E. & St. L. R. Co. v. Wilson, 11 Sup. Ct. 405, 407, 138 U. S. 501, 34 L. Ed. 1023.

An order of court directing a receiver of a railroad to pay debts to the laborers and employés of the corporation is to be construed as meaning all persons employed by and rendering services for the corporation, and hence to include an attorney rendering legal services for the corporation. Gurney v. Atlantic & G. W. R. Co., 58 N. Y. 358, 366.

"Employé," as used in Gen. Laws, c. 249, § 42, enacting that no person shall be charged as trustee for any funds which are held by him in the capacity of clerk, cashier, or other employé of the principal defendant, and which have been received in the ordinary course of such employment, does not include an attorney collecting money for such principal defendant. The sense in which the Legislature used the word "employé" in this statute is readily ascertained by the application of the familiar rule of statutory construction that, where general words follow particular ones, they are to be construed as applicable to persons or things of the same general character or class with those specified. The application of the general term "employé" after "clerk" and "cashier" brings this case exactly within the rule; and, besides, it must be borne in mind that, if the Legislature had intended to include all employés, there was no occasion to make any enumeration whatever. Wheeler v. Joslin, 63 N. H. 164, 166.

Attorney for special service.

Within the ordinary acceptance of the term, one who is engaged to render services in a particular transaction is not an employé. The term "employé" implies continuity of service, and excludes those employed for a special and single transaction. An attorney of an individual retained for a single suit is not his employé. It is true, he was engaged to render services, but his engagement is rather that of a contractor than that of an employé. Clark v. Renninger, 42 Atl. 928, 929, 89 Md. 66, 44 L. R. A. 413.

An order appointing a receiver for a railroad company, and authorizing him to pay out of the income the wages of employés that may have been earned within a certain period, does not include the wages of counsel employed for a special purpose. Louisville, E. & St. L. R. Co. v. Wilson, 11 Sup. Ct. 405, 407, 138 U. S. 501, 34 L. Ed. 1023, 1025.

"Employé," as used in Code, art. 47, § 15, providing that all moneys due and owing from a person or corporation making an assignment for the benefit of creditors, for wages or salaries to clerks, servants, or employés, should first be paid in full out of such property or estate, cannot be construed to include an attorney at law. The word "employé," though generally and ordinarily quite comprehensive, cannot be given a wider meaning than the cognate words, "clerks and servants," with which it is associated, but must be restricted in its signification so as to include only persons who perform the same kind of service that is due from clerks or servants. A statute which treats of persons of an inferior rank cannot by any general word be so extended as to embrace a superior. The class first mentioned is to be taken as the most comprehensive. "Specialia generalibus derogant." The more general word, "employé," must, by reason of its association and collocation with the words "clerks" and "servants," be restricted to a meaning synonymous with their meaning, and it cannot include a person of a higher grade of service than the more limited terms embrace. The term "employé" refers to those in regular and continual service. Within the ordinary acceptance of the term, one who is engaged to render service in a particular transaction is not an employé. Lewis v. Fisher, 30 Atl. 608, 609, 80 Md. 139, 26 L. R. A. 278, 45 Am. St. Rep. 327.

Bookkeeper.

"Employee" is derived from the French word "employé," and means one who is employed, and, as used in Laws 1885, c. 376, § 1, providing that the wages of employees of an insolvent corporation shall be preferred to other claims, is used in its broad sense of all who are employed, and hence would include a bookkeeper. People v. Beveridge Brewing Co., 36 N. Y. Supp. 525, 526, 91 Hun, 313; In re Stryker, 53 N. E. 525, 158 N. Y. 526, 70 Am. St. Rep. 489; Id., 26 N. Y. Supp. 209, 212, 73 Hun, 327.

"Employé," as used in Laws 1885, c. 376, is the correlative of "employer," and hence one who is employed to assist the general manager of a corporation to assist in keeping its books, and to clean the office and ship goods, is within the statute. Brown v. A. B. C. Fence Co., 5 N. Y. Supp. 95, 96, 52 Hun, 151.

"Employés," as used in 22 St. at Large S. C. p. 502, giving to employés of factories, mines, etc., a lien for their wages or salaries, does not include the bookkeeper of a mining company. Malcomson v. Wappoo Mills (U. S.) 86 Fed. 102, 198.

Civil engineer.

An employé is one whose time and skill are occupied in the business of his employer. A civil engineer of a railroad company, traveling on duty for his company upon a pass, such as is usual for employés to travel on over the line of the road, and who is injured by reason of a wreck while so traveling, is an "employé," and not a passenger, so as not to be entitled to recover for injuries received. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Smith (U. S.) 67 Fed. 524, 527, 14 C. C. A. 509, 31 L. R. A. 321.

Collector.

Rev. St. § 1944, provides that any agent, clerk, servant, or employé who shall appropriate moneys in his control belonging to his employer is guilty of embezzlement. Section 1945 provides that attorneys and persons engaged in making collections for others, who, having under their control moneys belonging to their employer or client, on reasonable demand refuse to pay over the same, are guilty of embezzlement. An indictment charged that the accused, being the employé, clerk, servant, and collector of a certain firm, for the collecting and keeping of the accounts of bills and accounts due belonging to such firm, received and took into his possession from the moneys of such firm a certain sum; and it was held not bad for uncertainty as to which crime was charged, as the words "collector" and "collecting" did not charge a crime under section 1945, so as to make a demand necessary; that section applying to persons in the nature of independent contractors, not servants or employés. If a person engaged in making collections for others is a collector, by an equally fair interpretation a clerk, servant, employé, or keeper of accounts so engaged may be collectors, and a collector may be servant, clerk, employé, and keeper of accounts. Construing the words used in the indictment in their usual acceptance in common language, the charge placed the accused in the class designated in section 1944 by describing him as a clerk, servant, employé, collector, and keeper of accounts. These terms are readily interchangeable and overlying, and in this instance derive a common character and meaning from their relative position in and formation of the entire sentence. In 2 Bish. Cr. Law, § 333, he suggests that, in every relation on which embezzlement may be predicated, the position of the person embezzling must have a correlative; that is, there cannot be a clerk without an employer, a servant without a master, an agent without a principal. In Gillett, Cr. Law, citing from Wharton, the author says: "The term 'servant' may include employés, cashiers, collectors. A person has been held a clerk who was employed to keep accounts and pay moneys thereon. The word 'employé' means a person employed. In general, the term 'agent' designates those employments where the persons exercising them are not under the immediate control of the superior." State v. Sarlls, 34 N. E. 1129, 1130, 135 Ind. 195.

Contractor.

Webster defines "employé" as one who is employed; a "contractor," as one who contracts to do anything. Those definitions are very general, but they obviously suggest, applied specifically, that an employé is one who is employed to perform personal services, and a contractor one who engages to do a particular thing; the idea of personal service not being a necessary element in the bargain. In the Standard Dictionary it is said that an employé is a person who is employed; one who works for wages or a salary, or who is engaged in the service of another; a contractor is one who executes plans under a contract; a subcontractor is one who contracts with the principal contractor to do work embraced in the latter's contract; that is, obviously, one who contracts to execute some integral part of the work covered by the scheme of the principal contract. By the Century Dictionary we are informed that an employé is one who works for an employer; a person working for a salary or wages; usually clerks, workmen, laborers, etc.; that a contractor is one who contracts to furnish supplies, or to construct work or erect buildings, or perform any work or service, at a certain price or rate; that a subcontractor is one who takes a part or the whole of the work from the principal contractor. Thus it will be seen, without any extended analysis of the various lexical definitions, that the significant element in the relation of an employé and his employer, specifically considered, is personal service, while the significant element in such relation between a contractor and his principal is the work, as an entirety, to be performed by him. Farmer v. St. Croix Power Co., 93 N. W. 830, 834, 117 Wis. 76.

Contractors who have entire control of the work to be done, and were in no way subject to the control or direction of the person with whom they contracted, while performing the work they contracted to do for them, are not laborers, in the sense that they were earning wages of some person for the work to be done by them. To constitute laborers or employés, who can be said to be earning wages of an employer, they must be holding such a relation to the employer that he can direct and control them in and about the work which they are doing for him. It does not include the owner of a steam wood factory, who, under contract with another, who furnishes rough planks, manufactures such planks for the latter. Lang v. Simmons, 25 N. W. 650, 652, 64 Wis. 525.

Under Acts 1854, c. 23, which exempts from attachment the wages or hire of a "laborer or other employé," in the hands of their employers, a builder who contracts, for the consideration of 5 per cent. on the entire amount of the cost of the building, to erect, superintend, and otherwise direct the erection of the building, is included. "A laborer, when engaged in services under a contract for compensation, is an employé; but, after designating 'laborer' in the statute, there is added 'or other employé.' Surely in this was meant more than a laborer, or else why, after using that word, add those which follow? If they only mean persons who are included within the meaning of the word 'laborer,' they are mere tautology and useless." Moore v. Heaney, 14 Md. 558, 562.

The term "employés" indicates persons hired to work for wages as the employer may direct, and does not embrace the case of the employment of a person carrying on a distinct trade or calling to perform services independent of the control of the employer. Campfield v. Lang (U. S.) 25 Fed. 128, 131.

In Revision, p. 188, providing that, in case of the insolvency of any corporation, the laborers in the employ thereof shall have a preferred lien upon the assets thereof for the amount of wages due them, respectively, and the word "laborers" shall be construed to include all persons doing labor or service, of whatever character, for, or as workmen or employés in the regular employ of, such corporations, "employés" means only the persons who actually perform the labor or service, and does not include a person furnishing the labor or service of others under contract to do the whole business of a corporation, or of a particular branch of it, as the latter is a contractor, and not an employé. Lehigh Coal & Navigation Co. v. Central R. Co. of New Jersey, 29 N. J. Eq. (2 Stew.) 252, 255.

An "employé," as the term is used in Rev. St. Ind. § 5286, giving employés of corporations a lien upon the corporation property, is a person "bound in some degree, at least, to the duties of a servant, and not a mere contractor, bound only to produce, or cause to be produced, a certain result." Vane v. Newcombe, 10 Sup. Ct. 60, 63, 132 U. S. 220, 33 L. Ed. 310.

An independent contractor to mine phosphate rock at a certain price per ton, employing others to do the work, is not a laborer or employé, within Act S. C. March 5, 1897, providing for laborers' liens. Malcomson v. Wappoo Mills (U. S.) 85 Fed. 907, 911.

The term "employés," as used in Act Ky. March 20, 1876, § 1, providing that when the property of any railroad company or any manufacturing establishment shall in any wise come to be distributed among the creditors, the employés of said company, owner or operator of such business, shall have a lien on so much of such property and effects as may have been embarked in such business, cannot be construed to include contractors supplying laborers and teams for the construction and repair of a railroad; being paid for the same by the day, and either party having the right to stop work at the end of any day. Tod v. Kentucky Union R. Co. (U. S.) 52 Fed. 241, 243, 3 C. C. A. 60, 18 L. R. A. 305.

In Laws 1862, c. 169, § 7, which declares that every railroad company shall be liable for all damages sustained by any person in consequence of any neglect of the agents, or by any mismanagement of the engineer or other employés, of the corporation, to any person sustaining such damages, "employés" applies to conductors, agents, superintendents, and others engaged in operating the road, and the like, but does not apply to contractors or persons building or constructing the roadbed, or laying down the ties and rails. Foley v. Chicago, R. I. & P. Ry. Co., 21 N. W. 124, 126, 64 Iowa, 644.

"Employés," as used in a statute requiring the payment of the employés of a railroad, refers to conductors, agents, superintendents, those engaged in operating the road, and the like, and not to contractors or persons building or constructing the roadbed, or laying down the ties and rails. Ney v. Dubuque & S. C. R. Co., 20 Iowa, 347, 351.

St. 1868, c. 448, making the owners or lessees of mills liable for certain acts of persons "in their employ" in the mill, does not include a person who had contracted to manufacture shingles for the defendant, and who ran and controlled the mill himself, and was not subject to the direction or control of the defendant. State v. Emerson, 72 Me. 455, 456.

In Balch v. New York & O. M. R. Co., 46 N. Y. 521, it was held that the words "employé" and "laborer," as used in the general railroad act of 1850, which gives the laborer a claim against the company for the indebtedness of a contractor, are used in their ordinary and usual sense, and imply the personal services and work of the individual designed to be protected. The former does not include one who contracts for and furnishes the labor and services of others, or who contracts for and furnishes a team or teams for work, with or without his own services. Fidelity & Deposit Co. v. Parkinson (Neb.) 94 N. W. 120, 122.

Corporation.

In the statute providing that the stockholders of manufacturing and mining corporations shall be individually liable for all debts due and owing laborers, servants, apprentices, and employés for services rendered such corporation, "employés" is qualified, and its import and meaning limited and controlled, by its association with the preceding words, "laborers, servants, and apprentices," in accordance with the familiar maxim, "Noscitur a sociis." It does not include a corporation which performs services for a corporation of the kind designated in the statute. Dukes v. Love, 97 Ind. 341, 344.

Drayman.

A drayman in the regular employ of a corporation, and whose services are of a kind or class which the corporation must have in order to continue its business, is an employé, within Revision, p. 188, § 63, giving laborers in the employ of a corporation, upon its insolvency, a lien upon the assets for their wages, and providing that the word "laborers" shall be construed to include all persons doing labor or service, of whatever character, for, or as workmen or employés in the regular employ of, such corporation. "Laborer," though less comprehensive than "employé," is by statute made its equivalent, and the correlative of "employer." The word "employé" properly describes any one who renders labor or services to another. Watson v. Watson Mfg. Co., 30 N. J. Eq. (3 Stew.) 588, 589.

Engineer.

25 Stat. 855, § 10, rendering any person acting for or employed by a railroad company guilty of a misdemeanor in refusing to handle interstate freight, includes locomotive engineers. Toledo, A. A. & N. M. R. Co. v. Pennsylvania Co. (U. S.) 54 Fed. 730, 736, 19 L. R. A. 387.

Family of employé.

The terms "officers" or "employés," in the exception to the provision of the interstate commerce act forbidding the giving of passes, that nothing in the act shall be construed to prevent railroads from giving free carriage to their own officers and employés, cannot be construed to include the families of officers or employés. Ex parte Koehler (U. S.) 31 Fed. 315, 321.

Fireman.

"Employé," as used in a constitutional amendment prohibiting the granting of any extra compensation to, or any increase in the compensation of, any public officer, employé, agent, or servant, to take effect during the continuance of the office of any person whose salary might be increased thereby, includes a fireman employed at a yearly salary, who is to hold his office during good behavior. The express mention of "employé" is not to be nullified by the subsequent use of the words "officer" and "salary." Wright v. City of Hartford, 50 Conn. 546, 547.

In Laws 1890, c. 388, § 1, requiring municipal corporations to pay weekly each and every employé the wages earned to within six days of the date of such payment, means a laborer or workman, and does not apply to a member of the fire department. People v. City of Buffalo, 11 N. Y. Supp. 314, 317, 57 Hun, 577.

Hospital physician.

The terms "officers, clerks, subordinate officers, and employes," in Act June 1, 1885, relating to cities of the first class, in reference to the appointment of officers, clerks, subordinate officers, and employes, do not include the medical staff, or the board of visiting physicians of the Philadelphia Hospital, consisting of specialists or experts, in the various departments of medical science, who perform gratuitous services. Commonwealth v. Fitler, 23 Atl. 568, 571, 147 Pa. 288, 15 L. R. A. 205.

Insurance adjuster.

In Code, art. 47, § 15, providing that whenever any person or body corporate shall have its property taken possession of by a receiver in the distribution of the property or estate, all moneys due and owing for wages or salaries to clerks, servants, or employes should be first paid in full, the word "employes" has a limited meaning, and cannot be applied in its broadest sense, or as including every one in the service or employment of a corporation or individual. The statute did not mean by "employes" persons rendering services of a higher degree than clerks. The duties of an adjuster of an insurance company being of a higher character than clerk, such an officer, while in a general sense an employe, cannot, by any fair rule of construction, be considered an employe, in the limited and restricted meaning of that term, as used in the statute. Boston & A. R. Co. v. Mercantile Trust & Deposit Co., 34 Atl. 778, 782, 82 Md. 535, 38 L. R. A. 97.

Janitor.

The janitor of the hall of a town of less than 12,000 inhabitants is not an employe of the town, who can invoke St. 1896, c. 517, § 6 (providing that, in towns in which the civil service act has not been applied to the labor service, the selectmen of the towns shall take such action as may be necessary to secure the employment of veterans in the labor service of their respective towns in preference to all other persons except women), in his behalf, by mandamus, as a veteran of the late Civil War, as the Legislature intended the words "labor service" to mean such service as defined by the rules of the civil service commissioners, and their rules do not include such an employe. Johnson v. Kimball, 48 N. E. 1020, 170 Mass. 58.

Manager or superintendent.

"Employes," as used in Laws 1885, c. 375, giving preference to the wages of employes, operatives, and laborers of corporations, when a receiver is appointed, means something more than operatives and laborers, but does not include every person in the employment of a corporation. Citing People v. Remington, 45 Hun, 329, affirmed in 109 N. Y. 631, 18 N. E. 680, which held that a superintendent of a corporation was not an employe, and Palmer v. Van Santvoord, 153 N. Y. 612, 47 N. E. 915, 38 L. R. A. 402, holding that the manager of a corporation was not an employe, so that a person who has absolute control and supervision of the affairs of a corporation is a general manager, and is not entitled to the preference under the act. In re American Lace & Fancy Paper Works, 51 N. Y. Supp. 818, 820, 30 App. Div. 321. So, also, in re Stryker, 53 N. E. 525, 158 N. Y. 526, 70 Am. St. Rep. 489.

A superintendent of a mining company will not be included in the term "employe," as used in 22 St. at Large S. C. p. 502, giving to employes of factories and mines a lien for their wages or salaries. Malcomson v. Wappoo Mills (U. S.) 86 Fed. 192, 198.

Officer of corporation.

"Employes," as used in Corporation Act, § 63, providing that, where a corporation is insolvent, the laborers and employes shall have a preferred lien for their wages, cannot be construed to include officers. The first legislation upon this subject only provided a preference for laborers. By universal consent, this had reference only to those who performed manual labor, of whatever nature, but it became manifest to common understanding that there was another class who did equal service in the interests of corporations, and of their creditors, whose vocation was of a different character from that of mere manual labor. There seemed to be no just reason for omitting the latter class from the preference, and the Legislature extended the favor which it had given to laborers to this class, and designated them as "employes." Weatherby v. Saxony Woolen Co. (N. J.) 29 Atl. 326. See, also, Bristol v. Kretz, 49 N. Y. Supp. 404, 406, 22 Misc. Rep. 55.

The president of a railroad company will not be said to be a laborer or employe, within the meaning of the statute providing that the wages of laborers and employes shall not be subject to garnishment or attachment except for public dues. The term "wages" indicates inconsiderable pay, without excluding salary, which is suggestive of larger compensation for personal services. But its application to laborers and employes certainly conveys the idea of a subordinate occupation, which is not very remunerative, but under immediate supervision. South & N. A. R. Co. v. Falkner, 49 Ala. 115, 118.

Public officer.

"Among lexicographers the definition given by Prof. Whitney in the Century Dictionary of the word 'employé' seems to me to be the most lucid and comprehensive. It is as follows: 'One who works for an employer; a person working for a salary or wages, applied to any one working, but usually only to clerks, workmen, laborers, etc., and but rarely to the higher officers of a corporation or government, or to domestic servants.' As used in Laws 1890, c. 388, requiring municipal corporations to pay weekly every employé engaged in its business, it does not include a clerk in the mayor's office, the secretary and treasurer of the park commission, a member of the fire department, a school-teacher, and a patrolman on the police force. People v. City of Buffalo, 11 N. Y. Supp. 314, 315, 57 Hun, 577.

An officer is distinguished from the employé in the greater importance, dignity, and independence of his position; in being required to take an official oath, and perhaps to give an official bond; in the liability to be called to account as a public officer for misfeasance or nonfeasance in office, usually, though not necessarily, in the tenure of his position. State ex rel. Kane v. Johnson, 27 S. W. 399, 401, 123 Mo. 43 (citing People v. Langdon, 40 Mich. 673); State ex rel. Cameron v. Shannon, 33 S. W. 1137, 1144, 133 Mo. 139.

"Employés," as used with respect to classes of public servants, refers to those whose employment is merely contracted for, and differs from officers, whose functions appertain to the administration of government. Moll v. Sbisa, 25 South. 141, 51 La. Ann. 290.

A member of the Capitol police, appointed by the commissioner of public buildings, is an employé in the office of the commissioner, within a resolution of Congress authorizing an increase of salary of all the civil officers and other clerks and employés in the office of such commissioner. Mallory v. United States (U. S.) 3 Ct. Cl. 257, 259.

A police surgeon is not a clerk or employé, within New York Charter 1873, c. 755, § 2, giving the police board power to fix the salaries and compensation of all clerks appointed by the board, and of all employés whom they may be authorized to appoint; he is an officer, within the meaning of the charter. Certainly such surgeons are not clerks, and, as employés are usually considered as embracing laborers and servants, and those occupying inferior positions, they can scarcely be included in that class of persons. People v. Board of Police, 75 N. Y. 38, 41.

"Employé," as used in Civ. Code, tit. 6, entitled "Services," § 1965 et seq., relating to the contract of employment, and regulating the duties, obligations, and liabilities of employer and employé, means the same as "servant." There is no necessary distinction between the terms. The term "employé" may sound more euphonious than the term "servant," but there is no substantial difference between the two, except as the statute makes a difference. All public officers are servants of the people. A person appointed and employed by resolution of a city as driver of the street wagon, and to care for its horses, at a certain sum per month is an employé of the city, and not an officer thereof. The relation of master and servant was created by the employment—nothing more nor less—just as the relation is created and regarded between a railroad or other private corporation where persons are employed to perform special service, not an independent calling. White v. City of Alameda, 56 Pac. 795, 796, 124 Cal. 95.

The term "employé," within the meaning of Laws 1890, c. 388, providing that every municipal corporation in the state shall pay each and every employé weekly the wages earned by such employé to within six days of the date of payment, does not include a public officer. In People v. Board of Police, 75 N. Y. 38, the court says "employés are usually considered as embracing laborers and servants, and those occupying inferior positions." People v. Myers, 11 N. Y. Supp. 217, 25 Abb. N. C. 368.

Salaried servant.

The word "employés," as used in Laws 1883, c. 349, giving a preference for wages due laborers, servants, and employés in case of the assignment of their employer, includes a stockholder in the assigning corporation, who has been engaged in the service of the corporation on a salary. "If the word 'servants' or 'employés' in the clause of the act quoted, meant nothing more nor different than the word 'laborers' therein, then they are extremely tautological and a useless repetition." Conlee Lumber Co. v. Ripon Lumber & Mfg. Co., 29 N. W. 285, 287, 66 Wis. 481.

Within Laws 1885, c. 376, providing that the claims of employés, operatives, and laborers of an insolvent corporation for wages shall be paid first out of funds in the hands of a receiver, bookkeepers, foremen, superintendents, and draftsmen employed on monthly salaries are not included in the term "employé"; the word "employé" being limited by the more specific words "operatives and laborers." In re Stryker, 53 N. E. 525, 158 N. Y. 526, 70 Am. St. Rep. 489.

Trainman or constructionman.

In Ney v. Dubuque & S. C. R. Co., 20 Iowa, 347, it was held that, in connection with railroads, the term "employé" applies to conductors, agents, superintendents, and others engaged in operating the road, and the like, and not to contractors or persons building or constructing the roadbed, or laying down the ties and rails. Ballard v. Mississippi Cotton Oil Co., 34 South. 533, 551, 81 Miss. 507, 62 L. R. A. 407, 95 Am. St. Rep. 476.

The term "employé," in Act Ohio March 23, 1888, for the protection of railroad employes, which requires every railroad in the state to block frogs, etc., includes the relation between an employé of one railroad, taking the numbers of cars transferred to the tracks of another railroad while they are on the latter tracks, and the latter railroad company. The word "employé," used in the statute, does not mean simply those men on the pay roll of the second company, who were in one sense its only employes, but it means all employes and servants authoritatively engaged in and about the tracks, rails, and frogs of the Wabash Company. Atkyn v. Wabash R. Co. (U. S.) 41 Fed. 193, 197.

Servant synonymous.

See "Servant."

Traveling salesman.

An employé is a person who is employed—one who works for wages or a salary—and as used in Laws 1885, c. 376, providing that, when a receiver of a corporation shall be appointed, the wages of the employes, operatives, and laborers thereof shall be preferred to every other debt of the corporation, means something more than an operative or laborer, and will include a traveling salesman employed at an annual salary. In re Cortland Mfg. Co., 45 N. Y. Supp. 630, 631, 21 Misc. Rep. 226.

The word "employes," in Laws 1885, c. 376, is a word of larger import than the words "operatives and laborers," and is not confined to those who perform manual labor only; and hence an employé of a corporation, whose duties are to go from place to place, and set up, put in operation, and repair machines made by such corporation, as well as to sell or solicit sales of machines, and who receives a compensation of $100 per month, is entitled to a preference given by the statute. Palmer v. Van Santvoord, 47 N. E. 915, 153 N. Y. 612, 38 L. R. A. 402.

The term "employes," as used in Laws Wash. 1897, p. 55, entitled "An act providing for a lien for employes," and providing that every person performing labor in the operation of any railway, canal, or transportation company, or any water, mining, or manufacturing company, sawmill, lumber, or timber company, shall have a prior lien on the property used in the operation of its business, to the extent of moneys due him for labor performed within a certain time preceding the filing of his claim therefor, is of broad significance, including any person who gives his time for hire. The title of the statute was not chosen in a careless manner, but with a deliberate purpose, in giving the enactment a true interpretation in accordance with the intention of the Legislature to insure to the employes of corporations payment of their wages by subjecting the entire assets and franchises of every industrial corporation to a prior lien in favor of employes. The statute does not restrict its beneficence to persons performing labor in the operation of railways, canals, mines, sawmills, and factories, but the lien is given to every person performing labor in the operation of such companies. Therefore, all participants in carrying on the operation of the different kinds of companies mentioned are entitled to liens, and a traveling salesman for a lumber company is within its provisions. In re Lawler (U. S.) 110 Fed. 135, 136.

"Employes," as used in Laws 1885, c. 376, providing that wages of employes, operatives, and laborers shall be preferred to every other debt against any insolvent insurance or moneyed corporation, will be construed in its restricted and limited sense, as not including any and all persons employed by corporations, irrespective of their service and the relation which they hold to the company, but will include persons selling pianos on commission. In re Luxton & Black Co., 54 N. Y. Supp. 778, 779, 35 App. Div. 243.

"Employes," as used in Laws 1897, c. 266, providing that, on assignments for benefit of creditors, the wages or salaries of employes shall be preferred, will include a traveling salesman, whose duty it was to sell goods in a particular locality, and whose compensation consisted exclusively of commissions. In re Smith, 59 N. Y. Supp. 799.

A salesman on commission is an employé, within the statute giving preference to employes on assignment by the employer, though the compensation of the employé was measured in part by a share of the profits. In re Ginsburg, 59 N. Y. Supp. 656, 661, 27 Misc. Rep. 745.

Employé in the office.

14 Stat. 569, authorizing the payment of employes in the office of the coast survey, naval observatory, etc., means "a person who is engaged in the performance of the proper duties of an office, whether his particular duties are carried on within or without the walls of a building in which the chief officer usually transacts his business." Stone v. United States (U. S.) 3 Ct. Cl. 260, 262.

Employé of carrier.

The term "employes," as used in an act concerning carriers engaged in interstate commerce, and their employes, shall include all persons actually engaged in any capacity in train operation or train service of any description, and notwithstanding that the cars upon or in which they are employed may be held and operated by the carrier under lease or other contract: provided, however, that the act shall not be held to apply to employes of street railroads, and shall apply only to employes engaged in railroad train service. U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3206.

Employé of postal service.

Rev. St. U. S. § 5467 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3691], declares that any person employed in any department of the postal service who shall embezzle any letter intrusted to him or which shall come into his possession, and which was intended to be conveyed by mail, or delivered by any carrier, mail agent, route agent, letter carrier, or other employé of the postal service, shall be guilty of the offense of robbing the mail. Held, that the term "employé of the postal service" was not limited to an officer employed by the postal department of the United States government, but included, as well, employes who were hired and paid by postal contractors, or other persons having charge of mail matter, sworn as mail carriers, etc. United States v. Hanna, 17 Pac. 79, 80, 4 N. M. (Gild.) 216.

One sworn as a deputy postmaster, who handled mail whenever he was about the office and felt like it, was an employé, within the meaning of the law. United States v. Brent (U. S.) 24 Fed. Cas. 1225, 1226.

EMPLOYED.

See "Actually Employed"; "Regularly Employed."

The word "employed" may mean either busy or occupied at work, or it may mean intrusted with the management of an affair. Brugier v. Moussier's Adm'r, 5 La. 93, 95.

In a bond given by a contractor, conditioned as required by Laws 1850, c. 278, requiring the contractor to execute a bond to secure the payment of wages to laborers employed on public works, by "laborers employed" was meant those hired by him, working at his request, and under an agreement on his part to compensate them for their services, and excluded the idea of their being employed by some other person as a subcontractor or independent contractor. McCluskey v. Cromwell, 11 N. Y. (1 Kern.) 593, 599.

As actual employment.

The word "employed," in Act May 24, 1888, c. 308, 25 Stat. 157 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2637], declaring that eight hours shall constitute a day's work for letter carriers, and that, if a carrier is employed a greater number of hours per day than eight, he shall be paid extra, "means actual employment in the carrier's work or service, and does not extend to intervals, however brief, when the carrier has control of his time." King v. United States (U. S.) 32 Ct. Cl. 234.

"Employed," as used in St. 1873, c. 284, § 1, exempting a vessel regularly employed in the coasting trade from compulsory pilotage, did not necessarily mean continuously so employed, but would include the case of a vessel actually and legally so employed at the time the services of a pilot are tendered, though the word "employed" is more commonly used as signifying continuous occupation. Wilson v. Gray, 127 Mass. 98, 99.

As customarily employed.

In an instruction that certain goods were not subject to a certain duty if the use to which such goods are chiefly applicable, and for which they were employed, was in making or ornamenting hats, "employed" means for which they were habitually employed or customarily employed or usually employed, and not for which they had been employed. Hartranft v. Langfeld, 8 Sup. Ct. 732, 736, 125 U. S. 128, 31 L. Ed. 672.

As designated or selected.

Laws 1857, c. 446, provides that all resolutions and reports of committees which shall recommend any specific improvement involving the appropriation of money or the taxing of the citizens of the city of New York, shall be published immediately after the adjournment of the board, under the authority of the board, in all the newspapers employed by the corporation. Held, that the word "employed" is used as meaning selected or designated. In re Astor, 50 N. Y. 363, 368.

As importing an employer.

In Gen. St. c. 2397, giving a mortgage lien to persons making advances to any person or persons who are "employed" or about to engage in the cultivation of the soil, "employed" is synonymous with the word "engaged," and includes those who are already engaged, as well as those about to engage, in the cultivation of the soil. It does not import that the person so employed must be in the employ of another. The statute does not authorize a mere employé to give a lien. Carpenter v. Strickland, 20 S. C. 1, 5.

Gen. Order No. 30, adopted April 12, 1875, providing that fees cannot be allowed to an attorney at law acting for an assignee in bankruptcy, except where he is "necessarily employed by the assignee," cannot be construed to authorize fees for legal services by the assignee as such, he being an attorney at law, for he cannot, as assignee, employ himself as an attorney at law. In re Muldaur (U. S.) 17 Fed. Cas. 958, 959.

The State Treasurer is employed in the treasury of the state, within Comp. Laws, § 5771, which provides for the punishment of any officer, clerk, or other person employed in the treasury of the state, who shall commit any fraud or embezzlement therein. The term "employed," as used in the statute, cannot be restricted to a narrow sense, as implying an employer, and only to be understood in the sense of procured to render service, as a master employs a servant. Such is the sense in which it has been quite generally used in reference to embezzlement, but this has happened mainly because the crime always presupposes the offender to have come rightfully into the possession of the money or property by reason of some position of trust and confidence. The crime has been more frequently and generally provided for as to clerks, agents, and servants than as to public officers, and, as the former are so much more numerous, the offense has been more frequently committed by them. The primary signification of the word "employ," as given by Webster, is to occupy the time, attention, and labor of; to keep busy or at work—which sense would include the treasurer, and such is its meaning in the statute, rather than the fourth sense given by Webster, "to engage one's services." People v. McKinney, 10 Mich. 54, 83.

As engaged in.

"To be employed in anything means not only the act of doing it, but also to be engaged to do it; to be under contract or orders to do it." United States v. Catherine (U. S.) 25 Fed. Cas. 332, 338; Same v. Morris, 39 U. S. (14 Pet.) 464, 475, 10 L. Ed. 543.

This is not only the ordinary meaning of the word, but it has frequently been used in that sense in the acts of Congress. Thus Act March 3, 1825, entitled, "An act to reduce into one, the several acts establishing the post office department," declares that the Postmaster General and all other persons employed shall take the oath previous to entering the duties assigned to them. And again, Act July 2, 1813 (3 Stat. 4), declares that certain vessels employed in the fisheries shall not be entitled to certain bounties unless the master enter into a certain agreement with every fisherman employed therein before he proceeds on his voyage. United States v. Morris, 39 U. S. (14 Pet.) 464, 475, 10 L. Ed. 543.

"Employed," as used in the act of Congress prohibiting any citizen of the United States to have any property in a vessel employed in transporting slaves, means not only the act of doing it, but also to be engaged to do it; and accordingly the chartering and fitting out of a vessel at Havana with design to have her perform a voyage then arranged for bringing slaves to the country brought the transaction within the prohibition of the act. United States v. Catherine (U. S.) 25 Fed. Cas. 332, 337. Thus, in Laws 1893, p. 99, declaring that no female shall be employed in any factory or workshop more than eight hours in any one day, etc., "employed" imports not only the act of employing, but the state of being employed, thus rendering the prohibition of the statute two-fold: First, that no manufacturer, etc., shall employ any female, etc., and, second, that no female shall consent to be employed. "To be employed in anything means not only the act of doing it, but also to be engaged to do it; to be under contract or orders to do it." Ritchie v. People, 40 N. E. 454, 455, 155 Ill. 98, 29 L. R. A. 79, 46 Am. St. Rep. 315. Thus a man is not "employed" as a mechanic, within the meaning of Laws 1894, c. 622, providing that mechanics employed by a municipal corporation shall not receive less than prevailing local wages in their trades. One hired in the street-cleaning department as a painter, and doing work as a driver, could not demand a painter's wages. McCunney v. City of New York, 58 N. Y. Supp. 138, 139, 40 App. Div. 482.

In Swan & C. St. p. 707, providing that no person shall be employed as a teacher unless he has first obtained the certificate required by law, "employed" means the actual engagement in the discharge of the duties as teacher; and hence the statute does not invalidate a contract to teach a school by one not having a certificate at the time such contract is made, but who obtains the same before the time the school is to begin. School Dist. No. 2, Oxford Tp., v. Dilman, 22 Ohio St. 194.

"Employed in the slave trade," as used in the first section of the slave trade act of 1800, c. 51, 2 Stat. 70, § 1, providing that it shall be unlawful for any citizen to have any property in any vessel employed in the slave trade, means not merely the actual transportation, but the being employed in that business; and a vessel caught in such trade, though before she has taken slaves on board, is liable to forfeiture under the act. The Alexander (U. S.) 1 Fed. Cas. 362.

As invested.

"Employed," as used in Const. art. 207, exempting from taxation the capital and machinery employed in certain manufactures, means "invested." Implements and property not used by the manufacturer, but used about the premises or in the factory, are not exempt; the term not being sufficient to include the property of any one other than the manufacturer, and then only when used in his special calling. State ex rel. Ward v. Assessors, 15 South. 384, 385, 46 La. Ann. 859.

Laws 1880, c. 542, §§ 3, 11, as amended by Laws 1885, c. 501, provides that every domestic corporation shall pay an annual tax upon the value of its capital stock employed within this state. Held, that "employed" should be construed to mean employed by the corporation claiming the exemption; that is, used; kept at work; busy. It does not mean invested. In order that an exemption may be had upon the ground of capital employed outside the state, the capital must be used, kept at work, or busy outside the state. Money invested by a corporation in stock of local corporations in various parts of the country is not employed outside the state, within the meaning of this statute. People v. Wemple, 18 N. Y. Supp. 511, 513, 63 Hun, 444.

As indicating permanency.

"Employed," as used in Pub. St. c. 11, § 20, cl. 2, providing that all machinery employed in any branch of manufacture shall be assessed where such machinery is situated or employed, means something more than merely being temporarily in use at a place. A portable sawmill, frequently moved from place to place, and temporarily placed in a town other than that in which the owner resides or has his place of business, is not situated or employed in such town, within the meaning of the statute. Ingram v. Cowles, 23 N. E. 48, 49, 150 Mass. 155.

As used.

"Employed," as used in Act June 29, 1888, c. 496, § 4, 25 Stat. 210 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3536], providing that any boat or vessel used or employed in violating any provisions of the act should be liable, etc., means to make use of; to put to a purpose. Practically, the words "used or employed" are synonymous. Every boat or vessel put to the purpose of violating the provisions of the statute is liable to the penalties, and to be put to such or any purpose necessarily requires antecedent determination on the part of her master or owners, or of some one with sufficient authority, that she shall perform such purpose. A vessel can only be used or employed by or with the consent of the person who has the legal right to use and employ. United States v. The Anjer Head (U. S.) 46 Fed. 664.

The constitutional exemption from taxation of capital, machinery, and property "employed in manufacture," does not apply to property which has once been employed for manufacturing purposes, after it has ceased to be actually so employed. Electric Traction Co. v. City of New Orleans, 14 South. 231, 45 La. Ann. 1475.

Act June 29, 1888, c. 496, 25 Stat. 209 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3533], prohibiting the dumping of mud from scows in the North river within prescribed limits, and declaring that any boat or vessel used or employed in violating any provision of the act shall be liable to penalties imposed, means a boat or vessel used in violating the act to the knowledge and intent of her officers, and does not include a tug which was proceeding in good faith to the prescribed dumping ground, when the scows in tow were dumped by the scowmen within the prescribed limits against the express orders of the captain and officers of the tug. The Emperor (U. S.) 49 Fed. 751, 753.

In 59 Geo. III, c. 95, exempting from taxation tools, carts employed in carrying mold, soil, marl, or compost employed in husbandry for manuring or improving land, "employed" means to be employed; the word pointing to the purpose or destination of the material. Regina v. Freke, 5 El. & Bl. 944, 949.

"Employed," as used in Metropolitan Building Act 1885 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 122), exempting the persons erecting a building to be employed for her majesty's use or service from giving the customary notice of an intention to build, would include a building in process of erection, which was to be applied to the custody of the arms of her troops. Regina v. Jay, 8 El. & Bl. 469, 477.

Employed by authority of law.

A ship placed in the service of a state for the purpose of nautical instruction under Act June 20, 1874, c. 339, 18 Stat. 121 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1054], is a ship acting under the orders of a department, and is "employed by authority of law," within Rev. St. § 1571 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1079]. Barnette v. United States (U. S.) 30 Ct. Cl. 197, 202.

Employed by the state.

A fireman at the State Soldiers' Home is not "employed by the state or any officer thereof," within Laws 1889, c. 380, providing that a laborer so employed shall receive not less than $2 per day. Drake v. State, 39 N. E. 342, 144 N. Y. 414.

Employed by the United States.

Act of Assembly of February 12, 1802, providing that every person who shall hold any office or appointment of profit or trust under the government of the United States, whether a commissioned officer or otherwise, a subordinate officer or agent who is or shall be employed under the legislative, executive, or judiciary department of the United States, is incapable of holding or exercising at the same time the office of alderman of any city, corporate town, or borough, cannot be construed to include the selection of an editor of a newspaper to print the laws of the United States by the Secretary of State of the United States. Commonwealth v. Binns (Pa.) 17 Serg. & R. 219, 220.

Employed in or about cars or depot.

A newsboy engaged in selling papers, and permitted to pass in and out of the cars of a passenger railway company on such business, is within the meaning of Act 1868, April 4, providing that any person engaged or employed on or about the roads, depot, premises, or cars of a railroad company, not being a passenger or employé, shall only have such right of action and recovery against the company for personal injuries as would exist if such person were an employé. Philadelphia Traction Co. v. Orbaun, 12 Atl. 816, 818, 119 Pa. 37.

Employed in manufacture.

The words "employed in the manufacture of wood," in a constitutional provision exempting capital, machinery, and other property employed in the manufacture of wood, do not include vessels employed to procure timber for sawmills. Martin v. City of New Orleans, 38 La. Ann. 397, 400, 58 Am. Rep. 194.

Const. art. 207, exempting from taxation capital, machinery, and other property employed in the manufacture of tapestry fabrics, includes all property so employed, though it may incidentally be used for other purposes; as, for instance, where a part of a building or factory used for such purposes is occupied by the owner as a dwelling house, such occupation does not alter the character of the factory so as to withdraw it from the exemption. City of New Orleans v. Arthurs, 36 La. Ann. 98, 99.

The phrase "employed in the manufacture of," as used in the constitutional provision that "the capital, machinery, and other property employed in the manufacture of * * * machinery shall be exempt for twenty years from taxation," does not include property leased for manufacturing purposes. State ex rel. Ward v. Assessors, 15 South. 384, 46 La. Ann. 859.

Employed in the service.

Where the federal Constitution enables Congress to provide for the government of such part of the militia as may be "employed in the service" of the United States, and which makes the President commander in chief of the militia when called into the actual service of the United States, there is a distinction between the words "employed in the service" and the words "called into the service"; the words "employed in the service" meaning the actual mustering in service, while the words "called into service" import some act to be done before the actual employment of the militia. Houston v. Moore, 18 U. S. (5 Wheat.) 1, 60, 5 L. Ed. 19.

Employed on police force.

The charter of Brooklyn (Laws 1888, c. 583), providing that no person employed on the police force shall be removed without cause, and then only after a public trial, evidently contemplates membership in the force, and will not be construed to relate to mere employés in the police department.

People v. York, 60 N. Y. Supp. 208, 210, 43 App. Div. 444.

Employed on water.

A stipulation in a contract of hiring a slave that he was not to be employed on water means some employment requiring him to go upon the water, or necessarily connected therewith; and such a contract is not broken by sending the slave to water horses at a shallow part of a deep stream, with instructions not to ride into deep water, although he did ride into deep water and was drowned. Madre v. Saunders, 48 N. C. 1, 2.

Employed within the state.

See, also, "Capital Employed."

Steamships owned by a domestic corporation, and employed in interstate commerce, and plying between ports of New York and Cleveland, Duluth, and other ports of the Great Lakes, are not employed within the state, within the meaning of Tax Law, § 184, providing that a domestic corporation shall pay a tax computed on the basis of its capital stock employed within the state. People v. Knight, 77 N. Y. Supp. 308, 399, 75 App. Div. 164.

Under Tax Law (Laws 1896, p. 856, c. 908) § 182, taxing capital stock of foreign corporations paying more than 6 per cent. dividends, "employed within the state," capital invested in securities of corporations of a kindred nature, from which the corporation investing derives a practical advantage, is taxable; but capital invested in securities entirely apart from any business of the corporation is not employed within the state, and is therefore not taxable. People v. Morgan, 83 N. Y. Supp. 993, 1000, 86 App. Div. 577.

EMPLOYER.

An employer is one who employs; one who uses or engages the services of another person. In re Cortland Mfg. Co., 21 Misc. Rep. 226, 229, 45 N. Y. Supp. 630, 632 (citing Stand. Dict.).

Where a subcontractor employed a framework knitter, who worked as a weaver of gloves for the subcontractor, in frames provided by him, at an agreed gross price per dozen pairs, and the subcontractor furnished the work by agreement to a master manufacturer, who found machinery and materials, the subcontractor was an employer, within 1 & 2 Wm. IV, c. 37, relating to the wages of artificers, and requiring the employers to pay them in the current coin of the realm. Chawner v. Cummings, 8 Q. B. 311, 321.

The words "employer" and "employment" are not of the technical language of the law, or of any science or pursuit, and must be construed according to the context and the approved usage of the language. The word "employment" means the act of employing or using; occupation, business; agency or services for another or for the public. An employer is one who employs; one who engages or keeps in service. Therefore, from the definitions of these words, it is evident that the statute relating to embezzlement without the consent of the employer contemplates the relation of agency—a contract for services, whereby the accused is bound to do or perform something in connection with the property embezzled, and that by virtue of such relation he acquired possession thereof. State v. Foster, 37 Iowa, 404, 407.

Whenever the term "employer" or "employers" is used in the act relating to the court of mediation or arbitration, it shall be held to include "firm," "joint stock association," "company," or "corporation," as fully as though each of the last-named terms was expressed in each place. Comp. Laws Mich. 1897, § 568.

EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY.

The term "employers' liability," when applied to insurance, is a descriptive term, generally used to designate a certain well-known branch of the insurance business, and the use of the term cannot be exclusively appropriated by an insurance company. Employers' Liability Assur. Corp. v. Employers' Liability Ins. Co., 16 N. Y. Supp. 397, 398, 61 Hun, 552; Employers' Liability Assur. Corp. v. Employers' Liability Ins. Co., 10 N. Y. Supp. 845, 846, 24 Abb. N. C. 368.

EMPLOYMENT.

See "Common Employment"; "Extraordinary Employment"; "Independent Employment"; "Joint Employment"; "Life Employment"; "Permanent Employment"; "Professional Employment"; "Public Employment"; "Same Grade of Employment"; "Worldly Business or Employment"; "Place of Employment."

Change of employment, see "Change."

Secular employment, see "Secular Business."

Employment is the act of employing or using—the state of being employed—and is so used in Sess. Laws 1896, p. 219, c. 72, §§ 1, 2, providing that the period of employment of certain working men shall be eight hours per day, so that the employer and servant are particeps criminis, and the servant cannot recover for overtime. Short v. Bullion-Beck & Champion Min. Co., 57 Pac. 720, 721, 20 Utah, 20, 45 L. R. A. 603.

In 2 Rev. St. p. 678, § 59, providing that "if any clerk or servant of any private person or corporation shall embezzle or convert to his own use without the assent of his master or employer any money, goods, rights in action, or other valuable security, or effects whatever belonging to any other person which shall come into his possession by virtue of such employment, he shall upon conviction be punished," etc., the phrase "by virtue of such employment" means by reason of the relation which exists between a clerk or servant and his employer. People v. Hennessey (N. Y.) 15 Wend. 147, 150.

The contract of employment is a contract by which one who is called the "employer" engages another, who is called the "employé," to do something for the benefit of the employer or of a third person. Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 1965; Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 2650; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 4094; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 1417.

As appointment.

In Civil Service Law (Laws 1899, c. 370) § 21, providing that no veteran should be removed from a position by appointment or employment, except for incompetency or misconduct, after hearing on notice, "employment" is synonymous with "appointment," being used interchangeably with such term. Stutzbach v. Coler, 61 N. E. 697, 698, 108 N. Y. 416.

As authority.

"Employment," as used in Act Cong. March 3, 1825, c. 65, providing that any person who shall be employed as president, cashier, clerk, or servant in the Bank of the United States, who shall fraudulently embezzle, secrete, or make way with any money or other valuable security which shall come into his possession by virtue of such employment, shall be deemed guilty of felony, means his authority from the bank. United States v. Forrest (U. S.) 25 Fed. Cas. 1144, 1146.

As carrying on business.

"Employment," as used in Act April 22, 1794, forbidding any employment or business on Sunday, means the act of carrying on a business on Sunday; and hence the carrying on of such a business only constitutes one offense, though numerous sales are made. Friedeborn v. Commonwealth, 6 Atl. 160, 113 Pa. 242, 57 Am. Rep. 464.

Where a person whose business was that of a butcher, without being engaged in retailing liquor as a business, or intending so to engage, on one occasion sold five cents' worth of ardent spirits, he was not following the employment of a retail liquor dealer, within the statute requiring such a person to take out a license. Moore v. State, 16 Ala. 411, 413.

Contract implied.

"Employment" implies a contract on the part of the employer to hire, and on the part of the employé to perform services; and, until such a contract is mutually entered into, it can have no binding obligation on either party. Malloy v. Board of Education of City of San Jose, 36 Pac. 948, 949, 102 Cal. 642.

"Employment," as used in Laws 1866, c. 466, § 4, declaring that the employment of teachers in certain schools shall be subject to the approval of the superintendent, means the act of hiring, and not the state of being employed; and hence, when the approval is once given, the contract of employment is complete, and the teacher cannot be discharged by the superintendent. People v. Hyde, 89 N. Y. 11, 17.

Hiring distinguished.

"Employment," as used in Code, § 4500, which prohibits the employment of a servant of another hired under written contract attested by one or more witnesses, is not synonymous with "hiring," but means to use a servant for a special or general purpose inconsistent with his duty to his employer, with a mutual benefit. Hightower v. State, 72 Ga. 482, 484.

As occupation.

Gen. St. c. 26, § 52, provides that the board of health shall from time to time assign certain places for the exercise of any trade or employment which is a nuisance, etc. Held, that "employment," as here used, would include the keeping of a large number of swine within the limits of a town. Commonwealth v. Young, 155 Mass. 526, 529.

The word "employment" does not necessarily import an engagement or rendering services for another. A person may as well be employed about his own business as in the transaction of the same for a principal. One of the definitions given by Webster of the word "employment" is "occupation; business; that which engages the head or hands." Worcester says, "Employment means business, occupation, object of industry, engagement, avocation, calling, or profession." Therefore, in a statute prescribing punishment for females found employed in saloons, carrying beer, it applies alike, whether they acted as proprietors or servants. State v. Canton, 43 Mo. 48, 51.

Office distinguished.

See "Civil Office"; "Office."

"Employment" is a more extensive term than "office"; every office being an employment, but an employment not necessarily being an office. Moll v. Sbisá, 25 South. 141, 51 La. Ann. 290.

"Though an office is an employment, it does not necessarily follow that every employment is an office. A man may certainly be employed by the government under a contract, express or implied, to do an act or perform a service, without becoming an officer. But if a duty be a continuous one, which is defined by rules prescribed by the government, and not by contract, which an individual is appointed by government to perform, who enters upon the duties pertaining to his station without any contract defining them, if those duties continue, though the person be changed, it seems very difficult to distinguish such a charge or employment from an office, or the person who performs the duty from an officer." Bunn v. People, 45 Ill. 397, 403 (quoting from United States v. Maurice [U. S.] 26 Fed. Cas. 1211, 1214).

The most important characteristic which distinguishes an office from an employment or contract is that the creation and conferring of an office involve a delegation to the individual of some of the sovereign functions of government, to be exercised by him for the benefit of the public; that some portion of the sovereignty of the country—either legislative, executive, or judicial—attaches for the time being, to be exercised for the public benefit. An office is a public station or employment conferred by the appointment of the government. Although every office is an employment, every employment is not an office. A man may be employed to do an act or perform a service without becoming an officer, but, if a duty be a continuing one, which is defined by rules prescribed by the government, and not by contract, which an individual is appointed by government to perform, who enters on the duties pertaining to his station without any contract defining them, if those duties continue, though the person be changed, it is difficult to distinguish such a charge or employment from an office, or the person who performs those duties from an officer. In the Opinion of the Judges to the Governor, 3 Me. (3 Greenl.) 481, the Supreme Court of Maine said: "There is a marked difference between an office and an employment under the government. An office implies a delegation of a portion of the sovereign power to, and the possession of it by, the person filling the office; and the exercise of such power, within legal limits, constitutes the correct discharge of the duties of such office. Employment has none of these distinguishing features, and one appointed state printer cannot be said to be acting as an officer, and exercising any of the sovereign functions of the government, in doing the mechanical work of manufacturing blank books, printing a notice, order, or proclamation, or supplying blanks, stationery, and letter heads for the territorial government, or a docket for the Supreme Court. Guthrie Daily Leader v. Cameron, 41 Pac. 635-637, 3 Okl. 677.

As place in army.

As used in 49 Geo. III, c. 126, § 8, forbidding the buying of offices, including nominations to an office, commission, or "place or employment," would include a cadetship in the Madras infantry. The words "place" and "employment" are so general as to comprehend those and every other advantageous position that the party can gain by nomination to a specific thing. Regina v. Charretie, 13 Q. B. 447, 461.

Railroad company.

"Employment," as used in a statute authorizing the taxing of merchants, hotel keepers, etc., and "any other person or employment which it may deem proper," if taken according to its natural import, cannot be held to comprehend a railroad corporation, which is neither a person nor an employment, within the ordinary acceptance of the words. "Employment" is a common word, generally used in relation to most common pursuits, and therefore ought to be received as understood in common parlance. City of Lynchburg v. Norfolk & W. R. Co., 80 Va. 237, 248, 56 Am. Rep. 592.

As temporary agency.

An employment is an agency for a temporary purpose, which ceases when that purpose is accomplished. People v. Loeffler, 51 N. E. 785, 790, 175 Ill. 585; Lasher v. People, 55 N. E. 663, 666, 183 Ill. 226, 47 L. R. A. 802, 75 Am. St. Rep. 103; Wilcox v. People, 90 Ill. 186, 192.

EMPOWER.

Where, in a statute any one is empowered to perform a certain act, the act is not only authorized, but commanded. Strong v. Wright, 1 Conn. 459, 466.

New York City Charter, § 1473 et seq., providing that the police department is authorized and empowered to grant theatrical licenses, is to be construed as vesting a discretionary power in the department to grant or withhold licenses, which may be controlled by mandamus. The language is almost identical with that of section 1909 of the consolidation act, under which authority to grant licenses was vested in the mayor, whereas, by the provisions of the charter which we have quoted, such power is now lodged with the police department. This very contention now made as to the intent and meaning of the words "authorized and empowered," which are to be found in both statutes, was involved in the case of People v. Grant, 58 Hun, 455, 12 N. Y. Supp. 879; and Justice Barrett, who wrote the opinion therein, thus disposes of it (page 457, 58 Hun, and page 880, 12 N. Y. Supp.): "The relator's contention is that these words, 'authorized and empowered,' should be construed as imperative, and he cites authorities for the proposition that the permissive words in question should be treated as mandatory. The rule undoubtedly is that where public bodies or officers are empowered to do that which the public interests require to be done, and adequate means are placed at their disposal, the proper execution of the power may be insisted on, though the statute conferring it be only permissive in its terms. City of New York v. Furze (N. Y.) 3 Hill, 612. The word 'may' is thus construed at times to mean 'must.' But why, it may be asked, should this construction be given to the act under consideration? What public interest demands that the mayor should be required under all circumstances to accept the fee and grant the license? It seems to me that it is quite the other way. The public good clearly requires that the permissive words in question should be read in their natural and ordinary sense." People v. Murphy, 72 N. Y. Supp. 473, 475, 65 App. Div. 123.

Under a resolve of the legislature empowering the judge of probate to grant letters of administration on a particular estate, it would be doing violence to the language and intent of the Legislature to suppose that it meant to dictate to a judicial tribunal the course of its proceedings in such particular case. We do not think the Legislature would have passed a resolve requiring and directing the judge of probate to do what by this resolve they intended only to empower him to do, and the judicial discretion vested in the judge by the laws of the commonwealth on all subjects within his jurisdiction was left unaffected by the resolve, and he had the right, as before, to determine the penalty of the bond, judge of the sufficiency of the sureties, and decline substituting other security for the bond, if he should be of opinion that by the general laws he was not at liberty to take a security in a particular case, as empowered by the resolution, different from that which he should feel obliged to require in all others. Appeal of Picquet, 22 Mass. (5 Pick.) 65, 67.

EMPRESARIOS.

The term "empresarios" was a name given to individuals who in the early history of Mexico were given very large bodies of land in consideration that they should bring emigrants into the country and settle them on the lands, with a view of increasing the population, and securing the protection thus afforded against the wild Indians on the Mexican borders. United States v. Maxwell Land-Grant Co., 7 Sup. Ct. 1015, 1017, 121 U. S. 325, 30 L. Ed. 949.

EMPTOR.

See "Caveat Emptor."

EMPTY.

"Emptying," as used in Rev. St. § 3324 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2168], requiring dealers in distilled spirits to efface and obliterate the revenue stamp on a cask at the time of emptying such cask, and providing a punishment for failure to do so, should not be construed in its ordinary, strict signification, requiring that the cask be completely deprived of its contents before the dealer is guilty of failing to efface and obliterate the stamp. The ordinary signification of the words "to empty" is to make void; to exhaust; to deprive of the contents; hence when a retail dealer of distilled spirits draws off the contents of a cask as far as can be done from the faucet, and then removes it from the place where it had been used in his business, he should efface and obliterate the stamp, though it still contains a small quantity of distilled spirits, of small value. United States v. Buchanan (U. S.) 9 Fed. 689, 690.

"Empty" as used in the charter of a canal company, wherein it is provided that every vessel not having commodities on board sufficient to pay the toll of $4 shall pay so much as, with the commodities on board, will yield that sum, and every empty boat shall pay $4, the word "empty" means without cargo. Perrine v. Chesapeake & Delaware Canal Co., 50 U. S. (9 How.) 172, 189, 13 L. Ed. 92.

The charter of a turnpike road, authorizing a different toll for a loaded wagon than that authorized for an empty wagon, does not mean that the wagon must be absolutely empty. To say that every wagon must be either loaded or empty, and that this wagon was not empty, and therefore it must be loaded, may be tolerable school logic; but, when applied to the present case, it is logic which common sense will not sanction. A loaded wagon, as meant by the charter, is not contradistinguished from a wagon absolutely empty. A wagon absolutely empty would be taken as an estray; at least, it would be suffered to pass the gate, for there would be no person answerable for the toll. Merrick v. Phelps, 5 Conn. 465, 468.

EN DECLARATION DE SIMULATION.

A Louisiana action, the object of which is to cause to be declared simulated acts, the appearance of which is contrary to the truth. Erwin v. Bank of Kentucky, 5 La. Ann. 1, 4.

A Louisiana action, the object of which is to have a contract judicially declared a simulation and a nullity, to remove a cloud from the title, and to bring back for any legal purpose the thing sold to the estate of the owner. It is essentially one in revendica-tion, and never of condition. Edwards v. Ballard, 20 La. Ann. 169, 170.

EN ROUTE.

The words "en route," in a contract to furnish teams for transportation of military supplies, accompanying the Yellowstone expedition, en route from Ft. Lincoln for 50 days or more, mean while the troops were moving in pursuit of Indians or only temporarily encamped. When the army was posted along the Yellowstone, and went into camp, it was no longer en route. Such a contract does not require a hauling of supplies from post to post, unattended by troops. McLean v. United States (U. S.) 17 Ct. Cl. 83, 90.

ENACT.

Bouvier defines the word "enact": "To establish by law; to perform or effect; to decree." By either of these definitions, the word is of equal force to the word "resolve," the fifth definition of which, given by Webster, is: "To express an opinion or determination by resolution or vote, as, 'it was resolved by the Legislature.'" The formula, "Be it enacted," therefore, includes the formula, "Be it resolved," and therefore the former phrase, while ordinarily applied to the passage of bills, may be used in passing a mere resolution or proposal, as a resolution to submit a constitutional amendment. In re Senate File No. 31, 41 N. W. 981, 984, 25 Neb. 864.

ENACTING CLAUSE.

The term "enacting clause" is used to designate the section of the bill or statute which authorized the whole bill or document as law. Pearce v. Vittum, 61 N. E. 1116, 1117, 193 Ill. 192.

The enacting clause of legislative acts and resolutions is that preliminary expression, such as "Be it enacted," or, "The General Assembly do enact," etc., which serves to identify the act of legislation as of the General Assembly; to afford evidence of its legislative statutory nature; to secure uniformity of identification, and thus prevent inadvertence and possible mistake or fraud. State v. Patterson, 4 S. E. 350, 352, 98 N. C. 660.

The enacting clause of a statute is not necessarily alone or only that which purports to be the enacting clause, such as "The people of the state of — enact," but comprehends every part of the statute which should be stated in order to define the subject of the enactment with clearness and certainty. Territory v. Burns, 9 Pac. 432, 433, 6 Mont. 72.

Const. 1870, art. 4, § 11, declares that the style of the laws of this state shall be, "Be it enacted by the people of the state of Illinois, represented in general assembly." This is known as the "enacting clause." It is no part of any section of the statute, and a repeal of any section or sections of the statute would not affect the enacting clause. Pearce v. Vittum, 61 N. E. 1116, 1117, 193 Ill. 192.

Within the rule that exceptions in a statute should only be negated in an indictment or information when they are descriptive of the offense defining it, but not when the exceptions afford matter of excuse only, and do not define or qualify the offense created by the enacting clause, the term "enacting clause" should be construed to mean all parts of the statute which create and define the offense, whether in one or more sections or acts. Yet, under an ordinance requiring a license fee from peddlers of certain articles, providing that the owners and renters of land may vend the products thereof in all towns and cities without obtaining a license therefor, a complaint for peddling without a license need not negative the fact that defendant was vending products of his own land. State v. Beving, 41 Atl. 655, 70 Vt. 574.

ENACTMENT.

The term "enactment," although inapt to express the beginning of a period of time, may properly be construed to mean taking effect. In re Hendricks, 57 Pac. 965, 967, 60 Kan. 796.

ENAGENAR.

A term in the Spanish law which is defined in Seoane's Neuman & Baretti's Dictionary by Valazquez as meaning "to alienate, to transfer, or to give away property." Mulford v. Le Franc, 26 Cal. 88, 105.

ENAGENACION.

A term used in the Spanish Law, and as defined by Eschriche, is "the act by which the property in a thing by lucrative title is transferred as a donation or by onerous title, as by sale or barter. This word, taken in a more extended sense, comprises also the enfiteusis (lease), the pledge, the mortgage, and even the creation of a servidumbre (servitude) on an estate. It follows, therefore, that a person who cannot alienate (enagenar) a thing can neither pledge nor hypothecate the same with servitudes (servidumbres)." In its most comprehensive sense, the meaning of the two words, "enagenacion" and "alienation," are as nearly identical as the signification of any two words in different languages are ordinarily found to be. Each word embraces in its most comprehensive sense the transfer of every estate known to the law, from a fee simple to an estate at will or sufferance. Mulford v. Le Franc, 26 Cal. 88, 103.

ENCLOSURE.

See "Inclosure."

ENCOURAGE.

Under Civ. Code La. art. 2324, providing that one who causes another to do an unlawful act, or assists or encourages in the commission, is responsible in solido with that person for the damages caused by such act, officials or authorities who passively permit a wrongful act are included, though a strict meaning of the words "causes, assists, or encourages" might not under other circumstances include such failure to prevent. Comitez v. Parkerson (U. S.) 50 Fed. 170, 171.

In True v. Commonwealth, 14 S. W. 684, 90 Ky. 651, the words "encourage, aid, or abet, counsel, advise, or assist," were said to be words in appropriate use to describe the offense of a person who, not actually doing the felonious act, by his will contributes to or procures it to be done, and thereby becomes a principal or accessory. Omer v. Commonwealth (Tex.) 25 S. W. 994, 996.

Under Acts 1799, c. 8, § 2, declaring that any game or match of hazard or address for money or other valuable thing is gaming, the act of cockfighting for money or other valuable thing constitutes gaming. By the same act, all who encourage or promote any game, etc., are involved in the same guilt with the actors or betters. How could any one more effectually promote and encourage a match of this kind than by not only giving it countenance by his presence, but actually paying his money to support and sustain it? The preparations are made by the principal offenders; notice is given of the time and place; the public are called upon to attend and pay money for the privilege of participating in the enjoyment of the sport; and one who accepts the invitation, and contributes his money to the extent of the fee demanded, is actively and efficiently aiding, abetting, and encouraging the unlawful thing. Johnson v. State, 36 Tenn. (4 Sneed) 614, 621.

ENCROACHMENT.

Encroachment is the gradual entering on and taking possession by one of what is not his own—the unlawful gaining upon the rights or possessions of another. Chase v. City of Oshkosh, 51 N. W. 560, 562, 81 Wis. 313, 15 L. R. A. 553, 29 Am. St. Rep. 898.

On highway.

"An object is not an incumbrance in a highway unless it obstructs the use of the way, while an encroachment is an unlawful gaining upon the rights or possessions of another, as where a man sets a fence beyond his line." Bouv. Law Dict. This is the meaning of the term in Gen. St. p. 151, c. 70, entitled, "The Incumbrances and Encroachments upon Highways." The Legislature, in passing such statutes, understood encroachments and incumbrances to be different evils, requiring different remedies. Thus the title furnishes evidence that the object of the statute was to preserve the limitations of the public right in the prevention of obstruction to travel. State v. Kean, 45 Atl. 256, 257, 69 N. H. 122, 48 L. R. A. 102.

An encroachment, in statutory sense, is a fixture which intrudes into or invades a highway, but does not necessarily prevent public travel; and, where a fence is in a highway, it is an encroachment. A man may willfully place a load of hay or a pile of wood in the middle of the street, and leave it there. This would not be an encroachment, but an obstruction, though room was left on either side for travelers to pass. State v. Pomeroy, 73 Wis. 664, 41 N. W. 726.

The fencing in or inclosing of a portion of a street or highway by a fence or wall, or the occupancy of it, would be an encroachment. Chase v. City of Oshkosh, 51 N. W. 560, 562, 81 Wis. 313, 15 L. R. A. 553, 29 Am. St. Rep. 898.

A worm rail fence, 5 feet in width, constructed with the middle of the worm on the line of a public road, thereby placing 2½ feet of the fence in the road, is an encroachment, within the meaning of Rev. St. § 4715, directing the supervisor of roads to remove all encroachments by fences or otherwise on public roads, etc., since, to be an encroachment, within the meaning of the act, does not necessarily require that the fence should also be an obstruction, in view of the words which follow the word "encroachments." Barton v. Campbell, 42 N. E. 698, 699, 54 Ohio St. 147.

The Michigan laws have always made a distinction between "cumbering and obstructing" a public way, and "encroaching" on it. The former term has been applied to impediments to travel, while the latter has embraced actual inclosure of a portion of the street by fences or walks, or occupation by building. An encroachment on the street may in one sense be said to cumber it, but, as the Legislature has never employed the two words as synonymous terms, a power to impose a penalty for cumbering or obstructing a street will not authorize a proceeding in the same manner as for encroachments. City of Grand Rapids v. Hughes, 15 Mich. 54, 57.

It is difficult to lay down any just rules by which to determine in any given case whether an object placed in a highway is an obstruction, or only an encroachment. It may be safely said that an object or structure, to be an obstruction, need not necessarily be so as to stop travel on the highway. A man may willfully place a load of hay or a pile of wood in the middle of a street, and leave it there. This would not be an encroachment, within the statute, because it is not a fence, building, or other fixture, yet it would undoubtedly be an obstruction, although room was left on either side of it for travelers on the highway to pass; hence a barn occupying nearly one-half of a highway in a populous village, and impeding and interfering with travel, is an obstruction. State v. Leaver, 22 N. W. 576, 579, 62 Wis. 387.

"Encroachment," as used with regard to a highway or public way, means an actual inclosure of a portion of the street by fences and walks, or its occupation by buildings. The meaning of this word is entirely distinct from that of "obstruction," which is applied to an impediment to travel and passage placed in the open street, and tending to make its use more difficult and dangerous. Gorham v. Withey, 17 N. W. 272, 52 Mich. 50.

On land.

Any part of the roof or cornice of a building, or of a water spout, so constructed as to project beyond the division wall, and overhanging or overshadowing any part of the adjoining owner's premises, is an encroachment upon his property. Pierce v. Lemon (Del.) 2 Houst. 519, 523.

The erection of a bay window over the soil of another is a tort, for which an action lies, though the damage may be merely nominal. Codman v. Evans, 83 Mass. (1 Allen) 443, 447; Id., 87 Mass. (5 Allen) 308, 81 Am. Dec. 748.

On park.

A building upon a public park is an encroachment. City of Chicago v. Ward, 48 N. E. 927, 933, 169 Ill. 392, 38 L. R. A. 849, 61 Am. St. Rep. 185.

On water course.

Schenectady City Charter, tit. 7, § 51, provides that the city council shall not remove encroachments from the natural water courses in the city until they have been established by a jury. Held, that the banks of a water course, with growing trees thereon, was an "encroachment," within the meaning of the charter, and that proceedings for their removal must be taken under title 7, § 51, of the charter. City of Schenectady v. Furman, 15 N. Y. Supp. 724, 726, 61 Hun, 171.

ENCUMBRANCE.

See "Incumbrance (On Title)."

END.

See "To That End"; "West End."

"Ended" means final; definitive; complete; conclusive; and to say that a contract is ended is to say that it is abrogated in a final, conclusive way. Bonsack Mach. Co. v. Woodrum, 13 S. E. 994, 995, 88 Va. 512.

"End," as used in a tax judgment which is against an undivided third of the east end of each block, means the east half of the block. Chiniquy v. People, 78 Ill. 570, 575.

The word "end" is defined to be the extreme point of a line or anything that has more length than breadth. The end of a parallelogram is the line extending from one side line to the other at their extremities; and the width of the end is the length of such line. If the line connecting the extreme points of parallel side lines make an angle with one greater than that made with the other, as, for instance, one being 10 and the other 170 degrees, it might not be proper to regard this line the width of the end of the figure presented, or even as the end itself. In figures having side lines irregular and not parallel with each other, a line connecting them where they terminate may be the end, and its length the width of the end, or otherwise, according to the peculiar shape of each figure. Hence the words "end" and "width of the end," are not terms of greater precision, and the meaning of parties who may use them without any words in explanation may not always be apprehended with certainty. Kennebec Ferry Co. v. Bradstreet, 28 Me. 374, 377.

Of voyage.

The phrase "end of the voyage," when construed literally, means the arrival of the vessel, but as used in the following order, "Please pay William Bradford or his order $24.90 at the end of my voyage in the Schooner Columbus on a fish voyage, if I make enough to pay, after taking out $10.00 I now owe you," it refers to the time when the fish caught on such voyage are sold and converted into money. Bradford v. Drew, 46 Mass. (5 Metc.) 188, 190.

Of will.

Where the will of testator is commenced on the first and is formally concluded upon the third page of a folio of foolscap paper, and signed there, and a fourth page contains another testamentary provision, and what is written on the fourth page is by clear inference incorporated into the body of the will, though the signature is not at the end of the writing in point of space, yet the signature will appear at the end of the will in point of fact, within the statute providing that the will shall be "signed at the end thereof." Appeal of Baker, 107 Pa. 381, 388, 52 Am. Rep. 478.

An instrument is signed at the end thereof when nothing intervenes between the instrument and the subscription. Accordingly, a codicil was signed by a subscribing witness at the end thereof, though there was a blank space of four inches between the signature of the testator and the commencement of the attestation clause. In re Dayger (N. Y.) 47 Hun, 127, 129.

2 Rev. St. p. 63, § 40, requiring the subscription to be at the end of the will, does not mean that the signature must not be after the attestation clause, as such clause constitutes no part of the will; but, if the testator chooses to insert the attestation clause before his signature, and thus make it a part of the will, it does not prevent his subscription from being at the end of the will. Younger v. Duffie, 94 N. Y. 535, 540, 46 Am. Rep. 156. The phrase "end of the will" is to be interpreted according to its plain and obvious sense, and means that the subscription and signature should be the concluding portion of the will. A will containing material provisions relative to testator's property after his signature and the signature of the witnesses is invalid. In re O'Neill's Will, 91 N. Y. 516, 520; Id., 27 Hun, 130, 131.

A will written on the first and third pages of a sheet of paper, and signed at the end of the third page, in a device written on which page were interlined the words, "See next page," on which page—the fourth—was written an unsigned clause making a certain bequest, which interlineation was made by the testator's direction, is "signed at the end thereof," within the meaning of Act April 8, 1833, § 6, providing that every will, unless the person making same shall be prevented by the extremity of his last sickness, shall be signed at the end thereof, etc. Appeal of Baker, 107 Pa. 381, 388, 52 Am. Rep. 478.

Ky. St. c. 21, § 26, providing that, when the law requires any writing to be signed by a party thereto, he shall not be deemed to be a party thereto unless the signature be subscribed at the end or close of such writing, does not require that no words whatever shall follow the signature; but, where a date and the name of the place of making a will follow testator's signature, the statute was complied with, since neither the date nor place of making are a part of the will. Flood v. Pragoff, 79 Ky. 607, 614.

Of year.

Where a portion of the purchase price of a crop of prunes was to be paid when the crop was taken off "at the end of the year," such phrase meant the end of the fruit season, and not the end of the calendar year.

Brown v. Anderson, 19 Pac. 487, 488, 77 Cal. 236.

END LINE.

End lines of a mining claim are not necessarily those appearing as end lines in the original plat of the claims, but, when a mining claim crosses the course of a lode or vein, instead of being along the vein or lode, the end lines are those which measure the width of the claim which crosses the lode. Del Monte Min. & Mill. Co. v. Last Chance Min. & Mill. Co., 18 Sup. Ct. 895, 907, 171 U. S. 55, 43 L. Ed. 72; Argentine Min. Co. v. Terrible Min. Co., 7 Sup. Ct. 1356, 1359, 122 U. S. 478, 30 L. Ed. 1140; Iron Silver Min. Co. v. Elgin Mining & Smelting Co., 6 Sup. Ct. 1177, 1184, 118 U. S. 196, 30 L. Ed. 98; Walrath v. Champion Min. Co., 18 Sup. Ct. 909, 914, 171 U. S. 293, 43 L. Ed. 170.
